Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2008 with funding from Microsoft Corporation

http://www.archive.org/details/literature09traiuoft

JANUARY 4, 1902.

Literature

Published by The Times

VOL. IX.

JULY 6, 1901, TO JANUARY 4, 1902.

59561
9/5/03

INDEX TO VOLUME IX.

PAGE

AUTHORS OF BOOKS REVIEWED.

Abbott, Dr Lyman 30
Achard, A 474
Acland, Lady 307
Adderley, J 608
Adelina 306
Adeney W F 16
Aesculapius 519
Affalo, F G 233
Ahlo, H 304
Airy, G 199
Aitken, G A 636
Aitkin, W F 420
Alengry, F. 606
Allen 21
Alix Orient 448
Allbert, Miss 612
Allchin, Dr 234
Alldridge, T. J. 490
Allen, G. 536
Andrews, K. 563
Anthony Hope 140
Armitage, Capt 88
Armstrong, R. A 283
Ashton, M. 235
Bachelier, T. 446
Badenek, N. 605
Bagot, Mrs. C. 417
Bagot, R. 326
Baker, J. 447
Balfour, A 517
Balfour, G. 350
Barlow, J. 307
Barr, A 308
Bartram, G 375
Bate, Rev H N 348
Bateman, M. 424
Bateson, M. 370
Bayfield M A 347
Basin, R. 473
Beaumont, W W. 259
Beavan, A H 54
Beeke, L. 494
Belcher, J. 347
Belden, J. 589
Bell, Mrs. A. 608
Bell, Mrs H. 518
Bell Ranske, J. 18
Benson, E. F 303
Benson, N. 114
Berenson, B. 466
Bernacchi, L. 324
Besant, Sir W. 239, 304
Bicknell, P. F 613
Biddulph, Col. 611
Binilloss, H. 402
Birrell, A. 280
Blornson 609
Blissett, N. K. 613
Bloundelle Burton, J. 304, 448
Blunt, C 60
Boas, F. S. 634
Bodley, J. E. C. 63
Boldrewood, R. 163
Boothby, G. 417
Bourget, P. 473
Bourne, G. 536
Bowles, M 449
Bradley, A C 392
Bradley, A. G. 322
Brandes, G. 342
Brewsan, A. 136
Bronnle, Dr. 470
Brooke-Hunt, V. 420
Brown, A 447
Brown, J. 347
Brown Linnet 493
Browne, E. A. 518
Browne, E. G 638
Browne, G. W. 474
Browning, O. 378
Bryan, S. 348
Buchheim, E. S. 471

PAGE

AUTHORS OF BOOKS REVIEWED— (continued)

Carey, R. N. 403
Carlile, Mr. 278
Castle, A and E. 422
Cavalier, Rev. E. F 40
Cay, N 295
Challaoe, R. 402
Chambers, R. W 401
Chevalier, A 539
Chouley, C. H. 166
Clark, C. G. 233
Clark, T 214
Clarke, A 448
Clear, Claudius 471
Cleeve, L 563, 613
Clifford, H. 164
Clifford, Mrs 189
Cobb, T 446
Cockburn, Sir J. 341
Cockerell, D. 560
Coleridge, M G. 518
Coleridge, H 233
Coleridge, C 539
Common, Mr. 62
Connell, F. N 376
Conrad, J 164
Constable, F C. 141
Cook, E. T 13, 114
Cook, Mrs. E. T. 511
Cook, S. A 470
Cooper, E. H. 613
Cope, G M 282
Corlett, B. 235
Corelli, Miss M. 233
Cornish, W. 470
Corvo, Baron 514
Cotton J G 64
Courthope, W J 36
Cowan, S. 300
Cox, Rev. C J 234
Coylee, K 114
Crane, Stephen 66
Crawford, F. M. 472
Crawford, W. S. 635
Creed, S. 377
Creighton, Mandell 536
Creswell, R. H 419
Crockett, S. R. 349, 360, 517
Croker, Mrs. 561
Crouse, R 164
Crommelin, M. 306
Crouch, A P. 613
Crowninshield, Mrs. 164
Crozier, J. B. 610
Cruickshank, J. W and A M 368
Cuningham, Lady F. 449
D'Aguilar, Sir G C. 282
Danes, R 234
Danvers, C 563
Davenport, H 608
Davidson, M. M. 439
Davidson, J 16, 302
Dawson, A J 562
Dawson, W. J. 534
Delaire, J 305
Delannoy, B. 214
Dickson, W. K 420
Ditchfield, P. H. 536
Dixie, Lady F. 417
Dobson, A. 186
Dodd, A. F. 283
Dodgson, C. 489
Donovan, Dick 215
Doubleday, A. H. 256, 535
Douglas, G 492
Dowie, M. M 283
Downer, Prof 515
Downie, J. 346
Doyle, C. 560
Drane, H J 494
Draper, W. H 42
Drummond, H. 351
Dugnid, C. 90

PAGE

AUTHORS OF BOOKS REVIEWED— (continued)

Dusting, G. 377
Eeves, Miss C 305
Eickling, H 418
Fielding, J 606
Findlay, J T 449
Finnemore, J 346
Fitzgerald, Percy 16
Fitzgibbon, M. 344
Fletcher, E 448
Fletcher, J S .. .. [illegible]
Flowerdew, H 613
Forbes, E. 308
Ford, S G 18
Forester, F R 494
Fountain, P 491
Fowler, E. T 92
France, Anatole 116
Fraser, Prof A C 62
Fraser, H. 164
Fraser, J. 448
Fraser, W A. 63
Frazer, N. L. 348
Freemantle, F. E. 559
Frere, W. H. 648
Fuller, H 308
Funck Brentano, F. .. .. [illegible]
Furniss, H. .. .. [illegible]
Furnivall, Dr. 443
Gadon, H 613
Galton, T. 91
Garland, H 141
Garnett, Dr R. 491
Gatke, Dr C 373
George, H B 59
Gerard, D. 234, 447
Gerard, M 613
Gilberne, A. 561
Gilbert, H. 491
Gissing, A 518
Glanville, B. 305
Glanville, J N .. .. [illegible]
Glover, T R 634
Godfrey, J T 140
Godley, A D 347
Gomme, G. L. 372
Gordon, Rev. C. W. 92
Gorton, Lieut-Col 91
Gotch, J. A 337
Gould, Baring .. .. [illegible]
Graham, J 280
Graham, R. B C .. .. 341, [illegible]
Gray, A. 613
Gray, W 518
Greenhow, Surgeon-Major 351
Greenidge, E. H. J. 347
Gregory, E. C. .. .. [illegible]
Grey, Grattan .. .. [illegible]
Griffith Francis 37
Grieve, Alex. .. .. [illegible]
Griffiths, G 561
Grosser, H. G. 539
Gurney, Mrs. G. .. .. [illegible]
Gwynn, S. 446
Hackett, J 420
Haggard, Rider 394
Hall, D 491
Hall, H R. 365
Hall, S. E. 489
Hamilton, C. 306
Hamilton, Lord E. 448
Hamilton, M. 350
Hanwell, A E. 448
Hanshew, T W. 394
Hopgood, Isabel F 517
Hardwich, J. M 336
Hardy, T .. .. [illegible]
Harland, M .. .. [illegible]
Harper, H A. 303
Harrison, Frederick 474
Harrison, Frederic 538
Harrod, Mrs .. .. [illegible]
Harte, Mrs. B .. .. [illegible]

PAGE

AUTHORS OF BOOKS REVIEWED— (continued)

Hebron, Mr .. .. [illegible]
Hocking, Silas .. .. [illegible]
Holder, F .. .. [illegible]
Hope, Dean .. .. [illegible]
Holland, H .. .. [illegible]
Hollard, C .. .. [illegible]
Holmader, Dr .. .. [illegible]
Holme, G .. .. [illegible]
Holt White, R .. .. [illegible]
Home, G .. .. [illegible]
Hooper, F .. .. [illegible]
Hooper, W. E. .. .. [illegible]
Hope, I. W .. .. [illegible]
Hope, H St John .. .. [illegible]
Hope, L .. .. [illegible]
Hope, W .. .. [illegible]
Horning, E. W .. .. [illegible]
Horsburgh, F. L. S .. .. .. [illegible]
Howard, K .. .. [illegible]
Howard, Lady M .. .. [illegible]
Howard, N .. .. [illegible]
Howells, W D .. .. [illegible]
Huffer, F. M .. .. [illegible]
Hume, F .. .. [illegible]
Hume, M A S .. .. [illegible]
Hunter, Sir W .. .. [illegible]
Hutchinson, H .. .. [illegible]
Hutten, Baroness von .. .. [illegible]
Ischester Countess of .. .. [illegible]
Ingram, Dean .. .. [illegible]
Ingram J K .. .. [illegible]
Innes, C R .. .. [illegible]
Jacobs, W W .. .. [illegible]
Jaggard, W .. .. [illegible]
James H A .. .. [illegible]
Jastrow Prof J .. .. [illegible]
Jefferson, R. L. .. .. [illegible]
John Myre .. .. [illegible]
John Oliver Hobbes .. .. [illegible]
Johnson, F .. .. [illegible]
Johnson O .. .. [illegible]
Johnston, R M .. .. [illegible]
Johnstone, P .. .. [illegible]
Jones, Constance .. .. [illegible]
Jones, G .. .. [illegible]
Joy, A W .. .. [illegible]
Jusserand, Mons. .. .. [illegible]
Kaufmann, Rev M .. .. [illegible]
Keightley S. R. .. .. [illegible]
Keith, L .. .. [illegible]
Kelly, E .. .. [illegible]
Kidd, Dr W .. .. [illegible]
King, L. W .. .. [illegible]
Kinnear, A .. .. [illegible]
Kipling Rudyard .. .. [illegible]
Knight, Prof W .. .. [illegible]
Knowlson, Mrs. G W .. .. .. [illegible]
Koch, T. W .. .. [illegible]
Kotzebue P .. .. [illegible]
Laboulaye, P .. .. [illegible]
Lambe, J L .. .. [illegible]
Lang, A .. .. [illegible]
Largent, Father .. .. [illegible]
Latham, Rev Henry .. .. [illegible] Latter, H .. .. [illegible]
Laut, A C .. .. [illegible]
Laverton, Mrs .. .. [illegible]
Lawless, Emily .. .. [illegible]
Lawson, H .. .. [illegible]
Le Queux, W .. .. [illegible]
Leavenworth, Prof .. .. [illegible]
Lee Capt W M .. .. [illegible]
Lees, Dr .. .. [illegible]
Legg Dr W .. .. [illegible]
Leighton, Mr and Mrs .. .. .. [illegible]
Levy Bruhl, L .. .. [illegible]
Levs, J K .. .. [illegible]
Liberty, A. L .. .. [illegible]
Liddell, A C .. .. [illegible]
Lilly, W S .. .. [illegible]
Lindsay, J S .. .. [illegible]

PAGE

AUTHORS OF BOOKS REVIEWED—(continued)

Macfarlane, M. ..
Macgregor, M. E. ..
Mackenzie, A. M. ..
Mackenzie, G. C. .. 163
Macleod, D. .. 376
Macpherson, H. .. 412
Madden, R. .. 234
Madden, M. .. 278
Madge, G. ..
Magdalene, S. H. .. 421
Magnaghten, S. ..
Magnay, M. .. 278
Madge ..
Magnay, Sir W. .. 250
Malcolm, C. H. .. 15
Mallory, L. ..
Manchard, E. C. .. 34
Mark, H. Y. .. 53
Marsden, R. ..
Marsh, R. .. 384
Marshall, C. S. .. 210
Marshall, J. ..
Marston, E. .. 11
Martin, Mrs. ..
Mason, A. E. W. .. 472, 6..
Mason, C. A. ..
Mason, F. ..
Maughan, M. S. ..
Maxwell, A. ..
Maxwell-Gray ..
Maxwell-Scott, Hon. Mrs. .. 561
Mayhew, J. G. ..
Mayne Lindsay .. 239
McCrie, R. W. .. 513
McCabe, J. .. 508
McCrindle, J. W. .. 470
McIntosh, H. .. 38
Mead, G. E. .. 612
Meade, L. T. .. 180
Meadows, A. .. 613
Meakin, A. M. ..
Meakin, B. .. 277
Menzies, Dr. Allan .. 38, 6..
Merriman, H. S. .. 560
Meyer, A. N. .. 180
Middlemass, J. .. 449
Miles, Franklin .. 308
Mills, T. M. .. 347
Milne, L. E. ..
Minchin, E. ..
Minchin, S. W. .. 208, 344
Mitford, M. .. 9..
Mitford, Phyllis M. ..
Montague, A. R. H. .. 180
Montgomery, C. .. 604
Montgomery, Lieut.-Col. .. 88
Montrésor, Mrs. .. 422
Moore, G. .. 66
Moore, H. C. .. 520
Moore, J. F. .. 161
Moore, J. S. .. 609
Morley, E. .. 373
Morrison, G. .. 346
Morrison, M. .. 637
Morton, H. .. 508
Mosheim, Mrs. .. 180
Mowbray, J. M. .. 613
Muirhead, .. 620
Munro, Mr. .. 17, 560
Murray, D. C. .. 422
Murray, H. .. 41
Nail, G. H. .. 347
Nash, P. J. .. 188
Newdegate-Newdegate, Lady .. 372
Nicholls, T. .. 347
Nicholls, C. .. 470
Noel, Lady Augusta .. 17
Norris, F. .. 304, 472
Norton, A. .. 616
Oates, F. A. .. 281 Oliphant, M. .. 489
Oliphant, D. J. .. 348
Ordmer, Dr. .. 112
Osgood, S. .. 42
Oppenheim, E. P. .. 93, 304, 562
Osborne, H. .. 449
Osborne, Lord Albert .. 491
Oudinot, R. L. ..
Page, S. .. 444
Paine, A. M. .. 305
Palgrave, M. E. .. 610
Palmerley, E. .. 491
Parker, E. .. 274
Parker, F. H. .. 679
Parker, G. .. 348
Parsons, Mrs. C. .. 303
Paterson, Mrs. H. de la ..
Patrick, D. .. 566
Paul, H. W. .. 636
Payne, W. .. 612
Pearce, E. H. .. 566
Pearce, J. H. .. 424
Pembertons, Mrs. .. 374
Perth, Mrs. .. 491
Peterborough, Dean of .. 283
Petersen, M. H. .. 349
Phelps, W. .. 611
Philips, E. .. 589
Phillips, W. A. ..
Phillips, L. M. ..
Phillipson, F. .. 375

PAGE

AUTHORS OF BOOKS REVIEWED—(continued)

Pigeh, E. .. 91
Pullan, Rev. L. .. 38
Q .. 628
Quiller, H. .. 614
Rae, R. S. .. 13, 269, 282
Ralph Connor .. 92
Randal, J. .. 274
Randall Marlow, D. .. 343
Rankine, R. ..
Rathbone, H. .. 282
Raymond, W. .. 303, 443
Reid, G. A. .. 638
Reed, W. A. .. 31
Rhys, E. .. 61
Ridgeway, Prof. W. ..
Rijnhart, S. C. .. 44
Rolfe .. 284
Robinson, E. K. .. 344
Robson, P. .. 11
Rogers, Mr. .. 337
Ross, Dr. E. A. .. 279
Rossiter, P. .. 561
Rounsdell, C. S. .. 346
Rousseau, V. .. 305
Russell, F. .. 376
Russell, Lady .. 371
Scott, Temple .. 636
St. Aubyn, A. .. 3..
St. Clair, W. .. 26
St. Cyres, Viscount .. 340
St. Lawrence, A. .. 281
Sanders, E. K. .. 340
Saunders, A. .. 446
Saunders, T. B. .. 419
Savage, R. H. .. 589
Schaster, Dr. .. 3..
Schwab, Prof. .. 1..
Scott, L. .. 399
Scudamore, C. .. 421
Selous, E. .. 9
Sergeant, A. .. 214, 376
Setoun, G. .. 612
Shannon, J. C. .. 307
Sharpe, R. R. .. 369
Shaylor, J. .. 282
Shed, M. P. .. 67, 447
Shields, Prof. C. W. .. 432
Shipley, A. E. .. 513
Shore, Major .. 494
Siam, Crown Prince of .. 492
Sidgwick, A. .. 62
Sidgwick, Mrs. .. 539
Sidney, P. .. 325
Sims, G. R. .. 562
Sinnette, E. .. 65
Skeat, W. W. .. 344, 471
Steed, C. .. 281
Slater, J. H. .. 517
Slater, Prof. W. F. .. 39
Smith, C. .. 215, 348
Smith, C. F. .. 510
Smith, F. E. .. 345
Smith, H. A. .. 345
Smith, J. R. .. 113
Smith, Prof. G. A. .. 472
Snell, F. J. .. 346
Snowden, K. .. 374
Somerset-Beth, Prof. .. 347
Stacpoole, H. de V. .. 447
Stature, W. J. .. 68
Stavordale, Lord .. 533
Stearns, Mr. .. 468
Stevens, Mrs. G. W. .. 345
Stein, M. A. .. 469
Stephen, L. .. 430
Stephens, E. .. 375
Stephens, H. N. .. 378
Stephens, W. R. .. 558
Stephenson, S. .. 589
Sterne, P. .. 284
Stevenson, R. .. 344
Story, A. T. .. 308
Stratton, S. S. .. 367
Stuart, E. .. 235
Stuart, J. .. 344
Sturgis, J. .. 374
Suthug, E. B. .. 308
Sundowner .. 165
Sutherland, G. .. 35
Swetten, G. .. 375
Sykes, J. F. .. 538
Symons, A. .. 609
Tallentyre, S. G. .. 471
Tanqueray, Mrs. B. .. 376
Tarika .. 639
Tarkington, Booth .. 93
Tennison, E. L. .. 569
Taylor, A. E. .. 62
Taylor, L. .. 618
Tennant, Miss .. 65
Terry, C. S. .. 256
Thatcher, O. J. .. 537
Thiman, C. A. .. 303
Thomas, B. M. .. 235
Thompson, C. L. .. 346
Thompson, J. .. 347
Thompson, M. .. 284
Thompson, Sir H. .. 213
Thomson, Miss .. 346
Thorpe, C. H. .. 42
Townsend, M. .. 321

PAGE

AUTHORS OF BOOKS REVIEWED—(continued)

Van Vorst, B. and M. .. 304
Vartenie .. 518
Venn, V. .. 611
Vernon, W. .. 111
Vetch, Col. R. H. .. 40
Villari, L. .. 457
Villebois Marcuil, Col. de .. 341
Violet Fane .. 483
Vincelly, E. .. 231, 471, 6..
Voynich, Mrs. .. 283
Waite, A. E. .. 232
Walker, W. S. .. 638
Wall, A. H. .. 346
Wallace, E. .. 560
Wallace, H. .. 612
Walpole, Rev. G. H. .. 348
Ward, Prof. M. .. 281
Warden, F. .. 116, 281
Ware, F. .. 269
Warren, A. .. 472
Watson, E. H. L. .. 588
Watson, J. (Ian Maclaren) .. 534
Watson, M. .. 214
Watts, E. .. 284
Weatherhead, T. C. .. 348
Weilly, Capt. .. 90
Wells, H. G. .. 465
Wen Chung .. 14
Westall, W. .. 308, 422
Westcott, Dr. .. 139
Western, E. .. 416
Weyman, S. .. 189, 472
Wharton, E. .. 66
Whates, Mr. .. 233
Whitby, Beatrice .. 5..
White, H. .. 350
White, P. .. 141
White, S. E. .. 638
Whitfield, E. E. .. 260
Whitman, S. .. 538
Whitall, Sir J. W. .. 610
Whyte, Dr. Alexander .. 40
Wickhoff, F. .. 167
Wiggin, K. D. .. 65
Wilkin, A. .. 313
Wilkins, W. H. .. 556
Williams, J. .. 605
Williamson, D. .. 420
Williamson, G. C. .. 399
Willis-Bund, J. W. .. 535
Wilson, A. .. 346
Wilson, F. W. .. 188
Wilson, Mrs. J. .. 606
Wilson, T. W. .. 493
Wilwynne, K. .. 165
Windle, B. C. A. .. 557
Wolf, L. .. 258
Wood, C. W. .. 509
Wood, S. C. .. 345
Wood, W. .. 65, 539
Wordsworth, Rev. C. .. 418
Yorke, P. C. .. 347
Yrjö-Koskinen, E. S. .. 612
Zack .. 446

CONTRIBUTORS OF SIGNED ARTICLES, LETTERS, &c.—

A. G. .. 403
Armour, Margaret .. 337
B. W. M. .. 580
Barlow, George .. 118
Barron, Oswald .. 68
Beeble, Harold .. 384, 462
Bell, A. F. .. 266
Bell, Mackenzie .. 285
Bourget, Paul .. 100
Bowles, F. G. .. 632
Brotherton, C. H. .. 615
Cairns, W. .. 50
Calderon, G. .. 202
Campbell, W. W. .. 290
Canney, E. H. .. 378
Cant-Wall, E. .. 46, 520
Carlyle, T. .. 132
Case, W. S. .. 160
Cazenove, C. F. .. 238
Cheetham, S. .. 95
Chesterton, G. K. .. 488
Clark, C. E. .. 262
Cook, E. T. .. 181
Cook, Mrs. E. T. .. 410
Cox, Rev. J. Charles .. 8
Crowdy, W. L. .. 180, 248
D. P. .. 262
Delaire, J. .. 353
Dobson, Austin .. 590
Draper, W. H. .. 252
Dutchin, E. H. W. .. 515
E. D. L. .. 70, 118
Eastgate, G. .. 328
F. G. .. 614
Falconer, C. M. .. 521
Fisher, W. E. Garrett .. 315
Forster, Max .. 238
Fowler, H. W. .. 256
Frantz, Henri .. 292
Fullerton, W. M. .. 439
Fyfe, W. H. .. 238

CONTRIBUTORS OF TITLES, LETTE

Hart, F. H. ..
Harding, J. E. ..
Hartshorne, Albert
Haultain, A. ..
Henderson, T. F.
Henty, G. A. ..
Hodgetts, E. A. B.
Hogarth, D. G.
Hole, W. G. ..
"Harry Chander
J. A. R. ..
J. D. ..
"Johnson Primus
Jones, T. Rhys
Joss, A. W.
Judge, Mat.
Keane, E. T.
King John
Kipling, Rudyard
Lang, A. ..
Law, Alice
Macdonald, H. C.
Machray, Robert
Magnus, Laurie
Maguire, A.
Marston, R. B.
Martinengo-Cesaresco
Maude, Aylmer
McBride, E. ..
McChesney, D. G.
McKenna, E. M. M.
Metcalfe, C. ..
Mew, Egan ..
Nicklin, J. A. ..
Nugent, G. ..
Nutt, Alfred ..
Oman, C. W. ..
"Oromian ..
Pemberton, J. H.
Perris, G. H. ..
"Philologus
Phipson, Evacuates
Prall, Beatrice J.
Quiller, Harry ..
R. E. V. ..
Rayment, H. ..
Roberts, R. E. ..
Roberts, Morley
Rouse, W. H. D.
Roylance-Kent, C.
Sampson, D. N.
Schwartz, A. ..
Seton-Walter, W.
Shaw, Walter ..
Sidney, Philip ..
Sillard, R. M. ..
Skeat, W. W. ..
Smith, Goldwin
Story, A. T. ..
Tarell, C. Camp Tegetmeier, W. B.
Thomas, Edward
Thring, G. H. ..
Toynbee, W. ..
Tyler, T. ..
"Violet Fane"
W. M. ..
W. S. C. ..
Walkley, A. B., 13, 248, 321, 362, 366, 553, 586, 630
Waller, A. R. ..
Wallis, C. ..
Warren, A. ..
Waters, W. G.
Watson, E. H. Lacon 528, 631
Waugh, Arthur
Weldrick, J. F.
Wells, H. G. ..
Wheeler, E. ..
Whiting, M. R.
Williams, W. E.
Wilson, H. Schütz
Winchester, Bishop Winchester, Dean o
Wolf, Lucien ..
Wynne, C. W.

CORRESPOND

Andrew Lang ..
Appin Murder, The Archæological Nom Artist as Critic, The Australian Verse
Besant and Rice
Byron and Southey Casket Letters, The Charlotte Yonge Ma
Chinese Spoils at P Coronation Service,
Crabbe's Aldeburgh
Cretan Symbols
Deacon Brodie
Dickens Examinatio
Dickens, A New
Elizabeth's Treatme
English Fiction in G

PAGE

CORRESPONDENCE—(continued)
Limitation of Dramatic Themes, The 513, 564
Lions in the Path 495
Literary Agents 237, 281
Literary Earnings
"Lucas Malet" on Fiction .. 21
Memorial to the late Mr. R. D. Blackmore 378
Morrisson, Man in Shakespeare, The 615
Mistakes 2
Mr. Henderson and the Cricket Letters 494
Mr. Henley and R. L. S. .. 519
Piquet or Écarté 282
Rachel, Sarah and the Demoiselle Shamela .. 566, 590 Shakespeare's First Folio .. 282
"Sir Long" 262
Stephen, R. H. 60
Stevenson 402
Sunset Records 616
"Two Girls and a Dream" .. 353
Unpublished Letters of Dr. Johnson .. 69
Use of Foreign Phrases, The .. 46, 80, 94
"Varsity Journalism" .. 591, 614
Walt Whitman 281
Was Amy Robsart Killed? 353, 377, 403, 425, 452, 476
Weltgeschichte 477
William Morris 285
Wiltshire Words .. .. 191, 2[illegible]
"What's What?" 477
Young Cricketer's Tutor, The 94

DRAMA—
Becky Sharp 230
Beyond Human Power 494
Blue Beard, Liberty Hall 630
Course du Flambeau, La 12
Iris 298
Last of the Dandies, The 415
Limitation of Dramatic Themes, The 530, 586
Mummy and The Humming Bird, The—A Tight Corner 365
Sarah Bernhardt at Her Best 58
Sentimentalist, The—Likeness of the Night, The—Sherlock Jones 431
Sherlock Holmes—Are you a Mason? .. 274
Shadow Dance, The 488
Undercurrent, The—The Great Millionaire 321
When We were Twenty-one—John Durnford, M.P. 256

HEADED ARTICLES—
Across the Border .. 364, 463, 508
Alexander Smith Redivivus 631
Alfred the Great—
Influence on English Culture .. 251
As Man of Letters 252
Bibliography of 253
Millenary of 294
Among the Reviews and Magazines 20, 43, 118, 142, 236, 352, 376, 423, 451, 475
Art Exhibitions 424, 509
Bibliography of the War, A 56
Bibliography of Victor Hugo 108
Bibliography of Carlyle's Works 131
Bibliography of Ruskin 189
Bibliography of King Alfred 253
Book Auctions of 1901 629
Book Sales 91, 141, 450
Books of the Year 622
"Botanic Garden" 600
Carlyle as Schoolmaster 131
Carlyle, Unpublished Letter from .. 132
Crabbe's Aldeburgh 294
Dickens and His Illustrators 581
Dickens—His Life and Writings .. 576
Dickens, Various Editions of 582
Dores Press, The 603
Fiction for the Holidays (List) 42
Fifteenth Century Book of Sport, A .. 632

FOREIGN LETTERS—
Germany—Wilhelm Raabe 319
France 437
"Jack Harkaway," The Creator of .. 298
London Bridge and its Associations .. 599
Mick McQuaid 390
Modern Greek Iliad, A 506
Pan-Celtic Congress, The 211
Philosophy of the Sale-Room, The .. 11 Quest for Stevensonia, The 86
"Remembrancers" 531
Report on Bookbinding, The 44
Ruskin and His Publisher 183
Ruskiniana, The Value of Rare 183
Ruskin Bibliography, A 189
Samuel Richardson 389
Scotland in 1901 7
Shakespeare First Folios 58
Some Movements in Victorian Poetry—
1. The Period and the Field 86
2. The Poetry of Faith and Aspiration 109
3. The Poetry of Reflection and Doubt 134
4. The Poetry of Emotion 157
5. The Poetry of Reaction and Artifice 185

PAGE

LITERATURE PORTRAITS—
Benson, Edward Frederick 396
Carlyle, Thomas .. .. 1[illegible]
Emerson, Ralph Waldo .. .. [illegible]
Esmond, Harry V. .. .. 4[illegible]
Gissing, George 60
Hardy, Mr. Thomas 4
Harrison, F. .. .. 4[illegible]
Hichens, Robert .. .. [illegible]
Hugo, Victor .. .. 1[illegible]
Hueffer, Ford Madox 147
Lang, Andrew .. .. 4[illegible]
Lee, Sidney .. .. 4[illegible]
Lucy, H. W. 441
Marguerite, Paul and Victor .. [illegible]
Martin, Sir Theodore 419
Morris, William 24
Loti, Pierre 28
Ruskin, John 171
Stevenson, Robert Louis 76
Swinburne, Algernon Charles .. 313
Tolstoy, Count 195
Ward, Mrs. Humphry 503
Wells, Herbert George 333
Wyman, Stanley J. 527
Whitman, Walt 219
Zangwill, Israel 549

NOTES—
Abbott, E., Death of 218, 241
Aberdeen University Library .. 215, 590
"Agamemnon," Log-books of 460
Alcan, M. Felix 413
Alfred Millenary 170, 194
Alfred Millenary Celebrations .. 265, 289
Alfred the Great, Works of 286
Allen, George 290
Allen, J. H. 548
Ameer of Afghanistan, The 331
American Book Auction Prices 459
American Bookselling 591 American Bookstores 266
American Collectors 545
American Invaders, The 331, 545
American Library Association 424
American Literature 217
American Magazines 617
American Preachers 482
American Publishing Trade 499
American University Degrees 407
American View of Rudyard Kipling 170, 218
American War of the Rebellion, The .. 435
Anderson, J. E. 74
Anderson, Robert 331
Andrew Marvell's Cottage 61
Anglo-Saxon Review 400
Annuals, New 452
Anthology Compiling 74, 612
Appin Murder, The 73
Argyll, Dowager Duchess of 290
Arnold, Matthew, Memorial Prize .. 459
Arnold, Mrs. Matthew 1
"Aronetistes" Society 146
"A Song," by H. J. S. 122
Austin, A. 26
Australian and Canadian Poetry .. 358
Authors' Copyright 145
"Average Reader, The" 266
Bagot, Mrs. C. 408
Bailey, H. C. 122
Balfour, Mr. 483
Ball, Sir R. 332
Ball's Guide (Alpine Club Ed.) .. 23
Balzac, Statue to 591
Barlow, J. 526
Beale, Miss D. 408
Becky Sharp 194
Bell, Miss M. 118
Bernhardt, Mme. S. 3, 51
Besant, Sir Walter 22, 384, 432
Best Selling Novels 525
Bethnal-green Free Library .. 351, 425
Bibliographical Society 384
Bibliothèque Nationale .. 27, 268, 312
Birmingham Argus 531 Birmingham Free Libraries 166
Birrell, A. 241, 460
Bishop, Mrs. 332
Bishopsgate Institute 475
Bismarck's Memoirs 499
Blackie and Sons 332
Blind, The Books of the 313
Bodleian Library 146
Bookbinders' Technical Terms 546
Bookbinding 526
Book, How to Open a 411
"Booklovers' Library, The" 545
Book Sales 432
Book-selling Experiment, A 427
Book-selling Trade, The 452
"Book, The" 47
Books, Prices of 481
Books and Newspapers, Improvement of 526
Bookstalls in Charing-cross-road 170, 194
Boothby, G., as a Dramatist 50
Bossuet 408

PAGE

NOTES—(continued)
Bompas, Messrs. J. and F. .. .. [illegible]
Bunyan, John .. .. [illegible]
Burnand, F. C. .. .. [illegible]
Burns Cottage .. .. 268 .. [illegible]
Burns Cottage and Museum 146
Burns, T. J. 384
Bury Art Gallery .. .. .. [illegible]
Butler, Lady Elizabeth W. 384
"By Sword and Fire" .. .. .. [illegible]
Byron's Early Poems .. .. .. [illegible]
Byron's House, Aberdeen .. .. [illegible]
Byron, Statue to Lord .. .. .. [illegible]
Caine, Hall .. 268, 384, 4[illegible] .. [illegible]
Caine, Ralph Hall .. .. .. [illegible]
Cairns, W. .. .. [illegible]
Calverley .. .. [illegible]
Camberwell Public Library 116
Cambridge University Library 13
"Canada, Women in" .. .. .. [illegible]
Canadian and Australian Poetry .. [illegible]
Canton, William .. 449 .. .. [illegible]
Carlyle, Mrs. .. .. [illegible]
Carnegie Libraries .. .. .. [illegible]
Carnegie, Mr. 67, 122, 1[illegible], 2[illegible], 384, 4[illegible]
Carter, Canon T. Thelluson .. [illegible]
Carter, Reginald .. .. .. [illegible]
"Cashel Byron's Profession" .. 383
"Century of French Romance" .. 143
Charter by King Robert the Bruce .. 60
Christ Church, Woburn square, Theft from .. .. 4[illegible], 441
Christina Rossetti Cross, The .. 4[illegible]
Church Congress and Mr. Kipling .. 211
Clairon, Mme. .. .. [illegible]
Clarétie, Jules 165, 172
Clark, H. 122
Clark, J. G. .. .. [illegible]
Clemenceau, M. Georges 412
Clifford, Hugh 483
Clive, W. B., Change of Address .. 193
Cluny Castle 73
Comédie Française 357
Compiègne Library 217
Comrie, Literary Associations of .. 74
Connoisseur 265
Cook, C. H. 121
Cook, W. M. 290
Copyright Act 121
Copyright Law in Siam 483
Corelli, Miss 170, 312, 443
Coronation Literature 457
"Corpus Numinorum Italicorum" .. 432
"Count Hannibal" 432
Courtney, W. L. 483
Crabbe and Aldeburgh 265
Crampton's Magazine 483
Cranston, Dr. James 266
Cresi, Mrs. 78
Crockat, The Literature of 51
Cripps's Memoirs 170
Critic, The American 482
Criticism 2
Cromwell Library 67, 146
Dante Society 332, 460
Derechef, R. 23
Diarmid and Grania 384
Dilulin, J. C. 264
Dickens, American Editions of .. 431
Dickens and Christmas 571
Dickens Letters 408
Dickens Revival 143, 342
Dictionaries Wanted by a Correspondent 194
"Dictionnaire de l'Usage, The" .. 232 Disease in Books 546
Dixie, Lady Florence .. .. [illegible]
Dobson, Austin 73
"Dolly Dialogues, The" 290
"Dooley, Mr., The Original" .. 266, 408
Dover Charters 239
Dores Press 554
Dugen Bridel, The 193
Doyle, Dr. Conan 408
Dramatic Artists Association of France 145
Dryden's House in Gerrard street .. 2[illegible]
Dünzer, H. 594
Durban Library .. .. [illegible]
Durham, Bishop of 98
Duse, Signora 242
Early Printed Books 351
Edinburgh Academy 122
Editiones Principes 481
Editorial Changes 189
Edwards, E., Life of 118
Edwards, Professor O. M. 459
Electra 408
Elizabethan Stage Society 482
Ely, G. H. 616
English Illustrated Magazine, The .. 432
English v. American Libraries 166
English Literature at Oxford 27
"English Literature, Illustrated History of" 290
"Erewhon Revisited" 289
"Eternal City, The" 194, 501
"Ethical Philosophy of Sidgwick" .. 47
Eton College 408
"Etrennes Helvétiques" 193
European Governesses in Musulman Families 97
Evans, Chancellor 501
Every Man 3, 26, 49

PAGE

Novels—(continued)
Making and Reading of Newspapers, The 75
Man from Blankly's 189
Memoirs 1
Moors 37
Magnetic, A 17
Mallock, Fred 194
Marshall, H. R 322
Martin, Sir Theodore 383, 392, 394
Masson, Professor 427
Master and Slave 373
Max Müller, Prof. Library of 1
Mechanical Fellows 194
Men of Letters as Hotel Proprietors in Switzerland 218 Merejkowski, History of the Conquest of 3
Meynell, Mrs. 317
Mind and Library 13
Mitchell Press, The 373
Mind 463, 546
Monmouth, Duke of 44
Monuments of the Bodleian 44
Modern History Lost at Oxford 28
Monson's Indians 194
Montague, Professor T 311
Montague Cornwall, The 1
Montbrun 74, 194
Montreal Free Library 1
Moore, G. 1
Morley, Quarterly 1
Morris, Dr 242
Morrow, J. and the Publishers' Congress 3
National Antarctic Expedition 28
National Home-reading Union 1 Nation's Pictures, The 231
Neale, Death of 3
Neil, R. A 2
New Testament, Twentieth Century 46
Newell, E. M 7
Newton, J. E 112
Newton, T. J 14
Nights of Madness 478
Nobel Prize, The 546, 571
Nothing Else Way 96
Nordenskjöld, Prof. Baron von 166
Northern Counties Library Association 1
Northern Mail, The 1
Norwich Workhouse Library 166
Norris, Chase 427
Norris, Frank, of 311
Novels with a Purpose 171
Novels Without Names 194
Nowell, The 243
Old English Plate 1
Omar Khayyam Club 492
Omar Khayyam, French Version 1
Only Way, The 146
Oxford, University 332
O'Neill, Max 332
Ormond, Miss 95
Orpen, Dodd 1
Oxford University Press 447
Paddington Free Library 1
Pan Coffee Congress 194, 242
Parker, Gilbert 1
Parnell, C. S., Library of 75, 120
Parnell, Sir S., Death of 47
Passing Thoughts on Books 548
Pearson's Illustrated Index of the Spring Magazines 25
Peters, Dr. C. 98
Petersham Church Guide 1
Petrie, Sir Flinders, Tomb of 194
Philippine Wars 1
Phillips, C. 122
"Pilgrim's Progress," Papers in 311
Pinkerton, A. M 499
Pinsent, A. W 23, 394
Pitman, Mrs 290
Plays, Six 1
Plunkett, The 242, 1
Poetics, Club, The 1
Poets, Plays, and Playwrights 478
Pollock, G. F 466
Portsmouth Public Library 1
Post Office Atlas 1
Poole, The Bibliography of 1
Portuguese Language Questions 1
Prince, G. F 146
Prince of the Early Middle Ages 5 Prophets 372
Pugh, Professor J 74
Prophecies of King Edward the Sixth 1
Pretty Girls, The Oxford 467
Pioneer and Pioneer of Water Tower 1
Pyramids, Nineteen 75
Quiller-Couch 475, 1
Public Libraries for Ireland 1
Public Libraries at the Cape 13
Publishers, Authors, and Agents 433 Publishers' Readers 1
Punch 1
Quarterly Review 218, 394
Queen of Romance 1
Queen Victoria, Letters of 47
Quiller-Couch, Commentaries of 372
Quotations, Proverbs of 98
Quackery, The Humbug 1
Quarter, An English 436
Quarterly Review 1
Quiller-Couch 1

Novels—(continued)
Regent Bookbinding 3
Royal Literature 47
Royal Patronage of London 501
Rule of the Third Order of St. Francis of Assisi 1
Ruskin's Birthplace 312
Russian Men of Letters Exiled 48
Rylands, Mrs 218
Sacrifice of Lucy, The 24, 49
St. Petersburg Novels in 1
Sale or Return System 28
Sampson, Professor 394
San Francisco Free Library 97
Sardou, M. V 394
Satyrs 483
Scaliger Centenary 242
Schoenbach, Dr. Bruno 432
Schoolmasters' Tour 407
Schopen 192
Scott Publishing Firm, The Walter 519
Scott, William 31
Scrivener, Dr., Monument to 194
Seaman, Owen 432
Sermons by Sir K. Russell 427
Sermons, University 481
Servant Question 242
Seymour, Admiral Sir E. H. 432
Shadow Dance, The 460
Shakespeare, Portrait of 98
Sharland's Hymns 121
Shorthouse, J. H. 332
Shorthouse, Mr 111
Sketchbook 368
Simplon, Mt. Shelley's New Address 97
Simpson, Herr C., Death of 242
Sissington, Messrs 23
Smallee, Dr. S 394
Société des Gens de Lettres 526
Soldiers' reading 117
Solomon Islands 427
Sorbonne, The 218
Sotheby's Sales 19, 263, 402, 501, 526, 570
South African Association for the Advancement of Science 358
South African Book Trade 1
South African Public Library 285
Southwark Public Library 475
State Libraries 117
Stephen, L. 217
Stephen, Leslie 501
Stephens, L., Life of George Eliot 97
Stevenson, Biography of 502
Stevensonia 29
"Stolen Duchess, The" 357
Strachey, Sir Edward 290
"Stringer Lawrence" 119
Sullivan, Sir A 1
Sunday at Home 501
Swedish Nobel Prize 75
Syrett, Miss Nellie 263
"Tale of Two Cities" 571
Tauchnitz Series 472
Tauchnitz, The House of 265
Teatie, G., Death of 74
Tempest, The, Russian Version 408
Tennyson, Portrait of 500
Terry, Miss E. 341
Thackeray in Australia 290
"Themistocles" 23
Thompson, M. Ernest Seton 408
Tolstoy, Count 2, 27, 51, 146, 193, 286, 1
Trinity University, Gift to 290
Toynbee, W 146
Trevelyan, G. M 526
Trevelyan, Sir G 49
"Tribulations of a Princess," The 220
Trollope, A. 217
Tuscan Artists, Stories of 459
Twain, Mark 284
Twickenham Library Committee 475
Undergraduate Journalism 547
"Underwriting" 499
United States, Libraries in 351
Up-to-date Novels 50
Utley, Sir T. and Lady Sykes 98
Verdi's Letters 460
Verestchagin, M. 266 Verlaine, Status of 51
Verne, Jules 146, 394, 4
View of Reading 195 Victor Hugo's House 1
"Victorian Anthology" 119
Voltaire, Statue to 394
Voltaire, Unpublished Poems of 98
"Voyage of Ithobal" 47
Wallace, Sir D. M 460
War Correspondents' Medals 51
Warne, F. G 3
Warne, Frederick 458
Weber, Prof. A 1
Weiss, Karl 1
Welsh, Jane 9
Wesley, John, in Cornwall 268
Westminster Library Rate 19
Whipple, Dr. H. R 358
White, Blanche 46
"Whitehall Shakespeare" 97
Wilkins, Miss M. E. 482
"Wilfred Vida" 460
Winter Pilgrimage, A 98
Wolseley, Lord 460

PAGE

PERSONAL VIEWS—

Australian Verse To-Day 293
Count Leo Tolstoy 204
Dickens in Memory 572
English and German Universities 505
General Reader, The 254
Henry Septimus Sutton 29
Historical Value of Wills, The 3
Hues in England 155
Importance of "Adolphe," The 407
Lower Branches, The 539
Nathaniel Hawthorne's Place in Literature 307 Plays and the Public, The 53
Plea for Satire, A 436
Poetry as a Profession 335
Qualifications of a Critic 316, 361
Review of Reviewing, A 539, 1
Rome in Recent Fiction 1
Secret of Emerson, The 274
Some Rudiments 187
Victor Hugo, Romancier 103
Welsh Literature of the Victorian Era 132
Women's Journalism 411
Works for the Young 467

POEMS—

After Lalour 3
Birth of Christ, The 394
Chrysanthemums 266
Cloud-changes 332
Cross Tide 50
Departure, The 482
Ebb Tide, The 218
First Line, The 384
Funeral in Florence, A 312
Haunted Garden, The 146
Infaire 26
Lake and the Star, The 73
Lesson, The 99
Life of the Sails, The 602
Moon and Mist 501
Musings on a Shell 408
Pies for Content on Earth, A 250
Reformers, The 368
September 290
Song, A 122, 170
The First Line 384
The Song of the Wind 618

REVIEWS.

ART AND ARCHÆOLOGY—

Botticelli 480
Conversations of James Northcote, R.A. 468
Four Great Venetians 469
"Gorm, The" 421
Giovanni Segantini 467
Print Collector's Handbook, The 538
Roman Art 187
Saints in Christian Art 508
Scottish Architectural Details 5
Study and Criticism of Italian Art 466

BIOGRAPHY AND REMINISCENCES—

Alfred the Great 42
Alfred, The Story of King 233
Apollonius of Tyana 611
Author of "The Peep of Day" 140
Before I Forget 539
Caroline the Illustrious 566
Childhood of Queen Victoria, The 324
Confessions of a Caricaturist, The 567
Dante, Life of 112
Diary of the Emperor Frederick, The 537
Dictionary of National Biography Supplement, Vols. I. and II. 277
Elizabeth, Empress of Austria 42
Father of St. Kilda, The 561
Forest Schoolmaster, The 606
Francis, the Little Poor Man of Assisi 610
Frederick the Great on Kingcraft 611
General Stringer Lawrence 60
Gilbert White's Life and Letters 536
Gladstone, The Life of William Ewart 40
Graham, Life and Letters of Sir Gerald 440
Green, Letters of John Richard 233
His Majesty King Edward VII. 19
His Most Gracious Majesty King Edward VII 6
Hunter, Life of Sir William Wilson 221
In Memoriam, Harriet Monroe-Ure 503
Ingelow, Some Memoirs of Jean 1
Joan of Arc 1
Josephine, Empress of the French 539
King Monmouth 539
Kitchener, Lord 40
Leader of Light Horse, A

BIOGRAPHY AND REMINISCENCES—(continued) Persian Poets in the Peter Abelard
Portraits Intimes
Recollections of Office Reformer of Geneva
Renaissance Types
Roberts, Lord
Roland, Private Le
Russell of Killowen
St. Gilbert of Semp
Saint Jerome
Salisbury, The Mar
Savanarola, The La
Schamberg Keer, T
Short Lives of the Sir Harry Parkes in Sketches of Bushm
Synesius the Hellen
Townshend, Milit
Tribulations of a P Twelle, Memoir of Victoria, The Life
Wagner, Life of Women of the French Portraits
Yale Studies in En

BOOKS FOR

Chieftain and the
For the Faith
From Playground
Held to Ransome Hero of the Hills,
Moscow and Other
One of the Red Sh
Out on the Llanos
Sir Phelim's Treas
With Cutlass and

BOOKS OF R

Annual Register
Byrne's Guide to Smith's Index to t of The Times

DRAMA—

Gioconda
Kiartan the Icelan
Laboremus
Rienzi and Ygrain
Sintram

ECONOMICS

Democracy versus Evolution of Mode Government or Hu
How to Invest and Public Relief of Th
Social Control,
Social Question, T
Story of the Stock
Trusts and the Sta

EDUCATIONA

Commercial Educ Abroad
Commercial Know
Educational Foun
Industry
Hermann and Dor Individuality and American Educa Manual of School
Our Public School
Scott Readers for Topographical an Palestine

FICTION—

Adventures of Tri
A Isle of Old Vince Alien, The Ambassador's Adv
Angel
Another Woman's Antonia Arbiter, The Archbishop and Th Aristocrats, The Arrows of the Alm

PAGE

FICTION—(continued)

Burden of an Honour, The . . 236
Bush Whacking . . 164
By Command of the Prince . . 18
Call of the Future, The . . 376
Cankerworm, The . . 639
Captain Landon . . .
Captain Ravenshaw . . 376
Cardigan . . 401
Caroline . . 346
Cash is King . . .
Catherine of Calais . . 303
Catholic Pirates, So called . . 18
Cavalier, The . . 589
Charm of Life, The . . 428 Child of Art, A . . 6
Christopher Deane . . 388 Circumstance . . 589
Cinderella . . 340
Cinders . . 92
Clementina . . 401
Continental Dragoon, The . . 536
Corban . . 215
Country I Come from, The . . 14
Coward, The . . 4
Crime of the Crystal, The . . 4 Crucial Instances . . 66
Cynthia's Damages . . 8
Cynthia's Way . . 539
Daring Spirit, A . . 189
Daughter of the Vehlt, A . . 306
Deacon Brodie . . 216
Death of the Gods, The . . 66
Death the Shewman . . 438
Deep Sea Plunderings . . 492
Derwent's Horse . . 308
Despair's Last Journey . . 432
Devastators, The . . 303
Disciple, The . . 478
Dolly Dialogues, The . . 349
Dorothy's Garden, The . . 216
Don or Devil? . . 622
Doom Castle . . 17
Double Choice, A . . 447
Dream Woman, The . . 165
D'ri and I . . 446
Dunstable Weir . . 438
Dupes . . 294
Early Stars, The . . 563
Edward the Exile . . 449
Embarrassing Orphan, The . . 473
Emperor's Design, The . . 351
Ensign Knightley and Other Stories . . 472
Episode on a Desert Island, An . . 612
Eternal City, The . . 188
Ever Mahon . . 116
Extermination of Love, The . . 613
Failure of Success, The . . 492
Farewell Nikola . . 447
Fate of Endilloe, The . . 236
Fiery Dawn, The . . 518
Fight to the Finish, A . . 561
Firebrand, The . . 517
First Men in the Moon, The (Xmas Supp.)
Flower and Thorn . . 518
Follies of Captain Daly, The . . 376
Fuma Gorlyeff . . 517
Fool's Year, A . . 613
For all Time . . 448
For Love or Crown . . 562
Forest Folk . . 562
Fortune of Christina M'Nab . . 561
Fortune's Darling . . 563
Four-leaved Clover . . 562
Fourth Estate, The . . 402
Franks: Duellist . . 165
Freier que . . 472
From the Land of the Shamrock . . 307
Ghost of Timlern Abbey, The . . 304
Giant's Gate, The . . 374
Gillette's Marriage . . 449
Glendarroch . . 613
Glowworm, The . . 492
Goddess of Gray's Inn, The . . 502
God's Rebel . . 308
Golden Fleece, The . . 474
Golden Spur, The . . 562
Gold that Perisheth, The . . 306
Great Lady, A . . 214
Great Noodleshire Election, The . . 235 Greatest of These, The . . 612
Grip of the Bookmaker, The . . 141
Gyda the 3th . . 448
Harvest of Stubble, A . . 376 Hearts in Revolt . . 401 Helmet of Navarre, The . . 189
Henry Bourland . . 448
Her Grace's Secret . . 376
Her Ladyship's Secret . . 306
Her Majesty's Minister . . 164
Her Mountain Lover . . 141
Herb of Grace . . 404
Heritage, The . . 93
Hero, The . . 562
Hidden Model, The . . 92
His Lawful Wife . . 449
History of Sir Richard Calmady, The . . 260 Honour of the Army . . 474
House of De Mailly . . 448
House with the Green Shutters, The . . 492
Hubert Sherbrooke Priest . . 639 Ill Wind, An . . 376
Impertinent Dialogues . . 308
Innocents on the Broads, The . . 308

PAGE

FICTION—(continued)

Kitty Fairhall . . 492
Kitty's Victory . . 164
Lady Christ . . 5
Lady of Lynn, The . . 4
Laird's Lack, The . . 4 Light Freights . . 4
Loom's Bread, The . . 449
Little Saint of God, The . . 449
Lord Culmore's Lover . . 613
Lord of the Sea . . 66
Lords of the North . . 589
Lost Key, The . . 307
Lost Regiment, The . . 325
Love and His Mask . . 613
Love Idylls . . 349
Love Like a Gipsy . . 6
Lover's Progress, The . . 4
Luck of the Valle, The . . 3 Mad? . . 304
"Mad Lorrimer" . . 613
Magnetism of Sin, The . . 519
Maid of Maiden Lane . . 30
Maiden's Creed, The . . 37 Malicious Fortune . . 1
Manasseh . . 613
Man of Millions, A . . 378
Manse Gate, The . . 307
Marm's Mutiny . . 164
Marrable's Magnificent Idea . . 141
Married in Making . . 307
Marriage of Mr. Molyneux, The . . 588
Mary Ann of Parchment Buildings . . 613
Mary Hamilton . . 448
Master and Slave . . 308
Master of Men . . 562 Memory Street . . 589
Million, The . . 447 Millionaire Mystery, The . . 304
Miss Pauncefort's Peril . . 563
Modern Antaeus, A . . 492
Modern Slave Dealer, A . . 613
Monsieur Beaucaire . . 93
Most Famous Lake, The . . 613
Mother of Emeralds, The . . 214 Mountains of Necessity . . 350
Mr. Bernard Brown . . 303
Mr. Elliott . . 518
Mr. Leopold Lugwell . . 281
Mrs. Musgrove and Her Husband . . 284
Must Yield to Win . . 306
My Brilliant Career . . 588
My Heart and Lute . . 284
My Silver Spoons . . 306
Nama's Talisman, The . . 236
New Canterbury Tales . . 326
New York . . 115
Nineteen Thousand Pounds . . 214
No Vindication . . 563
Nobler Than Revenge . . 235 Octopus . . 301
Oddland . . 235
Old Knowledge, The . . 416
Old Woman's Tragedy, An . . 494
On Peter's Island . . 306
Once Too Often . . 116
One Life Between . . 613
Only a Nigger . . 562
Our Lady of Deliverance . . 562
Pacifico . . 214
Pair of Patient Lovers, A . . 493
Pasha, The . . 518
Peasant Lassies . . 18
Penance . . 350
Pharaohs of the West, The . . 375
Plato's Handmaiden . . 115
Poor Elizabeth . . 350
Potter and the Clay, The . . 349
Presumption of Stanley Hay, M.P., The . . 235
Prince Rabor and His Wives . . 350
Prince Charming . . 284
Prophet of Berkeley Square, The . . 493 Pulls of Wind . . 494
Purple Cloud, The . . 447
Quincy Adams Sawyer . . 375
Real Christian, The . . 563
Real Life . . 308
Red Chancellor, The . . 350
Red Fate . . 306
Reminiscences of a Gentlemen Horse-Dealer, The . . 447 Retaliation . . 613
Rialto . . 375
Right of Way, The . . 349
Robert Annys . . 189
Robert Kane . . 18
Romance of the Hill Station, The . . 562
Sea Hath its Pearls, The . . 164
Second Dandy Chater, The . . 93
Secret Orchard, The . . 422
Separation of the Beresfords . . 494
Serious Wooing, The . . 43 Set of Flats, A . . 613
Seven Houses, The . . 351
Severance . . 448
Shoes of Fortune, The . . 589
Sinner and the Problem, The . . 374
Sir Hector . . 234
Sirius and other Stories . . 92
Sister Carry . . 589
Sister Teresa . . 63
Skipper of Barnenig, The . . 612
Skirts of Happy Chance, The . . 214
Snares of the World, The . . 304

PAGE

FICTION—(continued)

Surveyor, The . . 492
Sylvia's Ambition . . 8
Tales from Scott . . 8
Tales of Dunstable Weir . . 446
Tang . . 448
Thorn Queen, The . . 8
Tongueless, The . . 5
Tosca . . 6
Thale . . 18
Those that Took the Sword . . 4
Thirteen Lessings, The . . 4 Thousand Pities, A . . 4
Three Men of Mark . . 4
Told by the Taffrail . . 4
Tom Flaherty's Ghost . . 6 Treasure . . 2
Tristram of Blent . . 1
Triumph of Hilary Blachland . . 3
Two Girls and a Dream . . 3
Two Moods of a Man . . 6
Union of Hearts, A . . 2
Vanished Rival, A . . 4
Velvet Glove, The . . 4
Vicar of St. Luke's, The . . 2
Warrival's Well, The . . 1
Wealth of Malkerstang, The . . 5
Westerness, The . . 6
Whirligig, The . . 4
Widow Wiley and Some other Old Folk . . 4
Winds of Cathrigg, The . . 4
Wisdom of Fools, The . . 4
Wise Man of Stern Cross, The . . 17 Woman Alone, A . . 4
Woman Derelict, A . . 5
Woman of Yesterday, A . . 18
Woman's Burden, A . . 5
Women Must Weep . . 4
Wooing of Grey Eyes, The . . 4
Wooing of Sheila, The . . 6
Work of His Hands . . 5 World's Finger, The . . 5
Year One, The . . 449
Young Squire's Revenge, The . . 5
Youth goes a Marketing . . 422

HISTORY—

Annual Register . . 41
Cape and its Story . . 539
Charles II . . 186
Chevalier de St. George and the Jacobite Movements . . 258
Chronicles of the House of Borgia . . 516
Close of the Middle Ages, The . . 213 Fallen Stuarts, The . . 258
From Squire to Prince . . 611
General History of Europe, A . . 17
Histoire Politique de la Révolution Française . . 189
History and Working of French Political Institutions . . 63
L'Affaire du Collier . . 136
Last Days of the French Monarchy, The . . 421
Lettres à la Fiancée . . 137
Marquise d'Argenson and Richard II. . . 561
Mary Queen of Scots and Who Wrote the Casket Letters . . 300
Menasseh Ben Israel's Mission to Oliver Cromwell . . 258
Modern Europe . . 256
Outline of the Relations between England and Scotland (500-1709) . . 258
Relations of Geography and History . . 69
Roman Theocracy and the Republic, 1846-1849 . . 587
Short History of the English Colonies . . 283
Spanish People, The: their Origin, Growth, and Influence . . 540
Two First Centuries of Florentine History, The . . 1
War of the Polish Succession (1733-1738), The . . 492
Who Killed Amy Robsart? . . 325 World's History, The . . 411

LEGAL—

Maritime Law . . 446

LITERARY—

Bookbinding . . 563
Book Prices Current . . 41, 516
Care of Books, The . . 563
Catalogue of the Cornell Dante Collection . . 114
Chambers's Cyclopædia of English Literature . . 565
Concise Etymological Dictionary of the English Language . . 471
English Commentary on Dante's "Divina Commedia" . . 113
Essays from the Guardian . . 258
Essays of an Ex-Librarian . . 491
George Washington and Other American Addresses . . 538
Grands Écrivains d'Outre-Manche . . 139
Letters on Life . . 471
Life and Letters in the Fourth Century A.D. . . 634
Life in Poetry, Law in Taste . . 36

MILITARY—

Across War with China . . 7
Annual Campaign of [illegible] . . 7
Campaigns (Continental) . . 7
Campaigns, Illustrated Military . . 7 Boer War . . 7
Cuspatel . . 7
Diary of the Siege of the [illegible] . . 7
Fehrs . . 7
Kenel de Chaigne de [illegible] . . 7
Great Battles of the War . . 7
Sketches [illegible] . . 7
Russo-Japanese War . . 7 Tactics, Disciplines . . 7 War of the Cities . . 7
With Methuen . . 7
Without by an Eye Witness . . 7

MISCELLANEOUS—

Beauty Unadorned . . 4
Book of Cookery . . 4
Brooke's Book, The . . 4
Dreams and their Meaning . . 4
Modern Cookery . . 4
Motor Vehicles and Motors . . 4
Oyster Culture and Cooking . . 4
Rise, Fall of the Knights of the Garter . . 4
The Sovereign Herbs . . 4

MUSIC—

Wagner, Bayreuth, and Plays . . 4

NATURAL HISTORY, GARDENING—

Bird Watching . . 4
Book of Flowers, A . . 4
Cambridge Natural History, VIII. . . 4
Garden Diary, A . . 4
Garden in the Suburbs, A . . 4 Garden for Beginners . . 4
Grasses . . 4
Mighty Deep, The . . 4 Zoology . . 4

NAVAL—

With the Flag at Sea . . 4

ORIENTAL—

Ancient India . . 4
Asia and Europe . . 4
Catalogue of the Sylvester Library of Ethel [illegible] . . 4 Constructions towards A[illegible] . . 4
Kathana's Ramayana . . 4
Letters and Inscriptions [illegible] . . 4
Persian Historical Texts . . 4
Tel el Amarna Period, The . . 4

PHILOSOPHY—

Fact and Fable . . 4
History of Intellectual Development, the Lines of Modern Evolution . . 4
Methods of Ethics . . 4
Sketches in Outlines, Philosophy and Prophet . . 4
Philosophie d'Aujourd'hui . . 4
Principles of Morality . . 4
Problems of Conduct . . 4
Studies on Problems of Philosophy, Ethics . . 4
Use of Words in Reasoning . . 4 Works of George Berkeley . . 4

POETRY—

Book of the Heroic Ballads . . 4
Book of Verses . . 4
By Grey Old Gardens . . 4
Carmina Votiva . . 4
Garden of Kama . . 4
Hawthorn and Lavender . . 4
Leopards, Poems of . . 4
Lesbia Regina . . 4
Man of Kenoth . . 4
On the Track and Over the Downs . . 4
Oxford Year and Other Poems . . 4
Pantelos the Elder . . 4
Poems . . 4
Poems of the Past and Present . . 4
Poems of the Unknown Way . . 4
Selections from the Poems of [illegible] . . 4

PAGE

REPRINTS

Boswell's Life of Johnson
Byron
Chambers' Cyclopædia of English Literature
Christmas at the Mermaid (Xmas Supp.)
Dante 112
Essays of Elia (Xmas Supp.)
Fielding, Henry
Foundations of Belief 5
Green: Works of John Journal to Stella, The Keats, Thomas: Works of 514
Lamb's Books (Xmas Supp.)
Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare 543
Letters of Holman and Orchard Shakespeare, The Wisdom of 62
Sonnets 91
Songs of Innocence (Xmas Supp.)
Swift, The Prose Works of 436

SCIENCE

Advanced Exercises in Practical Physics Medical Dictionary of the Bible, The Practical Physiology Theosophic Conflict, The

SOCIOLOGY

Abolitionism 530 Anthropology
Chivalry
Confederate States of America 561
Food, Hygiene of Organic History of the Poisoner in England, A
In an Unknown Prison Land
Justice in Roumania, Law 65
Living Races of Mankind 66

PAGE

Sociology—(continued)

Public Health and Housing 530
Rural England 12
Then and Now 44
Women and their Work

SPORTS AND PASTIMES

A B C of Bridge 66
Les Sports et Jeux d'Exercice dans l'Antiquité Grecque 136
Sea and Game Fishing 253

SUPPLEMENTS

Autumn Publications Children's Christmas Books.
Christmas Supplement of Books for the Young and Illustrated Books

THEOLOGY

Aeroth, Poems of the Old Testament 420
Apostles' Creed, The 419
Bible Studies 39
Blessing of the Waters on the Eve of the Epiphany, The 420
Books of the New Testament, The 38
Century's Progress in Religious Life and Thought 16 Coronation Service, The 419
Earliest Gospel, The 418
English Church, The (1066-1272) 558
Fifty Years of Catholic Life and Progress 16 Hearts of Men, The 418
History of the Orthodox Church of Cyprus (a.D. 45-a.D. 1878) 420
Introduction to Christian Mysticism 419

PAGE

Theology—(continued)

Introduction to the Textual Criticism of the Greek New Testament 39
Is Christ Infallible? 38
Justification and Reconciliation 38
Laity in Council 445
Lessons from Work 139
Life and Literature of the Ancient Hebrews 39
Life and Work of the Redeemer, The 534
Life of the Master, The 534
Liturgy of "The Apostolic Constitutions," The 419 Man Christ Jesus 534
New History of the Book of Common Prayer 558 Risen Master, The 39
Roads to Rome 417
St. Augustine's City of God 419
St. Matthew 39
Salisbury Processions and Ceremonies 416
Social Development under Christian Influence 38
Thomas Wolsey: Legate and Reformer

TOPOGRAPHY, TRAVEL, AND GEOGRAPHY

Annals of Christ's Hospital 527
Armenia: Travels and Studies 231
Australasia, Old and New 40
Bath: Malmesbury: Bradford on Avon 163
Belgium and the Belgians 421
Bettesworth Book
Book of Brittany, A 163
Christ's College 611
"Chisel" Papers, The 234
Coaching Man's Compendium 163
Continental Road Travel in Central Western Europe 66
County and Town in England 536
Deserts and Forests of North America, The 491

PAGE

Topography, T

East of Suez
English Villages
Everybody's Paris
From Cyprus to Z Glories of Spain Guide Books (vari Highways and District
Imperial London
John Chinaman Lake Geneva and tions
Land of the Moor
Living London
Log of an Island
Mexico as I First
New College, Oxfo
Northamptonshir
Notes on St. Ma
Nottingham
Penelope's Irish Pilgrimage to We Ribbon of Iron, A St. David's
Sherbro and its H
Some Literary La on Wheels Springtime in the Story of Some Eng
Sunshine and Sur
To the Mountains
To the South Pol
Travel in the Fir Twixt Sirdar and Two Norfolk Villa
Victoria History
Norfolk
Victoria History
Worcester
Wanderings in T
Women of Thoma
With the Tibetan

Literature

Published by The Times

No. 191. SATURDAY, JULY 6, 1901.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

NOTES OF THE DAY 1, 2, 3, 4
"LITERATURE" PORTRAITS.—IX. Mr. Thomas Hardy. An Appreciation, by Stephen Gwynn 4
THE HISTORICAL VALUE OF WILLS—A "Personal View," by the Rev. J. Charles Cox 8
BIRDS AND THEIR WAYS 9
THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE SALE-ROOM 11
THE DRAMA, by A. B. Walkley 12
CURRENT LITERATURE—
Rights and Wrongs of the Transvaal War 13
The Chinese Crisis from Within 14
An Australian Writer—
The Country I come From—Verses Popular and Humorous—On the Track and Over the Sliprails 14, 15
Lusus Regius 15
Fifty Years of Catholic Life and Progress—A Century's Progress in Religious Life and Thought—Sketches of Booksellers of Other Days—The Testament of a Vivisector—His Most Gracious Majesty King Edward VII.—Giall Surveon—Smith's Index to the Leading Articles of The Times—Byrne's Guide to Company Formation—Beauty Adorned—Immoral Legislation—St. David's 16, 17
Doom Castle—The Wise Man of Sternecross—Karadac—By Command of the Prince—Catholic Usages So Called—Robert Kane—Peasant Lassies 17, 18
LIBRARY NOTES 19
BOOK SALE AT MESSRS. SOTHEBY'S 19
AMONG THE REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES.—I. 20
CORRESPONDENCE—The Charlotte Yonge Memorial—"Lucas Malet" on Fiction—Archæological Nomenclature 21, 22
AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for 22, 23
LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS 23, 24

NOTES OF THE DAY.

The subject of the "LITERATURE" PORTRAIT next week will be M. PIERRE LOTI.

* * * *

The book trade in South Africa seems to have fluctuated with the fortunes of the war. Literature was for a long time at a discount, and trade with the Transvaal and Orange River Colony is only just beginning to wake up again. But since the critical days of the campaign, fiction, we are told, has been in great demand—we suggest no ulterior meaning in this announcement. The lighter the literature, apparently, the better the Army likes it. One bookseller, who declares that his trade with South Africa has more than doubled since the war began, added that he had a standing order from one officer to send out twelve fresh novels to him every week. Perhaps the officer in question has taken Mr. Marston's recent suggestion to heart, and is sewing the books up into bullet-proof uniforms for his men.

warm an affection. "I want you"—he writes from in March, 1853—"I want you sadly to go about with thing would be just doubly as interesting." An years later he writes from Berlin, "I get your lon night. I am glad you will now write from Cobham, get your letters in the morning; they do me good fo day."

* * *

Last Saturday one of the oldest organs of the Fr the Moniteur Universel, appeared for the last ti lived 112 years. The Moniteur was the official jo French Revolution. It continued its governmenta the Directory, under the Consulate, under the Empir Restoration, and even down to the third Republ became an Opposition organ. It was always wel Napoleon, it is said, was for a time a contributor to It has counted on its staff some of the greatest name from Champollion and Gautier and Sainte-Beuve t Ed. About, and even Murger. Since 1868, when Officiel was founded, the Moniteur has steadily see diminish, although during the Franco-German war i a moment to recover its youth. The last well-kno contribute to its columns was M. Valfrey (Whi appearance will hardly be noticed. It has been f one of the most reactionary journals in Paris, but of polemic were not scurrilous enough to attrac attention.

* * *

One volume, such as that just published by is enough for Calverley. The four volumes of over-weighted him, and, though we turn regretful slim green booklets which we have cherished for so we want nothing better than this new collection wit Sendall's Life and Appreciation. Calverley died ea to be included in the "Dictionary of National where Mr. Leslie Stephen aptly sums up his sati "refined common sense." He is the first of more polished even than Conington, a review of wh by Calverley himself is in this volume—and of par both of these arts you must be impregnated with th course; but, above all, you must not be an imitato must show your own power. As Sir Walter S "'Lovers, and a Reflection,' inimitable and unu sense though it be, is an extremely powerful piece Calverley's doctrine was that in translation you s

With Calverley's career, his boyish daring, his frank, simple nature, his keen wit, and his undergraduate escapades most people are familiar. Sir Walter Sendall recalls many stories of college days. Calverley's wit certainly gained at Balliol by having Dr. Jenkyns to sharpen itself on. The Master himself shares the humour of the "Collections" story, when he asked Calverley, "And with what feelings, Mr. Blayds, ought we to regard the decalogue?" Calverley hardly knew what the decalogue meant, but he "had a due sense of the importance of the occasion and of the question," and replied, "Master, with feelings of devotion mingled with awe!" "Quite right, young man, a very proper answer," exclaimed the Master. One more taste we may give from the time when Blayds had become Calverley and the Oxford undergraduate a Cambridge Don:—

NOTES TAKEN AT COLLEGE MEETINGS.

At Meeting, February 28th, 11½—2.

Remarked by the Master.—That no people give you so much trouble, if you try to extract money from them, as solicitors.

By the Jun. Dons.—Except, perhaps, parsons.

By the Senior Dons.—The latter possibly because they have not got the money.

By Mr. A.—That a ton weight is a great deal of books.

By Mr. B.—That it is just one o'clock.

By Mr. C.—That that is likely, and that in an hour it will be just two.

* * * *

There is in sober minds so general and so reasonable a distrust of the utility of the "congresses" and "conferences" that Mr. John Murray's favourable verdict on the International Publishers' Congress is of importance. "There have been, and possibly still are," he writes to the Publishers' Circular, "some of our countrymen who regard such congresses as nothing more than elaborate 'beanfeasts,' but to those who have followed and examined them closely, it is evident that this view is a mistaken one. With each successive meeting there has been displayed a closer and more serious attention to business, and a growing desire to learn the methods of other countries with a view to concerted action when circumstances are opportune. It is to be one of the duties of the Permanent Bureau to regulate and control the subjects for discussion, so as to eliminate what is redundant, useless, or undesirable, and so we may hope that the next congress, which by the kind invitation of the Italian publishers is to meet at Milan in 1901, may fully maintain the advance in practical results."

* * * *

The Idler has a notable article in "Walks and Talks with Tolstoy" by Andrew D. White, United States Ambassador to Germany. On the subject of literary property, it seems, there is a striking divergence of views between the Count and the Countess:—

He told me that in his view he had no right to receive money for the permission to print a book. To this I naturally answered that by carrying out this doctrine he simply presented large sums of money to publishers, and that, in my opinion, he would do a much better thing by taking the full value of his copyrights and bestowing the proceeds upon the peasantry starving about him. To this he answered that it was a question of duty. To this I agreed, but remarked that our disagreement was as to what his duty in the matter really was. It was a pleasure to learn from another source that the

Emerson, Hawthorne, and Whittier; but he read at random, not knowing at all some of
He spoke with admiration of Theodore Pa
He also revered and admired the characte
William Lloyd Garrison. He had read Longf but was evidently uncertain regarding Lowell apparently with some other author. Of conte he knew some of Howell's novels, and liked th
"Literature in the United States at presen the lowest trough of the sea between high wav

* * *

Mr. White is by no means a Tolstoyite, n have argued most of the articles of th cessd. He had the courage to say right spectacle of Count Tolstoy virtually posing being while his fellow-Russians came whining to him was not at all edifying." To wh Count "listened very civilly." His general pic

A man of genius denouncing all science what he calls faith; urging a return to a state o simply Rousseau modified by misreadings of the repudiating marriage, though himself most hap the father of sixteen children; holding that Esc and Shakespeare were not great in literature, obscure writer a literary idol; holding that and Raphael were not great in sculpture n insisting on the eminence of sundry unknown painted brutally; holding that Beethoven, Han Haydn, were not great in music, but that son former outside any healthful musical evolution music of the future; declaring Napoleon to hav but presenting Kutusoff as a military ideal; lo that organized knowledge which has done more bring us out of mediæval cruelty into a be extolling a "faith" which has always been th pretext for bloodshed and oppression.

The article is packed with good things, and is t
Tolstoy article that has been published for a lon

* * *

Count Tolstoy, by-the-by, has also been cri authors in Die Gesellschaft. He regards Wilhe the greatest novelist, probably because he fin peasant life. He thinks little of Hauptmann, "Weavers" to be a noteworthy performance, be an important social question, and praises the au mitting any sort of love-story to interfere
"Hannele" he finds sentimental, and everythin mann of little artistic merit. Sudermann, e novels, is considered by Tolstoy to be a cultu minded artist.

* * *

The last instalment of "The Oxford Eng gives Mr. J. G. Holyoake (in the Daily N 1878) as the first authority for the use of the now accepted sense. As a correspondent (M pointed out in our columns on May 25, it George Trevelyan who launched the word on it be seen by a perusal of his speech at Selkirk Times of January 12, 1878.

* * *

"Claudius Clear," in his account in the
the late Mr. R. A. Neil, of Pembroke College, C dared to identify it. Nor did any one, we think, venture to put his finger on the point where Wilkie Collins ended and Besant began in the story which Sir Walter finished for his dead friend. Yet when it is a question of authenticity in ancient poems or pictures the critics seem to have no doubts. They are prepared by infallible instinct to distinguish to a line or a figure the true Homer or Giorgione, or the first and the second Isaiah. They will even show by coloured printing the diverse dates and composite authorship of the books of Scripture. Neil was much impressed, we are told, by his mistakes, and drew just this moral. He was a great admirer of Robertson Smith, yet began to feel some wholesome scepticism about the results of the "higher criticism," and to reflect on the chequered history of Homeric criticism.

* * * *

AFTER LABOUR.

He sits beside his cottage door,
His dull eyes fixed upon the grass—
An ancient man to whom no more
The days speak as they pass.

Yet sweet to him this rest must be
Who saw, with all its sense revealed,
The grand, deliberate pageantry
Of woodland, hedge, and field.

Nor missed the truth involved in fall
From stricken blooms, of seed that waits, Shut fast in seeming death, the call
Of Spring without the gates.

Thus to his simple mind was plain
That knowledge not denied to us,
But borne by vernal winds in vain
To ears incredulous—

But stay; he, too, was blind, alas!
Nor ever in his soul was born
That sense of far-off things which pass
And leave the world forlorn.

The lonely dawns, the woodlands dim,
The leaves that, whispering, come and go,
The birds, the hurrying brooks to him
Told nought that thou wouldst know.

For as the fields he ploughed and sowed
In season due, a figure gaunt Beside him down the furrow strode
Holding the whip of want.

While, starving through the years, his soul,
Stirred by some ancient sense of sin
To restless musings of the goal
That life must lose or win,

Grew fiercely in conviction set
That, his short-comings plainly seen,
The Judge of all would not forget How hard his lot had been.

W. G. HOLE.

Mr. Frederic Harrison will lecture on July 13 (3.30) at the British Museum on King Alfred the Great.

The members of the New Vagabond Club g mentary luncheon to Madame Sarah Bernhardt Cecil last Tuesday. The chair was taken by Hope.

Several literary men, including Mr. George M Thomas Hardy, and Mr. Frederic Harrison, in letts the Humanitarian League, have expressed the h abolition of the Royal Buckhounds may be followed couragement of other forms of "savage sport."

The Brontë Society at its last meeting accepte
Mr. George Dyson to pay for the compilation dictionary.

To-night (Friday) Mme. Adey Brunel will giv
the Steinway-hall on Browning and Rossetti.

The death is announced, at the early age of 40,
Warne, who had been London editor of the York
Post for a number of years.

A stage version of "Lorna Doone," by M
Dowling, has been produced at the Grand Opera-ho

Mr. J. M. Barrie will pay a short visit to the in the autumn.

M. Edouard Foa, the well-known explorer and last Saturday at Villiers-sur-Mer from the after-effe fever contracted in Africa.

Mr. Dan Godfrey, Junior, the conductor of t Band, Bournemouth, has obtained a verdict of against Mr. Grant Richards, the publisher, and Bedford, the author, of a novel called "The Har
the ground that one of the characters in the bo readily identified as the plaintiff, and that some p were calculated to injure his professional reputatio

A tablet to the memory of the late Sir Ar (presented by Mr. H. Lewis Doulton) will, on July by Dr. Cummings, Professor Prout, and Dr. Vince of the members of the Incorporated Society of M
the birthplace of the composer in Lambeth.

Professor Haeckel, the German evolutionist, London in the late autumn. He has engaged to del of lectures on fossil forms, and during his stay in t he will be the guest of his old friend, Professor Ray

M. Yves Guyot, at the banquet given in hi Edinburgh the other day, paid a high tribute to Sir and the influence he had on French writers, such briand, Augustin Thierry, Richelieu, Victor Alexandre Dumas. Moreover, M. Guyot said, whil had been his imitators, none of them had bee Through Scott literature had been made pictu history was made to live.

The Foreign Actor on the English Stage

Never surely was the foreigner more en évidence than just now. It is natural, considering the e restricted range of the dram playwrights of different coun have been even greater borrow have assumed a cosmopolitan aspect of late which must be almost, if not quite, without precedent. Besides the German company which has recently left the comedy, the Japanese company now performing at the Criterion, Madame Réjane at the Coronet Theatre, and Monsieur Coquelin and Madame Sarah Bernhardt at Her Majesty's, we have still to mention the music-halls—Liane de Pougy at the Palace, La Belle Tortajada's little drama in Spanish in three scenes at the Alhambra, and Mlle. Yvette Guilbert's recent appearances at the Empire. The English dramatic world has certainly become more liberal-minded. Forty years ago, as Mr. Clement Scott reminds us, there was a good deal of narrow-minded opposition to foreign actors. But the foreign artists to whom we now open our stage-doors so freely differ vastly in their aims and influence. We doubt if the music-hall artists from abroad do much to lighten the tedium of our up-to-date music-hall programmes. It is, however, as easy to be a philistine in our music-halls as in our art galleries. Regular habitués learn to appreciate all kinds of subtleties which only contribute to the boredom of the novice. It mattered little to them if they could not understand Mlle. Yvette Guilbert. There was the mysterious interest which could only belong to a pair of long black gloves. The cult of a "walk," in which Mlle. de Pougy is said to excel, is another subtlety. To be able to walk is, of course, essential to an actor. But this acquisition used to be rather a "stepping-stone to higher things," and not the whole point of a performance, as in these days of the American walk, the Parisian walk, and finally the "Cake" walk. The influence of foreign actors on the theatre proper is of much greater interest. It is not in the nature of the average Englishman to act well. The moment he begins to make believe one of two things almost inevitably happens. He either remains himself, and is consequently the same in whatever part he may take up, or else he is too obvious a posseur. Nothing, therefore, can be better for the English actor than contact with his foreign confrères, and especially with the French, who have at no time any difficulty in acting—on the stage or off. And it can hardly be doubted that the English stage has lately become much more natural and life-like. The rise of certain plays based more or less upon the models of Scandinavian and German drama have undoubt done much to bring about this change; but not more than the frequent visits of such exponents of the "natural" method as Madame Réjane. Meanwhile there is also the large debt which the English student of French literature owes to Coquelin and Sarah Bernhardt. Cyrano de Bergerac was a literary revelation—a revival of French romantic drama imbued with new life—and it was Monsieur Coquelin who introduced us to Monsieur Rostand. To appreciate Racine at his best we must see Sarah Bernhardt as Phèdre. Only Monsieur Coquelin can make us laugh as a Frenchman laughs at Tartuffe. But there is a hard nut to be cracked before the English spectator can derive all the pleasure there is to be gleaned from these opportunities—viz., the French language. Only the other day Madame Réjane remarked that an English audience does not applaud much, but it analyses and compares. Is this lack of applause at a French performance really to be accounted for in this charitable fashion? Is it not just possible that now and again some of us miss the point of a French dialogue? Once a smattering of conversational French has been acquired, one may even become a sufficient scholar to enjoy oneself thoroughly at a French theatre. But, like all things, it requires practice, and

Literature Portraits.—

MR. THOMAS HARD

Several years before "Tess of the D'U heard of, a well-known literary critic ran next after George Meredith among contemp longo sed proximus intervallo. Since then the has undoubtedly narrowed. Mr. Hardy's f slowly, but it has grown solidly; it is builder has never been, and I think never can be (in spi really popular novelist, and he does not pro He is not, like Mr. Kipling, for all readers; hi of that attaching quality which won for St personal affection from thousands of men and w looked on his face; he is, for a man of so much destitute of a following. But as he looms to the sinister and very much alone, he is one of th figures in our modern world of letters.

Like Burns he springs direct from the soil. the image of the genial Ayrshire farmer, singing ale-house, the soul of his company, is to emphas unlikeness rather than his likeness. I see him ing silent and aloof, listening with retenti possibly, narrating with stony detachment a s and tragical fates. Mr. Hardy is as indissoln the cast of his genius with a limited region of e any author since the beginning of authorship; Wessex soil, the sights and sounds and smell and of the cider country are fixed in all thei work; the people of whom he writes are not so Saxon, that is, quintessentially English. And contradiction, the authors with whom Mr. Har a natural affinity are not Englishmen but resembles Mérimée by the dryness of his art, M choice of subjects and his attitude towards them

Let us trace in a few words his rather uneven in 1840, Mr. Hardy was apprenticed to an eccles at the age of sixteen and gave his life till about to a pursuit which has deeply coloured all his "Desperate Remedies" to "Jude the Obscure. these stories (in which, as it will be remember characters are architects practising the miscell of stewards, land surveyors, and the like, famili in country towns) appeared in 1871, signed on It was followed in the next year by "Under Tree," and at this date Mr. Hardy definiti architecture (in which he had distinguished him be a prize-winner at a Royal Society's competi "A Pair of Blue Eyes" found its way into a se "Far from the Madding Crowd" ran throug then, appearing as a book, gained something of t it merited. It was the first of his books to yellow-backed form, then the hall-mark of pop popularity caused a reissue of the two preceding following thirteen years, seven novels in all wer of them appearing in good magazines; while full accorded to their author's genius, beginning his work in the New Quarterly as early as 1879. The confession to Tess on the night of their wedding, and then waited for hers with a smile. She noticed it.

> "Perhaps, although you smile, it is as serious as yours or more so."
>
> "It can hardly be more serious, dearest."
>
> "It cannot—oh no, it cannot"—She jumped up joyfully at the hope. "No, it cannot be more serious, certainly," she cried, "because 'tis just the same!"

There you had not merely a dramatic situation, but the statement of a view, which Mr. Hardy endorsed. It seemed to the natural unsophisticated intelligence of Tess that her loss of virginity out of wedlock was a thing to be regretted, a thing to be forgiven—just as was the same event in Angel Clare's history. And if you were to ask Mr. Hardy for the cause of the crime which led Tess through a tragic idyll to the scaffold, he would be bound, I think, to say that it lay in the marriage law, by which a woman was constrained to accept a possible position of repugnant bodily servitude.

> O wearisome condition of humanity
> Born under one law, to another bound!

Fulke Greville's lines might be the inscription on the successor to "Tess." Mr. Hardy had gained his hearing. If that book was not condemned, but rather read with avidity, he evidently had a free hand, and in "Jude the Obscure" he used it. "Jude" seems to me by far the most complete expression of this gloomy and powerful mind. The book is the history of a tragic marriage and its consequences; but Mr. Hardy does not in reality arraign the marriage law, which is only a part of humanity's wearisome condition.

> Vainly begot, and yet forbidden vanity, > Created sick, commanded to be sound.

The perpetual centre of his contemplation is the tragically ironic contrast between human life as it looks to the individual and human life as it looks to the race. We are put here to obey certain instincts, laws within us, which tend to the perpetuation of the species in a state of healthy animalism; yet so constituted are we, that we must of necessity form to ourselves ideal ends for our existence, and even wrap ourselves round in restraints, laws without us, to check the free play of nature. And in the everlasting conflict nature is indomitable, sometimes defeated, oftener victorious, sometimes reducing both forces to a kind of mutual paralysis, so that the animal, though restrained, yet mars the triumph of the man; but always infinite in her resources, like the bank at a gaming table; indifferent to everything so long as on the average she can maintain her own purpose. "The scorn of nature for man's finer emotions and her lack of interest in his aspirations" is a phrase that expresses the refrain of Mr. Hardy's thoughts. Nature is not touched by the boy Jude's thirst for learning, his ideal passion for the intellectual life. All she cares is to see him well provided with an instinct which will respond to the grossest appeal, yet which the higher things in his temperament, contributing to the deceit, will refine and glorify with dreams. Some have blamed the audacious piece of symbolism with which Mr. Hardy opens this chapter in Jude's experience; to me it seems not merely justifiable, but triumphantly right. The irruption of "that missile" ("the characteristic part of a barrow pig") upon the scholar's reverie, summoning Jude for the first time to a practical recognition of woman's existence, is an Aristophanic incident—indecent if you will, but it puts the essence of the facts as we point of view of the race, he simply fulfils his func begets, and dies.

Mr. Hardy does not preach. Only, as a occupied with the individual, not with society, nor wi it is merely the peculiarity of his attitude towards he continually sees the lesser destiny in conf greater ones, and always tends to paint as in "J tragedy of unfulfilled aims." It is curious to not novel "Desperate Remedies" (an immature work, influenced in its structure and aims by Wilkie Colli notions already cropping up.

> There is in us an unquenchable expectation gloomiest time persists in inferring that because selves there must be a special future in st though our nature and antecedents to the remote have been common to thousands. Thus to Cythe Graye the question how their lives would en deepest of possible enigmas. To others who position equally well with themselves the que easiest that could be asked—"Like those of similarly circumstanced." (p. 11.)

Applying that to the fates of Jude and the two whom his life was entangled, it is clear that all thr lectually ambitious pauper, the handsome trollop, a strung keen-witted pupil teacher, reached such a c respective careers as might naturally have been pre question of how they felt in working out their pa evident end is only of personal interest; it does no society or to nature. But the personal interest is keen—and Cytherea Graye said so, in a fine passage w quote, because the same thing is said more shortly in a

> She was not an existence, an experience, structure of sensations, to anybody but herself. T kind besides, Tess was only a passing thought. Ev she was no more than a frequently passing tho made herself miserable the livelong night and day this much to them—"Ah, she makes herself unha tried to be cheerful, to dismiss all care, to take the daylight, the flowers, the baby, she could idea to them—"Ah, she bears it very well."

The "Art of Thomas Hardy" (to borrow the book to which I am indebted for a bibliograp especially in his power to show us this "structo tions" on its way through life; or, in his own wor shape and coherence to a series of seemings, or pers sions." And the philosophy of Thomas Hardy ap that in the long struggle the lower continually triu higher; that man, by the laws which he makes to strongest of human passions, only heaps new diffic way of the highest human love; and, worst of all, t and ambitions diffuse themselves wider, and as men less easily content themselves with a life along the resistance, so the tragic conflict becomes more freq wearisome condition of humanity more wearisome.

The strongest of human passions is Mr. Har theme, but he has little to say in its glorificat recurring accident, a deflection of the compass, whi and women aside from their true objects, and makes work in natures that do not go out to seek it Everdene, the charming heroine—who wins our second-best. Grace in "The Woodlanders" returns shamefacedly to her husband, not from any sense of duty; the one faithful to the ideal love of the dead Giles is Marty South—quam nemo reprehendit. And the couples who are by nature fittest to enjoy a felicity that is not in the way of common nature find all the chances of the world against them. Some convention, reasonable or unreasonable, makes a barrier, and at the most they snatch a brief joy.

And yet I think Mr. Hardy is not altogether pessimist. Again I quote Fulke Greville.

> Yet when each of us in his own heart looks
> He finds the God there far unlike his books.

It is men and women rather than nature, he seems to say, who make the unhappiness; and the human heart, if it will rely on itself, holds truth and mercy sufficient to solve most problems. Angel Clare makes himself the mouthpiece of a convention, when Tess confesses her error, and by so doing he ruins his life and hers. Jude and Sue do what they can to secure happiness and repair their errors of judgment, but society intervenes and condemns not them only, but Sue's husband Phillotson, who had acquiesced in his wife's departure. Phillotson realizes what society will not realize, and perhaps cannot afford to, that life offers to a woman (as Cytherea Graye puts it) "a single opportunity of existence as well as of doing her duty." And so he follows the instinct of his own nature in letting her follow hers. But the force of society, the weight of all the dead who rule us, is tremendous, and the final tragedy comes when Sue, in the wreck of her intelligence, accepts the convention bodily, and goes back to force herself into a physical degradation, leaving Jude, one may say literally, to find his way to Hell. The same social obstacle to happiness, the opinion of others claiming to regulate a life which can only be clear to its possessor, is indicated in one of "Life's Little Ironies" when the promoted housemaid, widow of a parson, is debarred by her son from the gentle felicity of remarriage with a constant greengrocer.

Thus, taking the facts all round, Mr. Hardy sees happiness as something very difficult to compass, and the supreme joy which arises from the mating of two beings specially endowed to complete one another as almost a miracle. And he writes by preference about those who desire the miracle. His last book, "The Well-Beloved," relates with a queer irony the pursuit of one ideal by one man through three generations from mother to daughter and from daughter to granddaughter. People who want miracles cannot expect to be happy; and yet the world as Mr. Hardy sees it is full of the material for happiness. The face and the breath of earth are dear and familiar to him; he follows with joy the ways and works of nature in which man co-operates. Perhaps this is nowhere else so plain as in "The Woodlanders," expressed by the feeling slowly asserting itself in the timber-merchant's schoolbred daughter for all the life which Winterborne sums up and incarnates. I cannot resist quoting a description of the man which is worthy to stand beside Keats' "Ode to Autumn":—

> 'He looked and smelt like Autumn's very brother, his face being sunburnt to wheat-colour, his eyes blue as cornflowers, his sleeves and leggings dyed with fruit stains, his hands clammy with the sweet juice of apples, his hat sprinkled with pips, and everywhere about him that atmosphere of cider which at its first return each season has such an indescribable fascination for those who have been born and bred among the orchards.

No one also has [illegible]

compendium of English genius that we find in Sh rustics talk like Shakespeare's, for the excell speech in country places alters far more sl dress or morals. Mr. Hardy deals in no phone never embarrasses the eye; but it gives the form peculiar speech. If he was famous for nothin be famous for such passages of humour as the
from the Madding Crowd," where Joseph Poorg of half a dozen fully individualized and delightfu part is somewhat like that of the chorus in a Gr comment on rather than take part in the main a Hardy is more than a humorist. He is a born moving, perhaps, and weighty, but never cu master of the short story. I have said nothing volumes of tales (which figure with the rest in admirable collected edition of "The Wessex N there is not adequate space here. But it least observant as remarkable that a mind so and amplification should also have the art to and condense as the short tale demands. It is little is told, yet how much' suggested, for ex Fiddler of the Reels."

In these short stories, however, one does no my mind most characteristic of Thomas Hardy narrator, and the humorist, employing exclus faculty; and employing it in his later work wit into a clumsy circumlocution which in places disfig the story of Bathsheba and her lover. But the po and distorted idealist, is not visible. Mr. H lished a volume of poems, and he has written s verse marked with the virile originality which is ever he touches. Yet the poetry of his nature fine ance in prose. It is a poet who renders to us the a Vale of Blackmoor, reeking with blue mists; a p to us Tess's thoughts about the stars; a po Jude's half mystical idealization of the Unive no place for such as him; a poet who throughou and makes us feel the filaments that draw natu quivering joy of the earth under the rain, o mounting of the sap, of bodies that meet and min that at last surrender to each other. By a po whose work is informed by the larger imagina a man, whether for his comfort or discomfort, undoubtedly Mr. Thomas Hardy.

STEPH

It is just thirty years since Mr. Hard "Desperate Remedies," was brought out in t the Tinsley Brothers. It was published anon
"Random Recollections of an Old Publisher Tinsley says that he accepted "Desperate Rem that, in spite of the introduction of what "almost ultra-sensational matter," there was bright side of human nature in the book to sell edition. "However, there was not; but for a adds Mr. Tinsley, "I do not think Mr. Hardy l plain about." The same publisher bought the Hardy's second novel, "Under the Greenw published it in the following year (1872) convi got hold of the best little prose idyll that he had

> I almost raved about the book [he wr > it away wholesale to Pressmen and any one l > in good fiction. But, strange to say, it would > ing it hung on hand in the original two-volume

sion as an architect. But literature had been steadily asserting her claims upon Mr. Hardy, even while he practised Gothic architecture under Sir A. W. Blomfield in the early sixties, when he won the prize and medal of the Institute of British Architects for an essay on "Coloured Bricks and Terra Cotta Architecture" (1863) and received Sir W. Tite's prize for architectural design in the same year. Two years later he wrote an anonymous contribution to Chambers' Journal entitled "How I Built Myself a House"—a humorous sketch of the experiences of an unsophisticated young couple in house-building. Much of Mr. Hardy's earliest work was in verse, but of this work—according to Mr. John Lane, in his preface to the exhaustive bibliography which he has appended to Mr. Lionel Johnson's book on "The Art of Thomas Hardy"—everything, with the exception of one poem, was destroyed. The one piece of salvage is the Wessex ballad, "The Fiddler of the Tranter Swetley's," which appeared, bowdlerized, in the Gentleman's Magazine in November, 1875. The ballad was first reproduced in its original form at the end of Mr. Lane's bibliography, together with the novelist's biographical note on his friend and neighbour, the Rev. William Barnes, the Dorset poet, contributed to the Athenæum in October, 1886. Of Mr. Hardy's remaining contributions to periodical literature in other directions than fiction, we need, perhaps, only mention his paper on "The Dorset Labourer," published in Longman's in July, 1893.

"Far From the Madding Crowd" ran serially through the Cornhill unsigned, and when Messrs. Smith, Elder brought it out in three volumes in the same year (1874) its success was unqualified. Messrs. Smith, Elder saw it through four editions before parting with it in 1882 to Messrs. Sampson Low, who, in their turn, had reprinted it at least half-a-dozen times when Messrs. Osgood, M'Ilvaine took it over for their complete uniform edition of Mr. Hardy's works. It still has—with "Tess of the D'Urbervilles," which runs it very close in the matter of popularity—a far wider circulation than Mr. Hardy's other books, though all have a remarkably steady sale, and two, "The Woodlanders" and "A Group of Noble Dames," are at the present moment being reprinted. "Tess" was the first of the series to appeal to the sixpenny public—rapidly running through an immense edition—and "Far From the Madding Crowd" is now following its example. It was in "Far from the Madding Crowd" that the novelist first adopted the word "Wessex":—

> The series of novels I projected being mainly of the kind called local [he explains in his new preface to the book in the uniform edition], they seemed to require a territorial definition of some sort to lend unity to their scene. Finding that the area of a single county did not afford a canvas large enough for this purpose, and that there were objections to an invented name, I disinterred the old one. The Press and the public were kind enough to welcome the fanciful plan and willingly joined me in the anachronism of imagining a Wessex population living under Queen Victoria.

Mr. Hardy contributed to the article on "Why I Don't Write Plays" which appeared in the Pall Mall Gazette in August, 1892, although he wrote the dramatic version of "Far From the Madding Crowd" in collaboration with Mr. Comyns Carr and had it produced in Liverpool and at the Globe Theatre, London, earlier in the same year; and in the following year he dramatized "The Three Strangers"—one of the "Wessex Tales"—the play being produced at Terry's Theatre under the title of The Three Wayfarers, with three other one-act pieces.

After "Far From the Madding Crowd"—to return to the novels—came "The Hand of Ethelberta: a Comedy in Chapters," which followed the course of its predecessor through the pages of the Cornhill, and was subsequently published by Messrs. Smith, Elder in two volumes. Its author has since described the book as "a somewhat frivolous narrative, produced as an interlude between stories of a more sober design," and, though it did not meet with the striking success of "Far From the Madding Crowd," it was twice reprinted by the original publishers before Messrs. Sampson Low took it over in 1882—to part with it later, though only after four or five fresh editions had been planted out by Messrs. Osgood, M'Ilvaine—

Low), while in 1878 Messrs. Chatto succeeded the the publishers of "Under the Greenwood Tree" and out in two new editions. "Under the Greenwood still published by Messrs. Chatto (in three distinct is now, we believe, the only book by Mr. Hardy w from any house but that of Harper and Brother M'Ilvaine's successors), in whose complete edit novelist's works it also appears. "Desperate Rem anonymous novel, did not make its reappearance author's name until 1889, when Ward and Downey bro in its first one-volume form. Three years later Mr.
reprinted it in a popular edition, and in 1895, wh M'Ilvaine included it in their uniform edition, the We and other places mentioned were, in several of the st for the first time by the names under which they where—"for the satisfaction," writes the author reader who may care for consistency in such matt Hardy's seventh book was "The Trumpet-Major," p three volumes by Smith, Elder in 1880 after runni through Good Words. A new and cheaper edition in was brought out in the following year by Messrs. Sa who reprinted it several times before it passed i M'Ilvaine's complete edition in 1895. It was again r 1897. The eighth novel was "A Laodicean," whic originally in Harper's Magazine, Messrs. Sampson Lo it out subsequently in three volumes (1881). It has reprinted at least eight times:—

> The writing of this tale [says Mr. Hardy in t > face to the book] was rendered memorable, to two > least, by a tedious illness of five months that laid > author soon after the story was begun in a well-k > zine, during which period the narrative had to be > continued by dictation to a predeterminist cheer
> As some of these novels of Wessex life address > more especially to readers into whose souls th > entered, and whose years have less pleasure in the > heretofore, so "A Laodicean" may perhaps be > away an idle afternoon of the comfortable ones > have fallen to them in pleasant places; above all, o > and happy section of the reading public which h > reached ripeness of years; those to whom mar > pilgrim's Eternal City, and not a milestone on the

Mr. Hardy's next novel, "Two on a Tower," wa in three volumes in 1882 by Messrs. Sampson Low, a duction in serial form in the Boston Monthly. It has through about the same number of editions as its predecessor, although the book met with a storm of first appearance. "That, however," said Mr. Hardy, face to the book in the uniform edition," was thirteen and I venture to think that those who care to read th will be quite astonished at the scrupulous proprie therein on the relations of the sexes; for, though th frivolous and even grotesque touches on occasion hardly a single caress in the book outside legal ma what was intended to be." Four years elapsed Hardy's tenth novel, "The Mayor of Casterbridge, appearance, though his story of "The Romantic Ad a Milkmaid," which came out in the Graphic Summer 1883, was reprinted in book form in America in 18
Mayor of Casterbridge" was another Graphic stor Smith, Elder afterwards bringing it out in two volu was in 1886; in the following year Messrs. Sampso the book over, and, after several reprints, it found it the rest of the Hardy novels, to Osgood, M'Ilvain
"The Woodlanders" came next, this time throug Macmillan, who published it in 1887 in three volu seeing it through their magazine, and brought it volume form in the same year. Messrs. Macmillan w original publishers of "Wessex Tales" in two volu though the stories had been making their appearanc periodicals since 1879. With "Tess" and his next of tales, "A Group of Noble Dames"—both issue Messrs. Osgood, M'Ilvaine became Mr. Hardy's publi

numerous editions as an ordinary volume, and is now out of print in that form; and it has been reprinted several times since its inclusion in the uniform edition in 1895. "The Well-Beloved" started as a serial in the Illustrated London News in 1892, but did not appear in independent form until 1897, when it was included in the uniform edition with a few chapters rewritten. "Life's Little Ironies" came in 1894 and ran through several editions in the same year, joining the uniform series in 1896. "Jude the Obscure" (1895) was produced serially in Harper's, but, as in the case of "Tess," the magazine version was, for various reasons, abridged and modified in some degree, and it was not until it reached the book that the tale appeared as originally written. "For a novel addressed by a man to men and women," wrote Mr. Hardy in his preface, "which attempts to deal unaffectedly with the fret and fever, derision and disaster, that may press in the wake of the strongest passion known to humanity, and to point, without a mincing of words, the tragedy of unfulfilled aims, I am not aware that there is anything in the handling of the book to which exception can be taken." That, so far, is the last long novel published by Mr. Hardy, and it seems probable that his next volume will be another collection of short stories. His last volume, it will be remembered, was his collection of "Wessex Poems" (1898), only four out of which had appeared before, one of the four being "The Fire at Tranter Sweetley's," already referred to. Three tales, which we believe have not been republished independently—in this country at all events—should be mentioned before closing our bibliography—"The Indiscretion in the Life of an Heiress," which appeared in Chatto and Windus' New Quarterly Magazine in 1878; "The Waiting Supper," published in Murray's Magazine ten years later, and reprinted in America; and "A Changed Man," which appeared in two numbers of the Sphere last year.

THE HISTORICAL VALUE OF WILLS.

A "Personal View."

By the Rev. J. CHARLES COX.

Notwithstanding all that has been done to illustrate history in its general as well as in its social and economic aspects by the study of wills, the amount that has been accomplished, after either a fitful or systematic fashion, is a mere nothing compared with what remains to be done.

Those two great printing societies—Surtees and Camden—are in this matter naturally well to the front. The second volume issued by the Surtees Society (1835), edited by Canon Raine, was "Wills and Inventories illustrative of the History, Manners, Language, Statistics, &c., of the Northern Counties of England." These were taken from the registry at Durham. After a lapse of just a quarter of a century Canon Greenwell edited a second volume. The society also produced five excellent volumes, between 1836 and 1881, termed "Testamenta Eboracensia" from the York registry, illustrative of the Province of York from 1300 downwards, under the editorship of Canon Raine. The same industrious scholar, for the same society, likewise produced a volume, in 1853, on the early wills of the Archdeaconry of Richmond. The Camden Society produced, in 1850, a volume on the wills and inventories from the registry of the commissary of Bury St. Edmunds and the Archdeaconry of Sudbury, and also, in 1863, gave "a selection of wills of eminent persons," between the years 1495 and 1695, from the Prerogative Court of Canterbury. These volumes are more than sufficient Record Society of his founding. It includes i wills of Northampton and Rutland, from 1510 t the Consistory Court of the Bishop of Lichfi and certain peculiars of the diocese, from 1510 of the Archdeaconry of Berkshire, from 1508 t

the Consistory Court of the Bishop of Glou to 1650; and above all those of the Prer Canterbury (in three volumes), from 1383 to 1 interest attached to the systematic study of wi over a given district, particularly to the stude eve of the Reformation period, has of late be two very different parts of England—the points well as resemblance being equally noteworthy.
Weaver brought out, in 1890, under the title o
a most interesting account of some 600 Somerse years 1528-1536, arranged under their parishes tions of the St. Paul's Ecclesiological Soci valuable and exhaustive analysis of the wills o
Rochester, from 1400 to the accession of Elizab
Northamptonshire are now undergoing a like s

The Pre-Reformation wills give us a ru of the church where the testator desired and are therefore the authoritative source
The name of the saint connected with an old has not infrequently a peculiar value; the de of the introduction of Christianity through a and Augustinian sources, or remind us of the or monastic saints of Anglo-Saxon days, are generally supposed. Certain dioceses have had examined by competent scholars and are mos others are still in a hopeless modern muddle.
be named where the blunders in the offic present year of grace exceed forty.

The exact date of structural alterations the fabric of the church can often be found source, as well as the details of the supply an of church furniture and ornaments. The unsu of much excellent "Perpendicular" work is th as well as the lavish attention to roodlofts, a lights down to the very moment when the fir waves of the reformation swept into our church

It is pleasant to note how the clergy—the of the day—were not content merely to parishioners to leave a trifle for forgotten tit altar, to the reparation of the bells, or to th specific lights, or even to the poor of the distr exhorted them to attend to the good of the practical religious duty. For instance, The Paulerspury, in 1532, left "one-half of my goo in warkes of mercye as in mendyng of the bequests to the repair of bridges and roads we

The books named in wills afford a fund bibliographer and general student of literature

The record of the later mediæval wills establish the curious fact that, though the attempt to have Henry VI. canonized failed, there was many a church of his kingdom that not only possessed an image of the pious Monarch, but kept a light burning before it. Mr. Duncan found that this King had an image at the church of Lewisham, and a Towcester will, temp. Henry VIII., proves that there was a joint light in that Northamptonshire church to St. Roche and King Henry.

The cruel wrong done to education in the time of Edward VI. through the wholesale suppression of chantries becomes more and more established from the study of wills. Not a few chantries, whose connexion with parochial education is ignored by the chantry "certificates," can be proved to have done much in that direction. The chantry priest, instead of being the lazy mere masspriest as commonly asserted, turns out to have been frequently the village schoolmaster. The will of the Spratton chantry priest, of 1520, leaves "to every scolar of my paryshe that can syng iiijd., and that cannot ijd., and to every scolar that I have els jd., and that have ben my scolars beyng at my buryal a peny, and as moche at the moneth day to every scolar of myne that are present, and to each as have ben my scolars beyng then yn holy orders present at my buryall xijd." Another Northamptonshire example of somewhat the same character is to be found in the will of John Bloxam (1518), priest of the chantry of Our Lady, Great Addington. One clause runs as follows:—"I will that any priest who has been my scholar in time past to have that he may pray for me £10, or their value in books."

The funeral feasts were occasionally prodigious affairs. Edward Martin, parson of Old, a parish of slender population and small extent, appended with his own hand, in 1514, a noteworthy codicil to his will. Therein he provides that there were to be brewed against his burial four quarters of malt; and three bullocks, six sheep, three calves, and six pigs, and "hens and capons as nede shalbe" were to be prepared for the same, together with three quarters of "bred corne," that all comers might be rejoiced!

A most practical step towards developing research into wills would be the preparing a bibliography on what has already been published or printed. If some one of sufficient leisure and experience would prepare such a work, there is probably sufficient wholesome interest in the subject to secure a decent subscription list. Such a book would not only include an account of what is contained in such an admirable volume as the "Testamenta Karleolensia," by the late lamented Chancellor Ferguson, issued by the Cumberland and Westmorland Antiquarian Society, but also the smaller and more isolated efforts of other provincial societies. Other indexes, too, besides those already mentioned, would be there chronicled, such as the good work in that direction done by the Yorkshire Record Society.

Wills, too, are frequently to be found scattered about in the earlier episcopal registers, and among the muniments of our Natural Science, now that it has so large a place tion, inevitably tends to be a matter of summari of tabulated lists, of books and instruments. No o an examination in ornithology before him would necessary to prepare for it by getting up at three and summer morning in the woods. Another thing whic discourage first-hand observation is the countless volumes written on bird life. The scientific student may be content to know a natural fact by being taug true field naturalist will not admit it until he has seen surprising as it may seem, there is still something t about birds. Gilbert White—the Bacon of Ornithol ago when mediæval legends about plants and animals were still accepted, showed the proper way to study namely, by patient and accurate observation. I observers have followed in his steps. With the na Warde Fowler, Mr. Cornish, Mr. W. H. Hudson, and bird lovers are familiar. It is always refreshing to m book which shows what can still be done by those wh true gifts of sight and hearing and the patience t Such a book, for instance, to our thinking, was Mr. "Evolution of Bird Song"; and such a book is M Selous' BIRD WATCHING (Dent, 7s. 6d.), a volume of th Hall Library."

BIRDS AND THEIR WAYS.*

The title is, perhaps, a little misleading. Bird an art, the rules of which must be learnt. One rule any sudden movement, however slight—the raising glasses to the eye, for instance, is often quite enoug the bird you wish to focus. In the open field you c sportsmen know, get near birds by appearing oblivio presence, and avoiding all appearance of walking Of these and the like maxims Mr. Selous tells us not not the art but its results with which he is concerned book is a storehouse of patient and exhaustive o Bird watching, like everything else which is wo involves trouble and some discomfort. You must long before the kitchen fire is lit; you must not mi rain; and when you insert yourself into a hole made stack with only your eyes visible, you must endure to say nothing of the amazed curiosity of the pas But, as our author says, let a man "lay down the gu up the glasses for a week, a day, even for an hour, if and he will never wish to change back again."

Birds—the thought impresses itself upon us reading this book—form the most wonderful and most class of animal life. They do so many inexplicable the case of most animals hunger, sexual passion, and t an inner and secret life of which glimpses only are revealed to us. Strange and beautiful is the play of the stone-curlews at nightfall; and the description of it shows Mr. Selous at his best:—

> During the day, as I have said, these birds are idle and lethargic—sitting about, dozing often, or sleeping—but as the air cools and the shadows fall they rouse into a glad activity, and coming down and spreading themselves over the wide space of the warrens, they begin to run excitedly about, raising and waving their wings, leaping into the air, and often making little flights, or rather flittings, over the ground as a part of the disport. As a part of it I say advisedly, for they do not stop and then fly, and on alighting recommence, but the flight arises out of the wild waving and running, and this is resumed, without a pause, as the bird again touches the ground. All about now over the warrens their plaintive, wailing notes are heard, notes that seem a part of the deepening gloom and sad sky; for nature's own sadness seems to speak in the voice of these birds. They swell and subside and swell again as they are caught up and repeated in different places from one bird to another, and often swell into a full chorus of several together. Deeper now fall the shadows, "light thickens," till one catches, at last, only "dreary gleams about the moorland," as now here, now there, the wings are flung up—showing the lighter-coloured inner surface—till gradually, first one and then another, or by twos or threes or fours, the birds fly off into the night, wailing as they go. But this note on the wing is not the same as that uttered whilst running over the ground. The ground-note is much more drawn out, and a sort of long, wailing twitter—called the "clamour"—often precedes and leads up to the final wail. In the air it comes just as a wail without this preliminary. But it must not be supposed that all the birds perform these antics simultaneously. If they did the effect would be more striking, but it is generally only a few at a time over a wide space, or, at most, some two or three together—as by sympathy—that act so. The eye does not catch more than a few gleams—some three or four or five—of the flung-up wings at one time over the whole space. It is a gleam here and a gleam there in the deepening gloom.

Virgil thought that the rooks,

> Nescio qua præter solitum dulcedine lætí rejoiced in sympathy with the atmosphere; but this seems inadequate to describe the bizarre antics and curious "personal incidents" which Mr. Selous goes on to describe in great detail. Mr. Hudson and other writers told us much of the courting of birds and its attendant ceremonies; but there is a great deal of new and interesting matter in "Bird Watching." The wooing of the great plover is an intricate performance, and we have only space to give one phase of it:—

quickly to the calling one, who also ad
They approach each other, and standing s perhaps, a foot between them, but looking d in the direction in which it has been advanc assume, at the same time, a particular posture, worth waiting days to see. First selves tall-ly up on their long, yellow, s curving the neck with a slow and formal the head downwards—yet still holding it stop thus, set and rigid, the beak point Having stood like this for some seconds normal attitude. This wonderful pose, c in a vein of stiff formality, but to which yellow eye gives a look of wildness, almost it, both during its development and when i reached, something quite per se, and in vain

In all the important relations of life the observed by the larger birds. Most of us bowings of the courting pigeon. But the fl is the slave of ceremony. Here is another pic

> Two stock-doves fighting.—This is very > peculiar. They fight with continual blows

STOCK DOVES: A DUEL WITH CERE

being used both as sword—or, rather, part The peculiarity, however, is this, that over there is a pause in the combat, when both b bow, with tail raised in air, as in courting will bow together, and, as it would see facing towards each other, at any rate—they will both stand in a line, and bow, so t to the tail of the other, who bows to the two will bow at different times, each seemin in making his bow than in the direction or is like a little interlude, and when it is ov advance, again, against each other, till to front, and quite close. Both, then jump, and battle vigorously with their w parrying. One now makes a higher spring, t to jump on to his opponent's back, and upon him. This is all plain, honest fighti constant tendency—constantly carried out get into line, and fight in a sort of follow-whilst making these low bows at interva encumbered with forms, with a heavy, punc reminding one of those ornate sweeps an

Mr. Selous' close observations lead him to shake the basis of many an old belief. Thus he disputes altogether the theory that the nightingale is a melancholy bird of sober and dull colouring, a defect atoned for by its unquestioned superiority in song. Every natural history repeats the story of the lapwing tempting the intruder from her nest by feigning to be hurt (though we fancy it is not mentioned in the "Natural History of Selborne"). Mr. Selous has seen skuas, snipe, wild duck, and nightjars do this, but never peewits, and keepers confirm his experience. It is a curious phenomenon, and Mr. Selous explains it thus. During the incubatory period the bird is easily upset, and a sudden surprise may throw it into a kind of hysteria in its attempt to escape. This is found to be useful by drawing away the intruder in pursuit, and by the action of natural selection the bird acquires a new instinctive habit of fluttering helplessly away from its nest. So far so good, but our author is, here as elsewhere, not quite so lucid in his theories as in his facts. This ruse of the parent bird is (as far as we can understand him) of much less service when there are eggs in the nest than when there are young birds who can utilize a little delay by concealing themselves. And he suggests that natural selection would confine the adoption of this ruse to a period after the eggs have been hatched. This is an ingenious theory, but we much doubt whether observed facts will support it.

Mr. Selous has some very curious facts and speculations about the simultaneous movements of flocks of birds. The fact of such movements must, we think, be admitted, but we cannot think Mr. Selous has sufficiently weighed all his evidence, particularly in the case of the little birds who fed on the heap of refuse straw and wild plants against the stack in which he hid. The sudden flight of a number of them at the same moment might be accounted for in a number of ways, which oddly enough he does not suggest. Any almost imperceptible subsidence of the herbage would cause it. So would any slight movement, say of a weasel, or even a mouse, underneath where the birds were feeding. This only illustrates the excessive care required in theorizing on this matter. On the whole, Mr. Selous' evidence, as to pigeons, rooks—to rooks he devotes two most interesting and delightful chapters—and other birds does seem common mind. It is not explained by the hypothesis ship. Mr. Selous' close study of rooks leads him to " 'the many wintered crow that leads the clang home' is—a lovely line," and nothing more. Th animals are liable to be stirred by a sudden panic is common knowledge. But in the case of birds, at a by no means always a case of alarm. Mr. Selous has a theory of his own. He is reminded of the Gre wind or current of thought which, as the dem emotional Athenians believed, swept through an a caused it to think and act as one man. For h transference was the earliest means of communic gregarious animals. As they rose in the scale speech was developed, the old power was of cours Thought transference in man, in fact, if it exists, reversion to a more primitive type of intercommuni original, at any rate. The thought reader and the c if we accept Mr. Selous' doctrine, so far from bei are reverting to the savage and animal life of t forest. It is a large speculation on which we cannot We can only agree that Mr. Selous has certainly adde of observation on this obscure matter one of the which baffle us in the mystery of bird life. We have more than indicate the nature of this book, which is for the sincerity and originality of its treatmen subject and for the many curious questions raised will interest the field ornithologist.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE SALE-R

That a picture by John Hoppner should realize higher sum than has yet been recorded—again in th of course—for a work by Reynolds, Gainsborough, Turner, to say nothing of artists belonging to oth British school, gives colour to the favourite general the unexpected always happens. Hoppner's portra Lady Manners, afterwards Countess of Dysart, wh by Messrs. Robinson and Fisher on Thursday of las been the subject of much conjecture among connoisse little time. It was one of five pictures belong of pleasure but the quality of pleasure derivable from this or that picture into £ s. d.—then, surely, this canvas by Hoppner does not occupy a foremost place. On the other hand, it is in superb condition, as fresh as when it was painted, and more mellow. The opening bid in a crowded sale-room was one of 5,000 guineas—perhaps twice as much as the picture would have realized a decade ago.

More rapidly than it takes to tell came offers which advanced the price by leaps of 500 or 1,000 guineas to 12,000 guineas. Messrs. Tooth bid an additional 100 guineas, and by small stages 13,000 guineas was reached. At this point the well-known dealer Mr. Charles Wertheimer—younger brother of the father of the two ladies so daringly depleted by Mr. Sargent in the present Academy—and Mr. Duveen entered into contest. Mr. Wertheimer, seldom outstripped, refused to pay more than 14,000 guineas, and Mr. Duveen was declared the buyer at 14,050 guineas, or £14,752 10s. As we have hinted, this is far and away the highest sum yet paid at auction in this country for a picture. The following table is of interest in this connexion :—

HIGHEST SUMS PAID AT AUCTION FOR PICTURES BY THIRTEEN ARTISTS.

Artist.	Work.	Sale.	Date.	Price. Gns.
Hoppner ..	Louisa Lady Manners ..	Bruce	1901 ..	14,050
Van Dyck ..	Port. of Genoese Senator }	Peel	1900 ..	£24,250
" " ..	Port. of Lady .. }
Reynolds ..	Lady Betty Delmé and Children	Delmé	1894 ..	Gns. 11,000
Raphael ..	Crucifixion	Dudley	1892 ..	10,600
Romney ..	Viscountess Clifden and Lady Spencer	Clifden	1896 ..	10,500
Gainsborough	"The Stolen Duchess" ..	Wynne Ellis ..	1876 ..	10,100
Boucher .	Madame de Pompadour..	Lonsdale	1887 ..	9,900
Hobbema ..	Landscape with figures	Hope Edwardes	1901 ..	9,460
Constable ..	Stratford Mill	Huth	1895 ..	8,500
Turner ..	Dogana and Santa Maria Salute	Fowler	1899 ..	8,200
Troyon ..	Dairy Farm	Miéville	1899 ..	6,400
Burne-Jones	Love and the Pilgrim ..	Burne-Jones ..	1898 ..	5,500
Millais ..	The Boyhood of Raleigh	Reiss	1900 ..	5,200

As to Hoppner, his "record" has been quintupled. In 1895, when Lord Bridport's collection came up for sale, a full-length portrait by Hoppner of the seller's ancestor, Lord Nelson, 91in. by 58in., made 2,350 guineas ; and in 1889 a presentment of Mary Gwyn, at the Gwyn sale, brought 2,250 guineas.

The price paid for the Louisa, Lady Manners—to be accounted for in part, no doubt, by the presence in this country of several wealthy Americans—had its correspondence on Saturday afternoon at Messrs. Sotheby's. The portrait was rendered in mezzotint by Charles Turner, associated with his great namesake by reason of his several engravings in the "Liber Studiorum." The Turner plate for Louisa, Lady Manners, is very scarce. By one of those coincidences which give savour to life, a brilliant proof before all letters occurred for sale on Saturday, as part of the property of Miss Raeburn, grand-daughter of the great Scottish artist. A fortnight ago £100 would almost certainly have secured it, whereas, the original picture having two days before fetched so much, the mezzotint, albeit neither accounted very beautiful nor very faithful as an interpretation, made £200. As five minutes before a good, but slightly stained impression of Rembrandt's lovely etching, "The Three Trees," was sold for £198, we here have in a nutshell one of the main factors in the philosophy of the sale-room : rarity, with a dash of the sensational.

Twenty-four hours after the contest in Willis' Rooms between Mr. [illegible] passed into the possession of Mr. Charles [illegible] successful opponent of the previous afternoon [illegible] bidder.

Sentiment undeniably operated to a very la[illegible] sale of the Royal sherries. Not loyal subjects [illegible] entertainers across the Atlantic desired to hav[illegible] wine from the cellars of Buckingham Palace, W[illegible] Sandringham. The first lot made £7 10s. a [illegible] without the Royal label it might have been bo[illegible] that sum ; and for the final five dozen of g[illegible] Sandringham no less than £28 10s. a dozen was [illegible] dozen disposed of realized £18,457 17s., or [illegible] about £3 14s. a dozen. Who shall say that mone[illegible] within five days such sums are paid for pictur[illegible] out-of-fashion wine !

THE DRAMA.

"LA COURSE DU FLAMBEA[illegible]

Last week I ventured the opinion that, [illegible] analysis, the pleasure derived from Mme. Réj[illegible] to be found in her temperament, her essentia[illegible] power of interpretation, of imitating someth[illegible] considerable as that power undoubtedly was. [illegible] actress has been good enough to confirm my jud[illegible] ing as the heroine of La Course du Flambeau. [illegible] has given a marvellously clever imitation o[illegible] unlike herself ; her miming faculty has counte[illegible] her temperament for nothing ; the result has [illegible] the admiration excited by all feats of skill, but [illegible] Mme. Réjane is alone capable of giving us becau[illegible] Réjane, not the Réjane "thrill." The pla[illegible] Hervieu, novelist and dramatist, a serious, int[illegible] say bookish writer, who, getting an idea into hi[illegible] to write a novel or a play "round" it, instea[illegible] novel or a play as a frank imitation of life and l[illegible] for themselves. It is this method of setting [illegible] results in thesis-plays, and it is because the [illegible] result of this method that they are all radically [illegible] objection to them is the simple but fatal objec[illegible] is not fact. For instance, from your knowledge [illegible] affairs of some families in your square or in the [illegible] form the opinion that it is a hardship for a man [illegible] to marry his deceased wife's sister. The validi[illegible] clusion is tested by the facts to which you [illegible] suppose, on the other hand, that you take [illegible] marriage with a deceased wife's sister as the [illegible] Then you proceed to arrange your characte[illegible] accordingly. But your thesis has no validity. [illegible] stance to which you point in support of it [illegible] invented for its support. You are arguing i[illegible] thesis may or may not be true, but it is certain [illegible] the one piece of evidence which is absolutely in[illegible]

It may or may not be true, as M. Hervieu [illegible] Course du Flambeau (title taken from the Lucre[illegible] who "vitae lampada tradunt"), that the te[illegible] generation of a family is to sacrifice itself, a[illegible] generation, for the next. It is true of some fam[illegible] viduals, not of others. In short, it all depends, dence does not arrange things in this symmetrical fashion, and we turn away from the conclusion of M. Hervieu's play, dead grandmother and all, as a childish invention. It is vitiated by the same symmetry all through. Over against each successive sacrifice of the mother you have a piece of unconscious cruelty on the part of the child. In Act I. the mother refuses to marry the man she loves because her daughter is yet unmarried, and the next moment the daughter announces to her mother that she has arranged a marriage for herself. In Act II. the daughter, to save her husband from bankruptcy, forces her mother to the humiliation of begging alms from the man she has rejected. In Act III. the mother forges the grandmother's name in order to rob the old lady of money which the daughter wants for her husband. In Act IV., when the mother has slain the grandmother in order to save her daughter's life, the girl calmly leaves her because her husband has secured an appointment elsewhere. All this seems absurd to an English audience. Even in France, where the family bond is still something of a fetish, it must seem a bit "steep." It is not made more plausible by learned references to the Lampadephoria, to "mes très anciens amis Platon et le bon poète Lucrèce," to Æneas and Anchises, to the Atrides, to Mlle. de Sombreuil, and to the customs of the North American Indians. M. Hervieu seems to have thought that a play about the "torch of life" might reasonably smell of the lamp.

Apart from the demerits of the play we do not like to see Mme. Réjane crying her eyes out, in dowdy garments, and a wig streaked with grey. We admit the pathos of her acting when she describes her agonies as a detected forger, but would rather she left that sort of pathos to somebody else. She should stick to comedy, the ironic, acidulated, occasionally grim comedy of such pieces as La Parisienne and Ma Cousine and La Douloureuse. There she is inimitable, incomparable, irresistible. Some of her admirers may also put in a word for her coarser repertory, the hysteric passion and Billingsgate of Sapho and Zaza, and I can understand that taste, though I do not share it. But I cannot believe that any one wants to see her wholly wasted, a clever actress acting what any other merely clever actress could act, as in this dull, preposterous thesis-play of M. Hervieu's.

A. B. WALKLEY.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

THE CASE AGAINST THE BOERS.

RIGHTS AND WRONGS OF THE TRANSVAAL WAR. By EDWARD T. COOK. (Arnold. 12s. 6d. n.).

We praised Mr. Methuen, the other day, for the deadly moderation of his level-headed statement of the case against the Milner-Chamberlain policy. Mr. Cook writes on the other side and proves himself a still more effective advocate. He is a careful, cold-blooded writer, with a passion for accuracy and the verified reference. He has the knack of being continuously readable without ever letting himself go; and his manner reminds us of the great barrister who ridiculed eloquence, declaring that "the verdict is the thing." His opponents will probably say, indeed we fancy they have already said, that the controversies which the writer stirs are stale, and that the actual topics of the moment are the policy of farm-burning and the management of refuge [illegible] make his book something very like the final [illegible] subject.

Mr. Cook is no blind partisan of either Mr. [illegible] or Mr. Rhodes. He entirely disapproves of th[illegible] he admits that the Colonial Secretary was p[illegible] buffed by Lord Rosmead for proposing to press [illegible] immediately after the Raid, and was very much [illegible] publishing the "How is Mrs. Kruger?" despatc[illegible] Kruger had received it, for insisting on the word "[illegible] in a manner calculated to give needless prove[illegible] calling Mr. Kruger a sponge. But he makes it cle[illegible] mistakes only amounted to "contributory negligen[illegible] they are not the cause—or even the occasion—of th[illegible] war was the inevitable result of the clash of tw[illegible] policies, founded on racial distinctions, deliberately [illegible] consistently pursued. The only condition on wh[illegible] have been avoided was that one of the two polic[illegible] reversed. Consequently the rights and wrongs [illegible] depend upon the answers to be given to two questio[illegible] policy of Mr. Kruger such that Mr. Chamberlain o[illegible] given way to it? Did Mr. Kruger's so-called conces[illegible] to a substantial modification of that policy? Mr. C[illegible] both these questions in the negative; and he [illegible] answers with quotations not only from Blue-books, [illegible] public utterances of his opponents. Sir Henry de [illegible] John Morley, Mr. W. T. Stead, and others are wit[illegible] force cited and compelled to give evidence again[illegible] which they now support.

It would be a hopeless task to summarize the [illegible] the space at our disposal. It follows Mr. Kruger's [illegible] from the Convention of Pretoria onwards in order [illegible] Mr. Kruger has consistently evaded the obligations [illegible] vention, and of the subsequent Convention of L[illegible] extending frontiers which the convention had de[illegible] entering into direct relations with foreign Powers, ([illegible] fering with the commercial rights which the convent[illegible] for British subjects, (4) by commandeering British s[illegible] (5) by refusing British subjects the full rights of [illegible] It adduces evidence to show that the agitation for [illegible] from being a "capitalist's job," was in full swing [illegible] capitalists would have anything to do with it [illegible] Kruger's armaments, some time before the Raid, wer[illegible] extensive as to be only explicable if they were int[illegible] used against the paramount Power; and that, thoug[illegible] have been nothing that could be technically term[illegible] spiracy" to substitute the United States of Sout[illegible] the British dominion, yet it was the avowed policy [illegible] vanced members of the Bond to accomplish this result. [illegible] he gathers together various utterances of the anti-I[illegible] both in England and in South Africa, to show that th[illegible] Mr. Kruger, not to do justice to the strangers withi[illegible] but to fool the British Government with sham [illegible] "Gain as much time as you can," was the advice of M[illegible] White. "Give Master Joe another fall," was the [illegible] Mr. Labouchere. "Some colourable measure of re[illegible] recommended by Mr. Merriman, who expressly expla[illegible] was not in the interest of the Uitlanders that he urg[illegible] is honestly now the time," wrote Mr. Te Water, [illegible] little, however one may later again tighten the rope.

But all this is only preliminary. We come to the [illegible] the Bloemfontein Conference. Here Mr. Cook's argum[illegible]

All the evidence is given for Sir Henry de Villiers' verdict that "throughout the negotiations they (the Transvaal Government) have always been wriggling to prevent a clear and precise decision." The conclusion drawn is that "Mr. Kruger never had any honest intention of meeting the Uitlander case at all."

We must congratulate Mr. Cook most warmly on his achievement. Whatever else may be read about the diplomacy that precedes the war, his book must certainly be read. It will immensely increase a reputation that already stood very high. No recent book on any political question has been so good, and we are inclined to think that it marks out Mr. Cook as the ablest political journalist of the day. It seems like an anti-climax to add that it is admirably indexed; but, even at the risk of anti-climax that act of justice must be done.

THE CHINESE CRISIS.

Wen Ching is the pseudonym of a Chinese gentleman who contributed some articles on the Boxer business and the Reform movement to the Singapore Free Press. Rearranged and issued as a book, THE CHINESE CRISIS FROM WITHIN (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d.), they form a contribution to the literature of the subject not less striking than the contributions of Sir Robert Hart himself. In the one case as in the other the knowledge is obviously profound, though the style is occasionally cryptic. What is made quite clear, however, is Wen Ching's unfavourable opinion of Manchus in general and of certain Manchus in particular. It appears that the Manchus sent emissaries to Singapore to murder him; and one can understand that any scheme of murder which did not provide for the assassination of Wen Ching would seem incomplete in Manchu eyes. For he not only denounces those of them who are obviously wicked, but "gives away" certain others who are credited with the virtues of reformers. Even the great Chang Chi Tung, whose appeal to his countrymen a missionary lately translated, is shown up as a treacherous rascal. During the reform fever he was an eager reformer; but he changed his tone when the Empress-Dowager accomplished her coup d'État. Then

> His first act was a most contemptible betrayal of his friends in the reform ranks. Yung-I, Tan Tze T'ung, and others were, not long before, intimate pupils or subordinates of his. In fact, he had instigated them by his example, by his donations, and by his public sympathy. Yet the first thing he did was to telegraph to Pekin that these men should be beheaded. They were killed accordingly, without trial.

Wen Ching also warns us against Li Hung Chang. He is undoubtedly "the only sensible man left"; but

> He is a very dangerous man. He is now in the north. Do we know what he will do? Well, Li Hung Chang just wishes to wipe out the stain which has attached to his name in consequence of the loss of Formosa. He is known by the Chinese to be willing to die in harness or in battle to show his loyalty to the Dowager-Empress. Put Li Hung Chang in power in Chih-li, give him troops, and he will not refuse to obey Tzu Hsi's edict calling upon him to fight the "barbarians." Be it known that Li Hung Chang, like all the old viceroys, dislikes the foreigner from the bottom of his

the doings of Marguerite de Valois in the immortalized in Heine's poem :—

> The idle and curious, finding nothing mo > do, counted the number of young persons > palace, became Court attendants, and th > Whore had they gone? Perhaps in the Forb > exist subterranean passages, and perhaps' > still in the palace of China. However, g > wildfire that young servitors of the Court suff > deaths within the walls of the Imperial ci > reveals no secrets!

Dissolute living, however, did not distract politics. In order to check the Emperor's pro reform, she slapped his face with her fan, and lo
"a Palace of Circe wherein, by temptations men should make brutes of themselves." Wen "affirm that poor Kuang Hsu came out of the o though he "only joined in the gambling partie requested by the Empress-Dowager, who frequ palace to see that the amusements were b carried out." Yet Wen Ching thinks it not im terrible old woman might be moved to "make avowal of her sins," to "resign her regency," transfer the authority to Kuang Hsu." It is of that optimism which besets all writers question—from Sir Robert Hart, who thinks th if we abolish extra-territoriality, to Mr. Archi thinks that all will go well if we open up the
—and which seems so inconsistent and incomp cold-blooded critic who has all the proposals o in front of him at once.

AN AUSTRALIAN WRIT

The work of Mr. Henry Lawson has alrea appeal to Australian readers; his vivid an and his yarns of life in the back blocks have
"of the Bush, bushy," and are looked for a parts of the Commonwealth. Over here he is p by his volume "While the Billy Boils," bu brother in Australian letters, Marcus Cla very few Australian writers whom Englis name—he is also a poet. Messrs. Blackwood
THE COUNTRY I COME FROM (6s.), which contain
"While the Billy Boils" and from "On the Tr the Slipralls." The two latter we have late prised in one volume, from Messrs. Angus a Sydney; while side by side with it we have from Australia, of Mr. Lawson's poems.

In the inevitable absence of the traditio older country, Australian literature is ma by verse, fiction, and journalism, and the outco moment is to be found in writers like Mr. La plenty of "go," but they strike a rather dif
Marcus Clarke and Kendall, whose verses o
"weird melancholy" which the former fou
The new poet writes more in the spirit of advice :—"My brothers, let us breakfast in S Australia, and dine in France till our lives e smack a little of the luncheon party with recit

He warns us, however, to be careful how we criticize him :

> Must I turn aside from my destined way
> For a task your Joss would find me ?
> I come with strength of the living day,
> And with half the world behind me ;
> I leave you alone in your cultured halls
> To drivel and croak and cavil ;
> Till your voice goes further than college walls,
> Keep out of the tracks we travel !

Thus cautioned we hesitate to complain because Mr. Lawson rhymes "timber" with "remember," and "brought" with "Court," and "enjoyed" with "guyed" ; and, indeed, there is a sterling worth in his poems, or at all events in some of them, which excuses, if it does not justify, these eccentricities. The poet who is continually pouring out poetry for the newspapers, as Mr. Lawson does for the Sydney Bulletin, is inevitably unequal. Mr. Lawson, it seems to us, is at his worst when he jokes, and at his best in such serious poems as "How the Land was Won." That he is quite uninfluenced by Mr. Kipling one hesitates to say ; but his local colour is his own, and his inspiration is genuine. For instance :—

> No armchair rest for the old folk then—
> But, ruined by blight and drought,
> They blazed the tracks to the camps again
> In the big scrubs further out.
> The worn haft, wet with a father's sweat,
> Gripped hard by the eldest son,
> The boy's back formed to the hump of toil—
> And that's how the land was won !
>
> And beyond Up Country, beyond Out Back,
> And the rainless belt, they ride,
> The currency lad and the ne'er-do-weel
> And the black sheep, side by side ;
> In wheeling horizons of endless haze
> That disk through the Great North-west,
> They ride for ever by twos and by threes—
> And that's how they win the rest.

The man who writes like that is a poet, though some of his verse may be a good deal less than poetry.

The newspaper in Australia is the chief patron of literature, and Mr. Lawson's fiction, which has many of the qualities of his poetry, comes also from the Press. The book we have referred to, ON THE TRACK AND OVER THE SLIPRAILS (Angus and Robertson, Sydney, 3s. 6d.), contains some thirty-six stories of Australasian life, telling with great vivacity of the spirit of places at once little known to the English reader, and yet of vital interest to him. In no carping spirit, but rather in one of congratulation, we recognize Mr. Henry Lawson as the heritor of Mr. Bret Harte's manner and the pupil of Mr. Kipling. We are often reminded of the quick pathos and sympathy of the author of "Snowbound at Eagle's" or of the vigour and dash, the insight and courage of the writer of "Kim." Such stories as "No Place for a Woman," "A Daughter of Maoriland," "The Shanty-Keeper's Wife," will do more to make Englishmen understand their brothers beneath the southern cross than reams of political tirade. Such a paper, for example, as "The Songs They Used to Sing" brings us to the heart of that kind of man who began life twenty years ago among the mines on Lambing Flat, the Pipe Clays, Gulgong, Home Rule, or any other of the [illegible]

And he hadn't any "ideers"—at least he said so him matter of fact the picture Mr. Lawson draws of A Lizzie is very amusing, and gives a true picture of " wide dominions." One's general impression of the in this volume is that they are taken directly from the author does not exercise a wise literary eclecti are graphic, vigorous, occasionally heart stirring, bu lacking in art, sans suite, and incomplete. But thes sketches show, as did "While the Billy Boils," that Lawson has it in him to give us an even more valuab Australian life, practical, idiomatic, truthful, ye sympathetic.

KING JAMES I. AS A POET.

A sumptuous and beautiful book is Lusus Re Poems and Other Pieces by King James ye First Robert S. Rait (Constable, 42s. n.). The title-page i duction, with necessary alterations, of the design ap King James I. for the edition of his works printed in rare book. The frontispiece is from a portrait of belonging to Sir Robert Gresley, and of considerabl It was evidently taken when the King was still you face is much thinner and more refined than the later The cover of the book is a light grey paper stained—with the King's arms in the centre and thi corners. The title "Lusus Regius" Mr. Rait has take Latin translation of the folio edition of the "Counte Tobacco." Within the book are five reproductio King's writing, showing how painful a poet he was. we are bound to say, bear out the indications of the h They are little more than the school exercises of a among Humanists and struggled for by Puritans. M whom we owe their publication from a long-neglecte MS. in the King's own hand unearthed by Mr Madan, has done his best for them by a pleasant i and the necessary notes ; but they do not advance Ki claim to be a poet. The "Fragment of a Masque" they begin is a rather clumsy exercise. Its lo divinities may come. Mr. Rait unkindly suggests, fr Grammar, or, more probably, from the "De Civitate characterization is of the most elementary sort ; and altogether after six pages without any conclusion. when the Royal artist came to see what Ben Jonson of such a subject in such a style he wisely aban attempt to excel in that line. Next comes "an ad Alexander Montgomerie ("belovit Sandirs") on fulness and its results. There is nothing wo th qu but the lines to Bacchus which follow are perhaps wo as a specimen of what James could make of a subject way congenial to him.

> O michtie sunne of Semele the faire,
> Bacchus to me be loue the god of micht,
> O tuis bonie boy, quho euer dou and daire
> Subdue all mortall with thy liquore nicht, > Quho with thy power blindethes the sicht > to sum, to atheris thou the eirs has deafed, > fra sum thou takis the taist, sum smelling > dois taike, sum tuiching, sum all fine berea > are of. The greit Alexander craued interesting is a later autobiographical fragment "on his own destiny," and there are characteristic turns in the version of Psalm ci., written, by the way, on the back of the Ode to Bacchus. Two prose fragments conclude the volume, a letter to du Bartas, to whom the King was so overwhelmingly complimentary, and an addition, in one immense and ponderous sentence, to the preface to his "Basilikon Doron," in which he clearly adheres to the cujus regio ejus religio maxim. Mr. Rait thinks that almost all the pieces which he has collected, and now printed for the first time from the King's own MSS., were written between 1580 and 1592, a troubled time in which James may well have needed such diversion. The volume is an interesting one, and our best thanks are due to the editor. Perhaps the last instance of her late Majesty's sentiment towards the Stewarts was her consent to accept the dedication of this book, which is now inscribed to her memory.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Religious Retrospects.

Mr. Percy Fitzgerald, who is the author of Fifty Years of Catholic Life and Progress (Unwin, 21s.), has written a very large number of books, and one can perhaps hardly expect much depth of thought or precision of style at the hands of one who serves the compositor so easily. Very genially and very chattily he describes the heroes of the Roman Catholic Church in England; sometimes he writes inaccurately (as when he attributes a picture by Calderon to Sir E. Poynter), but always honestly. Everybody in his Church, small and great, who has done anything, has his meed of praise; but for the great ones, and especially for Manning (who is his special hero), Mr. Fitzgerald has whole chapters of admiration. If all those who have a personal interest in the book will spend a guinea on it, there should be a good sale; and those Roman Catholics who are averse to steady reading will find it a convenient way of reading the history of their own times. Its value to others will lie in the picture it gives, half unconsciously, of Roman Catholic life from the inside; the picture, indeed, is a pleasant one, and Mr. Fitzgerald is optimistic. The book is bright in a red cover adorned with four Cardinal's hats, to represent the four rulers, from Wiseman to Vaughan, who cover the period described. There are portraits inside of the owners of the hats, that of Manning being particularly fine. Mr. Fitzgerald deserves a concluding word of praise for his charitable treatment of Anglicans.

A Century's Progress in Religious Life and Thought, by W. F. Adeney (J. Clarke, 3s. 6d.), has considerable interest. It is a competent summary of the great religious changes that took place in the nineteenth century. Every one knows what these changes were; philosophy has become more spiritual; science has changed the old conceptions of creation; criticism has destroyed what now seems to us the old superstition about the Bible, and at the same time has made the Bible a living book and has restored more primitive and reasonable views of revelation; Calvinism, the doctrine of endless punishment, and certain doctrines about the Atonement have lost much ground; preaching has become less rhetorical and more reasonable; social questions have taken their place in the realm of good works; literature and art—well, that subject is a large one, and Mr. Adeney has not much to say about it; lastly, the Oxford Movement has transformed the Church of England. On this last subject Mr. on Social Questions, but Bishop Westcott Social Union are not mentioned. Thus the shows the narrowness which is the result of ou it also shows that in nine cases out of ten fundamentals of theology—these divisions have and arbitrary. Nearly every chapter of Mr. common ground for all educated Christians.

Old Booksellers.

Those who welcome books about books sh about booksellers, as the printers and publish teenth and eighteenth centuries were in differe the writer of such a book is at once so experie and so pleasant a writer as Mr. E. Marston th be an agreeable volume. In Sketches of Book Days (Sampson Low, 5s. n.) Mr. Marston do give us the history of all the famous seventeen century booksellers, but he selects from amon of note (he heads another sketch with the n but does not tell us much of her intimate hi their stories with much anecdote and informati welds his knowledge into clear and often ente of such men as Jacob Tonson (1656-1736), T 1724), John Dunton (1659-1733), Samuel Richa Thomas Gent (1691-1778), William Hutton James Lackington (1746-1815). Of these men, remarkable was Thomas Guy, by reason of his and his extraordinary good luck. After makin was a considerable fortune by the sober sale o himself the holder of a large quantity of South S increase of capital was sanctioned and the enorm began. At this time Guy was seventy-six years period of life, and as the prices went up, up, u holding at very large profits. Thus at the e immense fortune came to him, and it was almost the benefit of humanity. He had always bee St. Thomas' Hospital was improved by him, private persons were helped from time to time. was, of course, the hospital which bears his na saw roofed in before he died in 1724. Mr. M anecdotes of him culled from books that are not in general reading. Here is one with an excell one who possesses a guinea and notices a publ on the Thames:—

> One day as Guy was leaning over one of t ing very despondent and melancholy, a bysta was bent on suicide, implored him not to com Then quickly placing a guinea in his hand drew. Guy followed the stranger, assured mistaken, and begged his address. Some Guy, seeing the name of his friend in the hastened to his house, reminded him of t bridge, arranged with his creditors, and, final him in his business, which prospered in his h his children's children for many years in London.

Some of the men Mr. Marston deals with altruistic as Guy, but their characters are so w they become equally interesting. One would s the remarkable adventures of these men, t romances then than now, but perhaps that cretion of present day publishers.

is almost inclined to be carried away by the vivisection controversy, and to forget, as Mr. Davidson himself appears to forget, that the appeal of poetry is not at all to the scientific enthusiast, nor very much to the analyst of the subconscious, but entirely to the student and critic of poetry and poetic expression. We say this with some emphasis, because Mr. Davidson seems to us to be in great danger of bartering his rights as a poet for a mess of rhetoric. His recent work has been marked, as indeed all his work is, by power and a downright sincerity which command esteem; but both in his latest drama Self's the Man and in his present poetical brochure there is a plentiful amount of vigorous phrase-making which is entirely wanting both in form and in charm, and which really bears no relation to true poetry at all. "The Vivisector" is a monologue, somewhat in the Browningesque manner, containing the apologia of a materialist for the practice of vivisection, on the ground that all matter is in pain, and that the very giving of pain is part of the fulfilment of the law of matter itself.

> To the Materialist there is no Unknown;
> All, all is Matter. Pain? I am one ache—
> But never when I work: there Matter wins!
> And I believe that they who delve the soil,
> Who reap the grain, who dig and smelt the ore,
> The girl who plucks the rose, the sweetest voice
> That thrills the air with sound, give Matter pain:
> Think you the sun is happy in his flames,
> Or that the cooling earth no anguish feels,
> Nor quails from her contraction? Rather say,
> The systems, constellations, galaxies
> That strew the ethereal waste are whirling there
> In agony unutterable.

The idea is not, of course, a new one; it is as familiar to modern philosophy as it was to Heraclitus, or to St. Paul, who in the Epistle to the Romans puts the whole theory in a sentence when he says "We know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now." But the point is not that the thesis is not new, but that, treated as Mr. Davidson treats it, in metallic, argumentative phrases, it is not a fruitful topic for poetry; and Mr. Davidson has written so much in verse that both charms and impresses that we regret to see him wasting his talent on material that is not only outside his range, but practically beyond the limits of poetic treatment altogether. Remembering Lucretius, among others, no one would pretend that philosophic, or even scientific, argument is irreconcilable with the highest form of poetry; but this sort of debating-society rhetoric is another thing altogether. It leads its writer, by the very force of its argumentativeness, into radically unpoetic channels, and leaves him in a tangle of verbiage, ending in lines such as

> The stolid beat
> Of Matter, the infinite vanity
> Of the Universe, being evermore > Self-Knowledge;

with which the poem concludes. We liked Mr. Davidson better when he was piping eclogues in Fleet-street—thinking a little less deeply, perhaps, but singing to a better tune.

Mrs. Belloc Lowndes' HIS MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY KING EDWARD VII. (Grant Richards, 7s. 6d.) is an enlarged edition of her well-known life of the Prince of Wales. It includes an account of the King's accession and has some new illustrations. The book holds the field [illegible]

Norse, and the ballads and poems of the old Norse [illegible] cleverly reproduce the true ballad spirit and music, [illegible] should be welcome to all students of Norse literature.

A valuable publication is SMITH'S INDEX TO THE ARTICLES OF "THE TIMES" (King, 2s. 6d. n.). The period by it is 1895-1900, and each quinquennium is to [illegible] parts, indexing respectively proper names (places [illegible] places (geographically arranged), sources, and subjects [illegible] classified).

BYRNE'S GUIDE TO COMPANY FORMATION (Byrne [illegible]) practical handbook containing a summary of the Comp[illegible] and the Act of 1900, with explanatory notes.

BEAUTY ADORNED (Unwin, 1s.) tells girls how [illegible] hair, how to attend to their complexion, how to [illegible] figures symmetrical, and informs them on other [illegible] interest and importance to them. A good little book [illegible]

IMMORAL LEGISLATION (Glaisher, 6s. n.) is a [illegible] tirades on Irish Land Acts written in the interest [illegible] lords, partly in prose and partly in verse. Neither [illegible] nor the prose easily permits itself to be read.

ST. DAVID'S (1s. 6d. n.) is added to Messrs. Bell's [illegible] cathedral series. The writer is Mr. Philip [illegible] A.R.I.B.A.; and the illustrations include architect[illegible] ings as well as photographs.

FICTION.

Mr. Neil Munro.

DOOM CASTLE (Blackwood, 6s.) was dealt with in [illegible] on June 8 by Dr. William Wallace, who spoke of it [illegible] cally in his article on "Scottish Fiction." He has alrea[illegible] out many of its good qualities. For our part we [illegible] hesitate a dislike to Mr. Munro's manner of telling [illegible] His method makes a plain tale take an unconscionable [illegible] telling. It occupies one chapter to inform us that Mont[illegible] dull a hero with a "romantic" name as ever came fr[illegible] to Scotland to carry out a rather foolish task—has had [illegible] shot under him by certain "broken men." But lest [illegible] lose the full flavour of so essential a point the chara[illegible] oblige by telling this incident, or another, over and o[illegible] Mr. Munro's pen appears to have the leisure of the Mi[illegible] his style was much admired by the schoolboys of a f[illegible] We rather doubt if those who are at the present mome[illegible] pupillari would greatly appreciate "Doom Castle," [illegible] it is undoubtedly very proper reading for persons with [illegible] experience of life. With the exception of such charac[illegible] Argylls and the not altogether convincing Sim MacT[illegible] main personages of the story do not appear to be d[illegible] much knowledge of life or with a great amount of wit [illegible] A little history, a hint of the '45, a full measure [illegible] words, and a familiar acquaintance with other books o[illegible] romantic sort, a fluent and rather prolix pen supply th[illegible] necessary for a "Scottish romance" such as "Doo[illegible] But they supply also the recipe for a popular novel whi[illegible] successful, especially in Scotland, and such a book [illegible] certainly has the skill to produce.

The Wise Man of Sterncross.

THE WISE MAN OF STERNCROSS (Murray, 6s.), by [illegible] Augusta Noel, is an unequal, occasionally disappoi[illegible]

fiction among the shabby genteel and many a mistaken, unamiable proud woman in the same world, but Barbara Shirley in the Sterncross Vicarage is the most lugubrious of them all. Her desire for money to repay her family—for a loss, by the way, which is irreparable—develops into a mania, a miserly passion. In another of the motifs of the novel—the Mrs. Morland motif it may be called—the little son of a famous sculptor has in a rage blinded his young sister. He is sent out of sight of his father, becomes involved in a wreck at sea, is saved, and eventually given over to the wife of an Indian officer expecting her own child who has been drowned in the wreck. The development of this trick is highly interesting, and Mrs. Morland, the weak and widowed, deceived mother of the boy, is a wonderfully portrayed character. We will not go into the love motif in which "True," the daughter of the dolorous vicarage, is involved with Christopher, the son of the famous sculptor, and with a young gentleman who is a captain in the Navy at a surprisingly early age, but will content ourselves with saying that it is interesting if unhappy. There are many other themes still to handle, such as that of Mr. Denys Godolphin—called, with very poor cause, the wise man of Sterncross—but it is impossible to do justice to them all. The first 200 pages or so of the book are written after an unusually leisurely fashion; there is a spacious feeling in them, a largeness and quietude that is very pleasant. Like Balzac the author would appear to have perfect confidence in her readers and be content to make them follow her through many a weary detail of the youth of her characters before the real play begins. Then the story vitalizes. The style is often good, the frequent quotations from Scripture give it a certain distinction that is welcome. The wit is rather to seek; the "Wise Man," who refuses to be considered "the cynic of a lady's novel," never rises above a play on True's name or the quotation of a proverb—and a well-worn one at that. But Lady Augusta Noel has a very neat hand at description, especially if the scene be of a wild and melancholy character. Fang Rock, where Pete and Tony, two old sailors—one on the verge of madness, one on the brink of death—are visited by the unfortunate Chris, is wonderfully depicted. It is near this wild rock that Chris ends a life compact of sorrow. The following paragraph will show how the author tells of this point and also serve as an example of her serious style:—

> And so it came to pass that after long waiting they returned to land, and Basil, finding True on the shore, told her how, through the dark night, and from the stormy sea, the soul of Chris had gone home to God. With bent head and clasped hands he recited the De Profundis. In all the freshness of his penitence, with a heart thrilled with awe and humility, Chris has passed out of our human ken, to stand before that Tribunal "where the work of life is tried by a juster Judge than here."

That is the sombre end of the real hero, for the "Wise Man" is merely a looker-on, a hazy, elusive figure. The essence of the book is the terrible picture it gives of the cruelty of humanity and the irony of Fate. These things are drawn with a remorselessness so utter that one sometimes supposes the author is unaware of how painful a picture she gives of human intercourse. Chris, Mrs. Morland; Sir Lyon Dunbar, the father of Chris and Basil, Helena, his blind daughter; Barbara Shirley, her husband and son; even lesser characters, such as the old sailors Pete and Tony, are indubitably accursed. It will be seen that an agreeable book is not the result of the author's labours, but then "The Wise Man in the matter of language; otherwise it is a go well told; it does not lack invention, althoug like the characters, is of a somewhat stock kin search of love, which is brought him by a so picture (an anachronism in its beautiful excen daughter of Wulnoth, lord of Avening, who is craft. The Count sets forth to be her champ by Goyault, his chief knight. But Goyault h in love with Algitha. And when Karadac is lightning, and unable to do the fighting, he s fight in his place—a good situation, truly. W the intricacies of the plot further; it is no readers cannot complain that they do not g worth of tragedy, love, and pathos.

The Balkan States.

The reviewer who is not interested in th Balkan States will find it necessary to make sistently renewed attacks on J. Lawrence Lamb OF THE PRINCE (T. Fisher Unwin, 6s.) if he would trating far into the story. He is likely to be baffl cies. It narrates in full the tragic history of Pri Bulgaria, and the remaining three quarters of t
the fiction, founded, however, on fact—viz., th Detcho Boytcheff for the murder of his wife, a led up to it. We confess we found the strictl which is well done, more interesting than the story, attached by a rather slender thread
Alexander, is too spun out, and is a depressing
Yet there are signs that the author might achie work were he to content himself with a less than these five hundred closely-printed pages.

CATHOLIC USAGES SO CALLED (Skeffington, 2 with a purpose indeed. Mr. "John Myre," wh this little romance for the purpose of calling seriousness of the present ecclesiastical situatio his own), adopts the simple plan of setting up and knocking them down again with most satisf ness. Messrs. Headstrong and Golightly visi love with Continental usages, and return to th host of foreign ornaments. Briefly, they are tw young fools, and when Archdeacon Strongbull Protestant ring about the name) tackles them tions they flee in disorder, repent, and beha like sensible men. There are some rather funny little book, and the humour is not always uninte

. It is hard to take seriously such a book as by Mr. C. H. Malcolm (Simpkin Marshall 3s.6d. hero gives no indication of the superlative qu author asks us to believe he possesses. Th interest in the doings of the extravagantly bea and the distinctly priggish Robert. Here moment of their converse—"Robert went up to and whispered 'Marcelline.' Marcelline turn his eyes, and whispered 'Robert.' The next lovers were locked in each other's arms." This finale to a tale which aims at being full o affectation of familiarity with living celebrities peppering of its pages with indifferent and un do not enhance the value of "Robert Kane."

PEASANT LABOUR (Freemantle, 6s.), by Ju is a collection of short tales illustrative of

LIBRARY NOTES.

We are glad to learn that Professor Foxwell's Library of Economic Literature will remain intact and will not leave this country. Sir Walter Prideaux states in The Times of Monday that an offer from America has been forestalled by the Goldsmiths' Company, who, with much public spirit, have determined to acquire the library, and will proceed to consider "the conditions subject to which it may be made available for public use."

The report of the Cambridge University Library records the acquirement of 209 manuscripts and upwards of 48,000 books and periodicals. Of these 37,480 were acquired under the Copyright Act. Though little of exceptional bibliographical importance appears among the purchases, some interesting details are given. A unique fifteenth century book, "Composita Verborum," printed at Cologne in 1487, was obtained, and a valuable collection of Malay manuscripts and printed books were presented by Mr. R. J. Wilkinson, formerly of Trinity College. The classification of the great Taylor-Schechter collection is advancing towards completion, but a specialist in Arabic is urgently needed. Among the finds is part "of a work by a tenth century Jewish sectary, which probably represents the first attempt towards Bible criticism on a rationalistic basis." A noteworthy event of the year was the publication of the first volume of Mr. Charles Sayle's Catalogue of English Books to 1640; some sheets of the second volume have been printed off.

The Horniman Museum and Library, opened last Saturday by the Duke of Fife, stands in grounds which form another link in that chain of green open spaces well described as the lungs of London. If only for its beautiful grounds this new possession of the public is well worth a visit. The Museum contains a catholic assortment of curiosities, the result of a quarter of a century spent in many lands, while the library, with its 5,500 volumes, will be invaluable to students.

The Westminster City Council finds itself in a difficulty as regards its library rate. The ratepayers in the parish of St. George, Hanover-square, originally adopted the Libraries Acts subject to the limitation of a halfpenny rate. It was sought to remove this limitation for the sake of uniformity, but counsel's opinion is to the effect that, as the London Government Act does not expressly give power to make the alteration, it can only be carried out by a poll of the ratepayers. In no other parts of the city is there any such restriction, but it would appear that to remove the difficulty further legislation is needed.

The position of the London Library is most encouraging. On the work of the year a profit of £1,200 has been made, notwithstanding a falling-off in the actual number of members.

Some weeks ago Mr. Choate, the American Ambassador, speaking of the splendid Dante collection at Cornell University, incidentally mentioned the congestion of books at the British Museum. His point was that, since it would soon be impossible to place all publications in our national library, specialized libraries would be the natural result. Thus, as Cornell specializes in Dante, so Cambridge might devote itself to the collection of works—say, on mathematics and mediæval history. The matter is one which must soon engage the serious attention of the authorities in those centres which are condemned to receive the daily avalanche of printed matter. At the Bodleian Library 65,300 items were received last year, and the storage capacity is all but exhausted. Specializing is a certain remedy, but an expensive one to deal with thoroughly.

At Mile-end the public have waited long for their library, and are at length rewarded with some possibility of attaining it. The vestry-hall may—in course of time—be taken over and adapted for library purposes. But after the tortuous course pursued by the library movement at Mile-end we cannot be sure.

Prebendary Fraser, who has served the Cathedral Library at Chichester in an unofficial capacity for the last twenty-three years, has been appointed librarian. Mr. Fraser will bring great knowledge and much enthusiasm to his work. To him is owing the re-arrangement and systematic classification of the library.

subscriptions of those who use the leading depart Cape Town the South African Library has a grant of an income of £3,702, but, with only 700 subscribers t volumes, it can as yet scarcely claim comparison wit English public library.

The libraries of federated Australia have now their own. The first number is dated April and ent Library Record of Australasia." Support is appeal is not to be sold privately. The number contains wo ing notes and articles, including one on Australia's fi which was established in 1809 at Ebenezer Mount, the banks of the Hawkesbury river in New South Wa

Messrs. Sotheby's miscellaneous sale which Monday last contained some interesting items. A sold during the first two days were :—

Keats. "Endymion." First ed., 1818. A fine co though slightly stained ... ...
Keats. "Lamia," &c. First ed., 1820 ... ...
Coleridge. "Christabel," &c. First ed., 18
Presentation copy... ... ...
Shelley. "Prometheus Unbound." First ed., 18
An exceptionally fine copy in the original boar uncut, and almost unopened ... ...
Shelley. "The Cenci." First ed., 1819. A fine copy Browning. "Paracelsus." First ed., 1835 ...
Byron. "The Waltz." First ed., 1813. An excellent co Barham. "The Ingoldsby Legends," 1840-47. Pla by Cruikshank ... ...
Waller. "Poems," 1645. A complete copy of the fi authorized edition ... ...
Wither. "Britain's Remembrancer." First ed., 162
FitzGerald. "The Mighty Magician," 1853. Pres
tation copy... ... ...
FitzGerald. "Euphranor," 1855. Presentation copy FitzGerald. "Polonius," 1852. Presentation copy FitzGerald. "The Downfall and Death of Ki Œdipus," 1880 ... ...
Scott. "Waverley." 3 vols. First ed. A fine co but cut down in the binding ... ...
Scott. "Waverley." 3 vols. First ed. Uncut, b slightly stained ... ...
Dickens. "Dealings with the Firm of Dombey and Son
&c., 1848. With an interesting letter by the auth Thackeray. The MS. of "Round About the Christm Tree." On six leaves ... ...
Ireland. "Life of Napoleon," 1828. Plates by Cruiksha Wilson. "An Essay on the Genius of George Cru shank." Illustrated with 284 etchings, &c....
Aiken. "Sporting Notions." First ed. With fine coloured plates ... ...
Carlyle. "Sartor Resartus," 1840. Presentation copy Carlyle. "Heroes and Hero-Worship," 1846. Pres
tation copy... ... ...
Lamb. "The Last Essays of Elia," 1833. A fine co in the original boards ... ...
Bewick. "General History of Quadrupeds," 1790. First e Shakespeare. "The Second Folio." Imperfect...
Shakespeare. "The Second Folio." A fine and ve large copy (344mm. by 220mm.), slightly imperfect Shakespeare. "The Third Folio." A good cop though soiled ... ...
"Office de la Semaine Sainte." A little volume fou in the Bastille, and once in the possession of Carly whose autograph it bears ... ...
Marguerite de Valois. "Heptameron." 3 vols. 1780-81
La Fontaine. "Contes et Nouvelles en Vers." 176
With 12 of the suppressed plates. In fine condition
Longus. "Daphnis et Chloé." Paris, 1718. A beautiful co
Pliny. "Historiae Naturalis." Elzevir edition 163

AMONG THE REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES.—I.

In handling that opulent quarterly the Anglo-Saxon Review one feels that in these busy times a fourth of a year will be hardly enough to exhaust it. You have first to deal leisurely with the subject of the Berthelet binding, on which Mr. Cyril Davenport discourses. Then we have historical matter in articles on "The Young England Movement," on "The American Revolution in the Correspondence of Horace Walpole," on "The Duchess of Portsmouth and Madame de Montespan," and on "Old Military Books." Moreover, we have yet more unpublished Napoleon Correspondence. For the literary person Mr. Lang writes excellently on Smollett, and Mr. Sidney Low makes a good deal of "the poet of South Africa," Thomas Pringle, though he does not inspire confidence in an opening sentence on colonial literature by speaking of "Kendal" and "Bliss Carmen." We may single out two other interesting things. Mr. Howard Swan is the first writer who really tackles in a practical way the question of "Signalling to Mars," on which the unlearned have written much nonsense, and the learned have poured perhaps unnecessary contempt; and Mr. T. A. Cook tells us much that English sportsmen should peruse about the American athlete, for whom "the one test of everything is, not its origin, not the pleasure or the profit of its progress, but its result. He fights, and runs, and rows to win. To use a metaphor that must not be too literally strained, he follows the hounds to kill the fox, not to have a good day across country in the winter."

In the Nineteenth Century and After Mr. Thomas Shaw, M.P., draws a parallel between the present situation in South Africa and the situation in Canada at the beginning of Queen Victoria's reign. His moral is that rebels should be amnestied. Mr. Frederick Greenwood appeals to the missionary societies in China to reconsider their position and limit their activities. Professor Mahaffy takes a thoroughly Protestant view of "the Romanization of Ireland." Earl Nelson inquires what are the best means of arresting the depopulation of the agricultural districts. "The good cottage, good wages—which to be permanent must always depend upon good work given—and security of tenure are essential elements in solving our problem." But how are good wages to be given when the land has to make a profit for the landlord as well as the farmer, and the produce has to compete with the produce of land in foreign countries which has only to yield a single profit? Mr. Herbert Paul contributes a characteristic "personal impression" of the late Bishop of London.

There is nothing startling in the Fortnightly, but the average standard of interest is fairly high. "Kang Yon Wei's Open Letter to the Powers" expounds the views of the Chinese reformers—or, at all events, of one Chinese reformer. These are to the effect that Chang Chih Tung, sometimes classed with reformers, is a humbug, and that "Yunglu and Tung Fuh Siang should be turned out of the world." Mr. William Laird Clowes pleads for the cheapening of useful books, and incidentally gives an account of the cheap book business of Philipp Reclam of Leipzig, whose "Universal Bibliothek" he describes as "one of the wonders of the world." The prices of the books in this library vary according to the number of sheets, but you get about 112 pages for two pence half-penny, in a neat paper wrapper. The sales are prodigious.

Man," Lombroso's "Genius and Insan dictionaries, cookery books, &c. Mr. W.
M. Bourget's "Le Fantôme" in the number.

The Monthly Review has a very interesti by Mr. Arthur Symons on the poetry of Rol will help to assign to that poet his true pl world of to-day. We quote an illuminating c

> Mr. Meredith, caring mostly for origi > every noun an adjective which has nove > with it, and which champs and rears intra > Mr. Swinburne, preferring what goes smoot > startlingly from a distance, chooses his > sound and for their traditional significanc > appeal, sensuous or intellectual. Mr. B > delicate, evasively simple effects by coaxi > words to come together willingly, and take > as if they had been born under his care.

The stay-at-home Englishman who even y know much about the Boers will learn somethi Cape resident's paper on "The Boer at H the instructions given by the Aucer of A( on visiting England—a very human docum out as items worth special attention, Mr. J review of the state of technical educatio
Germany, and Mr. T. A. Cook's paper on Th actor, now only remembered—so fleeting is the founder of "Doggett's Coat and Badge."

The Contemporary contains an anonymous Foreign Policy of Lord Rosebery." "It is the verdict. The author of "Drifting" rai more, and protests that the optimism of S
"positively mischievous," and that it is real Britain is living on its capital, and is eco
These propositions may be true, but the a not seem to prove them. "The English Sch Rival," by R. E. Hughes, should be co
Kershaw's article in the Monthly Review. B German methods. Mr. Sidney Whitman c thetic biography of Count Blumenthal. " Sea," by Matthias Dunn, deals with all sorts connected with the fishing industries
"Vanished Landmarks," by "L. S. M.," is The writer admits the apparent High Ch maintains that "it is not easy to believe th more than a flash in the pan—a temporary r ing of a wave, when the tide is coming degrees, towards Agnosticism."

In the National Review a Free Lan Literary Experiences," which are, it is clear, f how he came to London to write for the Press year earned £98 18s. 5d.; for the second, £2 third, £334 14s. 8d. He seems to have gr the circulation of his manuscripts, for one wa rejected before it found a haven. The w courtesy of American magazine editors, w explain at length their reasons for refusing cert "declined with thanks" of their Engli difference is probably due to the fact that editors, unlike English editors, devote their magazines. "Great War Novels" are discus
H. Findlater, who inquires why such novels position is theirs in literature;" but his subsequent remarks show that they have not very much to be grateful for. "Servants may consider Thackeray as an open enemy and Dickens as but half a friend." And, again, "To him (Thackeray) they are knaves or fools, cunning knaves or contemptible fools." So that it is not very clear where the occasion for pride comes in. Mr. Hugh Clifford contributes to the number a "fragment of Asiatic history," entitled "The King of the Sedangs."

In the Cornhill is one of those reminiscent articles which always have their charm—"Notes of an Octogenarian," by Miss Louisa Courtenay. She corrects an old familiar story—viz., that when Rogers and Luttrell were in the Louvre together, a party of English ladies stopped and spoke to the latter. When he rejoined Rogers, he was asked "Who were they?" and replied, "I don't know; they asked if my name was Luttrell?" "And was it?" said Rogers. As Luttrell was a natural son, the remark was, to say the least, cynical. As a matter of fact it was Lord Dudley, not Rogers, who was with Luttrell; and the ladies had asked the latter "if my name was not Holland?" Lord Dudley had said "And was it?" in sheer absent-mindedness. "Urbanus Sylvan," whose identity with the Rev. H. C. Beeching has long been an open secret, is touring the provinces, and is as entertaining on Lincoln as he was on Lichfield; and Mrs. Earle, under "Family Budgets," explains how to eke out an existence on £1,800 per annum—deciding, by the way, strongly against flats for young married couples. Those who can manage to save anything out of this income may derive guidance from an article by Mr. G. Yard on "Investment and Speculation."

The question Can Literature be Taught? raised in our own columns by Mr. Beeching is answered in the negative, with cynical good humour, by Mr. Andrew Lang in Longman's. His contention is that "people are born with or without literary appreciation," and he supports the contention with anecdote:—

> A cook, a very plain cook, once made part of my humble establishment. Her line was Mr. Browning and Mr. Henry James. That woman could perhaps have been taught to cook (though I doubt it), but she did not need the school of Literæ Humaniores to teach her what, among other things, she ought to read. Again, all the annotated Brownings in the world could not have trained Mr. Edward FitzGerald (of Omar Khayyam) to appreciate Browning. He simply could not "thole" that poet. You may read his distressing remarks in the "Life of Tennyson."

"Swordsmanship in England," by Theodore Andrea Cook; "Close Finishes to the University Match," by Home Gordon; and "Notes on Sport in Sardinia" are the most striking articles in the Badminton. The sport seems to be above reproach, and the writer declares that the brigands "only trouble the police," and are not given to the holding up of moneyed strangers—a rule to which we should imagine that there must be exceptions.

The Magazine of Art gives a fine coloured reproduction of Mason's "The Cast Shoe." Mr. Spielmann is discussing the portraits at the Academy, and there is an illustrated paper on artists' studios, and the revival of sculpture in England is recognized by a study of the work of Mr. Albert Toft.

The July Artist embraces almost every side of art, and its copious illustrations are of great interest. Under the

Correspondence.

THE CHARLOTTE YONGE MEMORI

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—May we, through your columns, ask for d the proposed memorial to Miss Charlotte M. Yonge? be out of place here to recount the veneration in whi personally held by rich and poor in the secluded pa was her home. The memorial is intended to give ex what is felt as to the influence her writings have throughout the English-speaking world on behalf of wh and true. It has been decided that some suitable mem be placed in the village church of Otterbourne, in daily worshipped; and, further, that in the Ca Winchester, with which her name will always be visitors shall be appropriately reminded of an autho books are known and loved by thousands both in Engl America. The exact form of the memorial in the Cath partly depend upon the money forthcoming in respo appeal. A carved oak reredos in the restored Lady C stained glass window near to that which commemor Austen, has been suggested as appropriate.

Donations may be sent to Messrs. Prescott, Dim Co.'s Bank, Winchester.

We are, &c.,
RANDALL WINTON.
W. R. W. STEPHENS, Dean of Win
GEORGE HENRY GUILDFORD, B

"LUCAS MALET" ON FICTION.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I was somewhat astonished when I read yo pondent's criticism on Mrs. Harrison's speech. The which is spoken of as "a most extraordinary statem the more sober contention that "a story which is an orga can no more have two endings than your life or my life two endings" are both expressions, the one more forc the other, of a truth which seems to me indisputable.

A novel which is "worth anything" should, like a work of art, leave a distinct unity of impression; inclusion of any detail which impairs this unity, no ma intrinsic beauty it may possess, is so far an artistic To ensure this unity of impression the artist should main outlines of his conception clear to his mind's eye sets to work; he must be sure that he knows his ch and the vicissitudes through which they will have to pa only when this condition has been satisfied that the w be resolutely loyal to the ideal truth which underli genuine work of art; and that he will be quite sure of ma the emotional key in which the work is pitched. Wh member Pater's teaching that "the philosophic critic, (and he is the only one that counts), "will value in imagination, seemingly the most intuitive, the power of t standing in them, their logical process of construc spectacle of a supreme intellectual dexterity which they we cannot help feeling that the appreciation "which tively shudders at the thought of a novel which is a whole" must be very sentimental. And, though the either to lack of opportunities or to exiguity of the seeing faculty. Certain it is that there is no law to compel him to take aboard more than he can float. As a creator, he has absolute right to the conventions of choosing what details he pleases, and of combining them in the manner he pleases, "reined in only by the zodiac of his own wit." You can only condemn him when his work is not a fairly representative page out of the great book of human nature. If he be a thinker as well as an artist, his writing will contain mystery enough—the mystery of the common things of life, revealed only after meditating day and night upon the unchangeable laws written in the hearts of men.

Yours faithfully,

Cardiff, July 2. W. E. WILLIAMS.

ARCHÆOLOGICAL NOMENCLATURE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—A reprehensible practice has arisen in late years among modern antiquaries of altering, or attempting to alter, accepted nomenclatures in archæological literature. It was natural, indeed, that Rickman's system for architecture of about seventy years ago should be attacked long since; first by the ecclesiologists with their ugly and inconvenient "First-Pointed," "Second-Pointed," &c., and subsequently, with variations by others—students of the closet and not of the field, who fancied they could distinguish a clear transition between each of Rickman's "periods." "Period" has been a fatal stumbling-block to such amateurs. There is, of course, only one proper "transition," and that the very beautiful style, clear and concise, as all transitions must be, between Norman and Early English. Strictly speaking, perhaps, the whole course of Gothic architecture presents a continual transition from the middle of the twelfth to the end of the seventeenth century, or even later, according to the scope and inquiries of the special student.

Rickman was far too sensible a man to think that his division of styles of Gothic architecture was anything more than a convenient definition for the purposes of literature, and after nearly seventy years of trial in countless volumes on architecture and art by competent authority, its common sense and elasticity have been fully proved. And, although well-meaning empiries arise from time to time with their new systems of architectural division, there is reason to think that the general desire now is to "leave well alone." The application of this simple doctrine will presently be propounded to another threatened and far more important antiquarian nomenclature.

But minor lists are not so safe as that of Rickman. A few years ago, for instance, an attempt was made, with singular and crude infelicity, to alter the hitherto universally accepted names, sanctioned by ancient documents and Scriptural warrant, for the divers parts of a chalice. The authority, however, of Mr. Octavius Morgan and of Mr. Wilfrid Cripps would appear to be good enough for antiquaries at large. It was even whispered some years since that the well-founded title "Samian" had but a shaky tenure. Some knowledge of the study of antiquities on both sides of the Channel makes one aware that the unaccountable desire of some modern antiquaries in England to incontinently alter accepted nomenclatures to which time and scholars have given stability can only have the result of causing confusion at home and bewilderment on the Continent.

Probably there is no student of antiquities whose attention is not drawn to the study of heraldry. He early finds that he bearings and alliances in the book-plates of philes, now, alas, almost an extinct race of tomb, the glittering "Or," beaten perha bezants from the Orient, the blackened "A with the deut-de-loup, "Az.," "Gu.," an their veiled story, just as the lines in the Ex L count, while charges, such as "ogres," "hu

"clarions" with charming pictorial effect al with lions "passant," wolves "salient," or the whole forming one of the most attractive of a cultured antiquity; and what a glamou over the whole by the terms of the ancient tagenets!

Would it be believed that we appear to this genuine old-world attribute of history;
"Or" and "Arg." are to be turned into "silver," and—shades of ancient Garters, L the griffin sejant, sacred to "Nevill ancient sitting griffin"? Sitting, it may be suppose egg" of the inventories. One shudders grotesque diction the greater part of the will eventually be changed if a beginning is an arbitrary, new-fangled burlesque of antiq

Such are instances of "corrections," mad Editor" of the Victoria History of the Co
the proof-sheets of a section by myself o Effigies of Northamptonshire, and to which quired. It is really difficult to write about sort of moderation. Why cannot "well" proposed alterations are to be made not on t or Lyon, or Ulster, or, as far as I am aware fessional or recognized herald; indeed, I fe not one single member of the societies of in the Offices of Arms of the three kingdoms sanction such mischievous and childish vagar of Arms, as the guardians of the science of authoritative exponents, an appeal is now their assistance in the retention of time-hallo vocabulary, as well as for the rescue of what valuable and standard literary undertaking and ridicule.

Yours faithfully,

ALBERT

AUTHORS AND PUBL

The greater part of the Author is devote its founder, Sir Walter Besant. Mr. George tribute, as President of the Society of A Squire Sprigge, sometime Secretary, Illustra popularity with the Society. Originally, he members of the Council and Committee gave "to oblige Besant." He also has something
"Besant and Rice" books:—

> In every case the first draft was in Be > though the plot was not necessarily his > scheme of each book was decided upon > the draft was made, and every chapter wa > them, the emendations and developments > such as were approved by both. From

The literary work of Ralph Derechef, whose death was announced last week, was not confined to the columns of the Pall Mall Gazette—of which he was Paris correspondent—and other London newspapers. He translated a number of important French works into English for Mr. Fisher Unwin, including Brunetière's "Manual of the History of French Literature" (1898); Gustave le Bon's study of "The Crowd," in the "Criminology Series"—of which a third impression appeared last year; the same author's book on "The Psychology of Peoples"; Louis Proal's "Political Crime"—another volume in the "Criminology Series"; "Ginette's Happiness," by "Gyp"; and "The Anarchist Peril," by Felix Dubois.

Owens College, Manchester, is fortunate in its first Professor of English Literature—Mr. C. H. Herford. He is of German parentage on the mother's side, and his first book was "Studies in the Literary Relations of England and Germany in the Sixteenth Century." He has done much good in English literature, and is the editor of the Warwick Shakespeare. We doubt whether any one has achieved so many Prize Essays, and in one of them, the Members' Prize Essay, Cambridge, 1880, he showed a singularly clear perception of what puzzles a good many people, the difference between "the Romantic and Classical Styles." He is also known as a student of Goethe and of Ibsen (on whom he contributed an excellent paper to these columns some little time ago). The "Dictionary of National Biography" knows him well, and he has lectured at an American University.

The editorship of the Alpine Club edition of Ball's Guide, lately resigned by Mr. Coolidge, has been accepted by Mr. A. V. Valentine-Richards. The volume now in hand embraces the whole of Switzerland (except the Pennines), together with the Italian valleys between the Simplon and Lake Garda, and those portions of the Tyrol and Vorarlberg which lie to the west of the Adige and the Inn (from Finstermunz to Landeck) and are bounded on the north by the Arlberg railway. Climbers are invited to assist with information, more particularly with reference to the Forest Cantons, the Säntis district, the Bergamasque valleys, and the Val Camonica district.

A new book by Mr. Sydney Buxton will be published by Mr. Murray shortly, dealing with Mr. Gladstone's career from the political and financial point of view, and called "Mr. Gladstone as Chancellor of the Exchequer: a Study."

Mr. Arthur H. Beavan's "Imperial London," which Messrs. Dent are publishing next week, is a brave attempt to epitomize a subject which Sir Walter Besant deemed worthy of seven massive volumes. But its aim is only to give useful and correct data in an interesting fashion concerning London of to-day, and only two chapters of history are included. There are sixty illustrations by Hanslip Fletcher, reproduced in photogravure and in the text.

On Friday next Messrs. Methuen will publish a new volume of stories by Mrs. Clifford entitled "A Woman Alone," and a novel by Miss Adeline Sergeant, entitled "A Great Lady." Four other novels are coming this month from Mr. Long—"Nobler than Revenge," by Esmé Stuart; "No Vindication," by Mrs. Coulson Kernahan (both in about a fortnight); and "Women Must Weep," by Sarah Tytler; and "The Heretic," by Robert James Lees, at the end of the month.

One of the next volumes of Messrs. Greening's "English Writers of To-day Series" will be Mr. Hamilton Fyfe's monograph on Mr. A. W. Pinero.

Messrs. Longmans announce "Liberty Documents, with Thrush publishes only "strictly original, hitherto u poetry," and Mr. Mullett Ellis is concerned to "Themistocles" appeared in the book of "Poems Margaret Sackville which we reviewed on June 15. the circumstances under which the poem came into and states that he is communicating with Lady Marg ville on the subject. Following upon this letter, howev gram has reached us from Mr. Mullett Ellis to the effect:—"Since writing you, Lady Margaret Sac replied completely justifying herself; the fault must my own."

The author of a book about to be published Methuen entitled "The History of Sir Richard Cal referred to in Literature of June 22nd, is Lucas Mal as we stated, Lucas Cleeve.

Books to look out for at once.

"Belgium and the Belgians." By Cyril Scudamore. W. Bla [Illustrated.]

"On the War Path." By Mrs. J. D. L. Culley. John Long. [A woman's experiences at the front.]

"Sketches of Magdalen College, Oxford." By E. Glasgow. D

"Australian Federation." By Sir John A. Cockburn, Agent South Australia. Horace Marshall and Son. [With a preface by Sir Charles Dilke.]

"Severance." A novel. By Thomas Cobb. Lane. 6s.

"Sister Teresa." By George Moore. Unwin. 6s. [The second part of "Evelyn Innes," which will re- taneously—entirely rewritten—in a sixpenny edition.]

"Bush Whacking and Other Sketches." By Hugh Clifford. wood. 6s.

"Marrable's Magnificent Idea." By F. C. Constable. W. Blac

"The Mystery of Mr. Bernard Brown." By E. P. Oppenh Lock. 3s. 6d.

"The Thirteen Evenings." By George Bartram. Methuen. [Thirteen Bohemian Tales.]

"John Top, Pirate." By "Weatherby Chesney." Methuen. [A book of adventure under the nom de guerre of a author.]

"A Son of Mammon." By G. B. Burgin. John Long. 6s.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRIN

ART.

ART AND ITS PRODUCERS, AND THE ARTS AND CRAFTS OF TO Morris. 8½×6. 47 pp. Longmans. 2s. 6d. n.

À TRAVERS L'IDÉAL. Fragments du Journal d'un Peintre. Avec François Coppée. By AZAR DE MORGET. 8×5½. 337 pp. Paris: Per [A book of art criticism, a sort of French "Modern Painters," with "impressionism."]

BIOGRAPHY.

SYNESIUS, THE HELLENE. By W. S. CRAWFORD, B.D. 9×6. 536 pp 12s. n. [An elaborate biography and critique of the poet-philosopher, who ha of Hypatia and became a Christian and Bishop of Ptolemais about 410.]

MEMOIR OF THE REV. HENRY TWELLS, Honorary Canon of Pete W. C. INGRAM, D.D., late Dean of Peterborough. 7½×5. 224 pp. Darton. 6s.

EDWARD VII., KING AND EMPEROR. By ELEANOR BULLET. Wells Gardner, Darton. [The compiler of this wee book, which has pretty little photographs acknowledges "her indebtedness to Mr. Grant Richards's work, "H of Wales." She means Mrs. Belloc Lowndes' life, published by Mr. Gra

DRAMA.

RIENZI AND YGRAINE. Two Tragedies. By E. HAMILTON MOORE. Sherratt and Hughes. 4s. 6d. n.

SINTRAM. By HELEN LESLIE. 7½×5. 258 pp. Chapman and Hall. 5s [A play based on Baron de la Motte Fouqué's well-known story.]

ECONOMICS AND SOCIOLOGY.

SOCIAL CONTROL. By E. A. ROSS. 7½×5. 448 pp. The Macmillan Co.

HOW TO INVEST AND HOW TO SPECULATE. By C. H. THORPE (Th Series). 7½×5. 172 pp. Grant Richards. 5s.

L'OPINION ET LA FOULE. By G. TARDE. 9×5½. 226 pp. Paris: Alc

L'IDÉE SOCIALE AU THÉÂTRE. By EMILE DE SAINT-AUBAN. Paris: Stock. Fr.3.50.

L'ÉVOLUTION DU SOCIALISME. By JEAN BOURDEAU. 7½×4½. Alcan. Fr.2.50. [A concise account of the progress of Socialism in France during the

EDUCATIONAL.

TENNYSON. (The Temple Primers.) By MONTAGUE LUCE. 6×4. 128 pp.

UNE REINE. By J. H. Rosny. 7½×5½, 300 pp. Paris: Plon. Fr.3.50.

TESSA, THE TRADER'S WIFE. By Louis Becke. 7½×5, 256 pp. Unwin. 3s. 6d.

A THOUSAND PITIES. By Ellen Taylor. 7½×5, 146 pp. Unwin. 3s. 6d.

KING'S END. By Alice Brown. 7½×5, 366 pp. Constable. 6s.
[A story of New England country life.]

THE LADY OF LYNN. By Sir Walter Besant. 7½×5, 463 pp. Chatto and Windus.
[Reprinted from the Queen. Eighteenth Century Society at Bath. The title is the name of a ship.]

PRINCE CHARMING. By "Rita." 7½×5, 343 pp. Sands. 3s. 6d.

THE LOST KEY. By the Hon. Lady Acland. 7½×5, 353 pp. Macqueen.

THE DOMINIE'S GARDEN. A Story of Old New York. By Imogen Clark. 8×5½, 352 pp. Murray. 6s.

LITERARY.

THE WORKING PRINCIPLES OF RHETORIC. By F. J. Genung. 7½×5, 676 pp. Ginn (Boston). 6s.
[Examines the principles of rhetoric in their bearing on literature. Based on a previous book by the same author, entitled "Practical Elements of Rhetoric."]

A NEW ENGLISH DICTIONARY ON HISTORICAL PRINCIPLES. Ed. by Dr. J. A. H. Murray. Vol. V.—Jew-Kairine. 12×11, 646 pp. Clarendon Press. 2s. 6d.

LAKE GENEVA AND ITS LITERARY LANDMARKS. By Francis Gribble. 9×6, 303 pp. Constable. 10s.
[. . . "An informal, anecdotal history of Geneva, with especial reference to the careers of the many eminent men of letters, natives or strangers, who have lived or sojourned there."]

MISCELLANEOUS.

LES SPORTS ET JEUX D'EXERCICE DANS L'ANCIENNE FRANCE. By J. J. Jusserand. 60 Illustrations. 8×5½, 474 pp. Paris: Plon. Fr.6.

DEBRETT'S COMING EVENTS. Vol. I., No. 2, July. 6d.

THE ANGLO-SAXON REVIEW. Vol. IX. June, 1901. 12×7½, 348 pp. Macqueen. 21s.

MAGIC AND RELIGION. By Andrew Lang. 9½×6, 336 pp. Longmans. 10s. 6d. n.
[Largely a discussion of Mr. Frazer's views as expressed in the recent new edition of "The Golden Bough"; and intended to strengthen the author's position "that perhaps the earliest traceable form of religion was relatively high, and that it was inevitably lowered in tone during the process of social evolution."]

A DIARY OF THE SIEGE OF THE LEGATIONS IN PEKING. By Nigel Oliphant. With a Preface by Andrew Lang. 8×5½, 217 pp. Longmans. 5s. n.

GREAT MEN. By Harold Begbie. Illustrated by F. C. Gould. 11×8½, 50 pp. Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.
[A very amusing collection of caricatures of living celebrities—Lord Salisbury as Hamlet, Mr. Lecky as Tom Pinch, &c., with appropriate verse by Mr. Begbie.]

NATURAL HISTORY.

THE BOOK OF ASPARAGUS. (Handbooks of Practical Gardening. Vol. I.). By C. Ilott F.R.H.S. 7½×5½, 108 pp. Lane. 3s. 6d. n.
[The first of a series purporting to deal in a purely practical way with the culture of various fruits, vegetables, and flowers which are or might be grown in English gardens.]

FLOWERS AND FERNS, AND THEIR HAUNTS. By Mabel C. Wright. 8×6, 341 pp. The Macmillan Company. 10s. 6d.

ORIENTAL.

APOCRYPHA ARABICA. (Studia Sinaitica No. VIII.) Ed. and Trans. into English by Margaret Dunlop Gibson, M.R.A.S. 10×7. Cambridge University Press. 10s. n.

PHILOSOPHY.

THE EVOLUTION OF CONSCIOUSNESS. By L. Hall. 8¾×5½, 152 pp. Williams and Norgate. 3s. n.

IVme CONGRÈS INTERNATIONAL DE PSYCHOLOGIE, tenu à Paris du 29 au 26 Août, 1900. Compte Rendu des Séances et Texte des Mémoires publiés par les soins de, Pierre Janet. 10×6½, 814 pp. Paris: Alcan. Fr. 20

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

THE PROSE WORKS OF JONATHAN SWIFT, D.D. Ed. by Temple Scott. Vol. V. Historical and Political Tracts. 7½×5, 494 pp. Bell. 3s. 6d.

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF C. S. CALVERLEY. With a Biographical Notice, by Sir W. J. Hendall, G.C.M.G. 7½×5, 514 pp. Bell. 6s. n.

THE GERM, 1850. With a Preface by W. M. Rossetti. Stock. 10s. 6d.

A NATURALIST'S VOYAGE ROUND THE WORLD. By C. Darwin. 8×5½, 521 pp. Murray. 3s. 6d. n.

THE FAMILY SCAPEGRACE. By James Payn. New Ed. 7¾×5¼, 376 pp. Chatto and Windus. 3s. 6d.

DR. CLAUDIUS. By F. Marion Crawford. 8¼×5½, 110 pp. Macmillan. 6d.

HARROW SCHOOL REGISTER. 2nd Ed. Ed. by M. O. Davolish. 9×6, 822 pp. Longmans. 15s. n.

PLAYING AT BOTANY. By Phebe Allen. 2nd Ed. 8½×5½, 200 pp. Wells Gardner, Darton. 3s. 6d.

THEOLOGY.

RENDERINGS OF CHURCH HYMNS. By the Rev. R. M. Moorsom. Music by Rev. G. W. Griffith and W. S. De Winton. 7¾×4¾, 120 pp. Cambridge University Press. 5s. n.

THE RELIGION OF THE FIRST CHRISTIANS. By F. J. Gould. 6½×5, 143 pp. Watts. 3s. 6d.
[Regards Christianity as the natural product of a puritan and uncultured proletariat seeking fellowship and hope.]

LESSONS FROM WORK. By H. E. Wilmington, Bishop of Dunkeld. 7½×5½, 261 pp.

CHESS.

Address "Chess": Literature, Printing Ho

PROBLEM No. 194, by BARON WARDENER, Tans.
BLACK. 8 pieces.

WHITE. 8 pieces.
White to play and mate in two moves.

PROBL
J. O
BLACK.

WHITE.
White to play a

Problem No. 195, competing in La (6 pieces)—K at K B 2; Q at Q 5; R at K pawns at K Kt 5, Q 2. Black (10 pieces) K Q Kt 2; R at K Kt sq; B at Q R sq; Kt at Q B 4, Q 6, K B 5, K Kt 2, K R 2. White to Solutions.—No. 176, Corrias (2), R–B 4, 1. Kt–K 6, K×Kt; 2. Kt–B 5 ch, K–K 4 No. 178, Troitzky, White wins by R×P Slater (2), K–Kt 8. No. 180, Loyd (3), 1. Q– be delayed by checks. No. 181, Loyd (2), Lindmark (2), P–K B 4. No. 184, Cisar, k Q–B 6 claimed by Mr. Waters). No. 186, T No. 187, Csipkés (3), 1. Kt–Q Kt 7, followe &c. No. 189, Jespersen (3), R–Q B 2. End Troitzky, 1. Kt–B 6, P–R 7; 2. Kt–K 5 ch, B 4 and draws. No. 185, La Stratégie, 1. Kt– 2. Kt–B 3 ch, K–K 5; 3. R–K 6 ch, &c. K 8=Kt; 2. P–R 7, R–Q sq; 3. R–Kt 8 a Troitzky, 1. R–R 6 ch, K–B 4; 2. R×R Q Kt sq, P×R=Kt; 4. K–Kt 2, Kt–Q 7; 5.

Correct Solvers are:—Otto Würzburg (G 169, 170, 172 to 174; R. L. Antrobus, 169, Primo (Scarborough), 162, 166 to 169, 171 to 1 173, 174, 176, 177, 179, 180, 183, 184, 186, 187, (Bromley), 173, 174, 176 to 188; Arthur A. 171 to 173, 176; D. G. Ross (Sutton), 171 to 1

Notes and News.—The Cape Times spe tournaments commencing at the Cape Town would certainly appear that the game has the while of this lamentable and prolonged wa much in other ways of the doings of ches Africa. May peace soon rule! It is a fac colonial brothers and Englishmen resident a proportion know something of chess. Some What is the explanation of this superiority? stances favourable to the development of th A Mr. Albert W. Fox, of Washington, is ma chess player in Europe. He has recently vi he met Dr. Lasker, brother of the champio once more be directed to the great value o Games by correspondence, endings of a critica and constructed chess generally are worthy The popularity of problem study is increasingl

Game No. LXXXVII.—One of Mr. Pillsbu

White. Halprin.	Black. H. N. Pillsbury.	White. Halprin.
1. P–Q 4	P–Q 4	21. Kt×Kt
2. Kt–K B 3	Kt–K B 3	22. K–Kt 2
3. B–K 3	P–K 4

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 195. SATURDAY, JULY 13, 1901.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

NOTES OF THE DAY 25, 26, 27
"LITERATURE" PORTRAITS.—X. M. Pierre Loti. 28
HENRY SEPTIMUS SUTTON—A "Personal View," by C. C. Turelll 29
OLD HOUSES AND THEIR SECRETS 31
WILLIAM JAMES STILLMAN 33
THE LATE PROFESSOR TAIT 34
PROPHECY AND INVENTION 35
CURRENT LITERATURE—
Life in Poetry: Law in Taste 36
Lake Geneva and Its Literary Landparks 37
Theology—
Justification and Reconciliation—Is Christ Infallible and the Bible True?—Social Development under Christian Influence—The Church and New Century Problems—The Books of the New Testament—Bible Studies—Introduction to the Textual Criticism of the Greek New Testament—The Risen Master—The Life and Literature of the Ancient Hebrews—St. Matthew—The Preacher's Dictionary—Bible Characters 38, 39, 40
Lieutenant-General Sir Gerald Graham—The First Marquess Townshend—Australasia, Old and New—The Annual Register—Book Prices Current—Alfred the Great—The Siege of the Legations—The Father of St. Kilda—How to Invest 40, 41, 42
Fiction for the Holidays 42
The Serious Wooing 43
AMONG THE REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES.—II. 43
THE REPORT ON BOOKBINDING 44
CORRESPONDENCE—Heraldic Nomenclature—L'Aiglon—Rachel, Sarah, and the Daemonic—Foreign Phrases—Goldsmith's Death 45, 46
AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for 47
LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS 47, 48

NOTES OF THE DAY.

The "LITERATURE" PORTRAIT next week will be that of MR. GEORGE GISSING.

This will be followed by a series of special portraits, from the engravings on wood by Mr. R. Bryden, of the following:—Robert Louis Stevenson, Victor Hugo, Thomas Carlyle, Dr. Ibsen, John Ruskin, Walt Whitman, William Morris, Emerson, Tolstoy. The portraits in each case will be accompanied by fully illustrated articles dealing exhaustively with the life and work of the writer. In connexion with the arrangements already made for special contributions to these numbers, we may mention that M. Paul Bourget will contribute to the Victor Hugo Number, Mr. E. T. Cook to the Ruskin Number. For the Stevenson Number Mr. Morley Roberts will write an account of his visit to Samoa shortly before Stevenson's death. In the Tolstoy Number articles will appear by Mr. Aylmer Maude, Mr. Brayley Hodgetts, and Mr. G. Calderon.

* * * *

The many and varied writings of John Fiske, who has died at the comparatively early age of fifty-nine, were probably not known to a large class of readers in England, but those who read them became conscious of the unique position which he occupied. [illegible] tion of the doctrine of evolution and his [illegible] doctrine with Christianity. He claimed to have [illegible] theory of the development of the moral sense which [illegible] the maternal instinct. He argued that when, as [illegible] pointed out, a point was reached "at which va[illegible] intelligence were more profitable than variations [illegible] there would inevitably be a prolongation of the [illegible] infancy. This gave further scope for maternal af[illegible] the protective instinct of the male; and hence arose [illegible] morality. But he did an immense deal of historic[illegible] conceived the idea of a series of works on American [illegible] which belonged his books on "The Discovery of [illegible] "Old Virginia and her neighbours," "The Beginning [illegible] England," "The Critical Period of American History [illegible] "The Dutch and Quaker Colonies in Ameri[illegible] American Revolution." Messrs. Macmillan publi[illegible] in England, but an Illustrated edition of "The [illegible] Revolution" (1893) was also published in London [illegible] Gay and Bird. His historical work was somewhat u[illegible] it was almost always interesting, and was marked by [illegible] of lucid statement which he had gained as a lecturer.

* * *

"It pleased me," wrote Boswell a quarter of a c[illegible] "to find that he was so much beloved in his nativ[illegible] must have given even greater pleasure to the me[illegible] Johnson Club on Saturday last, when they attended [illegible] tion of the Johnson Museum, to receive such conce[illegible] the love which Lichfield still has for the memory [illegible] illustrious son. The house in which Dr. Johnson w[illegible] in which his father sold books, has long been a familia[illegible] in the town, distinguishable by the statue of the d[illegible] faces it in the market square—Chancellor Law's gift [illegible] sixty-three years ago. The house has not always b[illegible] with such respect; early last century a dancing-[illegible] giving lessons to his pupils in the very room i[illegible] Johnson was born; but, on the whole, it seems to [illegible] through the succeeding years with remarkably few [illegible] Michael Johnson's old shop, in which he appe[illegible] dispensed quack medicines as well as choice edi[illegible] classics, now contains a number of interesting relic[illegible] the desk on which the doctor is said to have w[illegible] Rambler. Other objects lent or given to the collect[illegible] Johnson's stout silver-headed stick, the great arm-cha[illegible] he received his last Communion, his cribbage board [illegible] editions of his works, besides portraits, autographs, [illegible] ments.

* * * *

Among those present at Lichfield when Dr [illegible] Hill dedicated the house "as a shrine to all John[illegible]

the Johnson Club owes its existence. Like many other coteries of the kind, the club originated almost accidentally. A few literary friends, acting upon the suggestion thrown out by Mr. Unwin, met at an informal supper at the old "Cock" in 1884 to celebrate the centenary of Dr. Johnson's death, and it was the success of that evening which led to the foundation of the club, with Mr. Unwin as its first prior.

* * * *

Mr. Alfred Austin is essentially a lyric poet, and he is most successful when he writes untrammelled by the course of political events. He is at his best in a poem based on the old love story of Acis and Galatea, overshadowed by the revengeful figure of the jealous giant, Polyphemus. The poem was written in Sicily in 1888, and is appearing in the North American Review for July, which appears in England on the 15th inst. An advance copy of the poem has been sent us by Messrs. Macmillan. Acis and Galatea converse daintily in anapæstic dialogue, but the Cyclops is rightly confined to sonorous blank verse. The verse is all well written, and the poet gives a touch of pathetic interest to the soliloquies of Polyphemus brooding over his love for a mortal.

While I range
The pathless labyrinth of forest pines,
Laden with logwood for my cavern hearth;
Climb the rough crags betwixt whose smooth, green flanks
The adventurous goats browse wayward; or descend,
Driving them home before my voice; or rive
Time-toughened oaks for virgin honeycomb,
Dripping with golden sweetness; or with care
Curdle the autumn milk in shelving bowls
For winter sustenance; then I forget
The god within me, and on task intent
That needs but mortal energy I live,
Human at every pore, a man—no more.
But now my flock are folded safe within,
And in the snow-cold larder of my cave
Is store for morrow's nourishment; and lo!
Up from the wave rolleth the rounded moon,
To wend her silent, uncompanioned way
Monotonous through Heaven; and with her mounts
The Olympian ichor in my veins, to wake Ancestral longings.

* * * *

The Elizabethan Stage Society have occasionally gone rather far afield in their excellent endeavour. They have even tried to persuade us that Oriental drama is within their province. But the two plays presented to-day—the "Morality" Every Man, and the "Miracle Play," The Sacrifice of Isaac—are of really national interest. We have lost the wholesome thrill which such plays produced when they impressed their audience much as the threat of Bonaparte or hell-fire once terrified naughty children. But it is an interesting glimpse which Mr. William Poel gives us of our drama in the fifteenth century. To make it the more real great care has been taken with the costumes. Those in Every Man are copied from contemporary Flemish tapestries. The play has actually a Dutch counterpart, Elckerlijk, and evidence seems to show that the Dutch were before us in their dramatic version of the old Buddhist story on which Every Man is based. The costumes for The Sacrifice of Isaac are Eastern, and have been lent for the occasion by Mr. Holman Hunt. Mr. Poel informs us that in a play called Jacob and Esau, written in the sixteenth century, the characters through whom the book is to be submitted s to the provincial bookbuyer. Londoners have n of a preliminary inspection of a book; but even the comparatively few booksellers who down large numbers of the new books in stock b orders to the kind of book that is in general dem mann has always taken an interest in German m

ing. His new plan seems to be a sort of com the Continental system and our own, and it will see how it works. On the Continent it is publish practically everything on the "sale but the publisher in this case deals only wit the bookseller, in his turn, submitting the customers. In Germany the system is work but there, as in other Continental countries, a is published in paper covers, which cost n replace when they come back soiled. It would matter to replace the covers of cloth-bound thing which marks the working of the Cont that books are published with uncut edges, returnable once the leaves are cut. Presum mann's publications will have to be examined seller's shop. And that individual, whose days always happy, will welcome a step likely to bri

* * *

The centenary that falls to-morrow is o would most suitably be observed in silence. C was born Jane Welsh, destined to be too h to the world as Jane Welsh Carlyle. Her trial of genius" have become an unforgettable part o and the "world's coarse thumb" makes little exaggerations of the literary temperament. And comedy has been played out, it is time to rem philosopher failed in little things, he was reall trials. The centenary might be made the occas of a cheaper edition of Mrs. Carlyle's brilliant

* * *

IOLAIRE.

LINES WRITTEN IN THE NORTH S

(Dedicated to Sir Donald Currie, G.C

I.

This was the land that the Norseman p
Here lay his furrows, there his shroud:
A thousand years . . . Oh, what a
But the romance of yesterday!
Iolaire! Iolaire!
Dance in the moonbeams free and f
Thou art a Viking's chosen bride, Speed-away, speed-away over the t

II.

And these same seas we plough to-day
Have tost their foam in the Vikings' wa
A thousand years . . . and the roll
Will rest our sons on the Norseman's p Iolaire! Iolaire!
Shake out the moonbeams from thy Scatter thy jewels on the tide,
For thou art a Viking's joy and pri

III.

Breeze of the Norland! fresh and stron

We regret to hear that Professor S. R. Gardiner is seriously ill.

The Leeds Mercury has been purchased by Mr. R. Leicester Harmsworth and Mr. Harold Harmsworth.

Sir John Leng celebrated on Monday the jubilee of his proprietorship of the Dundee Advertiser.

The French are taking up the crusade against advertisement; and M. Sully Prudhomme and Mr. Frédéric Mistral preside over a new Society the object of which is to preserve French scenery from disfigurement.

M. and Mme. Zola, who will be in Scotland in the early autumn, are to receive a visit from Mme. Matilde Serao, the Italian novelist.

The cataloguing of the Bibliothèque Nationale continues slowly. Vol. I. appeared four years ago, and now Vol. VI. is ready.

Mr. Justin McCarthy expresses the view, in the Daily Mail, that the atmosphere and the ways of the House of Commons are not favourable to the production of literary work.

Mr. Carnegie has offered to the city of San Francisco a sum of 950,000 dollars for the purpose of building a free library, subject to the same conditions that governed his recent gift to New York.

The prosecution of Count Tolstoy is said to have resulted in a great influx of Americans desiring to make the acquaintance of the novelist.

Mr. Rogers, the retired locomotive builder of Paterson, has bequeathed his entire estate, which amounts to between £1,150,000 and £1,550,000 to the Metropolitan Museum of Art of New York.

Paderewski's opera Manru has been performed at Lemberg. The book is by M. Alfred Nossig and is an adaptation of one of Krassewski's novels.

English Literature at Oxford.

If the Oxford Professor of Poetry's inaugural lecture (on "Poetry for Poetry's Sake"), now published by the Clarendon Press, does not end "a controversy which concerns the ultimate nature of art," it is, at least, a closely-reasoned contribution to a discussion in which the last word will never be said, while the universe contains poets and critics. He also has something to say on a subject which is becoming more and more one of practical interest, and on which scholars are divided into two camps, one of which has lately been represented by Mr. Beeching and the other by Mr. Andrew Lang. Professor Bradley says "Since I left Oxford. . . . a School of English Language and Literature has been founded, and has attracted a fair number of candidates" (statistics suggest the conjectural emendation "a number of fair candidates.") "Naturally I rejoice in this change, knowing from experience the value of these studies; and knowing also from experience, if I may speak boldly, how idle is that dream which flits about in Oxford and whispers that the [illegible] made a subject of examination. To lecture on Engli[illegible] is one thing, to examine in it is another; and [illegible] largely of the exigencies of the examination [illegible] Literature School has fallen to a great extent, t[illegible] much as one would gather from the strictures of [illegible] Collins, into the hands of philologists. Not many un[illegible] can be interested in the "mastering of Old E[illegible] basis of Teutonic phonology"; hence the School [illegible] by mere men. That is the real meaning of wh[illegible] Bradley calls an idle dream. How, in fact, c[illegible] philological side of English literature be made a pr[illegible] of examination? To collect facts and dates, to gr[illegible] authors, and "chatter" about Shelley, to repeat th[illegible] of a lecturer or assimilate the conclusions of liter[illegible] a rather inadequate training for the mind. [illegible] definite canons of taste which could be taught, then [illegible] might at least boast that it was educating the ide[illegible] Mr. Courthope, whose "Life in Poetry" we revie[illegible] when lecturing as Professor of Poetry, was inclined [illegible] to the standard of the classics. A knowledge [illegible] literature may serve indeed

> To teach vain wits a science little known,
> To admire superior sense, and doubt their own but the criteria of Greece and Rome are not always [illegible] for us. One may be penetrated with the spirit [illegible] tragedy, and know by heart the Poetics, the Ars [illegible] Longinus on the Sublime, and yet be a bad criti[illegible] literature. Anyhow, the curriculum of the English [illegible] School does not include a knowledge of Aristotle, o[illegible] Longinus. Mr. Passmore Edwards is evidently [illegible] opinion as Mr. Courthope, in respect of our re[illegible] classics. He has recently enriched the Univers[illegible] scholarship, to be competed for annually, "for the [illegible] ment and promotion of the study of English Lite[illegible] connexion with the classical literature of Greece [illegible] An examination for such a scholarship will be an [illegible] experiment; but it is to be feared that here [illegible] practical possibilities of "marking" will eventual[illegible] other considerations, and the important and decidi[illegible] will in time be linguistic rather than literary. P[illegible] the difficulty of assigning a solid and indisputable [illegible] perhaps it is the academic distrust of fluent w[illegible] whatever reason, examiners generally regard wit[illegible] "appreciations," and comparisons whether of [illegible] Catullus, or Clytaemnestra with Lady Macbeth [illegible] prescribes questions on literary subjects; they are [illegible] and set with much pain and trouble; but the answer [illegible] be known as "Tosh," and included under the same [illegible] tion as University Extension. It is true that t[illegible] always the first-rate at first-hand. The undergra[illegible] imitative creature, and reproduces, usually in a g[illegible] phrases which he culls from the popular criticism of [illegible] If he has been reading the works of Mr. Pater, [illegible] himself in efforts to find "the right word" (only it i[illegible] the wrong one) "for the right thing." Some years [illegible] picturesque simile and Oriental imagery were in [illegible] critics, Homer used to be like the rumblings of t[illegible] Thucydides resemble the tolling of a great bell. [illegible] smart epigram and caustic paradox are in vogue, [illegible] undergraduate speaks of the essentially bourgeois [illegible] Sophocles. This kind of thing has no fixed value; and [illegible] recognizing that the literary criticism of the E[illegible] Schools is too often worthless, fall back of necessity [illegible]

Literature Portraits.—x.

PIERRE LOTI.

At a moment when the realist movement was in full swing, some five-and-twenty years ago, there appeared under an obscure pseudonym the first book of Pierre Loti—"Aziyadé." It was written in melodious prose—the passionate recital of the love-passages of an officer with a young Turkish woman, amid the landscape and the horizons of Stambul and of Pera, in the centre of the gardens of the East, of the dazzling mirage of the Golden Horn and of the Bosphorus, wherein picturesque Oriental streets with their moving crowds veiled woman pass mysteriously by.

This romance of a young and unknown writer, a kind of autobiography full of living emotion, delighted the public, and its charm was derived from qualities exactly contrary to those which marked the naturalist school. In place of the impassive and searching analysis of M. Zola, of the minute and tedious descriptions in which the author of "L'Assommoir" delights, Loti sought only for emotional qualities. He would only depict what he had himself experienced. His passages of description are indeed frequent, but in each of them his aim is to arrest the attention by showing us in a few words the salient and fundamental character of the thing which he describes and by selecting those details which are most capable of touching our emotions.

These are the main characteristics of the book which brought to Loti his first success, and which by its subject no less than by its style seemed to check the excesses of the realistic school. And in the very quality which then so much impressed Loti's first readers lies the secret of his charm for readers of to-day. He has, in fact, while developing with the years, and acquiring a style of greater power, remained singularly true to himself; his method is unchanged, and one is almost justified in estimating his entire achievement by his earliest work. Such a book as "Pêcheur d'Islande" may reveal a greater power of emotion; another, such as the "Roman d'un Spahi," may contain more vigorous descriptions, but the difference is really of the smallest; the manner, the composition, the style remains the same. This separates M. Loti very clearly from the majority of modern writers. What a difference, for instance, between the earliest and somewhat hesitating work of D'Annunzio and the same Author's "Child of Pleasure"; and who would recognize in the youthful poems of M. Edmond Rostand the powerful playwright of Cyrano de Bergerac and of L'Aiglon?

M. Pierre Loti, then, has had the rare good fortune to create at the outset a new kind of romance to which he has remained faithful—the Exotic Romance—and to attain at once a complete mastery of it. In all his books the plot is a simple one and has only a small importance, his first object being to acquaint us with his emotions and his sensations. He has seen the countries which he describes. As an officer in the navy he has been a world-wide traveller. He has reclined beneath the happy perfumed groves of Tahiti, he has floated on "junks" down the languorous rivers of China, he has dreamed in the flowery tea gardens of Japan, he has explored the deserts of Morocco and Palestine, and everywhere it is his own story that he recounts, often with little variation. In the books which are altogether without plot—in "Madame Chrysanthème," where he gives us an idyll of Japan, or where he tells us of the desolation of the Eastern desert, his manner is exactly the same as when he describes the passion of Aziyadé. It is so in d'Automne" fills in the canvas begun in "Ma thème." "Au Maroc" is M. Loti's journey across Islam, and "Fantôme d'Orient" is another Constantinople as seen in a different mood to that In all these books whatever names he may a costume he may don—whether he wears the dress his finely drawn portrait of M. Lévy-Dhurmer, o in an Arab cloak—one recognizes at every point of Loti.

"Pêcheur d'Islande" is the one of his books mates most closely to the character of a novel. Its intense and poignant emotion, its effects fine to the very last page, is often looked upon as hi Wonderfully strong is the character of Yann finally disappears in the Icelandic sea, while h doubts and hopes to the last. This book, so full truth, reveals a remarkable power of observation the author has traced every stage of these lives he has penetrated their mystery. Yet the love and poignant as it is, is not the main theme. "Pêc is before all a superb and moving study of the sea page of the story one hears the roar of the waves change of the ocean passes before the eye, whether cliffs of Iceland, or the melancholy wastes of Brit Never is the imagination of M. Loti stirred from his pen one of these fascinating deser —the exquisite picture of the broad plains flowers over which he roams in "Maroc," pagodas of Japan in "Japoneries d'Automne, pages in "Fantôme d'Orient" where the w Constantinople and recalls the sweet far-c "Aziyadé."

This art of picturesque description possesses in a greater degree perhaps than a writer is essentially a personal gift. His poet cadence, his deliberate habit of letting his sent him without a verb, these are personal traits; th from no outside source. In the address whi on the occasion of his reception at the Académ Loti boasted that he read very little and was un modern literature. If one cannot accept this any qualification—for the influence of Flaube itself felt in the writings of Loti—yet it is no d accurate. This deliberate neglect of other Loti, a guarantee of personality, of originality likely to prove a danger. M. Loti, if he reads if his mind is refreshed from no literary source over again his own books, must at last become to tion of himself, enslaved to his own formulas, i own rhetoric. Hence the weakness of some of notably of his journey to the "Desert and to Jeru work in which one is too sensible of the writ nothing escape his eyes and his note-book. said that here M. Loti is the victim of his acad in the presence of the monasteries of Arabi storied landscape of Jerusalem and of Mar Sal his conscious determination to fix his impre himself to the proper height of emotion at all to let emotion as of old lead him where it will.

But no author is always at his highest level; Loti sometimes shows failure of accomplishment, rather all those delightful pages with which French literature; let us recall the moon risi

t'ampaign, the writer's instinct led him to an imprudence which compromised his future; in consequence of a letter which he sent to the Figaro about certain acts of cruelty committed by French soldiers at the taking of Huué, he was placed upon the unattached list. This disciplinary measure, however, held good only for a few months, and in the early days of February, 1884, he returned to active service, and is at the present moment captain of a ship employed in the Chinese waters. Thanks to his being able frequently to obtain leave of absence, Loti has had full scope to pursue his literary career. On May 21, 1891, he was elected to the Academy by eighteen votes out of thirty-five. M. Pierre Loti made his début in the world of letters with "Aziyadé" (Stambul, 1876-1877), extracted from the notes of "an English naval lieutenant who entered the Turkish service on May 10, 1876, and was wounded under the walls of Kars in October, 1877" (1879). He published next "Rarahu" (1880), which was reissued under the title of "Mariage de Loti" (1882); the "Roman d'un Spahi" (1881); then a volume containing "Fleurs d'Ennui," "Pasquala Ivanovitch," "Voyage au Monténégro, Suléima" (1882). Then came the "Trois Dames de la Kasbah," a pretty Oriental story (1884, grand in 16o); the "Pêcheur d'Islande" (1886), which won him the "Prix Vitet" at the Academy, and which was translated into German by Queen Elisabeth of Rumania; "Madame Chrysanthème" (1887, illustrated, a new artistic edition, 1888), which contains the story of the marriage of a naval officer with a Japanese woman; "Propos d'Exil" (1887); "Japoneries d'Automne" (1889), a special study of the civilization of Japan; "Au Maroc" (1890), which recounts the story of an embassy, to which M. Pierre Loti was attached, to the Sultan of Morocco; "Le Roman d'un Enfant" (1890), an autobiography recalling the "Mémoires" of George Sand, but marked by less simplicity and abandon. In the latter book the author tells how, overcome by the pessimism of the day, repelled by the coldness of the Protestantism of his childhood, then attracted for a moment by the poetry of the Roman ritual, he at last lost his faith, and opened his heart to the "conscience horrible du néant des néants." It was in this frame of mind that he published in 1892 the "Livre de la Pitié et de la Mort"—recollections of the scenes which had darkened his childhood. In 1892 appeared "Fantôme d'Orient," and in the same year the Eden Theatre presented a piece in eight scenes founded upon "Pêcheur d'Islande," with music by Guy Ropartz. This is not the only instance in which a work of Loti has been set to music, for M. Reynaldo Hahn has founded an opera on the "Mariage de Loti," which was successfully staged at the Opéra Comique. Since 1895 Loti has published "Désert, la Galilée, Jérusalem, Figures et Choses qui passent, Ramuntcho, Reflets de la Sombre Route." The books of Loti which have been published by M. Calmann Lévy show very unequal sales. Whilst "Pêcheur d'Islande" rose to 100,000, others have not got beyond a third or a fourth edition. M. Loti is known as a contributor to periodicals, especially to the Figaro, and the Nouvelle Revue.

From a rare Stevensonian trifle, which last week made £24 5s. at auction, an excerpt may be made, the more so as the trifle in question, "An Object of Pity," is practically unknown. It was written "by many competent hands"—Lady Jersey, her brother Captain Rupert Leigh, Mrs. Stevenson, Mr. Graham Balfour, Mrs. Belle Strong, and R. L. S. himself—when the Countess of Jersey visited Samoa in the autumn of 1892. Each contributor had to write a sketch full of the "Ouida glamour." The dedication, from the pen of O. Tusitala, the Teller of Tales, as the Samoans called Stevenson, is to "Lady Ouida." It begins playfully, "Many beside yourself have exulted to collect Olympian polysyllables, and to sling ink, not Wisely but too Well. Many have made it their goal and object to Exceed; and who else has been so Excessive?" We learn, moreover, that the collaborators, "all persons of ability and good character, were suddenly startled to find ourselves walking in [illegible]

HENRY SEPTIMUS SUTTON.

A "Personal View."

While many voices are loud, the [illegible] of hardly survive the lips that utter them, a voice has almost unnoticed into silence, which the few who have it closely would not willingly let die. It is a pleasa[illegible] nothing worthy of remembrance will be ultimately yet here was a man of rare distinction whose fame has deserted, who had slipped so entirely out of the w[illegible] ledge, who leaves his memory to so small a class, that of its perishing altogether is but too imminent and re[illegible]

Henry Septimus Sutton died at Manchester on M[illegible] seventy-seventh year. Until recently he had been e[illegible] Alliance News, a temperance organ, and he had been long with other newspapers in Manchester. Beyond those these journalistic tasks brought him into contact, friends, and the small religious community of whi[illegible] member, I doubt if there are fifty men living who eve[illegible] name. How many are aware that, half a century [illegible] being hailed by Emerson and others as a poet i[illegible] spirit of Herbert and Vaughan lived again? How [illegible] believe that his friendship with Coventry Patmore [illegible] the influences which made the "Unknown Eros" di[illegible] the "Angel in the House"? There are some to w[illegible] things are known, but their number is small, and t[illegible] little hope of its ever increasing. A collected ed[illegible] Sutton's poems was published in 1886. It has [illegible] reprinted, and it is difficult to conceive of any eve[illegible] bring it again into demand. What can prevail [illegible] stealing tide of oblivion?

Mr. Sutton was born at Nottingham in 1825. [illegible] published a prose treatise entitled "The Evangel [illegible] book of not much literary value, but interesting as a [illegible] It reveals its author as a mystic with a fondness [illegible] terms, a disposition to illustrate his spiritual phi[illegible] diagrams, a mind steeped in American transcendenta[illegible] liberal view of Scriptural inspiration not common in [illegible] In 1848 he published a volume of poems which at[illegible] attention of Emerson and other famous people, [illegible] showed clearly where his real talent lay, and ho[illegible] delicate a talent it was. In 1851 appeared a new bo[illegible] strange title "Quinquenergia," a prose treatise inte[illegible] forth a "new practical theology." The volume als[illegible] a further sheaf of verses, among them his most ch[illegible] poem, "Rose's Diary."

Soon after this Mr. Sutton fell under the spell [illegible] borg. To those who are acquainted with the prose b[illegible] mentioned it will not be surprising that the Swe[illegible] should have attracted him; what is surprising is [illegible] complete cessation of his poetical activity which [illegible] followed. Whether his inspiration was already ex[illegible] whether there is an inherent incompatibility betwe[illegible] silence, his indifference to fame, his absorption in sectarian interests, all assisted the world in the easy task of forgetting. However, there are still some who have not forgotten; and there must be others in the little company of those who love poetry from whom Mr. Sutton's work is sure of appreciation the moment it becomes known to them. To win the attention of a few such is the most that one can hope to do, and perhaps it is enough.

Mr. Sutton's collected poems (Glasgow, David M. Main, 1886) are not voluminous, but there is little in them that is not pure gold. His genius is of a rare and exquisite quality; it has affinities with Herbert and Vaughan; it has affinities with Blake, with Emerson, with Coventry Patmore; it has even affinities with Keats. "Clifton Grove Garland," one of his earliest poems, shows plainly the influence of "Endymion" and "Lamia"; it shows too an ease and abundance which make his premature exhaustion the more remarkable. It is written in couplets of a singular fluency and grace. It has a large measure of the fresh delight in nature, the fertility, the happiness, the sometimes excessive ingenuity and "lushness" of expression which characterize the earlier work of Keats. It is, indeed, a poem of much charm, fit to be read in the open air on a day of recumbent leisure; but it often lapses into prose and triviality, and it has not the really characteristic note of Mr. Sutton's genius. That note is struck more decidedly in the poem called "Mount Perilous of Pride." In the volume of 1848 this poem appeared as "The Hills." The later title marks the author's criticism of his own earlier mood. Whatever we may think of the mood, the poem is a fine one. In "Clifton Grove Garland"—in such lines as—

> Wide water-lapse with dark wind-crispings grooved,
> And green enrippled shades and whites that moved
> In twisting eddies in it, swirling o'er it
> At every zephyr's instance; and, before it,
> Round, and beyond it, such a green and grey,
> Such blue-deep rapture in the far-away—

the poet is simply revelling in the new-found power of beautiful expression. In "The Hills" he has realized himself.

> Though mine arm I made a girdle
> About a maiden's waist;
> Though for my mouth mine eyes their utmost wit
> Of eloquence had often tried, that it
> Her innocent kiss might taste;
> Though look on look had, flowing, fixed,
> Souls utterly intermix'd, > Hearts' fibres interlaced,
> And she said, if I forsook,
> Life would forsake,
> And well I knew that if I went
> Her gentle heart would break;
> Yet if she led me to the vale,
> From my sun-track kept me,
> That that high land might accept me,
> I must let her face grow pale,
> And leave her there,
> Nor could repent, although around

There is something excessive in this alo anti-social, something rather stoical than Chr no doubt, is what Mr. Sutton felt when he ch the poem, and wrote the quaint metrical prefac it in the later edition. But the mood is noble, severity of its expression is a finer music than sweetness of the earlier style. The earlier sty and, though the mood changes, it is not by former temper. The poet remains upon the sees new visions in his solitude, and new
"from star, and moss, and stone"—voices th to a devouter and more tremulous emotion, humility, to tears. The seer becomes more def his mountain is no longer Mount Perilous Mountain of the Lord. Of this new phase o perfect expression is "Rose's Diary," that ex the inner life, named from the youthful friend it is dedicated. Here, in verse of the most de simplicity, the poet records the experiences munion with God, living by the Divine lig fearful efforts to keep the light burning, it coveries, its doubts, and its consolations.

> Sometimes the wind-gusts push it sore
> Then closely to my breast my light I h
> And for it make a tent of my two hand
> And, though it scarce might on the la
> It soon recovers, and uprightly stands

* * *

> How shall I keep this sacred light? I > Preserve it from such influence as assa
> Unless I tend it lovingly, it fails;
> And there is nothing when the blast p
> But the poor shelter of my hands and l

In brief quotations one can give no more rare quality of this poem. I know nothing el our language, nothing at all like it in the hundred years. Comparison with Herbert and carry us very far; Mr. Sutton's spirit and m ripest production, are absolutely individual, a be finer or more winning. I will not profa praise; but with one more specimen, poign sincerity of contrition, will leave Mr. Sutt commend him.

> O Father! I have sinn'd against The
> The thing I thought I never more shou
> My days were set before me, light all
> But I have made them dark, it is too t
> And drawn dense clouds between me a

> Forgive me not, for grievous is my sin
> Yea, very deep and dark. Alas! I s > Such blackness in it, that I may not be > Forgiven of myself—how then of Thee
> Vile, vile without; black, utter black

OLD HOUSES AND THEIR SECRETS.

In the peaceful days in which we live few romantic associations gather round the great houses of the country. Their old inhabitants may live in them without fear of siege, or they pass into new hands and are submitted to modern improvements; their secret chambers are fitted up as pantries or as boudoirs, and their dim mysterious corners lose their old dim meaning under the glare of the electric light. Yet when one gazes on some old Elizabethan pile, as its windows glitter in the evening light, and the cawing rooks wing their way slowly by and settle in its ancestral elms, the sunset seems to bathe it in a radiance drawn from the world of old romance. As the shadows creep across the lawns, the years seem to fly back; strange faces peer from the windows, and stealthy footsteps crackle in the brushwood of the shrubberies. There is a glint of light through the growing dusk as a veiled white form flits across the drive and plunges into the copse. The cavalier is waiting for her beyond the wall, and she recks little yet of the tragedy which visitors of to-day trace in the sad eyes of her portrait by Dobson hanging in the drawing-room of the hall. Or from the side door opening from the library a black-robed figure emerges and passes down the covered way behind the flower garden. No wonder that this strange form, of which the face is never seen, and which moves out only when the shadows fall, is for the servants and the villagers a ghost indeed. But see! a horse gallops up the drive, and its rider flings himself from the saddle and batters on the great door. There is a hunt on foot for that mysterious inmate; the soldiers are now in the village street, and it behoves him to flee or to bestow himself as best he may so as not to fall into the hands of those who give but a short shrift to priests.

BROUGHTON CASTLE, OXFORDSHIRE.

To us, looking back through the haze of centuries, such recollections evoke, perhaps, but a gentle and pensive regret. Yet the reality, in days when violence and partisan hatred had freer play, was stern enough. The story is told in Mr. Allan Fea's SECRET CHAMBERS AND HIDING staircase and a stone slab is revealed containing a s aperture like a coal-hole. Through it a tunnel slants d into the wall, in which is an apartment large enough people. Here a single priest, or whoever it was wished to evade capture, could be fairly at his ease, p was thin enough to get comfortably down the tunn house was in possession of the priest hunters he supplied with food secretly by his friends, and might forth, when they thought it safe, and say Mass under night. A small supply of food was generally left in s as the advent of the priest-hunters was generally s unexpected; or it was let down through a tube ton-hall, where may still be seen in the wal small concealed tunnel from the banqueting secret chamber. On the floor still lies ting whereon a certain Father Wall rested limbs shortly before his execution in August

For it was weary and painful work th
There is in the Record Office a letter from the Henry Garnet describing the search at Hin Worcestershire:

> After we had been in the hole seve > seven nights and some odd hours, every ma > think we were well wearyed, and, indeed, > for we generally satte, save that sometime > half stretch ourselves, the place not being > and we had our legges so straitened that > not, sitting, find place for them, so that we > in continuous paine of our legges, and > legges, especially mine, were much swollen

He adds, however, that "we were very content within, and heard the searchers ever curious over us." There is a full account of t in the British Museum, which tells how "cle corners and conveyances were found in the all of them having books, Massing stuff, a trumpery in them, only two excepted."

One of the priests caught at the Hindlip search (16 famous John Owen. "Little John," as he was called, ha for constructing hiding-places, to be used for the conc Popish recusants or of "Massing stuff," and the keen parties, directed by skilled masons, were baffle ingenuity. On his capture, therefore, as Cecil wr time, "great joy was caused all through the kingdom his skill in constructing hiding-places, and the In number of these dark holes which he had schemed priests." It was hoped that—under the rack—he wou many secrets, and "great booty of priests" be thr
This, however, was not to be. In the British Museu account of the Hindlip capture we are told that he himself. The real mode of his death is suggested in and significant record of the Governor of the Tower :—" The man is dead—he died in our hands." Owen's dexterity was of great service to the conspirators at the time of the Gunpowder

RAWSTON HALL, CAMBRIDGESHIRE.

Plot. Many old houses—Ashby St. Ledgers and Rushton in Northamptonshire, Coughton and Clopton in Warwickshire, and others—still retain traces and traditions of the Romanist plots of the time, and at Huddington, near Droitwich, the hiding-places were large enough to contain a store of arms and ammunition in preparation for a general rising. But Owen made his arrangements in London too ; and they were made full use of by Father Gerard and his fellow conspirators. On one occasion the Lord Mayor and constables burst in upon the celebration of the Mass to find nothing but the smoke of extinguished candles.

We do not nowadays need contrivances by which we can at a moment's notice vanish behind a panel, unless it were to avoid an unwelcome caller. And we probably can hardly realize the extraordinary height of skill to which the art of instantaneous disappearance was carried, or the ingenuity of the contrivances by which a rambling country house could be inhabited by two sets of inmates, the one hiding from the other. The extinguished candles may, perhaps, recall to the reader the strange and mysterious adventures of the Parliamentary Commissioners at Woodstock, an account of whose ghostly experiences has come down to us and has been made excellent use of by Sir Walter Scott. The " good devil of Woodstock " had his parallel at Hinton Ampner in Hampshire, which was notoriously haunted by strange figures and uncanny noises, insomuch that no one at last would live there, and the house was razed to the ground. " Secret passages," we are told, " and chambers were then brought to light " ; but those who had carried on the deception for so long took the secret with them to their graves. Curious discoveries are sometimes made when these lurking places are invaded. The inmate fled often on a sudden alarm never to return, and in the changing times that followed the trap-door which admitted to his hiding-place was, perhaps, never disturbed. In a building close to Salisbury Cathedral a secret recess was discovered some twenty-five years ago containing a Jacobean horn tumbler, a velvet pillow, and a mattress on which caused the death of her little boy, so tradition him too severely because he would not learn to ngo a secret cavity in the wall was found, and book blurred and tattered, a relic no little victim of maternal wrath.

It is not only priests for whom the served as a refuge. The devices of no doubt sometimes turned to uses
If the priests were hunted under cavaliers under Cromwell, under C the other way about, and there was the regicides. Until recently more hole could have been seen in house Cromwell into which the Lord Pro have concealed himself—one wonder obscure recess—at Boscobel, and Madeley in Shropshire, at Moseley at Trent in Somersetshire, at Heale elsewhere—has been used as a Roya give a picture of the hiding plac
by Charles II. at Boscobel. Th
Charles II. and of James are skete " Restoration House " at Rochester, rested on his way from Dover to known to all visitors to that Less familiar is " Abdication Hou
James II. made his escape twenty-e
It stands in the High-street, much modernize hidden passage, and at the back may still leading down to what was then the course which James was rowed away on a rough night

Such are some of the memories which back to us, and which have been diligently Fea. He deserves most credit for his pictu drawn by his own hand. His list is proba exhaustive, but we must not forget how c

ABDICATION HOUSE," ROCHESTER.

chosen so good a subject, well fitted to keep alive the romantic memories which cluster round many a remote English village and its ancient hall.

WILLIAM JAMES STILLMAN.

We reviewed Mr. Stillman's autobiography only two months ago, and have now, much to our regret, to record his death. He died on Saturday last, at Frimley Green, Surrey, in the seventy-fourth year of his age. His book was the record of a wandering and adventurous life, devoted always to high aims, and to the service, sometimes of his country, more often of humanity at large, but never of himself. Yet it is clear that, as he looked at the past, he was conscious in his modest way that his efforts, though they did little to advance himself, had not been void of results. In his old age he had the happiness of the man

cui licet in diem Dixisse vixi.

It was a life full of work, full of interests, full of friendship, and ending with those desirable few years of rest which seem fitting before a longer journey.

William James Stillman was born in 1828 at Schenectady, in the State of New York, of parents whose influence cannot easily be traced in his own career. His father was a mechanic, and his mother was strongly imbued with Puritanism of the old type. He was educated at a school in New York, and at Union College, Schenectady; but the bent of his early genius was towards art, and it was with the object of studying art that he first came to England in 1850. Here he was introduced to Ruskin, and saw, but was hardly acquainted with, the great Turner, who was then an old man of seventy-five. Like many other young men, he was greatly influenced by the rising school of Pre-Raphaelites, and in particular by Rossetti and Millais. With Rossetti he formed a friendship which lasted for many years. It was as "the American Pre-Raphaelite" that he returned to America after [illegible] himself to Paris and to resume his art stud[illegible] time he settled down to art, and had the f[illegible] several of the group of so-called "Barbizon [illegible] Millet, Rousseau, and Dautigny, and the [illegible] account of whom is one of the best things [illegible] biography. But we doubt whether any [illegible] would have made him a great artist. M[illegible] is wanted. His knowledge of art was alw[illegible] than his executive skill. Then came another [illegible] residence in America, and an acquaintance, [illegible] intimate, with many of the best Amer[illegible] with Lowell, Longfellow, Agassiz, E[illegible] famous men. These appear to have been [illegible] happiest experiences, and it was about this [illegible] he married his first wife, a daughter of [illegible] Mack, of Cambridge.

The American Civil War broke out, a[illegible] anxious to serve his country in the field, w[illegible] for medical reasons, and was offered, instead [illegible] service, the post of United States Consul [illegible] This was the beginning of his long experie[illegible] Greece, and the near East, and of the [illegible] which he was principally connected. Ther[illegible] him a certain stiffness and independence [illegible] not commend him to Antonelli; nor, of [illegible] the political atmosphere of Papal Rome [illegible] degree congenial to him. His next post was the [illegible] in Crete. Of his life there a full description wil[illegible] in his Autobiography. It must suffice now to [illegible] during the troubled time of his Consulship, h[illegible] strenuous and able champion of the Christian po[illegible] indeed he always was of all that are desolate and [illegible] In 1858 he removed to Athens, and here, while he w[illegible] hard at archæology, he had the misfortune to lose his [illegible] son, too, became ill and died not long afterwards, by [illegible] father and son had returned to England. The nex[illegible] were spent in this country, two of them at Robertsbri[illegible] Stillman attempted, not very successfully, to share his [illegible] Rossetti. In 1871 he married again, his second w[illegible] daughter of Mr. Spartali, Greek Consul-General in L[illegible]

The third period of Stillman's life covers the tw[illegible] years during which he acted as a correspondent of [illegible] first in Herzegovina in 1875, when the country was i[illegible] insurrection, then in Italy and Greece, and finally in [illegible] His letters from Herzegovina, Montenegro, and Alb[illegible] very considerable effect in the formation of Brit[illegible] opinion. They were graphic and vigorous, like a[illegible] wrote, and they showed that, without being a trained [illegible] he had special qualifications for important work of th[illegible] His opinions were not invariably those of his employ[illegible] the long series of twenty years in which he wrote fr[illegible] Greece and Italy, especially from Rome, it was recog[illegible] his point of view was that of an acute and w[illegible] observer. It is noticeable, too, that he wrote, not per[illegible] but as a man continually interested in each fresh inc[illegible] situation. The truth is that he had found work which [illegible] He was something of a diplomatist, and was in a posit[illegible] brought him into contact with the political world, [illegible] moreover, the keenest possible sympathy both with [illegible] little Greece and with the revival of Italy. Above [illegible] a keen judge of character, and knew very well with wh[illegible] to deal. His book is full of shrewd estimates of [illegible] literary men, philosophers and artists. Personally, h[illegible]

THE LATE PROFESSOR TAIT.

The death of Peter Guthrie Tait is a great loss to the scientific world, in which his work will be held in lasting remembrance, and particularly to the University of Edinburgh. For forty years he was closely identified with all its interests. Without the familiar presence, conspicuous no less by certain peculiarities of costume than by a gait, dubbed by the students his "heather-step," the buildings of the University and the Royal Society of Edinburgh will experience a sense of something lacking, until time has reconciled people's minds to the new order of things. True, Professor Tait handed in his resignation of the Professorship of Natural Philosophy five months ago, but so long as his life was spared the severence was realized in only a minor degree. It is no secret that his eldest son's untimely death at Magersfontein in the early part of last year hastened his end, though the shock was mitigated by the warm sympathy of thousands both at home and abroad. Tait was a Senior Wrangler, had been a Fellow of Peterhouse and Professor of Mathematics at Queen's College, Belfast, before he accepted the Edinburgh chair in 1860. Practically the whole of his productive career is associated with Edinburgh. Being abundantly qualified to investigate either scientific or mathematical problems on his own account, it is not a little singular that his name should be so often met with in association with others. Thus, the partnerships Thomson and Tait—"T and T," as they were familiarly called—Stewart and Tait, Kelland and Tait, and Tait and Steele have even now a familiar ring, though at the same time a number of books stand in the name of Tait alone—for example, "Heat," "Light," "The Properties of Matter," "Recent Advances in Physical Science," and "An Introduction to the Study of Quaternions." These lists, in fact, give a clue to Tait's character, which was marked by sturdy independence on the one hand, and on the other by a readiness to put himself in the second place, provided that any cause which he had more nearly at heart could be advanced thereby. Thus, of his very numerous papers to the Royal Society of Edinburgh, a considerable portion were postponed time after time and ultimately taken as read, though he, as secretary, might very easily have given them the priority on numberless occasions. Yet, as they were mostly of a highly abstruse kind, he sank his own interests in those of the meeting.

Both by predilection and by training Tait was a mathematician, and had little sympathy for those to whom Nature had denied this faculty. Most of his work shows this bias, though, when the occasion demanded it, he could write clearly and forcibly upon other topics, without quitting the ordinary plane of argument. Nay, more, he could, at times, find a laughable illustration to assist his readers' ideas, as may be seen in his article on Quaternions in the "Encyclopædia Britannica." Wishing to make clear the conception of an imaginary quantity in Algebra, he writes :—

> Some Eastern potentate, possessed of absolute power, covets the vast possessions of his vizier and his barber. He determines to rob them both (an operation which may be very satisfactorily expressed by -1), but being a wag, he chooses his own way of doing it. He degrades his vizier to the office of barber, taking all his goods in the process, and makes the barber his vizier. Next day he repeats the operation. Each of the victims has been restored to his former rank, but the operation -1 has been applied to both.

temperature of a volume of air when it is r
under constant pressure, is occupied in doing
This is, indeed, exactly what happens, but Mayer supposed, with regard to solids and liq justified at that date (early in the forties) in ma tion with regard to gases. Looking back at the interval of nearly forty years, it does seem that T harshly dealt with, though in one or two cases not seek to conciliate his opponents.

In the lecture-room Tait was seen to great listening to his concise and lucid expositions forget that his clothes were not exactly in th and that his gown was very badly torn behind ( new one, however, when ladies began to attend the fact that he always started with a progra it, enabled his hearers to depart with some def their knowledge, provided that they did not wi opportunity. He was no believer in debanc experiments which merely appeal to one or r organs, but whatever was vital to the subject w
His name is not associated, like that of h Glasgow (Lord Kelvin), with any applicatio practice, or even with any improvement to experimental method. Yet, though only in deserving the appellation "great," Scotsmen w in reverence for generations to come, and the versity in particular will be fortunate if t successor who can worthily fill the place which

Two volumes of the collected Scientific Pa
Tait have been published by the Cambridge (1898 and 1900), and the third volume, com prove a fitting monument to his memory, is la papers were included by Professor Tait which sively his own. His work in conjunction wit was begun with "The Dynamics of a Particle," with Mr. W. J. Steele while he was still at B issued by Messrs. Macmillan in a seventh and The same publishers issue Kelland and Tait's " Quaternions" ; "The Unseen Universe," whic wrote in conjunction with Professor Balfour St fifteenth edition) ; Professor Tait's own volume the memoir of Dr. Andrews which he wrote in c Professor Crum Brown for "The Scientific P
Thomas Andrews." The first part of the "Tr Philosophy," written with Lord Kelvin, was Cambridge University Press thirty-four years ag following some years later. The "Elements o sophy," by the same authors, also came from Press. Professor Tait's "Sketch of Thermody lished by Douglas, of Edinburgh, in a sec enlarged edition ; while Messrs. Black are the volumes on "Light" and "Dynamics." His oth
"Thermo-Dynamics" (1868), "Recent Adva
Science" (1876), "Light" (1884), and "T
Philosophy"—the second volume which he wro Balfour Stewart on the possibility of recon religion.

Two Scottish minor poets of some note hav past few days Mr. Laurance James Nicolso Thule") and Mr. William Scott. Mr. Ni early years in the Shetlands, and his "So

PROPHECY AND INVENTION.*

There is a close relationship between invention and prophecy. Mr. Sutherland has emphasized it by employing his experience of inventors and past inventions in formulating a forecast of the outcome of invention in the twentieth century.

It is a question whether the prophet is not essential to the success of the future inventor. He may be guilty of errors, yet he educates the mind of the generation to receive the propositions of the inventor. Even in the enlightened twentieth century there is a tendency to assume that we have reached finality in many things. Consequently, any startling proposal made by a present-day genius is flouted. His adjudicators apply the non possumus test of their own beliefs, inclinations, and experience, and pass judgment unhesitatingly. They smile when reminded that members of the House of Commons scoffed at the inventor of gas because of his audacity in even suggesting the production of a light without a wick. There is room for more literature of the quasi-prophetic class, if provided by capable men. Jules Verne was one of the pioneers, and his forecasts have not only been realized with astonishing fidelity, but actually surpassed—as witness the recent passage of a letter round the world in much less time than even this daring prophet predicted. We have probably only just entered upon an age of comparative wonders; and we must learn and profit by the hindrances which ignorance has been allowed to create in the past. Inventive progress during this century will certainly effect great social changes, and bring many half-solved industrial problems to practical perfection. The prophet will not only stimulate the imagination of the inventor, but widen the conception of the public. Random and groundless prophecy on the lines of the vulgar almanacs is of course reprehensible, as pandering to the ignorant. What we want is an intelligent projection of ideas as to the future which, although essentially mere ideas, yet originate from an imagination checked by a reasonable perspective of probabilities and a careful rejection of mere fanciful possibilities.

We differ on some points of detail from Mr. Sutherland, but his forecast is of undoubted value. His chapters on natural and artificial power and on the storage of the former are excellent, full of sound ideas. However much the production of steam power may be cheapened, there is no gainsaying the fact that power which costs nothing at all is cheaper still. He foresees that the success of many inventions depends on suitable conditions, but he is apt to forget this maxim when he discredits certain possibilities in the development of our power supplies. On the other hand, some of the prospects he foreshadows in the advancement of agriculture must be discounted, because of the total lack of suitable environment. Farmers are not chemists as yet, unfortunately, and even the rising generation will be deficient in this respect.

Much of the chapter on future road and rail developments treats more on municipal reform than invention, and the opinions expressed as to the future influence of automotors on railways are rather contradictory. If the automobile is, as Mr. Sutherland says, to be a feeder to, rather than a rival of, the railway, it can scarcely be expected to "force the owners of railways into a more adaptive mood" by its competitive influence. His remarks generally about automobiles savour of suspended judgment, and the chapters on warfare, domestic developments, and music are of a very general nature. There is a tendency to belittle the future of flying-machines and balloons, but the stated grounds for so doing are reasonable.

The last chapter on invention and collectivism exposes risk a step in favour of one that might implicate i slightest degree, by any shortcoming. Yet how inventions prove wholly perfect in practice at first!

to mind another need—the need of capable experts.
much a man's eminence as the quality of his kn should carry weight in selecting experts. Men acq vast experience are indeed often possessed of a detailed knowledge but that is all. Their exper vast; it is, rather, intensely minute. Masters of often far from being the best men to decide large yet we employ them. Impartiality is also a most e largely "obscured," credential.

There are, in fact, many lessons in Mr. Sutherland both for the public, for the official, and for the pat latter is prone to be too grossly, and will so unwisdom of attempting to claim too much in a rambling patent.

As far as can be judged, the cheapening in the present century will tend towards dese Power will be brought within the reach of a either by cheaper means for utilizing natu
in a humble fashion, or by a widespread supp power in the convenient form of electricity, compress
This will be generated at large central power stat will be able to produce at low cost, and dist fitably in small quantities. Automobile traffic activity in isolated places, just as the railway remote counties and districts of the United Kin thus help local manufacturers to reach their own markets. The tendency of to-day is to spec most inventors will probably seek to provide for wants. The epoch marking inventions will be based for rendering waste energy available and for capt power of waterfalls, of the waves, and of the wind.
thus gained they will render constant and controllab will secure its direct application to the small require individual. There will be hundreds of detailed devi cuting the drudgeries of life by means of mechanica human power; as, for instance, boot and knife cle breaking and carrying, chaff-cutting, lawn mowing, ing, wringing, mangling, churning, potato cleaning like tasks. The dressmaker's sewing-machine, co riveter, the grocer's coffee-grinder, and general automatic weighing machine will be worked by pow the bootmaker's pneumatic hammer, the joiner's ham driver, plane, and saw; the local printer's pres press; the revolving brush in lieu of doormats; th newspaper kiosk; the gas-heated rotary ironer; th staircase, and many other small labour-saving m these will engage the attention of those who wi wholesale inventions. The present century will ass its awe-inspiring developments. But there will also arise countless minor resultant inventions (of res nevertheless great utility), which will pervade fication of industry and home-life. What the social be it is very difficult as yet to foresee; but the emar
the labourer will certainly bring new developments, the changes effected by the introduction of steam p opening of the nineteenth century. In the early days century, invention gradually triumphed over the insurmountable difficulties of riots and preju history will to some extent have to be repeated in t upon which we have just entered.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

AUTHORITY IN TASTE.

LIFE IN POETRY: LAW IN TASTE. Two Series of Lectures Delivered in Oxford, 1895-1900. By WILLIAM JOHN COURTHOPE, C.B., M.A. (Macmillan. 10s. n.)

These lectures, which were delivered by their author in his capacity of Professor of Poetry at Oxford, may justly be pronounced worthy of the character and traditions of the honoured Chair from which they proceeded. Dealing as they do with questions lying at the root of all poetic and critical activity, they inevitably provoke discussion and controversy; and many of the dependent conclusions which they draw might be debated at a length proportionate to their introduction. We would not be understood to endorse all Professor Courthope's judgments, nor to follow him implicitly into every by-way of his argument. But for the general tone of his criticism and the wider conduct of his theme we have nothing but admiration and respect. A volume of this sort, based upon sound and broad erudition, and illuminated everywhere by vigorous and sensitive judgment, is a distinction to contemporary criticism, and an honour to that reverend University which has done more than any other English institution to cultivate taste and disseminate culture. So long as works of this high and dignified order are associated with the spirit of our Universities, there is no cause to apprehend the decay or dissolution of English literary criticism.

Professor Courthope, it is true, is rather erudite and thorough than animated and persuasive; his style has very little charm or elasticity. Nor is it marked by individuality; we seldom meet with that felicity of conveying which is characteristic of the highest form of literary expression. His lectures contain none of those striking and coloured sentences which give to Arnold's lectures, for example, their recurring and abiding qualities of charm. He is not without the foible of repetition which is common to all literature designed primarily for oral delivery; but his repetitions fail to secure those changes of note and implication which fill the "Lectures on Translating Homer" with witty diversity. Professor Courthope's effects are rather logical than dialectic, and some of his arguments must have been difficult to follow at a single hearing. They are not, indeed, altogether plain at a single reading, for the workmanship is not free from congestion, a fault which alternates curiously in his composition with passages of diffuseness and over-elaboration. In this way the central idea is sometimes obscured by cross-references, and the issues are thus temporarily confused. But the careful student—and criticism of this order makes its appeal exclusively to care and culture—will find that all these illustrations tend eventually to the decoration of the theme and to the completion of the argument. It is merely part of the Professor's thorough-going method that no subsidiary example should be neglected.

What oft was thought but ne'er so well expressed,

So much, in brief, for Professor Courthope's manner; the matter of his lectures calls for more detailed consideration. Every one who has studied contemporary literary movements is aware that the great danger under which literature has laboured during the last thirty or forty years is the tendency towards democratization which has resulted from the gradual spreading of theories of individual liberty and licence. As the individual becomes more and more a law to himself in social and religious the universal tendency? For, as Professor C sses, there must be some conformity; art c itself from life without losing its hold upon the l

All the great art of the past has been represent of its generation, but at the same time it has strained contemporary tendencies by reference of authority. In these two series of lectures, " and "Law in Taste," Mr. Courthope has set h the history of the past and to apply it to the the present, and in both processes he is concern tion of poetry to life and the counter-regulation

Naturally he starts with a definition of poetr his definition lays itself open to question and There have been innumerable definitions of poet them has satisfied all inquiries; Mr. Courthop scarcely supply their deficiencies. "Poetry," art which produces pleasure for the imaginat human actions, thoughts, and passions in me
One sees, of course, what the Professor means, definition it will not hold water. The ques suggests itself—What sort of pleasure, and imagination? We will not quibble over the which, employed in the wider Aristotelian functions of poetry very fairly; but it might j a music-hall song by a "lion comique" prod imitating human actions in metrical langua formance of this sort would hardly comply w cultivated man's sense of poetry! Perhaps w only an adjective. "Poetry produces a nobl pleasure for a cultured imagination by imitatin thoughts, and passions in metrical language indeed, serve; though still open to controvers

From this point the lecturer proceeds to a fashion in which this pleasure is produced, and believe very justly, that it is produced by a c individual and universal elements in thought a poetry must present a universal truth from a of view; and the wider the generalization, the intensity of its personal appeal, the more p of poetry which animates the thought. It follo poetry must always be testing its own emotion contending interests—the individuality of the universality of the thought. When he comes tinction through the history of poetry Profess pands his thesis by means of a number of illustrations. He shows how the classical p through the universality of their attitude, whi of every age have decayed through the n interest to ephemeral sentiments. And when his test to certain modern literary developm ticular to the poetry of Mr. Rudyard Kipling, criticism with a judgment which is not ofte
the consideration of contemporaries. The wh of the volume is full of sane and penetrating a

In passing to the consideration of law more directly historical survey of the infl affected poetry from without. We pass, i intrinsic to the extrinsic influences, and Mr.
show that here, too, the standard of authori usage has alone preserved what was worthy o the roll of poetry unfolds itself, we see the in character continually beating their wings, as i law of universal taste; and the poetry wh

PIERRE LOTI.

From the Original Painting by Lily-Dhurm

experience. The only surrender of liberty demanded from the individual taste is, in the first place, the suspension of judgment till the æsthetic perception has been justly trained; and, in the second place, a submission of the intellect, in the early stages of its schooling, to the judgment of the world on the works of art deemed most worthy of admiration. When the judging faculty has been disciplined to view things in all their bearings, and has become robust and mature, the mind resumes its native liberty, and is free to revise its early decisions. Such is the course of what has been well called Humanism in Education.

This seems to us to be admirably and lucidly said, and it lies at the root of all discriminating criticism. Indeed, the thesis of this whole volume, with its frequent reference of individual taste to universal authority, is one that can scarcely be insisted upon too firmly at the present time, when so much that is called "criticism" lies in the hands of writers who are not too careful to subject their own preferences to any sort of standard of judgment, and who turn the "perfect law of liberty" into a laughing-stock by the exercise of untutored enthusiasm in the proclamation of foolish predilections. We are often told that contemporary criticism is in a state of decadence, but that is a view which we ourselves are not for a moment disposed to accept. Criticism will always be the occupation of the few, and it is entirely vain to expect to find it flourishing in every stray corner in which literature may be written or gossiped about. But that by the few it is being sincerely and strenuously cultivated the literary activity of the last few years has abundantly testified; and Professor Courthope's sound and dignified volume is further evidence of its healthy survival. We can only hope that it may be as widely read as its merits deserve, for the diffusion of the taste which it advocates can scarcely fail to benefit every side of contemporary literature.

LITERATURE AND LAKE LEMAN.

No provincial city in Europe, and by the nature of the Republic all Swiss cities are provincial, is half so rich in literary associations as Geneva, and Mr. Francis Gribble may congratulate himself on being the first to see the opening for a popularly written book on its native worthies and its visitors. In LAKE GENEVA AND ITS LITERARY LANDMARKS (Constable and Co., 18s.), which deals with almost every name of revolutionary importance during the two great periods of European revolution, he has produced what many, to whom Geneva and its lake are not merely geographical expressions, have long desired in vain. It should take a high rank in that newer class of guide-book which seeks to make history something more than dry bones and dead conclusions. For Mr. Gribble real life is sufficiently romantic. Bonivard may now appeal from the tyranny of tradition to the test of reality and be no less remarkable, if more wonderfully human, than when he was merely a poetic stalking-horse for Lord Byron. The real Bonivard appears as a kind of lay prior whose love of the table was his only conventual attribute, and whose four marriages do not detract from our opinion of him as a good patriot who could think of other things than his country.

In his treatment of Calvin, the religious father of the Genevese, Mr. Gribble has made that theological tyrant interesting even to those whose artistic bent is naturally alien from his iron creed and rigid methods of rule. Perhaps Mr. Gribble insists rather too much on the small size of Geneva in Calvin's great work, outside of his theories of gov[illegible] was organizing Geneva as an armed camp under th[illegible] discipline. Even international jealousies only hel[illegible] help themselves. He was, in fact, a theologically-min[illegible] Marshal. It is no less clear that Calvin shed no tea[illegible] bited no vain and tardy remorse over the burning [illegible] He was no doubt a great man. He was hardly in [illegible] sense of the word a good one; he was without any se[illegible]

But though Geneva is essentially a city of relig[illegible] its chief appeal to notice is as a literary and revolut[illegible] As it has given shelter of late in times of which M[illegible] minded to keep his task within reasonable limit[illegible] written—to Vera Zassulic and Prince Kropotkin, so [illegible] refuge to all those who found their rulers dangero[illegible] moral environment asphyxiating. It became th[illegible] expatriated prophets, not a few of whom might ha[illegible] more obscure if they had stayed in their own coun[illegible] as is natural, when one has to deal with the wanderi[illegible] literature, the district has a characteristic crop of le[illegible] which Mr. Gribble does ample justice. He does am[illegible] too, to Jean Jacques Rousseau, whose mental by[illegible] appears nowadays not a little sickening. Mr. Gribbl[illegible] lies in a kind of ironic iconoclasm. He depicts Ro[illegible] the picture is an interesting and, we may add, a us[illegible] an excitable and sentimental mountebank, whose [illegible] never prevented him lying and whose decency was [illegible] by its utter absence—the classic example of the ent[illegible] of a gentleman. But though the writer, as we thi[illegible] absolves Madame de Warens from the aspersions of t[illegible] ful protégé who took her money, he clears her moral [illegible] the expense of her commercial integrity. She ap[illegible] rôle of a bankrupt absconding, not even with her own [illegible] with the plate and linen of her husband. At any rate [illegible] spoil the story to have it explained in lucid and iron[illegible]

Curchod can hardly command admiration, but without this coldness of passion we might have missed "The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire." To quote from the book where it deals with these lovers when they met in later years :—

> The regrets, we may take it, were tempered by the lurking consciousness that things were really better as they are. The lovers must have known that, if they had married on nothing, the one would never have written his history and the other would never have had her salon, but they would have been just two struggling nonentities whom the world would never have heard of. They must have felt, too, that the success in life which they had achieved separately, but could not possibly have achieved together, had meant much to them; that in winning it they had fulfilled their destinies, that their temper would have been soured if they had had to live without it. All this they must have admitted to themselves, and even, in their most candid moments, to each other. And yet—and yet!—

No less human, if rather more calculated to furnish grounds for satire, is the story retold of the unphilosophic philosopher and philanderer Benjamin Constant in his relations with the exigent Madame de Stael, the undiscriminating daughter of a more beautiful and more discreet mother. At the last we are left in no doubt that Madame de Stael is only acting to save appearances; that her heart is with the young and gallant Albert de Rocca rather than with the man whose departure, she avers, will drive her to suicide. But Mr. Gribble fails to make it clear that it was at this time that Constant was ready to woo, by heavenly or diabolic means, the favour of Madame Récamier, and that Madame Dutertre, who had become his by means calculated in England to excite the intervention of the King's Proctor, had held him only for a season. And what became of Charlotte Dutertre? It is a point of interest.

In such a book it is obvious that the writer must make a selection. Mr. Gribble, on the whole, has made his with discrimination. Yet we miss references to some celebrities of Genevan origin—to Mulhauser, the poet, to Ezechiel Spanheim, to De Candolle, or even, in any detail, to François Huber. This is the more noticeable because Marie Huber, whose success in setting theologians by the ears affords Mr. Gribble some not unnatural pleasure, was the great aunt of the man whose observations on bees, made, after he became blind, through the eyes of his wife, formed the first standard work on that subject. Taking the book as a whole, it would be difficult to praise Mr. Gribble's style too highly. It is entirely lucid, sympathetic, and modest, and he has the gift of irony. There is nothing in the book which is not interesting.

THEOLOGY.

Ritschlianism.

There has been of late much discussion of the Ritschlian Theology. Mr. Garvie's careful exposition of it was noticed in these columns some time ago. We are, therefore, glad to see an English version of Ritschl's chief constructive work, his celebrated exposition of the Christian doctrine of the atonement, JUSTIFICATION AND RECONCILIATION, translated and edited by H. Mackintosh and A. B. Macaulay (T. and T. Clark, 14s.). The third volume of the "Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung" is far the most important of Ritschl's works for those who would understand his doctrine of the Person of Christ and its significance for as Mediator and Saviour. Ritschlianism will become widely popular among English-speakin though in some respects it does respond to t tendencies of the day—the despondency which ha by the aggressions of criticism and the weariness of troversies. The work of translation has been executed, and to Messrs. Mackintosh and Mac students are indebted for bringing within their re piece of theological thought.

A great part of IS CHRIST INFALLIBLE AND TH by the Rev. Hugh Mcintosh, M.A. (T. and T. taken up with criticism of recent writers on " and of the Ritschlian school, which the auth attacks. "It is a palpable perversion of facts, a misnomer," he says, "to call this mongrel sys It would be nearer the truth to call it anti-Ch not only eliminates or evaporates the distinct elements of the Christian religion, but it openly of them and teaches the opposite." It is not, hov ascertain Mr. McIntosh's own actual teaching place of the Bible in the system of Christianit apparently with equal approval writers so opp other as Prof. Robertson Smith and Dr. Liddon, surprising that a follower of Prof. Robertson Smit the existence of degrees in inspiration—a theory " is rampant in Jewish jargon and Rabbinical lo theology, and modern Rationalism." Mr. McInto is too lengthy to be effective; one's patience is by his cumbrous style and somewhat tasteless rh over, there is something very weak and petulant on distinguished theologians from whom he hap The absence of an index is a serious defect in treatise.

The Christian Social Union.

SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT UNDER CHRISTIAN INF Rev. M. Kaufmann, M.A. (Kegan Paul, 3s. 6d.), Donnellan lectures delivered before the Universit 1899 to 1900. Mr. Kaufmann discusses from the poi "Christian Socialist" the influence in the past an influence in the future of Christianity in the evolut He is an able thinker and a lucid writer. It is pe that he should discount the influence of the intel and social forces which have little connexion wi the complexity of the influences at work. But m siderations expressed by Mr. Kaufmann will rea themselves to the reader. The Christian theory of spiritual equality as, e.g., set forth by St. Paul, consistently, would no doubt solve many problem life. The question to be settled is whether the C embodies the Christian spirit and is capable of d justly expected of her.

The teaching of the Christian Social Union sented in THE CHURCH AND NEW CENTURY PR Gardner, Darton, 3s. 6d.), a series of lectures a Tufnell-park. The contributors are the Bisho Canon Scott Holland, Canon Gore, Canon Bar and one or two others. They deal with actual q day such as the Empire, the State, the Munic crowding and Housing, the Temperance Questi lectures are not of equal merit, but they will all perusal—whether we turn to Dr. Westcott, who Catholic Church is the chief embodiment of the Im Mr. Chandler, who discusses practical remedies has not adopted the chronological order in describing the New Testament writings. The only complaint, however, that can be made against the book is that the writer indulges too freely in a certain "causticity" of style. He says, for example, that "when Luther called the Epistle to the Galatians his 'wife' and called the Epistle to St. James (sic) an 'Epistle of straw' he simply showed that he understood neither." There seems something misleading, too, in the blunt term "forgery" when applied to what Professor Deissmann rightly calls the "pseudonymous epistolography" which was a common feature of post-classical literature. Mr. Pullan's critical views will be understood if we mention that he energetically defends the Johannine authorship of the Fourth Gospel, and assigns its composition to the date 80-90 A.D. We cannot think, by the way, that he adequately discusses the subjective element which even moderate critics recognize in the Gospel. Mr. Pullan's vindication of the Pauline authorship of the Pastoral Epistles is vigorous and trenchant. On the whole, he does not quite do himself justice as a critic. He dismisses so briefly, and sometimes so contemptuously, opinions opposed to his own that he conveys the impression of having not studied them with sufficient care. Such an impression, we are sure, would not be fair, but Mr. Pullan does not take pains to obviate it.

English theologians will welcome the translation by Mr. Alex. Grieve of Dr. Deissmann's BIBLE STUDIES (T. and T. Clark, 9s.), the more so because the author acknowledges that English scholars have taken a leading part in discovering and utilizing the Papyri and Inscriptions on which the studies are based. Most of the volume is taken up with brief notes on different words, forms, and phrases in the Greek Bible, on names of Biblical persons, &c. There is a short and interesting paper on "Greek Transcriptions of the Tetragrammaton"; but the best essay is the first in the volume, entitled "Prolegomena to the Biblical Letters and Epistles." From a literary point of view this paper is well worth studying. Dr. Deissmann distinguishes between the "letter" properly so called, which only "becomes literature by means of its publication," and the letter "published professedly as literature"—i.e., the "epistle." As to the Pauline Epistles, he decides that "the authentic writings of the Apostle are true letters, and that to think of them as epistles is to take away what is best in them." St. Paul, he says, had no idea of writing "scripture"; he had no thought of the position his words would occupy in sacred literature; "he wrote letters, real letters, as did Aristotle and Cicero, as did the men and women of the Fayyûm." On the other hand, "Hebrews" may be classed as an Epistle; as also may most of the "Catholic Epistles." Professor Deissmann concludes that "The beginnings of Christian literature are really the beginnings of the secularization of Christianity. . . . The Church, as a factor in history . . . required literature, and hence it made literature, and made books out of letters." The author evidently regards the study of the Septuagint as in a backward state, and he anticipates very fruitful results from closer investigation of the Greek of the Old Testament.

The first two chapters of Dr. Eberhard Nestle's INTRODUCTION TO THE TEXTUAL CRITICISM OF THE GREEK NEW TESTAMENT, translated from the second edition by Mr. W. Edie and edited by Dr. Allan Menzies, D.D., London, 1901 (Williams and Norgate, 10s. 6d.), give a clear and readable account, first, of the facts connected with the history of the printed text of the New Testament; secondly, of the materials with which textual by a series of critical notes on various passages Testament. There are also ten plates at the end, some of the more important codices. The book is li the field as the standard work on textual criticism fo to come, and it is a serviceable addition to the " Translation Library," of which it forms a part.

The Resurrection.

In THE RISEN MASTER (Deighton Bell, 6s. 6 marked by originality of thought, spirituality of to charm of a literary style, the Master of Trinity Hall, the Rev. Henry Latham, urges the view that the m of Christ passed into the spiritual body "simply away." With the "erudita inscitia" of a student he argument on the position of the grave-clothes. body was not stolen he contends from the words of Evangelist, which depict the linen clothes as lying f napkin rolled up in a place by itself and "partiall the angular form thus given it." A thief would have the clothes or carried them away. He discards the angelic agency (in fact he seems to suggest that th angels were young white-robed Essenes), and he point whilst the conduct of Mary Magdalene shows that she t the body had been taken away, the behaviour Apostles when they left the grave favours the suppo they believed Christ had left the world and assumed form. The argument is ingenious, if rather strained prefer to dwell upon such fine chapters as Mr. Lath on the "Journey to Emmaus" and the "uncertainty o

Dr. Lyman Abbott.

Dr. Lyman Abbott is a convinced and enthusiast of the modern school of Biblical interpretation, and AND LITERATURE OF THE ANCIENT HEBREWS (J. Cl written to show that the conclusions of scientific "enhance the value of the Bible as an instrument fo vation of the spiritual faith." He had already in position in "The Theology of an Evolutionist." He with the Old Testament in detail, treating it mainly of religious experiences." Dr. Abbott is well up in ture of his subject, he writes clearly and forcibly, and with uniform respect of traditional views. The most chapter is that which deals with "Hebrew History." of clear, strong, sensible teaching. Especially valua distinction drawn between "truth" and "fact" Abbott says, "Ignoring that difference has invo students in needless perplexity." One passage is wor as showing the spirit in which the book is written :—

> The value of the history does not depend upon it accuracy in detailed incidents in this remote p question to consider is whether the historian is righ in his interpretation of human history, whether Go world of men, whether Jehovah is to be reckon national policies, whether moral forces are to be tak of by wise men in the world's administration, or whe makes right, and God is only on the side of battalions.

The New Century Bible.

ST. MATTHEW, edited with introduction by P Slater (T. C. and E. C. Jack, 2s.), is the first volum New Century Bible," and has been followed by two oth on St. Luke and St. John. The series promises to notes are brief, useful, and to the point, though not always impartial. Thus the editor assumes in his note on Matt. i., 25, that the "Brethren of the Lord" were uterine brethren. From this and other annotations he would seem to have little sympathy with the ordinary beliefs of Churchmen. The series is in fact avowedly "undenominational," but it marks a real effort to popularize the results of recent research.

THE PREACHER'S DICTIONARY, by the Rev. E. F. Cavalier (Hodder and Stoughton, 12s.), is meant to supply preachers with subjects and thoughts for their sermons. We have a list of topics, theological, ethical, and social. Mr. Cavalier gives a definition of the word, a summary of the Biblical teaching on the matter in question, and a number of quotations. An undoubtedly useful publication.

BIBLE CHARACTERS, JOSEPH AND MARY TO JAMES, by Dr. Alexander Whyte (Oliphant, Anderson, and Ferrier, 3s. 6d.), will no doubt be popular among a certain section of religious people. Dr. Whyte speaks with authority—he seems to know much more about his characters than most of us do—and his sketches are eminently lively. Chacun à son goût. To us it does not seem very helpful to speak of our Lord as shaking hands with Nicodemus "just as the cock was crowing in Martha's garden"—by the way how does Dr. Whyte know that Nicodemus had any acquaintance with John the Baptist?—or of Salome's "splendid impudence" and her "stupid heart?" "The holy curiosity" which the eloquent minister of Free St. George's attempts to gratify in his discourses on "Pilate's wife," St. James, the "brother of the Lord," and elsewhere seems to us perilously akin to the inquisitiveness to which our "society journals" minister from week to week.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Military Biographies.

THE LIFE, LETTERS, AND DIARIES OF LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SIR GERALD GRAHAM, V.C., G.C.B., by Colonel R. H. Vetch, C.B. (Blackwood, 21s.), is one of those biographies which it is equally difficult to praise and to find fault with. Sir Gerald Graham was a very brave man and a very capable officer. But his career was not particularly eventful, and though we should imagine that he was a charming man to know and to serve under, he never captivated the popular imagination to such a degree as to justify a biography of the bulk of the one before us. His letters are very much like other people's letters, and his diary is not very different from other people's diaries. The most interesting pages are those which give us glimpses of General Gordon, who was "Charlie" Gordon to Sir Gerald Graham. It is certainly of interest to see it noted that the subsequent hero of Khartum has "sobered down into a more reflective character"; and this gives a picturesque impression of Gordon's masterfulness. The time is when Gordon was passing through Egypt to the Sudan:—

> After breakfast Gordon sent for the Sultan and his brothers, treating them with civility, but as inferiors and with no ceremony, telling them to sit down, and dismissing them when done with. He talked Arabic utterly regardless of grammar, as he does French, but he rarely seems at a loss for a word—when he is he refers to his interpreter—and he always seems to make himself understood. He told the Sultan not to go about in his uniform and finery until he the Sappers, whose duty it was to lay the p across the wet ditch surrounding the great While superintending this operation he was on h being almost the only mounted officer prese easy mark to the Chinese matchlockmen, whe picked off fifteen of his Sappers. During the heigh caused by the fire of the great guns and smal Colonel Wolseley, who was standing by Major G some remark to make, placed his hand on that to draw his attention. "Don't put your exclaimed Graham, wincing under the pain, gingal-ball lodged in my leg." It was the first taken of the wound.

On the whole the book is well put together, thou much of it, and a good deal of it is trivial.

Colonel C. F. V. Townshend's MILITARY L MARSHAL GEORGE, FIRST MARQUESS TOWNSHEND is unquestionably a book of some value to the m and supplements in some important respects t Dunlop in the "Dictionary of National Biograp lishes Lord Townshend's share in the actions at Fontenoy, his service in Germany in 1761, an in 1762. Colonel Townshend has made a caref battles in which his ancestor was enga the capture of Quebec, at which, afte of Wolfe, Lord Townshend was in se He extracts from the Townshend MS. all the in able, some of which is new, and gives us in full attack made on the general on his return from reply to it. It is, however, hardly a new di author implies in his preface, that the plan by wh taken was not the plan of Wolfe. Apart from t is thrown on certain military operations by the book pretends to no value. Of Townshend's gather very little; we do not even learn that h turist; and though avowedly avoiding the poli hero, Colonel Townshend is not afraid to make assertion that "while Lord Lieutenant of I wisely, with a deep appreciation of the rights the people whom the King had placed unde Colonel Townshend addresses himself to the pol first Marquess, which is perhaps historically m he will find it necessary to study other auth Townshend MS.

Probably we are all more ready now to regar Mutiny as a much maligned man than his biog Few believe that ancient calumny of the falsificat when in command of the Guides. Major Reynel should have exploded that fallacy, if such fall ploded, years ago. The wonder is, not that the corps should have been somewhat confused, but t officer, taking over the command of a regiment ployed in detachments on active service (the s having to be paid by the various officers to w temporarily lent), should have been able to keep the main sound and correct. What with Hodson the carelessness of his predecessor, and the r important work thrown suddenly upon his hands, have been surprising if his numerous en covered some serious discrepancies. But Hodson's memory—that he met his death while searching for loot—it is disposed of here by a mass of evidence that should convince the most sceptical. The main facts of Hodson's adventurous career are well known. He was at Rugby under Arnold, for whom he retained to the last a generous admiration. His reputation in after years as a gallant and dashing soldier surprised some of his Rugbeian contemporaries not a little, for he does not seem to have taken kindly to the football "scrimmage" then in vogue. Yet he retained some renown as a runner, and was even then remarkable for his powers of endurance. From Rugby he went to Trinity, Cambridge, where he took his B.A. degree in the spring of 1844. At one time he had thought of studying for the Bar, and on leaving Cambridge he was already too old to obtain a cadetship in the Company's service by the ordinary means. It became necessary for him to pass through a Militia regiment, and a commission was obtained in the Guernsey Militia from General Sir William Napier. He was actually twenty-three years old when he saw himself enrolled as an infantry cadet on the Bengal Establishment. He died within a week of entering on his thirty-eighth year, having crowded into that short space of time as much work as most men contrive to get through in the course of a lifetime. He was buried in the garden of the Martinière, on the evening of March 12, 1858. "At the moment when his remains were lowered into the grave Sir Colin Campbell himself burst into tears over the loss of one of the finest officers in the Army—the man whom Robert Napier was proud to call friend, to whom Montgomery could find no equal for his rare combination of talent, courage, coolness, and unerring judgment." The subject of this eulogy died a brevet-major. Few men have won this honour, before or since, more hardly than Hodson of Hodson's Horse.

Australasia.

A continuous residence of nearly forty years in Australasia has convinced Mr. Grattan Grey, the author of AUSTRALASIA, OLD AND NEW (Holder and Stoughton, 7s. 6d.), that Imperial Federation will come to nothing, and that Australia will be independent before the century ends. This is prophecy a long time ahead; its value depends a good deal on the newness of Mr. Grey's acquaintance with Australasia. There is no country with which an absentee sooner loses touch, and the last two years especially have so transformed Australian ideals and feelings as to make the witness of men who came home before 1898 or so comparatively irrelevant. Meanwhile, forty years of active journalism "under Austral skies" have left their mark on this book in other ways. They have filled it with the loose grammar, the cant phrases, and the slipshod information that flourish in minor journalism. As one turns over the pages and comes upon one after another of the long-ago corrected myths, Cook's knowledge of "enormous resources" in the interior, the squatter's fifty years' concealment of the fact that gold was to be found in payable quantities, the autochthonous origin and Malthusian rites of the blackfellows—to name three at random—as one reads that in Aust alia there is "no bourgeoisie to look down in its turn upon those who are inferior to them in social position or wealth" (a statement flatly contradicted within two pages), or that federation "will do all that a people imbued with the true sentiments and aspirations of nationality are capable of accomplishing," one recognizes familiar strains from the Buckabidgee Daily Times and Goondiwindi Clarion. And one cannot help wishing that the author's eyes and ears had been as active as his journalism; that he had spared time from the com-sources" that vitiate other books. As a global-trott this might have passed muster; as a specialist's—and claim made for it—it deserves severe criticism.

The Annual Register.

Year by year THE ANNUAL REGISTER (Longm preserves its original features, and improves upon the which they are presented to the reader. The "English section of the volume for the year 1900 is excellent although it might have been more accurately printe space of a short review it would be difficult to indicat value and wide scope of the references to hundre events which this section places side by side with th "sensations" of the year. The annals of our colonies with under the general page-heading of "Foreign (the heading of the whole of the section is "Foreign an History," and there is room for this at the top of t and in connexion with them such a mistake as that n name of Mr. Olivier, of the Colonial Office and Jamai be avoided. We suppose that any change in the form of the index would be resented by those who accustomed to use its clearly-printed peculiarities years, but it can hardly be maintained that a system o which gives "Postmen's Park opened" as a sepa (under its first word) and then leaves a busy man to "Bermuda" is indexed under "West Indies," satisfactory. The chronological "Chronicle" is full information, excellently arranged, but some one, p printer, seems to have taken too little pains with it and punctuation. The section devoted to the "Liter 1900 gives due prominence to such diverse books as M "Oliver Cromwell" and Mr. Weathers' invaluable "Guide to Garden Plants," an exhaustive volume which to be obscured from public notice by less importa "Science of the Year" is also a useful portion o We can give especial praise to the sub-section "Ph In the summary of events connected with "Art, D Music" it may perhaps be considered that the Drama is good, the Art portion better, and the Music po The "Obituary of Eminent Persons Deceased" is ve well put together; the number of names dealt wit excessively large. More space might have been g advantage, to such distinguished persons as Dr. H. D. Mr. R. D. Blackmore, and less notice taken of Oscar sundry hymn writers, not to say foreign profess permissible to grumble that it requires a quarter o toil with a sharp paper-knife to open up the resources Annual Register," but this labour is amply repai consideration of the fact that a reader can look forwar dismay to times of great hunger and thirst afte political, historical, and sociological information. Th volume of "The Annual Register" is certainly w more than the price asked for it.

A Vade Mecum Indexed.

Useful as are the fourteen volumes of BOOK PRICE to the bibliophile, it is a laborious undertaking through the index of each in quest of detail a particular work. The appearance of a general Index t ten issues, 1887-96 (Elliot Stock, 21s.), is, then, a welc Short of an exhaustive subject as well as author-ind would have involved, as responsible officials at any gr can testify, a vast amount of additional work, we coul been utilized in order that entries may be perfectly clear, and the chronological arrangement under each head is the best possible. In subsequent issues, although we are aware that this hardly comes within the scope of an index, the libraries to which belonged monumental works, like the three Mazarin Bibles sold between 1887 and 1891, might with advantage be indicated, the more so as space on the lines permits. It may be noted that the two men of letters who died quite recently, are both represented, Mr. Robert Buchanan by the "Fleshly School of Poetry," Sir Walter Besant by his "Eulogy of Richard Jefferies" and "French Humorists."

We are glad to see that Mr. Warwick H. Draper's ALFRED THE GREAT (Elliot Stock) has reached a second edition. So far as we have observed it seems the best of the books so far produced with a view of the approaching millenary celebrations.

Mr. Nigel Oliphant enlisted in the Scots Greys, was transferred to the Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders, rose to be lance-corporal, and bought himself out in order to be free to accept an appointment offered to him in the Chinese Postal Service. Hence he was in Peking when the trouble came, and now we have his DIARY OF THE SIEGE OF THE LEGATIONS IN PEKING (Longmans, 5s. n.), with a preface by Mr. Andrew Lang. Mr. Lang is principally concerned to tell us that Mr. Nigel Oliphant is a golfer—a statement which leaves us cold. The book itself covers the ground in a straightforward, unpretentious manner, and has some maps and plans. There are some new facts about the mining operations of the Chinese, who had actually tunnelled underneath the Chinese quarters, and had sixteen large cases of powder in their mine ready to be exploded. As regards the Forbidden City Mr. Oliphant maintains that "it would have been far better if at the very first the Generals had burnt the whole place to the ground, and then asked for instructions from home afterwards."

In the case of THE FATHER OF ST. KILDA, by Roderick Campbell (Russell, 6s.), the relation of the title to the contents is not very clear. The book is a record of a life passed in the service of the Hudson Bay Company. If it had been so written as to give practical information about the conditions and emoluments of that service, it would have been useful, but it principally consists of unsuccessful attempts at fine writing. Now and again, however, there is a good story; and this account of the manner in which the employés of the company arrange their marriages is amusing:—

> Our officials, when they wished to become Benedicts, often married Indian girls. Many, however, did not care to do so, and would petition the company to select wives for them and send them out by the next boat. Their wishes were, as a rule, complied with, and the selection was nearly always satisfactory. Among the archives of the company are found receipts from factors running thus:—"Received per Lapwing Jane Goody, as per invoice, in good trim"; and "Received per Osprey Matilda Timpins, returned per Lapwing as not being in accordance with description contained in invoice."

One paragraph of some length is reproduced from an article contributed, not very long ago, to our own columns by Mr. Robert Machray. We should have been more sensible of the compliment if Mr. Campbell had not neglected to make any acknowledgment of his indebtedness.

HOW TO INVEST AND HOW TO SPECULATE, by C. H. Thorne

FICTION.

FICTION FOR THE HOLIDA

We give below a selection from recent nove
a guide to our readers in their holiday reading

"The Hidden Model." By Mrs. Harrod. (Hei
"Cinders." By Helen Mathers. (Pearson, 6s.
"The Second Dandy Chater." By Tom Gallon. (
"Monsieur Beaucaire." By Booth Tarking 2s. 6d.). (Short and light).
"Pacifico." By John Randal. (Smith, Elder.) (An "Marna's Mutiny." By Mrs. Hugh Fraser. ( (In Japan).
"The Serious Wooing." By John Oliver Hobbe
"The Second Youth of Theodora Desanges." T
Mrs. Lynn Linton. (Hutchinson, 6s.).
"The Seal of Silence." By Arthur R. C Elder, 6s.).
"The Maid of Maiden Lane." By Amelia E Unwin, 6s.).
"Kitty's Victoria Cross." By Robert Cromie.
"The Mother of Emeralds." By Fergus Hu Blackett, 6s.).
"In His Own Image." By F. Baron Corvo. (
"My Son Richard." By Douglas Sladen. (
(A tale of the Thames.)
"Harlaw of Sendle." By J. W. Graham. (Bla
"Tangled Trinities." (Heinemann, 6s.). By M —"Daniel Woodroffe." (This is a powerful all readers or for a sunny afternoon.)
"His Familiar Foe." By E. Livingstone P Richards, 6s.).
"The Golden Wang-ho." By Fergus Hume. (Jo
"The Sin of Jasper Standish." By "Rita." (
"Anne Mainwaring." By Lady Ridley. (Lon
"In the Name of a Woman." By A. W. Mar mans, 6s.). (In the "Puritanian" style.).
"The Survivor." By E. Phillips Oppenheim. (
"The Warden of the Marches." By Sydney wood, 6s.). (On the Indian Frontier.)
"Rival Claimants." By Sarah Tytler. (Dig (Early days in North Carolina.)
"Our Friend the Charlatan." By George Gis and Hall, 6s.).

Devonshire stories are:—

"The Good Red Earth." By Eden Phillpotts. (Arr And "The White Cottage." By "Zack." (Co

Rome and Roman Catholicism are dealt with

"Frederic Uvedale." By E. Hutton. (Blackw And "Casting of Nets." By Richard Bagot. (

For Historical Novels readers may like

"My Lady of Orange." By H. C. Bailey. (Lo
"Prince Rupert the Buccaneer." By (Methuen, 6s.).
"Lysbeth." By H. Rider Haggard. (Longman
"A Forbidden Name." By Fred Whishaw. (Ch 6s.).

Ireland we get in

"The Lost Land." By Miss Crottie. (Fis (Towards the end of the eighteenth century
"My New Curate." By Father Sheehan. (
Dublin). (A quiet story of Roman Cath Irish village.)
"Mononia." By Justin McCarthy. (Chatto a (A story of Young Ireland).
"That Sweet Enemy." By Katharine Tynan. ( (Upper Irish Society.)

"The Profane Pipes."

To be modern, of the world worldly, to tell us of the people who, like the splendid butler in Mr. Grossmith's play, consider themselves of the innermost circle, is the agreeable mission of Mrs. Craigie, who does all these things and many others in her latest book. "People say that if you cannot have happiness lawfully, you mustn't take it unlawfully. But what about unlawful unhappiness?" is one of the pertinent questions that the newest of new heroines, Rosabel, the wife of Lord Shortclough, and the main figure in John Oliver Hobbes' novel, THE SERIOUS WOOING (Methuen, 6s.), likes to ask. But all the wits and worldlings of this entertaining volume cannot answer her impassioned cries in anything like a satisfactory fashion. After being married by her mamma to the Earl of Shortclough, who is spoken of as a cretin from the beginning; after falling in love with what one fancies Mrs. Craigie intends to be a terribly compelling person, the Socialistic Jocelyn Suttrel, and being dexterously jockeyed out of that affair by her mundane brother, Sir Courtenay Ragot, and her sister Carrie Ceppel; after another marriage and a final retreat on the Socialistic and a simple life in Nuremburg, Rosabel's questioning of the cosmos are, we fear, by no means ended. A beautiful Meredithian lady, so complex, so freely influenced by such a type of man as Suttrel (when they meet she feels a "nervous emanation which, like a wave seizing seaweed, caught up her heart and seemed uncertain where to fling it"), does not end her psychic adventure by journeying to the Continent with her beloved. This is the cause of discontent, we find, with Mrs. Craigie's brilliant and adroit book; she does not convince us in regard to the main idea; the incidents of Rosabel's revolt are interesting far above the common, but the conclusion of the matter is a little too like life, too commonplace to be perfect art. When this is said we have little but the warmest commendation for a "Serious Wooing." Despite its rather sentimental title—from a lady who has revolutionized the nomenclature of novels—the book is vigorous from the opening dialogue in Carrie's celebrated drawing room, which is said to have been copied from the music room called the Paradiso, designed by Mantegna and Costa for Isabella d'Este, to the last paragraph of philosophic Christianity. Rosabel is evidently a heroine after the author's own heart: she is treated with an amount of sympathy and earnestness that causes the reader to feel every thrill of her splendid physical nature. But she is a very "difficult" lady, and in regard to her passion for Jocelyn Suttrel one is a little inclined to take sides with her unscrupulous and amusing family and friends who by a series of sad frauds almost keep her from her desire. One's heart does not go out to the hero. We are told he is extremely great and clever and he has about him a good deal of a certain tragic comedian, but he does not hold one. When your hero is, in appearance, like the Strafford of the Wentworth Woodhouse collection you may be sure he will be terribly "thorough" and very likely dull. He and his Rosabel believe wonderfully in The Movement, The Ideal, and the like, for all the world as though they were a couple of dear little undergraduates of the old days when Ruskin ruskinised and William Morris began to be. Old fashioned trifling with sociology and new fashioned revolt against things as they are lead to some pretty complications that Mrs. Craigie handles with admirable reticence and skill. In her delineation of the characters that surround and complicate the great souls of Rosabel and Jocelyn the author is at her best. Rosabel's brother, Sir Courtenay, a philistine man of the world who considers himself by blood and in action a gentleman, is made to define that elusive being as "a person Rosabel and Jocelyn that holds one quite apart superficial but engaging wit of the story. Mrs. always essentially of her age and therefore in th practises she shows the influence of its later master pleased to note occasionally the flying shadow of Di crosses a page or two, and every chapter and many instinct with the excellent spirit of Meredith at his would not imply that the author of "A Serious Wooing tionally imitative—she stands above that; but muc phraseology—"clarion thought," "wayward beautie disastrously," "The Piper and his Rosabel"—recalls of the point and aptness of a mighty hand. But M is highly independent too. We do not fancy she borrows where the style of this paragraph:—

> The spinster was spare, with a fine gaunt chest black eyes, and no nonsense discernible about the kne on the contrary, jutted out (in a square manner) co much decency, by black cashmere cut, as a skirt, no long below the ankles. These, however, were incredible degree, and the resolute foot, small and sl something romantically aristocratic in its sh elegance.

Carried to its ultimate, this method cannot hope t ridiculous. Side by side, however, with some paragraphs are many such happy phrases and doubtfu "The upper classes are composed of women who will and men who will not work," or "In human relationsh comes not from the deficient heart or ill-matched heart ill-matched visions." But Mrs. Craigie has one old habit which we find rather wearisome. The hea chapters are lavishly powdered with somewhat ina quotations which, while displaying wide reading languages, do not greatly help us to realize the ladies men who have to act up to these mottoes.

Although "The Serious Wooing" is enjoyable perhaps show the author at her highest; her subject is a little over-worked, and the method, although as better than Mrs. Craigie has shown us in many a p adventure.

AMONG THE REVIEWS AND MAGAZIN

The most exciting article in Blackwood is one on Larrikinism in Australia, signed Ambrose Pratt. We given to understand that the great cities of Australia combed with secret societies who terrorize alike the their respectable fellow citizens. The writer represe held the position of solicitor to a certain "Push," a professes to reveal the secrets of its organizati members of the gangs, according to Mr. Pratt, criminals, but well-paid artisans; "drunkenness is forbidden among them"; and they "are require continent lives." If all that be true, it is not easy t quarrel they have with society, or why they should amazing number of undiscovered murders with which credits them. The Camorra and the Mafia one un The members of those organizations live by extorti from neighbours, as the price of immunity from vi outrage. Mr. Ambrose Pratt's stories of Larrikinis doubtless founded upon fact, are less in accordanc "Slave Trade in North Nigeria" fulfils the promise of the first. It is lively, not to say sensational, reading. "The Foreign Office from Within," by Sir Walter Miéville, is a good account of the methods of work of the most important of the Government Offices. Mr. H. S. Caldecott gives us a good description of "A Boer Refugee Camp" in Natal. Considering all things, the refugees seem to be fairly comfortable, if not cheerful. We read that—

> Near by is a camp for convalescent soldiers, and some of the men take their walk along the river bank in our neighbourhood. It is surprising to find what a kindly and friendly feeling exists between them and the Boer women. The Boers feel no resentment against the regular soldiers, and the soldiers speak very highly about the fighting qualities of the Boers; but the Boers do make it a personal question that the Colonial volunteers should be employed against them. They seem somehow to imagine that they are fighting for that independence, which in course of time it will be the destiny of every colony to do. They rather anticipated that the sympathies of the other dependencies would be with them and not against them. They are particularly sore with the South African Volunteers, and have more than once committed acts where these corps were concerned which they would not have done in the case of regulars.

In the Gentleman's Magazine Mr. Percival H. W. Almy writes of the Coleridge Country, meaning Ottery St. Mary, and Mr. Charles Cooper gives amusing extracts from the diary of a tradesman who flourished in a small Sussex country town in the middle of the eighteenth century.

There is a third instalment of Dr. T. Miller Maguire's articles on "Guerilla or Partisan Warfare" in the United Service Magazine, relating some of the exploits of Stuart, Morgan, and Forrest in the American Civil War. These articles have been good as far as they have gone, but the subjects merit more detailed treatment.

Good Words revives an interesting memory in an article by E. Hobson on Ida Pfeiffer—a great traveller in the days when women travelled far less than they do now. She went to the Holy Land and Iceland, and twice round the world, was attacked with a lassoo and a knife in Brazil, locked up as a spy in Transcaucasia, and sentenced to death by the Queen of Madagascar. Her books were as popular in England as in her own country. One still comes across copies on the shelves of the second-hand booksellers.

Mr. Theodore Andrea Cook, whose articles appear with a welcome frequency this month in the magazines, writes for Cassell's on "The Rowing World of London." The number also contains a short story by Mr. Douglas Sladen, as well an interesting description of a marvellous mountain railway in California by Mr. Ronald L. Pearse.

A promising series of papers with the general title of "School Days Abroad" is begun by Mr. Ascott R. Hope in the Public School Magazine. The first article describes life at an Austrian military college—a weird place, not in the least like Sandhurst, if we may judge from the account given of it.

The Universal and Ludgate has rather a way of nibbling at good subjects instead of treating them. Anna Comtesse de Bremont's article on Balzac's love letters is a case in point this month. An article on Lord Milner by Mr. Comrie Colquhoun is better; and Mr. Tebbutt's paper on signs and signboards is well and quaintly illustrated.

THE REPORT ON BOOKBINDING.

Librarians and book collectors will find abundant food for reflection in the report which has just been issued of the Committee on Leather for Bookbinding appointed by the Society of Arts last year. The conclusion arrived at is that there is ample justification for the complaint that modern leather is not temperature and thorough ventilation of lit strongly insisted upon. It appears to be a gene leather, and particularly Russian leather, lasts that are in constant use. This is attributed amount of grease absorbed by the leather from t is suggested that a suitable dressing may be d would have a similar effect.

The primary cause of decay, however, is dec deterioration of the leather, and many of the mo tanning, dyeing, and finishing are strongly c every library visited the committee found evide bindings of all periods represented, but the book the last eighty to a hundred years showed far g of deterioration than those of an earlier date bindings examined bore evidence of decay after a as from five to ten years. The poor condition of the latter end of the nineteenth century is att to the thinness as to the inferior quality of Modern leathers dyed with the aid of sulph condemned. In nearly every case Russian leath have become rotten—at least in bindings of the
But in the main the injury for which the l manufacturer are responsible is due to ignorance the means employed to give the leather the o required for binding rather than to the intention an inferior article. The members of the committe themselves that it is possible to test any leath as to guarantee its suitability, and they believe t to be no difficulty in providing material at the good as any previously made. They have not to any decision as to the desirability of establis official standard, though they consider that th consideration. Their report, which occupies pages of the society's journal, is to be reprin pamphlet and published by Messrs. Bell and Son

We gave some particulars last week of Messrs which concluded on the 4th, and we now a important items :—

Tennyson. "Poems by Two Brothers," 1827. I paper copy ... ...
Coleridge. "Poems on Various Subjects," 1796. edition ... ...
Keats. "Endymion" 1818. Presentation copy ...
Keats. "Poems," 1817 ... ...
Meredith (G.). "Poems," 1851. First edition...
(Thackeray) "Harlequin and Humpty Dumpty,' Stevenson. "An Object of Pity" and "Obje Pity," 1892 ... ...
Stevenson. "The Pentland Rising," 1866 ...
Sterne. "A Sentimental Journey," 1768. First e Johnson. "The Prince of Abyssinia," 1759. Pre tion copy .. ..
Butler. "Hudibras," 1662. First edition of the part ... ...
Bunyan. "The Pilgrim's Progress." Second ed imperfect ... ...
Beaumont and Fletcher. "Comedies and Trage 1647 ... ...
Shakespeare. "The Famous Victories of Hen Fifth," 1617. A good copy of this extremel book ... ...

Kelmscott Press.
"Sigurd the Volsung." Incomplete specimens only 32 copies printed ... ...
Shelley. "Poetical Works." 3 vols. ... ...
Keats. "Poems" ... ...
"Sigurd the Volsung." 1898 ... ...
"Life and Death of Jason." Vellum copy ...
"The Earthly Paradise." 8 vols. ... ...

Vale Press.

Correspondence.

HERALDIC NOMENCLATURE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I welcomed with enthusiasm the prospectus of the "Victoria History of the Counties of England," and fully intended to lay out my £250 in the purchase of the numbers as they appeared.

I have, however, for many years been a student of armory, and if the volumes of the series are to be defaced by the needless vulgarization of heraldic nomenclature to which Mr. Hartshorne has called attention, I shall not allow the scholastic standard of my library to be lowered by the presence of that work.

My process of reasoning is simple and, I think, just; moreover, it is not likely to be peculiar to myself. If in a given book I find that a subject with which I happen to be conversant is handled in an unscholarly manner, I feel justified in distrusting those other portions of the volume in which, owing to insufficient knowledge, I am more or less at the mercy of the writers.

I am, of course, only an individual member of the book-buying community, but I am confident that there are many who, whether they may write to the Press or not on this matter, think as I do, and will act in the same way.

I have heard much of the wide-spread disgust occasioned among antiquarian scholars by the perpetration of this atrocity in an heraldic publication now in course of issue.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
OXONIAN.

"L'AIGLON."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Much criticism is now afloat on the subject of L'Aiglon. May I be allowed to add my quota in the form of a few thoughts on some of the features of the play which have made it fail to be a really great piece dramatically?

The list of personnages includes no less than forty-six characters. Of these not more than twenty are of any considerable importance in the plot. The rest enter once or twice and play an almost irrelevant part. Some, indeed, play in side plots which embarrass rather than help the main intrigue, if such exists. What else could be expected from such a legion of participators? Shakespeare, who used more dramatis personæ than the classic writers of the French drama, would surely be astonished at seeing such a company on the boards!

Again, how does Rostand use his actors towards the end of the play? Most of them, even of those who have taken a large part at first, drop out of sight, and no account is rendered of them. From the time of the banquet Gentz is left to eat his bonbons and enjoy his scent without a word more about the duel with the French attaché. Dietrichstein gives his history lesson and is not heard of again. Fanny Elssler, who seems the moving spirit in the conspiracy, does not appear after the banquet and passes out of sight without a word of thanks from the Duke. Metternich, too, is brought in rarely after Act IV., and when he does appear his character is rather altered. It is true that the last words of the play are allotted to him, but they do not seem as striking as they should be. Compare this with the Shakespearian tragedy. Shakespeare accounts for all the

The Battle of Wagram is one of the finest conceptio play, but even this is overdone. The fifth scene of A drawn out to an excessive length, without anything s striking to authorize the enlargement. Of course, it opportunity for the Duke to display further his char its mixture of puerility and idealism. But that has b in so many other ways that we are already acquainted

These are some of the features of the play which dramatic failure, interesting though it is from an standpoint.

I remain, Sir, yours faithfully,
WALTER W. S

Derwent-house, Anerley, S.E., July 6.

RACHEL, SARAH, AND THE DÆMO

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In Literature of May 11, 1901, you did honour to comment upon an essay of mine, on Rach appeared in the Gentleman's Magazine for May last. Y seemed to think that the French classic drama had no become so outworn in these days of romanticism and s Coquelin and Sarah Bernhardt have done something tow ing them (the works of the grand siècle) alive." I had v argue that the genius of Rachel had given temporary lif classic drama which, when Rachel died, ceased to have a p hold upon even the French stage. Rachel's great pa taken mainly from Racine and Corneille, where Bernhardt does not generally play them, and indeed onl acts Phèdre. The public taste has undergone a ch of the two great French lionnes, Rachel was the more terrible. Rachel's great "heroines"—god-like only resemblance to the gods of polytheism—are mostl They are torn by the fiercest passions—specially hate, revenge—but they feel no touch of conscience and of murder or of other crime. Such characters, a damonic deeds, bear no comparison with post-Christian Mrs. Siddons could gloriously embody true heroines, truly God-like, despite their sorrows, temptations, fail who are more or less consciously swayed by conscien Christianity. It would be idle to compare too curi merits as tragic actresses of Rachel and of Sarah. Ge that instead of comparing himself and Schiller men glad to possess both; and so great was Rachel in her Sarah may well be content to be less, but of her god-l Still the presence of Sarah on our stage leads unave thoughts of both these distinctively gifted women delight in contemplating such artists in their nearne their remoteness. In the Dame aux Camellias, Rac certainly not have played the consumptive Rababite as so tenderly rendered the fragile wanton; while Sarah approach Rachel in Camille, Roxane, and other of her tragic heroines. It is not sufficiently considered what influence Christianity has had upon the tragic stage.

Rachel played Desdemona when she was a pupil, b attempted the pure, tender lady when she had attaine great days of her glory as an actress. The reason is n seek. Desdemona is gentle as divine. If Rachel ha the part in her time of fiercest power, she might, irritated by that which would seem to her weakness character, and carried away by her damonic and passions, have altered the conclusion of the great tr taking in a tragic frenzy the life of Othello, and the

THE USE OF FOREIGN PHRASES.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—It is time some protest was made against the pedantic and vulgar fashion of dragging foreign, especially French, words, which so many cannot understand, into English conversation or writing on every possible occasion, especially when, as is often the case, the user himself does not know their true meaning, or cannot pronounce or even spell them correctly.

Thus many use the French word employé instead of the good English "employee," notwithstanding the fact that but few attempt, and still fewer succeed in the attempt, to pronounce it aright. Others persist in saying "ongvelope" for "envelope" (although nobody says "ongveloped"), ignorant that the French word is not envelope at all, but enveloppe. Then dépôt is either French, in which case it requires the two accents, or English, when it needs none, and the common spelling "depôt" is ridiculous from any point of view. The following words, too, if intended to be French, are nearly always wrongly written:—spécialité, chalet, connoisseur, portemanteau, réservoir, mémoire, pommade, déshabillé; as are also the German walz, schottisch, hussar; the Italian serraglio, tufo, maccheroni, grotta, comando, regata, banditti, concertino, rilievo, portafoglio, mustaccio, bruggadocchio, lazzaretto, zouave, opera buffa; the Spanish dueña, guerrilla, guerrillero; the Portuguese curação; the Dutch weld; the Norwegian eider, malström, kariol.

The only excuse for employing foreign words, save as technicalities and quotations, or for the sake of variety or local color, is when their meaning cannot be given in plain English, such as débris, dénouement, genre, élite, boudoir, corps, jeu d'esprit, tour de force, coup d'état, pièce de résistance, au revoir, esprit de corps, de rigueur, ennui, négligé, coup d'œil, suite, ensemble, hors de combat, siesta, auto-da-fe, and it does not justify the using of such terms as employé, crêpe, serviette, bouquet, personnel, matériel, bête noire, en évidence, en masse. As a matter of fact it is mostly half-educated persons, with only a smattering of French and a very poor command of English, who do so. Highly absurd, too, is the custom of pronouncing English words as if they were French, as "vahz," "mirahzh," "massahzh," "presteezh," "cortayzh," "tomahto," "daybosh ay," "bah-relief," "accooshmong," "otel," "traf'," "amaturr," "promenahd," "restaurong," or spelling them so, as is often done with "impass," "detour," "role" (better "roll"), "plebiscite," "misalliance," "pell-mell," "toilet," "gram," "meter," "maneuver," "annex," "revery," "speciality," "menagery," "repertory," "naïvety," "absinth," "picket," "lackey," "clientele," "negligible," "renascence," "intransigent," "blond," "absinth."

Indeed, many words now universally treated as French might be anglicized, as "flancee," "attachee," "habituee," "regime," "debut," "in block," "on route," while "frontage" or the good Latin-English "faciata" could be used for façade, "résume" for résumé, "chiliogram," "hecatometer" for the barbarous kilogramme, hectomètre (the latter of which connotes a sixth part rather than giving any suggestion of a hundred), and "paper mash" for papier mâché. On the other hand, "blouse" should be pronounced to correspond with "route" and "tour," while "bulletin," "invalid" no more call for a quasi-French pronunciation than "satin" and "valid." As for "reveillé" (for réveil), "troche," "beau ideal," "cap-à-pie," they are not French at all, nor yet the much-abused "morale" in the sense of "mettle" or "fettle;" nor is translation of "sur le tapis," though the [illegible] means "on the tablecloth," the shallow and thou[illegible] stopping to consider that we do not usually la[illegible] on the floor! The same incapacity is respons[illegible] sense as "female employé," "male fiancé" [illegible] Spain," when we have the far more [illegible] "castles in the air," and "Gulf of Lyons" [illegible] Lion," from which Lyons, or, more properly, [illegible] distant.

If, instead of introducing such melancholy [illegible] have no reason but vanity, or the mere de[illegible] supposed fashion, writers would endeavor [illegible] true pronunciation and spelling of foreign nam[illegible] Liége, Chamonix, Gent, Leiden, Haag, Ham[illegible] Pest, Córdoba, Habana, Buenos Aires, Lauren[illegible] could be no possible objection, nor yet [illegible] with foreign tongues, solecisms in English itse[illegible] Thus analogy and etymology unite in decla[illegible] generally simpler, spellings as preferable [illegible] adopted—silvan, tiro, sibyl, siren, sirup, [illegible] vicount, sent, samon, coler, gage, garantee, ga[illegible] feasant, fantom, syndic, gaiety, villany, [illegible] frontispice, agreable, parlament, cronicle, car[illegible] copist, grot, embarcation, remarcable, det, [illegible] becillity, callisthenics, cacao, diamantiferous [illegible] sismic, mimograph, cenozoic, esthetic, med[illegible] cosmus, homeopath, glycose, acoluth, acu[illegible] diecese, coertion, arsion, energic, cynism, cu[illegible] adress, hauty, controler, coud, hole, net, ax, [illegible] tire, toilet, epaulet, program, photogram, fr[illegible] rime, bire, lich, drily, gipsy, pigmy, dike, [illegible] garot, batallion, jewelry, mold, gormand, te[illegible] savior, furor, biased, traveling, worshiper, [illegible] registrer, civilize, baptize, advertize, adve[illegible] courtizan, teaze, cozy, hight, pretense, de[illegible] woman, pitance, calidoscope, calogram, semst[illegible] harken, salable, theater, center, meager, mass[illegible]

Pronunciation should be corrected in hun[illegible] hostler, hotel, habitual, heroic, historic, [illegible] phthisis, apophthegm, thyme, indict, pyrites, [illegible] margarine, colonel, lieutenant, ally, accord, [illegible] control, repute, annex, combine, combat, [illegible] contract, preface, detail, politic, lunatic, [illegible] ordeal, dais, exhale, forehead, hagioscope, ou[illegible] cases following as nearly as possible the sp[illegible] the standard rules of the language.

I am, Sir, respectfully,

EVACUSTE[illegible]

151, Strand.

GOLDSMITH'S DEATH

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In the course of an address to the Re[illegible] volent College, reported in The Times of to-d[illegible] referred thus to a pathetic incident at the dea[illegible] "As he lay dying, they gathered round hi[illegible] 'Is your mind at ease?' The answer, in t[illegible] Macaulay, which had never been obliterat[illegible] them, was, 'No, it is not.'"

It was, of course, Johnson, not Macaul[illegible]

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Sir Edwin Arnold's new epic poem, "The Voyage of Ithobal," deals with the first circumnavigation of Africa alluded to by Herodotus. Mr. Murray's announcement gives the argument as follows:—Ithobal of Tyre undertakes to explore the unknown waters beyond the Red Sea, in the service of Pharaoh Neko, King of Egypt. In the market in Tyre he purchases a lovely African princess, to whom the mystical secret of the Dark Continent is known, and having built three ships at Suez, he sets out accompanied by her on his expedition. In due course he returns with only two ships remaining, and relates to the King the story of his voyage and adventures, describing all the features of the countries visited—his adventures by sea and land—the mutiny of his men and all the other incidents of his adventurous voyage. The narrative is divided into seven Cantos corresponding to the seven days during which it was related to the King.

Mr. Maurice Hewlett's new volume, to which he has given the title, "New Canterbury Tales," will be published by Messrs. Archibald Constable in the early autumn.

Messrs. Houghton, of Boston, publish most of the late Mr. John Fiske's books, and Messrs. Macmillan have brought out over here also the "Outlines in Cosmic Philosophy," written by Fiske nearly thirty years ago, and published two years after the production of his first work, "Myths and Myth Makers," in 1872. "The Destiny of Man," "Through Nature to God," and "The Idea of God as affected by Modern Knowledge," also appear in English editions through Messrs. Macmillan. One of his latest works was a collection of essays called "A Century of Science," in which ten of the essays were political and literary. They reveal to some extent, in their fresh insight and forcible style, Froude's "Short Studies." Another volume of essays was "Excursions of an Evolutionist."

Biography again plays a prominent part in Mr. Murray's new list. Besides Viscount Goschen's life of his grandfather "George Joachim Goschen," publisher and printer of Leipzig, 1752-1829, we are promised a biography of "Stringer Lawrence, the Father of the Indian Army," by Colonel John Biddulph, and a memoir of "Felicia Skene, of Oxford," by Miss E. C. Rickards. Felicia Skene, the daughter of Mr. James Skene, of Rubislaw, whose friendship with Sir Walter Scott is recorded in the dedication to the fourth Canto of Marmion, was a woman of remarkable accomplishments, but she was best known for her philanthropic work during more than forty years among the City and county gaols. Then there is the autobiography of Sir Henry Layard, in two volumes, with some additional chapters on his Parliamentary career by Sir Arthur Otway, besides the record of "A Sailor of King George"—Captain Hoffman, R.N., who fought at Trafalgar and had many other interesting adventures—edited by A. Beckford Bevan and the Rev. H. B. Wolryche Whitmore. Mr. E. H. Parker, who recently produced an excellent book on the history, diplomacy, and commerce of China through Mr. Murray, has written another volume on "John Chinaman" for the same publisher, in which he illustrates the character and customs of the Chinese by means of a series of anecdotes derived from personal experiences.

The success which the history of "Europe in the Middle Ages," by Professors Thatcher and Schwill, of Chicago, has had in this country since Mr. Murray brought it out about two years ago has induced the publisher to arrange for an English edition of the "General History of Europe, 350-1900," by the same authors. It has been adapted to the requirements of English colleges and schools by Mr. Arthur Hassall, who supplies bibliographies for each period. Another interesting item is the announcement of what promises to be a really practical volume on "National Education," with special chapters and papers by Sir Joshua Fitch, Professor Armstrong, the Rev. Bernard Reynolds—Prebendary of St. Paul's and chief school inspector of the London diocese—Principal J. H. Reynolds, of the Municipal Technical School, and a number of other educational experts including with summaries of criticisms passed upon the "... of Ethics."

Messrs. Macmillan announce a new edition of Sir ... Jebb's "Modern Greece," which made its first ap... twenty-one years ago.

Mr. Heinemann announces "Love and His Mask," by Méné Muriel Dowie (Mrs. Henry Norman). The h... young general in South Africa, and the novel pictures ... Society in War Time.

We are requested to explain that the "Imperial E... of Dickens which we recently announced, and in which Gissing and Mr. F. G. Kitton collaborate, is quite ... from the Rochester Edition, with which Mr. Gissing and M... are also connected. In the Imperial Edition (Gresham ... ing Co.) Mr. Kitton is the artist who illustrates Mr. ... reprinted Essay on Dickens. In the Rochester Edition (... Mr. Gissing supplies the introductions and Mr. Ki... notes for each work.

Mr. F. W. Spealight sends us "The Book," th... Souvenir Guide, with many photographs, of the fête ... Thursday at the Botanic Gardens, in aid of the Nationa... for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. The proceed... sale go towards the profits of the fête, and any copie... after the fête can be purchased from F. and R. Speal... Regent-street. The price is left to the purchaser.

Messrs. Hutchinson, the publishers of "The Livin... of Mankind," announce a companion work, "The ... Animals of the World," in fortnightly parts. There ... about 1,000 illustrations, many of them coloured, and ... will be free of all scientific names and expressions.

Messrs. Jarrold and Sons will publish shortly a ... visitors to the Bayreuth Festival, entitled "Wagner, B... and the Festival Plays," by Frances Gerard.

Books to look out for at once.

"Napoleon: Extracts from The Times and Morning Chr... 1821." By A. L. Humphreys. 18s. net.

"Mr. Gladstone as Chancellor of the Exchequer." By Sydney ... M.P. Murray. 5s. net.

"Frédéric Mistral, Poet and Leader in Provence." By C. A. ... Macmillan. 6s. net.
[Treats of the poet's life and works, and also of th... Provençal language and the movement known as the Fél...

"The Arrow War with China." By Charles S. Leavenwort... Professor of History, Nanyang College, Shanghai. Samp... 3s. 6d. net.
[Narrates the events which admitted foreign Ambassadors ... and opened China to the outer world.]

"A Retrospect on the South African War." By Lieut.-Col... May, Royal Staff College. Sampson Low. 6s.

"A Woman Alone." Three Stories. By Mrs. W. K. Clifford. 3s. 6d.

"A Great Lady." By Adeline Sergeant. Methuen. 6s.

"Quincy Adams Sawyer. By C. F. Pidgin. Unwin. 6s.
[A tale of New York life which has had a large American ...

"No Vindication." By Mrs. C. Kernahan. John Long. 6s.

"Mistress Nell." By G. C. Hazelton, junr. Murray. 3s. 6d. n...
["A merry tale of a merry time," founded by the author ... play, produced last year.]

"A Black Vintage." By M. Gerard. Digby and Long. 6s.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS

BIOGRAPHY.

CHARLES II. By OSMOND AIRY. 13×10, 277 pp. Gospil. £3 3s.
[Sumptuously illustrated from contemporary portraits.]

THE OLD PLANTATION. How we Lived in Great House and Cabin Befo... By J. B. AVIRETT. 202 pp. Neely.

REMINISCENCES (1808-1815) UNDER WELLINGTON. By CAPT. W. HAY... by his daughter, Mrs. S. C. I. Wood. 8×5, 301 pp. Simpkin Marshall. 6s.

MODERNE STAATSMANNER. Biographien und Begegnungen. Von ... 9×6, 305 pp. Allgemeiner Verein für Deutsche Literatur.

BUSH-WHACKING AND OTHER SKETCHES. By HUGH CLIFFORD, C.M.G. 7½×5, 324 pp. Blackwood.
[Sketches of life in the Malay Peninsula and Borneo.]

MY BRILLIANT CAREER. By MILES FRANKLIN. With a Preface by Henry Lawson. 7½×5, 309 pp. Blackwood.
[A story of Bush life. The author is described by Mr. Lawson as "just a little Bush girl, barely twenty-one yet."]

A SUMMER HYMNAL. A Romance of Tennessee. By J. T. MARR. 7×5, 332 pp. Centre (Philadelphia.)

THE GREAT NOODLESHIRE ELECTION. By J. A. FARRER. 7½×5, 181 pp. Unwin. 3s. 6d.

THE HONOUR OF THE ARMY, and Other Stories. By EMILE ZOLA. Ed., with a Preface by E. A. Vizetelly. 7½×5, 304 pp. Chatto and Windus.

ARROWS OF THE ALMIGHTY. By OWEN JOHNSON. 8×5½, 435 pp. The Macmillan Company. 6s.

THE BROAD ROAD THAT STRETCHES. By CECIL HARTLEY. 7½×5½, 230 pp. Burleigh. 3s. 6d.

THE LUNATIC AT LARGE. By J. K. CLOSTAN. 8½×6, 154 pp. Blackwood. 6d.

JOESSA. By ITAR JOSSMAN. 8×5, 147 pp. Neely.

THE THIRTEEN EVENINGS. By G. BARTRAM. 8×5, 310 pp. Methuen. 6s.
[Stories, largely of an occult kind, told at the "Boomerang" Club.]

THE LION'S BROOD. By D. OSBORNE. 8×5, 361 pp. Heinemann.
[Rome at the time of the Punic War.]

NOBLER THAN REVENGE. By ESME STUART. 8×5, 321 pp. J. Long. 6s.

THE PRESUMPTION OF STANLEY HAY, M.P. By NOWELL CLAY. 8×5, 286 pp. Warne. 3s. 6d.

SOME PELICAN TALES. Selected and Ed. by F. [M.] BOYD (Editor of the Pelican). 6½×4½, 143 pp. Greening. 1s.

HISTORY.

HISTORICAL GEOGRAPHY OF THE BRITISH COLONIES. Vol. V.—Canada. Part I. (New France). By C. P. LUCAS. 7½×5, 243 pp. Clarendon Press. 6s.

THE STORY OF NEWFOUNDLAND. (The Story of the Empire Series.) By F. E. SMITH. 7×4, 129 pp. Horace Marshall. 1s. 6d.

ANCIENT INDIA AS DESCRIBED IN CLASSICAL LITERATURE. Translations with Notes, by J. W. M'CRINDLE. 9×6, 216 pp. Constable. 7s. 6d. n.
[The sixth and last vol. of a series of translations of Greek and Latin texts relating to Ancient India. This vol. has extracts from Herodotus, Strabo, Pliny, &c.]

LITERARY.

ESSAYS DESCRIPTIVE AND BIOGRAPHICAL. By GRACE, LADY PRESTWICH. With a Memoir by her Sister, Louisa E. Milne. 9×6, 262 pp. Blackwood. 10s. 6d.
[Studies in France, Italy, and Scotland. Two Geological Essays.]

THE STORY OF BOOKS. By GERTRUDE B. RAWLINGS. 6×4, 165 pp. Newnes. 1s.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE JEWISH ENCYCLOPÆDIA. Prepared by more than 400 scholars and specialists. Ed. by ISIDORE SINGER. Vol. I. Aach-Apocalyptic Lit. 11×8, 695 pp. Funk and Wagnalls.

MODERN BRIDGE. By "SLAM." With The Laws of Bridge, as approved by the Portland and Turf Clubs, by "BONE." 6×4½, 145 pp. Longmans.

THE LIVING RACES OF MANKIND. By H. N. HUTCHINSON, J. W. GREGORY, and R. LYDEKKER. Vol. II. 11×9, 576 pp. Hutchinson. 7s. 6d. n.

THE MYCENÆAN TREE AND PILLAR CULT AND ITS MEDITERRANEAN RELATIONS. By A. J. EVANS. 11×7½, 106 pp. Macmillan. 6s. n.

POETRY.

POEMS by J. LLOYD. 6½×4, 144 pp. Elliot Stock. 2s. 6d.

SELECTIONS FROM THE POEMS OF S. WEIR MITCHELL. 8×5½, 161 pp. Macmillan. 5s. n.

POLITICAL.

AUSTRALIAN FEDERATION. By SIR JOHN A. COCKBURN, K.C.M.G., with a Preface by the Right Hon. Sir Charles W. Dilke, Bart., M.P. 7½×5, 250 pp. Horace Marshall. 2s. 6d. n.

A CENTURY OF LAW REFORM. 8×5, 416 pp. Macmillan. 5s. n.
[Twelve lectures by different authors delivered at Lincoln's Inn.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

THE TONGUE OF THE TREES. By H. J. SWALLOW. 7×5, 88 pp. Elliot Stock. 1s.

BODNEY STONE. By A. CONAN DOYLE. 8½×6, 122 pp. Newnes. 6d.

THE CONQUEST OF LONDON. By DOROTHEA GERARD. 9×6, 126 pp. Methuen. 6d.

EVERYBODY'S GUIDE TO PHOTOGRAPHY. By "OPERATOR." New Ed. Revised by E. Pierre. 6½×4, 104 pp. Russell.

EVELYN INNES. By GEORGE MOORE. 8½×6, 187 pp. Unwin. 6d.

THEOLOGY.

A SERVICE FOR THE SICK IN HOME AND HOSPITAL. By M. G. PEARSE. 7½×5, 103 pp. Horace Marshall. 1s. 6d.

HISTORY OF THE CHURCH TO A.D. 325. By the REV. H. N. HATE. 6×4½, 133 pp. Rivington. 1s. n.

RIVINGTON'S BOOKS OF THE BIBLE. Ed. by the REV. A. E. HILLARD. The Gospel According to ST. JOHN. 7×4½, 124 pp. 1s. 6d.

WITH THE CHURCHWARDENS OR COLLOQUIES ON ECCLESIASTICAL

CHESS.

Address "Chess": LITERATURE, Printing Hou

PROBLEM No. 196, by J. G. CHANCELLOR.
BLACK. 5 pieces.

WHITE. 11 pieces.
White to play and mate in two moves.

PROBL
MAX KAR
BLACK.

WHITE.
White to play a

In the excellent little monthly Checkmate (C that comparatively little is done with critical Kt endings, Mr. Reichelm gives the following win by a system of procedure tempered and re play":—

PROBLEM No. 198, by G. Reichelm, Phi
(3 pieces)—K at K Kt 5; R at Q B 7; Kt
(2 pieces)—K at K R sq; R at Q Kt 3. White

The Dutch Chess Association has awa international problem tournament, and the second prize:—

PROBLEM No. 199, "Vexillum."—White
Q Kt 8; Q at Q R 7; R at K 2; bishops at K
Q B 7; pawns at K B 2, K R 6, Q Kt 4, Q pieces)—K at K 4; Q at K R 8; R at Q R 8 at K B 2 and Q 6; pawns at K Kt 3, K Mate in three.

There were five leading prizes and four h

COMPLICATIONS.—Some players revel in tion, and, indeed, the pleasure afforded to well by such is very great, and there is ample Here are examples:—

GAME in Match, PHILADELPHIA v MANHATTAN, at Philadelphia:—
BLACK. MARSHALL.

WHITE. MARTINEZ.
White to play his 14th move.

Continued:—14. P–Q 5, Kt×P (of course unexpected); 15. Kt–Q 4, Kt–Kt 5; 16. Q–R 3, Q–Kt 3; 17. R–K sq, P–R 4; 18. Q–K 2, castles; 19. Kt–R 2, Kt×Kt; 20. R×Kt, R×R; 21. Q×R, Kt–K 3, &c. In the end, after nearly 70 moves, Black should have won, but owing to hasty play only drew.

CORRESPONDE
A. NORLIN (W TUTTE (Black
BLACK

WHITE.
White to p

Continued:—1
Q–R 4; 3. Kt–
R×R; 5. Q–R
Q–Q; 7. Kt–Q sq; 9. Kt–Q 2, P–K R 4, and w
P–R–Q ch; 6. K
Q×Q ch, and win

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 100. SATURDAY, JULY 20, 1901.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

NOTES OF THE DAY 49, 50, 51
"LITERATURE" PORTRAITS.—XI. Mr. George Gissing ... 52
THE PLAYER AND THE PUBLIC: A "Personal View," by Laurie Magnus 53
IMPERIAL LONDON, by Laurence Gomme 54
BIBLIOGRAPHY OF THE WAR 57
SHAKESPEARE FIRST FOLIOS 58
THE DRAMA, by A. B. Walkley 58
CURRENT LITERATURE—
The Relations of Geography and History 59
The Life and Letters of Gilbert White 60
Robert Buchanan: A Critical Appreciation 61 Philosophical Books:—
Problem of Conduct—Methods of Ethics—Principles of Morality—Use of Words in Reasoning—Fact and Fable in Psychology—Works of George Berkeley—Nietzsche—Varia 62, 63
Mr. Bodley's "France"—The Canadian Contingents—Our Public Schools—The Stall Plates of the Knights of the Order of the Garter—Penelope's Irish Experiences—The Arrow War with China—Sir Harry Parkes in China—Great Battles of the World—The Northumberland Fusiliers—I. Y.—The Living Races of Mankind—Les Juifs en Roumanie—A B C of Bridge—Spring Time in the Basque Mountains—Pilgrimage to Wessex—Continental Road Travel in Central Western Europe—Book of Cookery 63, 64, 65, 66
Evelyn Innes—Sister Teresa—Crucial Instances—The Aristocrats—Lord of the Sea 66, 67
LIBRARY NOTES 67
CORRESPONDENCE—Archæological Nomenclature (Mr. O. Barron)—L'Anglon—Unpublished Letters of Dr. Johnson—The Use of Foreign Phrases—Goldsmith's Death—Harry Chunder 68, 69, 70, 71
AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for 71
LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS 71, 72

NOTES OF THE DAY.

Next week we shall publish a special Stevenson number, with a reproduction of Mr. R. Bryden's woodcut portrait of Stevenson and many other illustrations. In the same number will appear the first of a series of articles by Mr. Arthur Waugh on the Principal Movements of Victorian poetry. The Victorian era, which has just closed, has been, in poetry, one of the most distinctive periods in the history of English literature. What course poetry will take in the era now beginning it is at present difficult to say, but a consideration of the immediate past has a direct bearing on the future. For these reasons a review at the present moment of the period just ended, by a well-known critic who has made a close study of its various developments, cannot fail, we think, to be of interest to our readers. The first article will treat the period in a general way. The second article will consider "The Poetry of Faith and Aspiration," and in subsequent

Books to read just published:

"Charles II." By Osmond Airy. (Longmans.) Splendidly illustrated.

"Imperial London." By A. H. Beavan. (Dent.)

"Cassell's Illustrated History of the Boer War." (

"Sister Teresa." By George Moore. (Unwin.)

"The Grip of the Bookmaker." By Percy (Hutchinson).

"Severance." By Thomas Cobb. (Lane.)

"My Lady's Diamonds." By Adeline Sergeant. (Wa

* * * *

Although the morality play Every Man, which was by the Elizabethan Stage Society on Saturday la quadrangle of the old Charterhouse, is, according t ideas, entirely lacking in dramatic qualities, the audie none the less impressed by the performance. To st picture of the fifteenth-century stage and the costumes from figures on early Flemish tapestries) could hardly interesting. The characters being merely abstractions fications of virtue or vice, it was, perhaps, justifia actors to attempt no realistic rendering of their par matter of fact, they intoned their parts in a sort of co sing-song. But it was remarkable, where the main obj society was, presumably, to reproduce faithfully the past age, that some of the principal male parts should entrusted to women. In the second piece, The Sacrifi the historical proprieties were similarly outraged appearance of a lady in the part of Isaac. But th effect was at once simple and impressive. To-day programme will be repeated, under the patrona Duchess of Argyll and the Lord Mayor, and the pro go to the Queen Victoria Memorial Fund.

* * * *

On Saturday last at Christie's there was a sequel t dent at Robinson and Fisher's on June 27th, an account appeared in Literature of July 6th. It will be recalled t weeks ago the astonishingly high sum of 14,050 guinea for Hoppner's portrait of Louisa, Lady Manners, a Countess of Dysart, a canvas which measured fifty-one forty-one inches. Last week there occurred for sale a h presentment of Mrs. Palmer, née Gascoigne, thirty twenty-five inches. Although it bore little resemb his work, it was catalogued as a Gainsborough almost certainly by John Hoppner, an artist delicate, one may almost say ethereal, touch. The s white dress, black shawl, and old-fashioned straw of the "Early History of Charles James Fox" was hoped for; and we had it, though the continuation was not quite in the expected form. In the first part of a history of "The American Revolution," published in 1880, some readers of the earlier biography were disappointed with the form the continuation took, and some found in the book the bias of the politician. But it showed a fine literary faculty. To-day is Sir George's sixty-third birthday, and, now that another two years have passed away, we begin to ask ourselves how soon we may have the pleasure of reading the rest of the story.

* * * *

The name of Mr. James Hamblin-Smith, who died last week at his residence in Cambridge, was probably more widely known in the educational world than those of many more learned authors. In fact, the famous "coach," whose works on Algebra, Euclid, and Trigonometry, are familiar to most schoolboys, contented himself some fifty years ago with the modest position of "Captain of the Poll"—the name given to the first in order of merit of those who did not compete for honours. It is now some seven years since he gave up active work, but during the forty years, more or less, during which he prepared undergraduates for the ordinary degree, it may safely be said that at least half of his pupils were successful. He was no "crammer," in the ordinary sense of the word, but he had the inestimable faculty of making his pupils work, and the text-books which he provided for their use and that of many schoolboys in all parts of the country were excellent examples of lucid arrangement. He was a fair classical scholar, and knew his Horace intimately—to the extent of suggesting occasional critical emendations. Caius College claimed him as an undergraduate, and there were few better known or more popular figures in the University.

* * * *

It would appear that the novelists of our day do not, like a certain dramatist a century or two ago, beseech the gods to "annihilate time and space and make two lovers happy." They juggle with both conditions—asking no permission—just as the need of the moment may require. There are many amusing instances of this happy irresponsibility in the newly published novels of John Oliver Hobbes and Mr. George Moore. Every one has remarked that "The Serious Wooing" is almost breathlessly up-to-date; but allusions to Mrs. Botha and the Yarmouth murderer are nothing in comparison with the record achieved by Mrs. Craigie's heroine. Rosalel is introduced on the day of the opening of Parliament by the King (Feb. 14). Before the beginning of Lent (Feb. 20) she has lost her first husband—a mad nobleman; has gone off to her Socialist lover, left him, waited until her schoolgirl sister is safely married, suffered a severe illness, and married a second peer. This is pretty good. Mr. Moore cannot quite equal it, but he demonstrates that neither revision nor even complete rewriting is sufficient to remove all obscurities of action. Evelyn Innes (Chap. VII., new version) "abandoned herself to memories of the afternoon." She had been with her lover to the Carmelite Church in Kensington. Afterwards they had walked and sat in Kensington-gardens; "they had talked on and on." Evelyn goes home to Dulwich; her lover follows—after a considerable interval, we gather. She tells him her father is dining with the Jesuits—"they would have the whole day to themselves." They walk in the lanes; spend hours, apparently, in the picture gallery. "It must be nearly five o'clock," Evelyn remarks; and they go back to tea more than

CRAS TIBI.

[In the Horatian manner.]

I.

Wine of Chios; wine of Lesbos drink you;
But bethink you
(When the gods you praise Amid your jovial feasting) that our days
So quickly run,
That here we stay with but as brief delay
As from a rising to a setting sun.
Wine of Lesbos, wine of Chios drink you;
But—bethink you!

Falernian wine is good! Pass round the
And drink amain!
When you have drunk it up,
Then fill it to the brim and drink again!
Look how the laughing hours, crowned wi Go reeling by!
But through the dance and song
Bear you this thought along,
That we must die.

Yes, they are gone—the Bacchanalian wi
Who revelled through the nights
At Attic banquet or at Roman board.
They had their day, then went the comm
That all must go; the high, the lo
The peasant and the lord.

II.

We revel not among
The wines that Horace and Anacreon su
But, to our merchants' doors,
(To fill our flasks)
Thousands of mighty casks
Come hither from the Lusitanian shores
And many a butt we see
From Xeres and from Burgundy:
Champagne and sweet Moselle
Behold as well;
The vintage of the Bordelais, and more;
A goodly store.

Wine of Xeres, wine of Medoc drink you
But bethink you!
No matter whether flagon, jack, or can;
Or graven silver cup, Theocritan (Where foxes watch the boy the while th Watches the grapes; where in the
The ancient fisher casts his heavy net)
Nor how, from age to age,
The scenes are shifting on this antic sta
Nor whence the wine with which the bo
But now, to crown the jest, the laugh w
Its echo lingers yet; and there,
Beside each vacant chair,
An empty goblet lies upon the ground!
Wine of Medoc, wine of Xeres drink you
But—bethink you!

WILL

* * *

of a late amiable and lamented advocate, preserved in the Skene Charter Chest."

* * * *

A correspondent writes :—" In the mock Johnsonese of the Rambler occurs the phrase, ' the local colour of a Spanish cock-fight.' A critic may be moved thereby to remark that Mr. Vivian has yet to learn that the phrase ' local colour ' was not used 150 years ago, or, for that matter, in England at any rate, forty years ago. When the phrase was first imported into England may be a matter of doubt ; nor, I think, is any history of it given even in that storehouse of curious information, Dr. Murray's Dictionary. But the phrase was at the height of its vogue in France more than seventy years ago. It was a catch-word of Gautier and the French Romantics. Mérimée told Taine that local colour was to the young Romantics what the Holy Grail was to their favourite Middle Ages. And when Gautier had a friend travelling in Africa, he writes to him, ' Just send me a few pots of local colour, and I will make famous Turkish and Algerian stories.' The French Romantics, however, are a far cry from old Samuel Johnson."

Punch celebrated last Wednesday its diamond jubilee, having been founded on July 17, 1841, with Mr. Mark Lemon as editor. Between him and the present occupant of the chair there have been only two editors of the popular weekly—Messrs. Shirley Brooks and Tom Taylor.

We fear there is no longer any doubt that Count Tolstoy's life is in serious danger. He is suffering severely from fever and consequent weakness.

The Guardian of Wednesday published the full Latin text of the Rule of the Third Order of St. Francis of Assisi, the MS. of which M. Sabatier recently discovered in a convent in the Abruzzi.

Mme. Sarah Bernhardt is to recite in Paris a poem by the Lady Mayoress, called " Flower Symbols," which has been translated into French by Mlle. Janotha.

The London County Council has affixed a brass tablet on the boundary wall of Waterlow Park, Highgate-hill, to mark the site of Andrew Marvell's cottage. A similar tablet, it may be remembered, was stolen about a year ago. The new one has been securely fastened to the wall by a bolt at each of the four corners.

A mural tablet to Sir Isaac Pitman, erected by the Bath Corporation on the house where he lived in Royal-crescent, was unveiled on Monday by Mr. Arthur à Beckett, president of the Institute of Journalists.

It is proposed to raise a statue of Verlaine in the Square des Batignolles. M. Rodin will be the sculptor.

Messrs. J. and E. Bumpus have just been appointed by the King booksellers to his Majesty.

A letter has been dictated by the Commander-in-Chief stating that the subject of granting medals to war correspondents is still under consideration at the War Office.

The last ten years or so have seen an increasing mass of literature concerning cricket. In books alone, to say nothing gossip and reports of the game. With all this, it is that the unapproachable classic of all true cricketers a certain thin duodecimo volume, published nearly years ago. It was in 1833, to be accurate, that Joh little work appeared, with a title-page (as was th custom in those days) of a length almost ludicrous in with the remainder of the book. Hard-working write painfully after literary reputation, may be excused jealousy when they consider the ease with which Nyre his niche in the Temple of Fame. For he did not his own book. " The Young Cricketer's Tutor " w entirely written by Mr. Charles Cowlen Clarke, enthusiast about the game, and jotted down from time his father-in-law's house the veteran cricketer's relat bygone triumphs of the Hambledon Eleven, and dir playing the " elegant and manly game of cricket." H himself, we may be assured, supplied the spirit, if not of the book. He had an inimitable gift of descript and healthy pride in the sound Hampshire yeoman which he came, and a full share of that touching fa ancient glories of the game that most cricketing possess. His own father had been founder and capt famous Hambledon team—the M.C.C. of the eighteent —the eleven drawn from an obscure village in H " which met on the first Tuesday in May on Broad-Ha and there " was wont to conquer England." The son' of his father is charming in its directness and simple f as good in essentials (though lax enough in gramm struction) as anything in Hazlitt. " I never saw," he finer specimen of the thoroughbred old English ye Richard Nyren. He was a good face-to-face, unflinchi promising, independent man. He placed a full and upon the station he held in society, and he maintained insolence or assumption. He could differ with a without trenching upon his dignity or losing his own known him maintain an opinion with great firmness ag Duke of Dorset and Sir Horace Mann, and when, in co of his being proved to be in the right, the latter has crossed the ground and shaken him heartily by the h there not a fine sense of dignity here, and, one may carelessness of grammar ? It is a little piece of portrai that lives, and the same may be said of half a dozen o of description that follow—that of Tom Sueter, the wicket-keeper. " What a handful of steel-hearted sol in an important pass, such was Tom in keeping the w or of George Lear, the long-stop, of whom he says t ball seemed to go into him, and he was as sure of it as been a sand-bank." Or, again, read the racy acco single-wicket match between " Lumpy " Stevens, t bowler of the day, and a certain countryman for five pou It is difficult to resist quoting a part of it. " The con bowler made the countryman go in first, for he thought his business in a twink ; but the fellow having an arm a hop-pole, reached in at Lumpy's balls, bowl what h might ; and slashed and thrashed away in the most style, hitting his balls all over the field, and always air ; and he made an uncommon number of runs from th of bowlers before he could get him out—and, egad him !" Or, read again of John Small, the elder, the " turned the short hits to account " and initiated the practice of hustling the field ; who, also, taught h

Literature Portraits.—XI.

GEORGE GISSING.

The literary descent of the second-rate is rarely in doubt. There can be no obscurity as to the parentage of the imitators or school fictionists who flood the markets with tolerable reading matter at six shillings per volume. But their individual descent, whether it be legitimate or illegitimate, has no interest for the critic. He is content to view them as he weighs them, in the mass, when he estimates common tendencies only. It is a different thing when a new development or a striking personality compels his attention and individual interest. Among those who have by slow, by very slow, degrees compelled this particular interest Mr. George Gissing stands in a high and solitary place. Mr. Gissing belongs to no school, certainly not to any English school. The sincerest form of flattery in any admirer cannot imitate and cannot even caricature him. There is truly nothing visible to copy. His essence lies in a bent, in a mood of mind, not by any means in any subject, even though his satiric dissection of what he has called "the ignobly decent" showed his strength, and, indirectly, his inner character. His very repugnance to his early subjects led him to choose them. He declared what he wished the world to be by showing that it possessed every conceivable opposite to his desire.

Those who have read all his work and are interested in origins may have noted with particular pleasure that in "Isabel Clarendon" he showed an instinctive affinity for the lucid and subtle Tourgeneff. There is perhaps no more intensely depressing book in the entire English language than this short novel. Its last three chapters are of unsurpassable gloom, not because of any outward tragedy, but because of the utter futility of the man depicted. The hero's desire reached to the stars. But he was not able to steal or take so much as a farthing rushlight. Not even Demetri Roudine, that futile essence of futility, equals this, his literary child of bitter unable ambitions.

So much is certain, Tourgeneff moved what Zola had really failed to stir in Mr. Gissing. For he was never a Zolaist even at his worst. No man without a style could have influenced him for more than a time. Even Balzac, fecund and insatiable, had, it is possible, no more true power over him. For Balzac, though his constructions were often imaginary and his perspectives a gigantic imposture, was truly a constructor and architectonic, even if barbarous. And construction is obviously alien from Mr. Gissing's mind. He needs no elaborate architecture to do his thinking in. He would have been contented with the Porch.

Now, and at last, the critic has been given an opportunity of understanding the bent and nature of this author. In "By the Ionian Sea" Mr. Gissing has not only put the coping stone to his reputation, but he has also declared himself. Able novelist as he is—and Tourgeneff, Flaubert, and Dostoiefsky would not have disdained his companionship—he is by nature a scholar, a man of the cloister, though not conventual. His pessimism is the natural pessimism of misplacement. Nowadays scholars, as he would understand them, do not properly exist. The learned have become specialists; there is no broad culture possible to them. His ideal is the Renaissance scholar. Without any doubt he must be an admirer of Rabelais.

Perhaps his greatest book is "Born in Exile." To say it is a masterpiece is for once not to misuse the word. It is intense, deeply psychological, moving, true. "L'anatomie presumptueu detail, unmoving. Yet Godwin Peak is an idealis idealist lives amongst those who look at once to Anarchism to cure all human social diseases. T nature that loves all beautiful things is his, a nothing. Unlike Klugeote in "Isabel Clarendon," take them. But the end is the same. By his very esse is no revolutionist. Like many who are not, his n keenest incitement to revolution in those who mind, yet given more to action, more to hope.

ways of hating modern civilization. Mr. Gissing idealist. He looks back. It is the more hop impossibly vain.

In such a nature, displayed as it must literature, for men to read who can read, it w seek for that form of humour which inevitably co
It has been said untruly enough that Mr. Gissing
It is quite possible that those who say it are missing his irony. His humour is of the subtler k in the less sudden contrasts. He does not blow farce. It is utterly alien from his nature.

Nevertheless it remains true that the gener writings is distinctly not merely amusing. But characteristic and the most important part o hitherto has dealt with those young men who, w and well-educated, are without money, the the cannot be comic. The martyrdom of capable environment in the Devil's Twilight betwee Camberwell and the Beersheba of Camden To tragic. It was reserved for Mr. Gissing to treat t as a subject of serious study. And he has pathologist whose business is not cure, and not he has gone beyond this scientific method it is w a satirist of no mean order.

To such a literary intelligence, informed learning of the past to which he leans, his styl the man and his own. For the greater part it than sparkling; clear if not cold; with a subd result of much Latin and more Greek. For th Greek tragedies have always inspired him wi rhythms. Though he is often cold, especiall irony, he can rise to heights of passionate deser
a sense of luxury that here and there tinges Tyrian purple—in spite of all his sense of restrain marked than in any living writer.

It is perhaps only those who, perceivin evanescence of fiction, regard it as literar certainly wasted who will wonder that a write gives himself to it at all. But while that comm which Mr. Gissing obviously abhors, as much a smoky skies beneath which it flourishes, ther practicable method for the man of letters to a Perhaps few novelists see so clearly that fict of art is truly diagnostic of a disordered, if dissatisfied, form of civilization. To him the idylls of Moschus; the simpler tragedy; the n joys of him who ploughs the soil or works at are the fitting themes of art.

It is, it must be, alien from the nature of th
so delighted by the wasted and solitary borde Sea to supply the market with novels, which, t have more or less to comply with the rigid formula note of the artist's mind, and deny him, especi

It took Mr. Gissing many years to enter into his literary estate, and even now the average novel-reader shows a strange reluctance to buy his books. But if Mr. Gissing's sales are not startling as circulations are estimated nowadays, he has a faithful and gradually increasing following—especially through the libraries—and most of his earlier books sell as well to-day as any of his later volumes. His first novel, "Unclassed," was published seventeen years ago; it was brought out in a new edition by Messrs. Lawrence and Bullen in 1895. "Demos" and "Isabel Clarendon" came next, both published in 1886, the first by Smith, Elder, and the second by Chapman and Hall. "Isabel Clarendon" is now out of print. "Thyrza" followed in 1887, "A Life's Morning" in 1888 (after running through the Cornhill); and "The Nether World" in 1889—all through Messrs. Smith, Elder in the old three-volume form, and now, like "Demos," obtainable in the six-shilling and popular editions, with the exception of "A Life's Morning," which can only be had in the cheaper editions at two shillings or half-a-crown. Messrs. Bentley published his next novel, "The Emancipated," in the following year—also in three volumes—to be subsequently issued in one-volume form by Messrs. Lawrence and Bullen. In 1891 Mr. Gissing returned to Messrs. Smith, Elder with "New Grub Street," which went through the three-volume form to the one-volume editions of its predecessors. A year later he published both with Messrs. A. and C. Black and Messrs. Lawrence and Bullen, the first with "Born in Exile," which went from the three-volume to the one-volume edition in 1893, and the second with "Denzil Quarrier." Messrs. Lawrence and Bullen, who took over the copyright of "Born in Exile" a few years ago, though it is still out of print, issued most of Mr. Gissing's later books—"The Odd Woman" in 1893; "In the Year of Jubilee" in 1894 (both originally in three volumes); "Eve's Ransom" in 1895 ("The Paying Guest" appearing in Cassell's Pocket Library in the same year); and "The Whirlpool" and "Human Odds and Ends" in 1897. All these, after passing for a time to Mr. Heinemann, are now published by Mr. Bullen. "The Town Traveller" (1898) came through Messrs. Methuen and is now in a second edition; the same publishers issued "The Crown of Life" in the following year. With his last novel "Our Friend the Charlatan"—published only a few weeks ago—Mr. Gissing appears again with Messrs. Chapman and Hall, who are also the publishers of the charmingly produced volume of his rambles "By the Ionian Sea." Every man has his intellectual desire, he writes in this latest book—as quoted in the review which appeared in Literature on June 29th:—

> Mine is to escape life as I know it and dream myself into that old world which was the imaginative delight of my boyhood. . . . The world of the Greeks and Romans is my land of Romance; a quotation in either language thrills me strangely, and there are passages of Greek and Latin verse which I cannot read without a dimming of the eyes, which I cannot repeat aloud because my voice fails me. In Magna Graecia the waters of two fountains mingle and flow together; how exquisite will be the draught!

One other volume should have been added to the list of Mr. Gissing's novels—"Sleeping Fires" which appears in Mr. Unwin's Antonym Library; and an article is worth mentioning which he contributed to the discussion on "The Place of Realism in Fiction," in the Humanitarian for July, 1895.

> Realism [he wrote] signifies nothing more than artistic sincerity in the portrayal of contemporary life; it merely contrasts with the habit of mind which assumes that a novel is written "to please people," that disagreeable facts must always be kept out of sight, that human nature must be systematically flattered, that the book must have a "plot," that the story should end on a cheerful note, and all the rest of it. . . . At the same time I joyfully compare the novelist's freedom of to-day with his bondage of only ten or twelve years ago. No doubt the new wine of liberty tempts to excess. Moreover, novels, nowadays, are not always written for the novel's sake, and fiction cries aloud as the mouthpiece

THE PLAYER AND THE PUBLI

A "Personal View."

By LAURIE MAGNUS.

In a "Personal View," publish[illegible] on June 15, [illegible] Walter Raleigh made the interesting sugg[illegible]tion" tha[illegible] attempt to bring dramatic thought and dra[illegible] [illegible] into touch with the modern theatre, the actor bars [illegible] It is a hard saying of its kind, but those of us who ha[illegible] compare the delivery of English blank verse with th[illegible] French heroic couplet or of the German dessyllab[illegible] London's hospitality to foreign actors has helped us to [illegible] a judgment—will be slow to dispute the conclusion re[illegible] Mr. Raleigh. Yet I fancy that this personal view [illegible] partial view of the matter. The theory that the tyran[illegible] actor sets the laws of composition at defiance, that h[illegible] to speak quite plainly, obstructs the business of the t[illegible] and prevents that subordination of characters and tha[illegible] development of the conflict which are essential to [illegible] art, is a quite tenable proposition, but it is not the wh[illegible] of the present decline of British drama. If Parliam[illegible] decide next week to prohibit interim applause—a self[illegible] which is habitual to many Continental audiences—the i[illegible] or ultimate effect on the inspiration of English pl[illegible] would, I surmise, be very small. It is doubtless tru[illegible] Raleigh shows in the form of a parable, that, "when th[illegible] theatre patronizes literature, it is not the theatre tha[illegible] literary, but literature that becomes stagey." But [illegible] remembers, it was not always so. Shakespeare was [illegible] literary because the modern theatre patronized him, no[illegible] fact that he was an actor bar the way to his revival of [illegible] the stage. And then, again, one remembers that it is [illegible] where so to-day. In Germany, for instance, dramati[illegible] and dramatic imagination are brought into touch [illegible] modern theatre, despite the common human nature of [illegible] in the Fatherland. Dr. Kuno Francke tells us, in his [illegible] Forces in German Literature":—

> German literature is at last beginning to partak[illegible] universal heightening of German national life of [illegible] foundation of the new Empire thirty years ago wa[illegible] far-shining signal. . . Once more is literature com[illegible] something more than a mere pastime or recreat[illegible] once more are writers coming forward who feel [illegible] have a mission to fulfil, whose highest desire it is [illegible] interpreters of the longings and aspirations of th[illegible] once more are novels and dramas being produc[illegible] arouse popular passion and enthusiasm, because they [illegible] in palpable and living forms, the momentous con[illegible] problems of the day.*

All this is intensely German. Englishmen are n[illegible] habit of thrilling to far-shining signals, or of going h[illegible] meet writers with a mission to fulfil, or of visiting the Till yesterday, at least, some years had elapsed since a writer had arisen in England "whose highest desire it is to be the interpreter of the longings and aspirations of the people," and even he, unfortunately, chose, for his second appeal, the music-hall instead of the theatre. Mr. William Watson, again, has evidently felt the sense of a mission upon him, but he has been the Jeremiah, and not the Ezekiel, of prophecy. The "momentous conflicts and problems of the day" have left the rest of our authors cold.

The point that strikes one most forcibly in any attempt to form a comparative estimate of the power and popularity of the theatre in Germany and England is the difference of the standards that are applied to it. Professor Francke, for instance, in this admirable book, is always digging down to the roots of national sentiment and feeling. In the epilogue, which chiefly distinguishes it from his earlier work on "Social Forces In German Literature," we come across remarks of this kind :—

> Even less veiled than this war between the powers temporal and spiritual is the second great conflict that threatens the public peace of Germany : the conflict between monarchy and democracy. There can be no doubt that this is the real point at issue between the socialist labour party and the Imperial Government. On the surface it is a question of labour organization, of the distribution of wealth, of strikes and wages.

And again :—

> . . . the third great struggle which has to be fought out in the twentieth century : the struggle between industrialism and humanity. Nowhere are the lines between employer and employed more sharply drawn than in Germany, nowhere is there more of class feeling and of class hatred.

But what, in the names of Tanqueray and Ebbsmith, and of the tailors who designed their gowns—one can imagine the London theatre-goer asking—has all this to do with drama ? Has not Mr. Courtney told us, in his lectures on "The Idea of Tragedy," that "people go to the theatre in order to be amused and to laugh ; they hardly care to be made to feel" ? And, against this, have we anything more hopeful to set than Mr. Pinero's promise, in a letter to the author of that book, that if "the tragic idea may yet find fruitful stimulus in the great tumult of Imperial emotions at present stirring the world-spirit of our peoples. . . . we poor modern playwrights will not be found wanting at least in the endeavour to respond to lofty and heroic inspiration" ? The world-spirit and its Imperial emotions are yet a little young in our midst, and these modest playwrights of to-day may still redeem their undertaking ; but I would contrast with these opinions and conclusions the deliberate judgment of Dr. Francke :—

> It is not the office of Poetry to solve social problems. It is the office of Poetry to hold out social ideals. The German drama of the last decade has fulfilled this mission with singular stability of purpose and with singular artistic success.

Do we look for the record of the "war between the powers spiritual and temporal ?" We find it in Wildenbruch's plays. Do we look for the "second great conflict . . . between visit the theatre in the Fatherland, not in orde by the epigrams of smart society, but in orde feel, in order to understand the human tendenc that are hanging in the air. The distinction believe, is at least partly one of education. The ing man has read Marx and Lassalle, and rea Huxley. I have heard him quote Plato in an im at a meeting, and this preparation makes a con ence when he ascends his throne in the galle visiting the theatre may be better than theirs, for the end in view of recreation and enjoyment criptive articles on the dresses, which are now a the dramatic criticism in the evening papers, variation on the German critic's discussion quantities of realism or idealism which went to play. But when it comes to a question of revi then, I think, we ought to recognize that State do something, and a training in elocution may do the greatest effort is required from the natio Courtney tells us, and I, for one, believe him, tha ahead, that out of the confusion of Jingoism and Li there will shine a bright national ideal out of lightning and the voice. But meantime, Le towards the close of his "Dramaturgie" applies to ourselves :—"What a naive idea to give national theatre, while we Germans are as yet no not speak of the political constitution, but o character." The nation's conscience has been are events in our history, but is its moral character to insist on the necessary reforms, or will it lethargy ? This is not an electoral manifesto, bu least, the problem of the future of British drama.

IMPERIAL LONDON.*

[By Mr. LAURENCE GOMME.]

Everything is Imperial now. And so the ca due course received its title, and the book s fact is before us. London is Imperial in mo one, in more senses certainly than Mr. Beavan has to contemplate and in more senses than its indifferent citizens recognize. Perhaps the mo thing about London is the unbounded admiration w who knows it well has for it compared with all othe unbounded indifference every one has for the mean that are necessary to make it what it is. No c neglected by the Imperial Government as London city is compelled to put up with makeshi administration as London is, and no capital city stand aside to suit, or wait upon, the interests of London is not only the first city of the Em no rival. There is scarcely a second to her, bec are so far behind. Mr. Beavan does not tell which illustrate the Imperial position of London is assumed, and thereupon ensues a description o

and scientific London, philanthropic and scholastic London, fashionable and military London, theatrical London, picturesque, botanical, and zoological London, and journalistic London. All this is very nice, and Mr. Beavan puts his facts pleasantly enough, and illustrates his book by some charming sketches, of which we reproduce some specimens. But it is not Imperial London that he is talking about. It is merely so many phases of London life—phases which are not peculiar to London unless treated in the comparative method in order to show how all these phases appear under the Imperial influence of the capital city. This Mr. Beavan does not do, and we are compelled, therefore, to state that his book does not answer to its title.

We have said that Mr. Beavan writes pleasantly enough on the topics he has chosen, but he does not write accurately nor up to the standard of the task he has attempted. "One hundred years ago," he tells us, "there were few learned societies in existence; the Royal Society, the Royal Institution, the Society of Arts, the Society of Antiquarians (sic), the Linnean Society, and the Geological Society. These still flourish in London, but not many additions have been made to this list of strictly scientific associations, only the Archæological, the Royal Astronomical, and the Royal Meteorological having come into being during the nineteenth century." Surely Mr. Beavan must know better than this. London is certainly noted above all other cities for the number and usefulness of its mere light pleasures. It is a pity that, having devoted chapter upon this interesting side of London life, M did not think it worth while to probe its depths and to ascertain what good is being done in London in th the benefit of the Empire.

Mr. Beavan's other chapters, pleasant reading th undoubtedly are, do not seem to us to go to the root and in particular they skip over all that is really i their several subjects. Thus, to mention one instance have this sentence: "Unlike other cities and to Continent, London has never been provided with ret places worthy of its size and population, and of such had, why some should have been so largely patronized neglected is a problem." Now London has practicall markets whatever. Its market system, like other p economic life, has been allowed to take care of itsel result that in place of proper markets we have "s the rich and costermongers for the poor, while the ways of London are in places a disgrace to modern and a harm and danger to the people by reason of the u markets tolerated there. As to why this is so one has seek, and Mr. Beavan could have stated the problem w if he had investigated the subject more fully.

GOVERNMENT OFFICES FROM ST. JAMES'S PARK.

It will be gathered from these criticisms that M has given us a pleasant book about London. But liberty against the influences of the Crown. The Sovereigns of England, unlike every other kingdom, never placed the seat of Government within the capital city. Parliament and the legal tribunals were outside the city walls at Westminster, in the fields, and there was always jealousy between the city and the outside. That jealousy, once the proud instincts of a freedom-loving people for institutions of their own, has now degenerated into the jealousy of keeping for the smallest area and the smallest number of people rights, powers, and traditions which belong by all the rules of civic life to the area and the people making up the actual corpus of citizenship. In popular imagination, in common parlance, and in actual practice, inhabitants of Whitechapel and Poplar, Holborn and Islington, Marylebone and Hampstead, Westminster and Hammersmith, Battersea and Lewisham, Bermondsey and Woolwich, boroughs created last year. An is unlimited. Few people can re without traversing old prejudice old errors. Mr. Beavan, for i writing of its palaces and givh sketch of Kensington Palace, t of the Royal palace of Greenw ruined palace at Eltham, and y the Imperial London to which attention. Military London is sentence or two without mentio Arsenal, or Plumstead depôt, in London. If these sort of in a history of Imperial London see that the true conception of is not even faintly grasped by th greatness need not make it impo it well, need not make it impos or administer, need not make it improve and knit together if jealousy of city and court is not the city and extra city.

FOUNTAIN COURT, TEMPLE.

The history of Imperial Lon us of the capital city of to-day a free life and to get rid of the the chains with which prejudice bind it. It would show how po used for all the purposes whic opulence can command, while are left to the masses who know how the great trade coming up it is left to the chance provision of for wharfage and dockage; and railways all centring upon the c left to go almost where they will up of their terminal stations.
of doings which influence the w and of buildings and sites full which comes only from associa great events of a national histor

Mr. Beavan does not inspir
His pages skim over the sub pictures, delightful of themselve duce any definite notion of Imperial London.
Beavan has ever felt the greatness of London w
To do this he must proceed further afield than am things which lend themselves to the artist's pencil. Let any one wishful to know something of Imperial London begin by steaming up the river from the lower reaches of the Thames; then let him take his place of observation in the busy hum of the city, and note the signs of world-wide life which are there to be noted; then let him wend his way to docks and manufactories, to local centres of industries that are not generally recognized as parts of London life; then to the seat of Government at Westminster, and thence to the ever-radiating mileage which serves as home to nearly five millions of people. There will be pictures enough at every stage, history enough at every centre, interest enough to any kind of inquirer. We wish Mr. Beavan had done something of this kind for the great subject upon which he has chosen to write, and then we should have had still more sympathy with the results.

CLIFFORD'S INN

A BIBLIOGRAPHY OF THE WAR.

[It is impossible, of course, at present to make a complete bibliography of the war. Our readers may, however, be glad to have a classified list of the books of different kinds so far published which bear on the subject. The list does not include books, such as that by Mr. E. T. Cook which we reviewed the other day, about the diplomacy that preceded the war or the settlement that must follow it.]

"The South African War." By Major S. L. (Murray, 6s.)

"Cassells' Illustrated History of the Boer War." B Dones. (Cassells, 7s. 6d.)

"The Story of the War in South Africa." By C T. Mahan. (Sampson Low, 10s. 6d. n.)

"The War to Date." By A. H. Scaife. (Unwin,

"Boer War, 1899-1900." By C M. E. Brunker. (Clowes, 2s. 6d.)

II. Personal Narratives of Partic Operations.

(i.) Books on the Natal Camp the Siege and Relief of Lad

"From Cape Town to Ladysmith W. Stevens. (Blackwood, 3s. 6d.)

"The Natal Campaign." By Be leigh. (Chapman and Hall, 6s.)

"How We Kept the Flag Flyi Donald Macdonald. (Ward, Lock, 6s.)

"The Siege of Ladysmith." M'Hugh. (Chapman and Hall, 3s. .)

"Ladysmith: The Diary of a Sie H. W. Nevinson. (Methuen, 6s.)

"Four Months Besieged: The Ladysmith." By H. H. Pearse. (Macm

"The Relief of Ladysmith." Atkins. (Methuen, 6s.)

"The Siege of Ladysmith." By (Newnes, 1s. n.)

(ii.) Books on the Kimberley- Campaign:—

"Towards Pretoria." By Julia (Pearson, 6s.)

"To Modder River with Metho A. Kinnear. (Arrowsmith, 1s.)

"Some Reminiscences of the War Africa." By the Earl de la Warr. (Blackett, 1s.)

"With Methuen's Column on an A Train." By E. N. Bennett. (Senn 2s. 6d.)

"Besieged by the Boers." By E. M.D. (Hutchinson, 3s. 6d.)

"Mafeking: A Diary of the Sie Major F. D. Baillie. (Constable, 6s.)

"The Siege of Mafeking." By J. ton. (Methuen, 6s.

(iii.) Relating the Exploits of Colonel Plumer's

"History of Rhodesia." By H. Heusman. (Black

III. Books on Experiences within the Boer Lin

"London to Ladysmith via Pretoria." By Winston Churchill. (Longmans, 6s.)

"The Story of my Captivity during the Transva By A. Hofmeyr. (Arnold, 6s.)

"Twice Captured." A Record of Adventure du Boer War. By the Earl of Rosslyn. (Blackwood, 10s.

"With the Boer Forces." By H. C. Hillegas. (Met

"Ten Months in the Field with the Boers." Lieutenant of General de Villebois-Mareuil. (Heineman

"My Experiences of the Boer War." By Count S (Longmans, 5s. n.)

"Pretoria From Within during the War." By H. (Shaw.)

"Souvenirs de la Guerre du Transvaal: Journal d' taire." Par H. Lesoy de la Marche. (Colin, 3f. 50c.)

IV. Other Books Giving Personal Experiences.

"The Work of the IXth Division." By Sir Ho

V. The War from Special Points of View.

(i.) Religious:—

"My Diocese During the War." By the Bishop of Natal. (Bell, 6s.)

"The Salvation Army at Work in the Boer War." By Mary Murray. 1s.

"Christians in Khaki." By Jesse Page. (Marshall, 1s. 6d.)

(ii.) Medical:—

"The Tale of a Field Hospital." By F. Treves. (Cassell, 6s.)

"Shadows of the War." By Dosia Bagot. (Arnold, 10s. 6d.)

"The Sick and Wounded in South Africa." By W. Burdett-Coutts. (Cassell, 1s. 6d.)

"A Civilian War Hospital." By the Professional Staff. (Murray, 12s. 6d. n.)

"On the War Path: A Lady's Letters from the Front." By Mrs. J. D. Leather Culley. (John Long, 3s. 6d.) Begins July, 1900.

(iii.) Various:—

"Australia at the Front." A Colonial View of the Boer War. By Frank Wilkinson. Illustrated by N. H. Hardy. 1901. (John Long, 6s.)

"The Canadian Contingents and Canadian Imperialism." By W. Sanford Evans (Unwin, 6s.)

"The Work of War Artists in South Africa." By A. C. R. Carter. (Virtue, 5s. n.)

"War's Brighter Side." By Julian Ralph. (Pearson, 6s.)

"The Journal of the C.I.V. in South Africa." By Major General W. H. Mackinnon. (Murray, 6s.)

"One Thousand Miles with the C.I.V." By J. B. Lloyd. (Methuen, 6s.)

"The Staff Work of the Anglo-Boer War." By Lady Briggs. (Grant Richards, 10s. 6d.).

"War Impressions: a Record in Colour." By Mortimer Menpes. (Black, 20s. n.).

"A Woman's Memories of the War." By Violet Brooke-Hunt. (Nisbet, 5s.).

"Trooper 8,008 I.Y." By the Hon. S. Peel. (Arnold, 7s. 6d.).

"I.Y., An Imperial Yeoman at War." By "The Corporal." (Stock, 3s. 6d.).

(iv.) Criticism:—

"An Absent-Minded War: Being some Reflections on our Reverses." By a British Officer. (Milne, 2s. 6d.)

"War and Policy." By Spenser Wilkinson. (Constable, 15s.)

"Lessons of the War." By S. Wilkinson. (Constable, 2s. 6d.)

"The War Office, the Army, and the Empire." By H. O. Arnold Forster, M.P. (Cassell, 6s.)

"The Tactics of To-day." By Major C. E. Callwell. (Blackwood, 2s. 6d. n.)

"Army Administration: A Business View." By Centurion. (Constable, 1s.)

"Notes on Reconnoitring in South Africa." (Longmans, 1s. n.)

"Yeomanry, Cavalry, or Mounted Infantry." By Colonel Rolleston. (Smith Elder, 1s. 6d.)

"Wrecking the Empire." By J. M. Robertson (Grant Richards, 5s.)

(v.) Miscellaneous:

"How to Read War News." With a Glossary of Military Technical Terms. (Unwin, 1s.)

"Golden Deeds of the War." By A. T. Story. (Newnes, 5s.)

"The Transvaal in Peace and War." By Neville Edwards. (Virtue, 7s. 6d. n.)

"Mechanical Traction in War." By Lieutenant-Colonel O. Layrez. (Sampson Low, 5s. n.)

VI. Fiction (not including Books for Boys).

(i.) General:—

"The Wedge of War." By Frances S. Hallowes. (Elliot Stock).

"An Imperial Light Horseman." By Harold Blore. (Pearsons, 6s.)

"A Fighter in Khaki." By Ralph Rodd. (John Long, 3s. 6d.)

"In the Wake of the War." By St. John Adcock. (Hodder and Stoughton, 2s. 6d.)

"Cease Fire!" By J. Maclaren Cobban. (Methuen, 3s. 6d.)

"The Despatch Rider." By Ernest Glanville. (Methuen, 6s.)

SHAKESPEARE FIRST FOLI

Tuesday last saw another record set up reference to the Shakespeare folios, the occasion of a very fine copy of the First Folio, which, contest, was knocked down to Mr. Quaritch for the highest price yet paid for a Shakespeare fo on the second Tuesday in July just two year previous record for the First Folio was made in th Mr. Harvey bidding £1,700 for a copy of the same Tuesday's folio is, if anything, in somewhat than the copy sold in 1899, as it is only very and the repaired leaves are not many. But it is as it measures only 325mm. by 207mm. In this resp to some other perfect copies known, and notabl in the possession of the Duke of Devonshire and Coutts, though it outdistances them all in rega ness. The First Folio was published in 1623 at A contemporary note in the unique Sheldon copy by Mr. Sidney Lee shows that that volume was for £3 15s. The earliest record of a First Folio occurs in a catalogue of 1687, but the price is catalogue of nearly one hundred years later, 1756, first folio was sold for £3 3s. Judging by the pri Sheldon copy it might be assumed that that o imperfect, though it is most probable that it question of fashion, for we know that at that date were not nearly so much sought after as early classics and fine examples of the Continental pr the price of the first folio at auction had in which five years later, in the Roxburghe sale, £100. In 1818 the price was £121, and some year Wilks sale, it had gone up to £155, but the er prices did not set in till the Daniel sale in 1 was given for the copy now belonging to the Ba Coutts. It is only within the last two years, hov price has run into four figures, two of the instanc referred to above, while a third was the Daly c in New York in March, 1900, for close upon £1,08 stand that if the 1899 copy had come to the ha Tuesday dealers would have been prepared t £2,000 for it.

With reference to the Shakespeare First F being prepared by the Oxford Press, of which particulars, the Periodical says:

> The efforts that Mr. Sidney Lee is making t present whereabouts of the extant copies of t First Folio have produced for him a vast corre owners both in America and in this country. F has been shown to assist in the research, and n in fine condition, the existence of which has no recorded by bibliographers, have come to light. enses families have been met with who have ch many generations the unhappy delusion that th of a First Folio, whereas investigation of the v prized has proved it to be either an imperfect c folio or one of the earliest of the "facsimile" rei century. The majority of copies now in Ame exported comparatively recently by London bo ownership of the American copies seems in ma change with perplexing frequency.

something still more wonderful. She is not only a superb actress, she is a superb athlete. And when I call her a superb actress I mean that she has a superb temperament. It has been the fashion to insist upon her mimetic skill. In comparing her, for instance, with Signora Duse, people are in the habit of saying that she is more "theatrical," less "natural." I am more than ever convinced that this is a mistake. Sarah Bernhardt plays her own nature, her own temperament, for all that it is worth, just as Eleanora Duse does, and the difference between the two players is one of nature rather than one of method. The one actress is no more able to disguise her real self than is the other. Take Mme. Bernhardt in Phèdre. It is a "classic" part if ever there was one—classic, I mean, in the Gallic sense, ceremonious and elegant, a little trim and geometrical like the Park of Versailles, in short, genuine Louis Quatorze. But the actress deliberately romanticizes it, makes it a compound of raving beast and swooning odalisque, a Racinian idea touched up by Baudelaire and Verlaine. Some one objects, But is that the true Racine? The answer is that there is no true Racine one and indivisible, the world making its Racines for itself as it goes along. That is the special virtue of a classic (not in the Gallic but in the universal sense). It is always being "born again," as Mrs. Poyser said of something else "and born different." We of to-day cannot see Racine with the eye of his contemporaries, and it really does not matter.

"Les mêmes œuvres," says Anatole France, "se reflètent diversement dans les âmes qui les contemplent. Chaque génération d'hommes cherche une émotion nouvelle devant les ouvrages des vieux maîtres." The point is, does Mme. Bernhardt give us this "émotion nouvelle" in Phèdre? There can be but one answer to this question. On the night this play was performed Her Majesty's Theatre was densely packed, and the conventional phrase is really for once strictly accurate—the actress held her huge audience spell-bound. She was languid, she was frenzied, sometimes she chanted her mellifluous lines like a chorister, at others the words rattled in her throat like the hoarse growls of a panther balked of its prey. Her eyes gleamed with lust and then turned blank with despair. Every attitude seemed to fall into its place in a single design of harmonious beauty. Her death scene was like the gradual extinction of a volcano. But I may as well cease hunting for similes, for I fear how hopeless is the attempt to describe these rare moments of great acting. For me this performance of Mme. Bernhardt ranks as the supreme thing in the acting of passionate womanhood, just as Duse's Mirandolina ranks as the supreme thing in the acting of capricious womanhood, "uncertain, coy, and hard to please." Racine was a bold man in putting the passionate woman, without a single veil of reticence to cover her, on the stage, and, frightened at his own temerity, he never attempted the thing again and soon resigned playwriting altogether. To-day we are all mortally afraid of passion, naked and not ashamed; I mean that we are afraid to look upon its image, for presumably it plays as great a part in human life as ever it did. There is no passion, for instance, in La Dame aux Camélias, only a false sentimentality, a sickly pathos. There is no passion in La Tosca, only the crude violence of melodrama. When Mme. Bernhardt ceases to play in them they will cease to exist. And there is no passion, absolutely none, in the absurdly overrated L'Aiglon and Cyrano of M. Rostand. There was a touch of it, just a touch, in his Princesse Lointaine, and I cannot help regretting that Mme. Bernhardt has dropped that

CURRENT LITERATUR

THE LESSONS AND FALLACIES OF TH

THE RELATIONS OF GEOGRAPHY AND HISTORY. By H. I Fellow of New College, Oxford. Clarendon Press,

There is an enormous amount of useful infor happy generalization compressed into this little t might serve as an introduction either to Hawley's Op War or to Freeman's Historical Geography. For M is dealing with the subjects which lie on the debatea between military and political history, and which eludes in any complete survey of the one or the o manual, therefore, must be equally valuable to the wishes to get a broad view of the great campaig seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth centuries, student at the University who has to grasp the f facts of the making of modern political geography.

The book falls into two sections. Eight chapter the general rules by which geographical facts influenc developments. Thirteen more apply the theories the first section to the various regions of the globe.
America are dealt with (though on a slighter scale) n Europe. We had occasion, little more than a year ag eize another book which was intended to carry out of the same plan; but between Mr. George's work
Dr. Miller Maguire there is an enormous differe manner of execution. The advantage lies entirely on the work that is now before us, where orderly arrang the logical working out of cause and effect replace m observed facts and long and arid strings of names.
No one with the two books before him could hesi moment which he should recommend to the student soldier or civilian—of historical geography.

Besides the ordinary topics of the geographe ethnologist, there are many secondary issues on George finds space to say a few weighty words. We n an example the chapter on "The Fallacies of the Map, which (as the author remarks) Bacon would have c Charta if they had been known in his day. The tw those which may be called the "nationalist" fall
"natural frontiers" fallacy.

The politician who wants an argument to su aspiration produces a map coloured to suit his pur is working the "nationalist" fallacy, all districts given language is spoken are tinted alike, regardle of the fact that in some of them another language current; and the world is asked to draw the conc all ought, in justice and fairness, to be under the sa ment. Or a country in which different races live same political rule is coloured to show the variety of the world is invited to infer that one or another of t in justice to be politically separated from the rest.
other hand the map-maker is supporting the boundary fallacy," the map is used to show how extr venient certain well-marked geographical frontiers for a given nation, and the inference is tacitly draw nation has a moral right to seize them if it can.

It is one of the ironies of modern politics that Fr licists, after harping for three generations on one of t

as if it had been a French empire, and as if France was the natural inheritor of its limits. But since the war of 1870-71, when aspirations after the Rhine boundary have become futile, the other geographical heresy, that nationality is coincident with language, has been brought to the front. We are now asked to hold that Metz, and perhaps Liége and Geneva, ought to be French towns, because a map showing the divisions of ethnology or language would colour them with the same hue that it uses for Paris.

As a matter of fact it is equally futile to press to its logical result one or the other of these two theories. Neither "natural boundaries" nor racial homogeneity make a nation, but the sentiment of national unity; and that sentiment may overrule the most striking difficulties in the way of geography, or on the other hand may refuse to come into existence in spite of every favouring circumstance of place and race. The Greeks are a real nationality in spite of their sporadic dispersion over so many shores and islands. The Swiss are a real nationality, though they speak three tongues, are divided by two religions, and have the main chain of the Alps passing through the midst of their territory. On the other hand, Norway and Sweden, where race, religion, language, and physical juxtaposition all plead for unity, steadily refuse to coalesce, and are more divided in spirit at the present moment than when they were first united in 1815. It is useless then to draw race-maps of the Austrian Empire, or Belgium, or Switzerland, and to argue from them that disruption is right and natural. If there is a possibility that the one may break up, and a certainty that the other two will cohere, it is a matter purely of sentiment and not of physical or ethnological geography.

We have, perhaps, spent too much time over the excellent chapter in which Mr. George sets forth these conclusions. But we must find space to praise the section in which he deals with the Alps and their defiles, as fundamental facts in historical geography. Nothing is more easy, when dealing with such a subject, than to construct a mere list of summits and passes. It is far more difficult to draw up the historical reasons which in one age or another have given a temporary or a permanent importance to the individual passes, but this Mr. George has most successfully accomplished. Not least of his luminous generalizations is the one which, on pages 313-15, shows why in certain ages the Alps have had no practical influence on European history. Under the Cæsars they were not a frontier; in the Middle Ages the entities Italy and Germany did not exist; both were included in the "Holy Roman Empire," and the regions in and about them were divided up into so many small States, all virtually independent, and all formally included in the Empire, that the mountains were of little political importance. If the Emperor had to expect opposition on one route, he could take another, sometimes a very roundabout one. It is interesting, for example, to remember that Henry IV. went from Germany to humiliate himself at Canossa by way of the Mont Cenis. It was only when the fiction of the Holy Roman Empire had been forgotten, when France had come up to the Alps, and when large States like Savoy, Milan, and Venice had grown up in the valley of the Po, that the passes began to have a real influence on history. We note that Mr. George asserts that "the use of the Alpine roads has been almost entirely one-sided; invaders pour into Italy, but Italy has never, save during old Roman days, sent out her armies East or West or North." At least two exceptions to this generalization must be made—the Lombards about the year 600 A.D. poured into Provence and Burgundy, and (but for Munamolus) might have

GILBERT WHITE.

The Life and Letters of Gilbert White. leigh Holt-White. (Murray, 3

That no authentic account of the life or re general letters of Gilbert White should have a remarkable fact when the general este historian of Selborne is held by naturalists and life is taken into consideration. We feel, indebted to Mr. Rashleigh Holt-White, a gra historian of Selborne, for availing himself of hi a member of the family and publishing in two the letters, journals, and accounts which h appeared. Mr. Holt-White states in his pref worthy account of Gilbert White's career This is hardly correct. Professor Bell, who p house, and occupied it for nearly thirty yea information respecting the previous owner, and his very valuable edition of White's Selborne in 1877. In addition to this there is a long and account in the "Dictionary of National B appeared as late as last year, by one of the n zoological writers, Professor Newton. Singula two accounts are not acknowledged in the pref nor is any allusion made to the article by Jess ings of Natural History." Mr. Holt-White strongly against the misstatements that hav regarding the historian of Selborne, more espe the notes that have appeared to the innumerab well-known work.

The volumes begin with the early history o appear to be descendants of the guti or riti, wh the early Saxons, the present name White bel corruption of their tribal name. The family Selborne, where Gilbert White was born, birth, the country was so badly cultivated perfectly secluded, and could not be discovered and the roads were so bad that access was almo The description of the state of the country in remarkably characteristic. Speaking of the writes:—

> The hundreds (of Essex) in general look p fear of ague makes people dislike them. vales are bad, and there you meet with a hor a sound bottom, which is very convenient f it, but my horse found it so narrow that he and had cut himself all four. I hope the here, I shall escape the ague.

Travelling at that period must have been roads were so bad that White makes a speci horse vehicle reaching Selborne, and he himself by coach was afflicted with coach sickness.

Those who have interested themselves in t White are aware that of late years some attack upon his personal character. As long since as 18 when editing the "Colleges of Oxford" stated of his being the model clergyman, residing in h interested in all that concerned the parish in w he was from a college point of view, a rich sinecu resident . . . who continued to enjoy the deeply mortgaged, and he never received more than the modest stipend of a curate. In holding his fellowship and the small college living of Moreton Pinkney, he took a course which other fellows had taken before him, and which was in no sense blameable or exceptional. He did not conceal his real pecuniary position from his college, and he did not, as is alleged, own at Selborne any patrimonial estate.

By his will, White bequeathed £100 to Oriel, and the Provost in acknowledging the receipt of the legacy said, "We shall take care that your uncle's kind remembrance of us shall not be forgotten, his memory will ever be respected by his Oxford friends, and dear to those of his own college, at least I am sure it will ever be so to your faithful and obedient servant J. Eveleigh." It is well known that, although White never married, he had on more than one occasion a desire to do so, but the obstacle to matrimony was that his income without his fellowship, which would have to be vacated on his marriage, would have been insufficient to support a family, and if he had accepted preferment, which was offered to him, he would have had to leave his beloved Selborne.

These volumes are particularly readable and entertaining, and not only to naturalists. They derive much value from the graphic account they give of the life of a country clergyman in the eighteenth century. Mr. Holt-White, though not himself a naturalist, has done his work with great conscientiousness. He is not a practised author, and many slips, which would have been avoided by a more skilled editor, might be noticed. More care might have been taken in the spelling of proper names, and the description of the arms of the White family are given in two different versions in the first volume and in the pedigree at the end of the second volume—neither version, we fancy, being absolutely correct.

The allusion to the numerous editions of the "Natural History" is excessively imperfect. In fact Mr. Holt-White only enumerates those which were practically reprints of the first edition, and mentions no editions published later than eighty years since. Despite these omissions the thanks of all naturalists and lovers of country life are due to the editor for these volumes, which all lovers of Gilbert White will read with the greatest pleasure.

W. B. TEGETMEIER.

Side by side with the Life and Letters of Gilbert White comes yet another new issue of the "Natural History," which has been edited with an introduction and notes by Professor Miall and Mr. Warde Fowler. Of the notes there is not much to be said. After the numerous editions of White, which approach one hundred in number, little can be added to the remarks of the previous editions. Professor Miall's introduction is mainly based upon the accounts previously published by Bell and Professor Newton. Mr. Fowler adds a few pages on White's erroneous views as to the migration of birds. The volume includes not only the natural history, but the antiquities of Selborne, and observations on the various parts of nature, which were compiled from White's diaries by Dr. Aitkin and published by him in 1802.

BUCHANAN—AND OTHERS.

ROBERT BUCHANAN: A CRITICAL APPRECIATION, AND OTHER ESSAYS. By HENRY MURRAY. (Philip Wellby. 5s. n.)

self-assertion should begin [illegible] in this [illegible] is not surprising that almost everything written of hi[illegible] who knew him intimately should savour of hypo[illegible] actually of hysteria. Certainly Mr. Murray is a d[illegible] of Buchanan himself. There are ten articles in [illegible] volume of essays, and every one of them is marked [illegible] that vigour and exaggeration which gave emphasis [illegible] withheld authority from, almost everything which [illegible] wrote. Some of the articles we seem to have [illegible] in one of the Sunday papers; and all alike are wr[illegible] flowing pen, and, from a purely journalistic point of [illegible] "good copy" and effective. But as a criticism the[illegible] fail from an entire lack of that sense of proportion wit[illegible] criticism cannot even begin to exist. Violence and ex[illegible] disfigure every page; and, though at first the reade[illegible] amused by Mr. Murray's judicial gymnastics, he soo[illegible] of the instability and perverse audacity of the whole [illegible] taste can feast long upon this sort of hors d'œuvres of [illegible]

The essay upon Buchanan occupies about one [illegible] volume, and during its course Mr. Murray delivers [illegible] some disconcerting obiter dicta. Stevenson's [illegible] "cherry-stone chef d'œuvres"; and the three Vict[illegible] "sweetest of posthumous regard" are Tennyson, Bro[illegible] Buchanan himself. As a set-off against this enthusi[illegible] Pye, and Crabbe are combined together for the m[illegible] Murray's contempt, and such a violence upon Crabb[illegible] defined, if restricted, talent merely proves that Mr. [illegible] temperamentally disqualified from poetic criticism of a[illegible] or authority. Again, we are told that Bucha[illegible] exponent of the deeper intellectual life of his epoch a[illegible] in its religious evolution was truer, more complete, [illegible] fore, in so far greater than his two great and fri[illegible] Browning and Tennyson"; and judgments of this s[illegible] able as they are to Mr. Murray's loyalty, are not muc[illegible] of his judgment. In short, the whole essay on Bu[illegible] scarcely be taken seriously; it is an exercise in speci[illegible] of a particularly hyperbolical type.

The other articles are for the most part reprint[illegible] of current literature, and of purely ephemeral interes[illegible] book closes with an "open-letter" to a young [illegible] meditates a literary career—a letter so packed wit[illegible] ment and perversion of fact as to invite rather fuller [illegible] tion. "I write the words in all sad sincerity," [illegible] Murray, "honestly believing that in this year of g[illegible] high literary capacity is as dire a curse as can wi[illegible] an unmoneyed Englishman." Here, again, the di[illegible] Buchanan is patent; here is the old pessimism [illegible] "literary career" with which we are all long sin[illegible] familiar. But Mr. Murray out-Herods Herod. "[illegible] very rarely done with any honesty, or with any desire [illegible] the interests of literature. On the majority of jo[illegible] scamped as lightly and as easily as possible; on the [illegible] and professedly literary organs it is performed wit[illegible] cynical dishonesty." We confess that we find some[illegible] unedifying in the spectacle of a man of letters [illegible] decrying the honour of his craft, but, when he pr[illegible] wholesale imputation of dishonest motives, he pu[illegible] out of the arena of honourable argument altog[illegible] Murray cannot be ignorant that there was never a [illegible] literary ability was less of a "misfortune" and sou[illegible] nition than it is at present; indeed, the great fault [illegible]

daily and weekly criticism was ever more honourably or more capably performed than it is at present. But Buchanan, in certain well-known utterances about the literary life, set a fashion of defiant pessimism, which Mr. Murray and a few others of his followers seem unwisely anxious to preserve. They would do better to look round for themselves and test a few of their too dogmatic accusations. If they did so sincerely, they would find cause to moderate and readjust their judgment.

SOME RECENT PHILOSOPHICAL BOOKS.

Ethics.

Mr. A. E. Taylor's PROBLEM OF CONDUCT (Macmillan, 10s. n.) is the most noteworthy book on ethics that has appeared for some time in our language. Not that it will meet with general approval; quite the reverse. Its faults lie upon the surface—and underneath. It is very ill-constructed, full of repetitions, redundancies, and digressions, with no index or table of contents, or anything else to guide one through the colossal chapters. The young thinker rushing into print with his first book is very much in evidence all through. Nor is the general tone agreeable. A remarkable cocksureness and acrimony are prominent, with a free and frequent handling of questions usually described as "delicate." And the philosophic standpoint is not speculatively hopeful or practically comforting to any one who takes morality seriously. Mr. Taylor believes in a "Beyond Good and Bad," in other words, a Spinozistic or Bradleyan Absolute in which moral distinctions are merged, not to say lost. Hence he concludes that both morality and religion are mere practical compromises which prove irrational and bankrupt when philosophically analyzed. And yet, when all this has been said, it remains true that his book will have to be read by all who wish to keep in touch with the progress of ethical theory. For it is an honest and vigorous effort to carry Mr. F. H. Bradley's metaphysical theories into the ethical domain, a task which had not been seriously attempted before. Mr. Taylor insists strongly that ethics should be an empirical inquiry and that metaphysical conclusions should result entirely from a review of experience. We agree with him, but do not think he adheres to his own precept. To us the book seems saturated with metaphysics; indeed to derive its main interest from that very fact. It would be unfair, however, to say that the interest is all metaphysical. Mr. Taylor's spirited criticism of current moral practice and doctrine abounds in happy observations and corrections of common mistakes. There is also a curious personal note about it, reminding one of Schopenhauer, as though the author's theory represented his experience of life. It is evident, too, that Mr. Taylor knows what is going on in psychology, an accomplishment not too common among British moralists.

In the sixth edition of the late Henry Sidgwick's METHODS OF ETHICS (Macmillan, 14s. n.) we have the last of the life-work of an earnest thinker and good man. He only lived to carry the revision half way through the book; the remainder has been seen through the press almost unchanged by his friend and pupil, Miss Constance Jones, of Girton. The alterations in the first half are, as might be expected, not considerable in principle, though they illustrate Sidgwick's constant striving for definiteness of thought and corresponding clearness of expression. But this edition is made important by the fact that Miss Jones'

Prof. Wilhelm Wundt's PRINCIPLES OF MORA DEPARTMENTS OF THE MORAL LIFE (Sonnenschein, 7 lated by Dr. Margaret Washburn, forms the third comprehensive "Ethics." A debt of gratitude is du lators, who have now completed their task of mak to us one of the main works of the most emi German thinkers. This debt, however, real and soli will be felt by professional specialists rather than t interested in ethical questions. For the book li the atmosphere of speculation changes as we p country to another, even when that other country us in philosophy as Germany. Prof. Wundt hard one of the problems that form the staple of an ord ethical work, such as the "Methods of Ethics" or of Conduct" just noticed, to take the first exa He views human activity in all its forms as esse festation of will, and moral goodness as an ident individual with the common will. To reason and he assigns a very subordinate function in human this is doubtless familiar enough in Germany Englishman who is not prepared for this pecul Wundt's "Ethics" will be a sealed book. His be increased by the fact that the standpoint is disclosed in the present work, but has to be gath Prof. Wundt has written elsewhere on logic and p

Logic.

Mr. Alfred Sidgwick's USE OF WORDS IN REA C. Black, 7s. 6d. n.) is a criticism of formal logic wi for replacing it by a more intelligent system. upon the existing state of things are severe, but deserved. The condition of what is known in Oxf logic" is nothing less than an educational scanda generally recognized that elementary logic shou higher education, no one has the authority to refo from the mass of mediæval absurdities which ch seems no chance of any improvement till some gre body, like the University of Oxford itself, causes a text-book to be written. To clear the way toward Sidgwick's book will do excellent service. elementary logic will always be to prevent men fr elementary mistakes in reasoning. Mr. Sidgwi that the way to do this is not to multiply rule abstract "reasoning process," but to direct a general characteristics of the matter reasone exposition of this truth in its various aspects show a dry and complicated subject to which few men c

Psychology.

Professor Joseph Jastrow's FACT AND FABLE (Macmillan, 8s. 6d. n.) is a collection of reprinted bond of union is that they all deal more or le matters psychological. The author has the A clear exposition, and in the variety of subjects layman will find much to interest and instruct hi half the volume is devoted to criticism of popular Prof. Jastrow conceives to be such. The titles essays, "The Modern Occult," "The Problem Research," indicate the kind of errors he has much discontented with the methods and conc Society for Psychical Research, which he plainly the resuscitation of "spiritualist superstitions entirely re-arranged, enriched with new material and appendices on points of philosophic importance, and altogether makes a great improvement on the first edition of thirty years ago. Prof. Fraser's own contributions to the volumes it would be almost impertinent to praise. Berkeley is a subject which he has made peculiarly his own. Nearly forty years have elapsed since the appearance of his first essay on "The Real World of Berkeley"; and we are heartily glad to see him now at a venerable age rounding off his work of popularizing one of the most profound and stimulating of thinkers.

Nietzsche.

One great obstacle which has hitherto stood in the way of a general knowledge of Nietzsche's teaching has been the unmanageable size of his books. We do not mind ploughing through a big volume which we only half understand if we are supported by the conviction that we are doing something solidly improving. But no one cares for a jeu d'esprit of 500 pages, the length of "Zarathustra," which the author prided himself on making half-unintelligible. Thus, granting that the diffusion of Nietzsche's principles is desirable, Mr. Common has done well in compiling a volume of selections on NIETZSCHE AS CRITIC, PHILOSOPHER, POET, AND PROPHET (Grant Richards, 7s. 6d.). The extracts, carefully, if not brilliantly, translated suffice to give us the main aspects of Nietzsche, and are, in any case, much anew the praise or blame of all human qualities and ch The apotheosis of strength of course involves the re the moral values of Christianity and humanitarianism replaced by the "Overman." Using this clue, the re is recommended to begin with the extracts on Ethics, no difficulty in finding his way through what might seem to be a maze of topsy-turvy nonsense. He wi Nietzsche was not uttering a gratuitous blasphemy for example, "In the whole of the New Testament only figure appears which demands our respect Pilate, governor;" or in ending his rhapsody, "Now the Futur with the words "God is dead; we now want the to live."

NIETZSCHE

Professor William Knight's VARIA; STUDIES IN OR PHILOSOPHY AND ETHICS (Murray, 7s. 6d. n.) ar addresses which have been delivered from year to introductions to the author's class-lectures at St. They range over a fair variety of topics, such as "Ou Philosophical Outlook," "Poetry and Science," and the dation of Public Opinion," but do not start much n Their style, however, is agreeable, the poetical quota and the sentiments unexceptionable. Modestly refer the author himself as "Nugae," they may be recomm those who do not like their philosophy too strong. T of the title "Philosophy and Ethics" is a little st first till one realizes that "ethics" means "practical m

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Mr. Bodley's "France."

Mr. J. E. C. Bodley has just brought out in France edition written by himself of his well-known book on th and Working of French Political Institutions. As he without complacency, in his preface, "my compatriots have the necessary leisure to cultivate these audacit which does not surprise me, now that I have successfu to a certain extent the genius of the French tongue." will now appeal to the public whom, after all, it pa concerns; and this public will be struck by the con the writer that the Third Republic is bound eventuall way before the multiple assaults by which it is be Bodley expresses general ideas which may often be Taine, and which, when they are personal, almost h reflect the bias of that portion of the fashionable Fre with which he has been thrown. Hence the courage w he says again and again, "the Third Republic will n long as the Hanoverian dynasty." Mr. Bodley originally book before the Dreyfus affair. In the preparation edition was an admirable opportunity for attempting by the touchstone of the facts revealed during this gre his often accurate and instructive, but singularly unsa observations. Yet Mr. Bodley has carefully neglec opportunity. In his preface he tells us that he has only it. But he has made notable changes, especially in th on the French Socialists. If, after the Dreyfus affair, M could write such a sentence as the following, one is te regret that he did not postpone all allusion to this matt subsequent volume:—"The action of the Socialists i ment in the Dreyfus affair showed their incapacity to p deviatingly the realization of their so-called social ide

Canada and the Empire.

THE CANADIAN CONTINGENTS, by W. Sanford Evans (Unwin, 6s.), is not merely an account of the gallant exploits of the men of Paardeberg, but a treatise on the past, present, and probable future of Canadian Imperialism. The military history in the book is not, indeed, much more than a common-place compilation; the political essay is valuable and suggestive. "Is the existing machinery for the management of Canada's external activities and of its co-operation with the other parts of the Empire wholly satisfactory?" That is the question which Mr. Evans raises, and his reply to it is:—

> The most economical and safest machinery does not exist in Canada for managing its external interests; and there are defects in the connexions with the other parts of the Empire and with foreign countries which impair efficiency through an unsteady transmission or waste of power.

This "because there is no one agency in Canada to which the work of managing Imperial activities has been definitely entrusted," and because there is no provision for consulting colonial feeling before adopting a line of policy from which war is likely to result. Mr. Evans continues:—

> These considerations lead up to the solution I venture to suggest for the immediate difficulties. There must be in the Dominion Government a Minister who is as distinctly and definitely responsible for the external activities of Canada as is the Colonial Secretary in England for Colonial Affairs or the Foreign Secretary for Foreign Affairs.

Arguments might be urged against this proposal as well as in favour of it. The danger that a Canadian Imperial Minister might use his position, under popular pressure, to force a war with France over the Newfoundland fisheries is not to be ignored. Its appearance, however, is welcome evidence that young Canada does not shrink from its responsibilities, and it will, no doubt, be carefully considered in high quarters if Canada formally adopts it.

The Influence of Public Schools.

Mr. J. G. Cotton Minchin's OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS (Swan Sonnenschein, 6s.) has quite a place of its own among the many books about public schools that have been written lately. It is no set and formal history systematically or chronologically arranged, but a continual out-pouring of anecdotes about old masters and old boys—such as one hears when old boys foregather, but on a grander scale—together with occasional expressions of opinion as to the superiority of public schools to all other schools whatsoever and wheresoever. Not being a Ruglsian, Mr. Minchin naturally refuses to give Dr. Arnold the credit for all the improvements that have ever taken place in public schools since his time. Even in the fashioning of prigs, he points out, Dr. Moberly of Winchester was quite his equal, the principal difference being that Moberly's prigs were High Churchmen, whereas Arnold's prigs were Broad Churchmen. Each sort of prig has had, no doubt, a place and a use of his own in the general scheme of things; and Mr. Minchin has a reasoned and temperate admiration for both headmasters, though he refuses to give either of them the glory that is the other's due. He makes a mistake, however, in supposing that it was the English public school system with which the author of "A quoi tient la supériorité des Anglo-Saxons" fell in love. The school on which M. Demolins based the conclusions set forth in that book is a private school—the particular enterprise of a gentleman whom the majority of except that the proofs have been abominabl tient la supériorité," "Deus dat incrementum," are only a few of many errors allowed to pass them is noted in the long list of corrigenda.

The Knights of the Garter.

In THE STALL PLATES OF THE KNIGHTS OF T
GARTER, 1348-1485, by W. H. St. John Hope ( Constable, 12s. 6d. n. each), we have the beginnin heraldic work. Affixed to the backs of the stal
St. George's Chapel, Windsor, are a consider plates of gilded brass, varying much in which bear the enamelled or painted arms of t Order of the Garter. The series extends over a p of five centuries, and there still remain about six memorials, or nearly seventy-two per cent. of t number. In the interesting letterpress th these plates, Mr. Hope points out that the stat originally provide that as soon as one of the fi die, a shield of his arms (made of metal) and h fixed to the back of his stall, and that his succes manner set up their arms beneath those of the f that their plates shall be of a smaller size. The s VIII. made two changes—viz., that the plate of a put up within a year of his installation, instead and that knights who were foreigners might set up or fashion that they liked. The size of the p four inches to fifteen in length, the larges foreign examples.

Mr. Hope considers that the dimensions up, ten and a-half by seven and a-half inches, a posterous." In the excellent critical introducti divided into six special groups, the study o light many interesting details. The exact n memorials now extant is 588; but the numb have been elected into the Order from 1348 dow time is 812. The missing plates are to be accou ways—viz., through theft, through removal degradation, and through neglect of the statu erection. The third reason probably accoun largest number of those that are missing. As known to have been stolen since the publishing
One of these—viz., that for Sir Charles So Worcester (1514-26)—actually came to light a y
the shop of a marine store-dealer in New Z replaced in its proper stall in 1898. It is propo cation, which is to be completed in eight parts, of 90 full-size coloured facsimiles, each havin
note. The first part, in addition to the introduct plates; the earliest of these are two of the f
John de Grailly, who died in 1377, and Sir N died in 1386. A charming small example is th Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick (1373-1401). The Astley, who died in 1486, is beautifully executed, arms sink into insignificance when compared detail of the helm and crest and mantling;
silver harpy, and the red mantling is powdere gold flowers. He was the elder son of Sir T Nailston, co. Leicester. In August, 1438, he de Masse in Paris, in a mounted combat; and, fou was the victor in a fight with axes against Aragon, at Smithfield; this latter achievement hood and a pension of 100 marks a year. In 1 existence, have been men of special distinction. The facsimiles reflect much credit on the publishers; it is a pleasure to note that the general effect is not spoilt by attempting to reproduce actual gilding.

A Sentimental Journey.

The peregrinations of Mrs. Kate Douglas Wiggin's Penelope are almost as well known by many as those of Homer's Ulysses. Her travels in Scotland and England are now followed by PENELOPE'S IRISH EXPERIENCES (Gay, Bird, 6s.), which will give an equal amount of delight to her admirers. For our own part as we read through these trivial, facile, elegant, and allusive pages we are inclined to cry aloud for the Mrs. Wiggin of "Timothy's Quest." Salemina, Francesca, Benella, Mr. Beresford, and the rest, may be real people for all we know, while Timothy of the Quest was certainly an invention, but he was the true man. The present ladies and gentlemen act up to the guide-books, as it were, and perform their tricks just at the right moment at which to see a good view of "the Urbs Intacta" or to drag in a verse by Father Prout. But Mrs. Wiggin's delicacy and charm can never leave her even when she devotes to the compilation of sentimental guide-books what we had hoped to see given to pure art. Her facts and figures are carefully verified, and then hidden under an agreeable mask of fiction and "literary" quotation; but like many another casual visitor to Ireland she sometimes trips in a bright and cheery way. Penelope, for example, says:—"I've studied the song-writers more than the histories and geographies, so I should like to go to Bray and look up the Vicar. . . ." Every one is forced to learn sooner or later that the Bray in which "loyalty no harm meant" is an agreeable village on the River Thames where Ascot parties may be made up, and not in county Wicklow, Ireland. Apart from the pleasant little history of Penelope and her friends, the main charm of Mrs. Wiggin's latest book is the admirable spirit of sentimentality with which she approaches Ireland and the Irish. Leinster, Munster, Ulster, Connaught, and Royal Meath are taken in turn and each part of the island is submitted to the alchemy of Mrs. Wiggin's gaily sentimental mood. Much of the beauty and grace of Ireland may be learnt from her "experiences," but, of course, the vital questions at issue and the fount of the lachrymæ Hiberniæ are left untouched.

China.

A record of events startlingly like the occurrences of our own day is given in THE ARROW WAR WITH CHINA, by Prof. C. S. Leavenworth, of Shanghai. The war (1856-1860) arose out of the attack made by Chinese on the lorcha Arrow when lying off Canton, against which the British Consul—afterwards Sir Harry Parkes—protested. Then, as lately, we had Ambassadors fired on, allied forces marching on the capital, the lady who is now Empress Dowager in flight, and Li with his own plans for a settlement. The story has been told by Lord Loch in his "Narrative of Events in China" and in Mr. Stanley Lane Poole's "Life of Sir Harry Parkes." It is related briefly and readably, with due reference to authorities, and a bibliography, by Professor Leavenworth, who takes a hopeful view of the progressive enlightenment of China which the Arrow war helped to advance.

At the same time we have from Mr. Stanley Lane Poole another volume called SIR HARRY PARKES IN CHINA (Methuen, 6s.). It gives us at once a sympathetic biography and a careful account of Anglo-Chinese relations from 1830 to 1885. In The various Chinese wars are related in sufficient detail; character-sketch is admirably done. The author has tre the same ground before in the two-volume biography mentioned, which he wrote with Mr. F. Victor D but the reproduction of the narrative in a briefer and more form is quite warranted by the importance of the subject extent of the public interest in it.

Mr. Stephen Crane's Last Book.

In GREAT BATTLES OF THE WORLD, by the late S Crane (Chapman and Hall, 6s.), we see a writer usually t attempting a task for which he had no particular qualifi and failing in it. The thing which Stephen Crane und and knew how to depict was the psychology of the batt In attempting to describe a number of battles in a papers about the length of magazine articles he had little tunity of displaying this talent; and the particular required by the military historian he did not possess. but Stephen Crane could have written "The Red B Courage." Almost any war-correspondent might have the book before us. Not only is it inferior to Napier's is inferior to the work of the Rev. W. H. Fitchett. Any will compare the accounts given by the three writer storming of Badajoz will see that Stephen Crane's acco bad third to the other two. His battles, besides Badaj Vittoria, Plevna, Burkersdorf, Leipzig, Lützen, New Solferino, and Bunker Hill.

A Regimental History.

THE NORTHUMBERLAND FUSILIERS, by Mr. Walter (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d.), the second volume of a series o mental histories, deals with a corps which has sub claims to have its history chronicled. The Northum Fusiliers are second to none in military distinction Regiment was raised so long ago as the year 1674, and one of the oldest in the service. Its uniform (which is also in its way) has been worn by many of the most famous soldiers of the past two centuries; and its roll of "honours" includes at least one that is borne by no other now in existence. This is that of "Wilhelmstahl," wh 1762, while fighting against the French, the Fifth were mental in effecting the capture of an entire division of the It was in this regiment, too, that the celebrated Phoebe served for some years as a private soldier without her sex discovered. Recruits were apparently accepted in thos at an even more youthful age than at present. This actually enlisted when only fifteen years old. The vol brought well up to date, since the history of the regimen any rate the earlier stages of the present campaign in Africa is included therein.

I. Y., by "The Corporal" (Elliot Stock, 3s. 6d. facetious grumble at the discomforts of the African camp

The second volume of THE LIVING RACES OF M (Hutchinson, 7s. 6d. n.) is now out. It is a popular acco the manners and customs of various peoples ranging fr Bantus to the British, and the photographs, which as bef of more account than the letterpress, are excellently pr and carefully selected.

The question of the treatment of the Jews in Roum one of intense interest to the small public that tak interest in it at all. All the material for a complete s are good. There are also some translations of old Basque ballads; but these will only appeal to the few. There is no climbing, or rather the eminences ascended are only hills.

Some people may not like to see the actual scenes that have been depicted in their favourite novels. But for those who do Mr. Clive Holland's PILGRIMAGE TO WESSEX, printed by Messrs. Percy Lund, Humphries, with illustrations of the places round about Dorchester described by Mr. Thomas Hardy, will be just the thing. In inspecting the kitchen where Tess and Angel Clare supped on their wedding night and the "half dead town-let" where the D'Urbervilles lived there is something of the same pleasure as there is in running down a quotation.

The notes made during eight years' driving tours are put together in CONTINENTAL ROAD TRAVEL IN CENTRAL WESTERN EUROPE by W. J. A. Staines (Chapman and Hall, 12s.). It is rather a book to turn over in quest of information about unfrequented places which it would be worth while to visit than one to read steadily through; quite common-place in style, though pleasant enough to treat as we suggest. There are some photographs of rather more than average merit.

"Madge's" BOOK OF COOKERY (Marshall and Son, 3s. 6d.) is a valuable addition to the numerous cookery books provided for the English housewife. "Madge" is well known to be practical and economical, and her recipes are within the reach of the average housekeeper. Her chapter on vegetables especially is excellent. Part II. of the book deals with "Home Management," and this makes it very useful for young housewives. Nothing has been forgotten, and the advice given is sensible and sound. How to deal with servants, tradespeople, &c., how to buy, how to manage the work of the house—all this is clearly told. The young woman who starts housekeeping, without knowledge on the subject, might do worse than buy the book and carefully study "Madge's" valuable hints.

FICTION.

The Tragedy of Womanhood.

We fear that those who, in the old days when Mr. George Moore was wont to confess the unregenerate devices and desires of a young man, did not find him very amusing, will, now that he leaves the curiosities of youth for the analysis of an indeterminate woman's soul, consider that he occasionally approaches dulness with no timid strides. But in EVELYN INNES (cheap edition, Unwin, 6d.) and SISTER TERESA (Unwin, 6s.) the many admirers of Mr. Moore may find a prodigious deal of earnest consideration of a few circumstances interesting to the amateur in the art of living. Evelyn Innes was a gifted artist with some of the defects of her qualities and with strong religious tendencies—a woman who had discovered two instincts in herself, an inveterate sensuality and a sincere aspiration for as piritual life. The story of the second part of the book, called "Sister Teresa" is that of the struggle in one soul between the hedonic and wayward artist of the stage and the devotee of the highest life. This exhaustive account of Evelyn as she tries to accept the shelter of the conventual life, reverts to the world, returns to the life of the "vocation," and finally has her fate settled for her apart from the workings of her own inconstant, complex, and highly energetic nature, receives from the author an almost pathetic care and elaboration. Convent life may be little enough known to all of us, but Mr. Moore enters into the souls of the women he creates with a perfect sense of power and insight. The Prioress of the Passionist Nuns at Wimbledon, the Mother, Mary Hilda, the Sisters, Mary congratulate Mr. Moore on his power to co his masterpieces; we could only wish that taste for textual alteration somewhat furth much that is wearisome in the present work.

dogmatic and content, but, again a little while his work of yesterday is, in his own phrase, "s

Such a book as "Sister Teresa" shows extraordinary perseverance, but what is the o this really enormous piece of work? A gift to be good to do, as it were, the best for he steadfast in any desire, and play-acting is shelter of the Church of Rome is, therefore tries it and finds herself still acting, still Sister Teresa comes to be of much the same o who early states the case for the convent
"There are those," she said, "who slip awa they are very young, before life has fairly those who have had a disappointment. . . .
young, and although she has had disappointme she recovers. Two men, out of many, Sir Ulick Deane, constantly call to her. Aga expresses the view that "the human animal th sex the greater part of his and her mental li Owen say that the arts arose out of sex; that to capture woman he cut a reed and blew and that it was not until he had won her that an interest in the tune for its own sake." If been able to take a real delight in "the tune art she might have been spared much toil of s have attained the peace she sought. She is an artist in her religion, while she is too insin of her art, as this passage shows:—"One exalted, she thought; it is only by working a works at art, that one prepares oneself for th of inspiration. God is scattering the seed alw in those hearts which are prepared to receive The poet must write verses every day, the every day, the nun must pray every day, so inspired one day in the seven." These views towards the "vocation." But even this s attitude is broken in upon by such hopeless ap spend the whole of my life with these women w than children?" when Sister Jerome says another fails to do a wise one. Almost to the "Does another quest lie before me?" an
"She tried to stifle the thought, but it cr like a curlew across waste lands." At last soul is set at rest from without. At the friend of operatic days:—"Dear Louise, all th importance; it matters nothing whether we children or doing the things that the world
The important thing to do is to live, and know life, taste life, until we put it aside. Th paradox, but it is a simple little truth. Life and to enter into the will of God we must for must try to live outside ourselves in the ge Louise, who is still of the world and is now
"So this is the last stage." Thus the lowered upon Mr. Moore's tragedy of woman content to leave as most of us have foun

carefully written of the collection—there is fine handling of an exceptionally powerful situation. Possibly the writing may be too studied for some tastes; there are times when Miss Wharton leans towards preciousness, or when the verbal mosaic of her style tends to distract attention from the matter in hand. Here, for example, is the opening paragraph of the last mentioned story:—

> Have you ever questioned the long shuttered front of an old Italian house, that motionless mask, smooth, mute, equivocal as the face of a priest behind which buzz the secrets of the confessional? Other houses declare the activities they shelter; they are the clear expressive cuticle of a life flowing close to the surface; but the old palace in its narrow street, the villa on its cypress-hooded hill, are as impenetrable as death. The tall windows are like blind eyes, the great door is a shut mouth. Inside there may be sunshine, the scent of myrtles, and a pulse of life through all the arteries of the huge frame; or a mortal solitude, where bats lodge in the disjointed stones and the keys rust in unused doors. . . .

Such an exordium may not inconceivably frighten some intending readers. As a commencement it is somewhat too showy a piece of fine writing, and the effect would be the greater if it were introduced elsewhere, after reader and writer had got, so to speak, upon more familiar terms. The manner is more natural later on, but the observation is always acute, the expression almost always adequate. "The Duchess at Prayer" might have furnished Robert Browning with material for a long poem.

THE ARISTOCRATS (John Lane, 6s.) calls itself "the impressions of the Lady Helen Pole during her sojourn in the Great North Woods, as spontaneously recorded in her letters to her friend in North Britain, the Countess of Edge and Ross." It is a clever, mordant little book, that charms you one moment with its delicate insight and appreciation of beautiful things and places, and revolts you the next by sayings that are anything but delicate. Some of these have the excuse of wit. Some are simply coarse, and jar very much when put into the mouth of a beautiful girl, the sister of an English Duke. Some of the "impressions of the Lady Helen Pole" are shrewd enough. She finds American blood over-diluted, in life as in literature, and the American mind and attitude incurably "aristocratic," to use a word she would never think of using at home. The different types she meets are cleverly and rather cruelly sketched. The anonymous author has the art of saying what he means and saying it in good, terse English.

Colossal are the imaginings of Mr. M. P. Shiel. HIS LOAD OF THE SEA (Grant Richards, 6s.) goes back to the gigantic scale of "The Yellow Danger," and deals with the destinies, not of couples, but of the world—we had almost said the universe. Mr. Shiel's style runs away with him. But then his conviction runs away with the reader till he is forgiven even such sentences as this:—

> Hogarth, who had a continual habit of picking his shining top-teeth, stood with the quill suspended, as if the question confounded him, maintaining that statuesque pose some moments, rather different from the other farmers, for he wore a frock coat, and was younger than they, being about twenty-six.

Hogarth was a magnificent youth, a Jew without knowing himself to be one, and Mr. Shiel's favourite type, the natural king among men. Diamonds fall from the [illegible]

LIBRARY NOTES.

King Edward the Seventh is a bibliophile in the t[illegible] of being a lover of books, and his Majesty is [illegible] attention to the Royal libraries. The Library at [illegible] was begun by Henry VIII. and contains about 100,000 [illegible] many smaller collections having been added to it from [illegible] the Royal residences. The books in the King's private [illegible] at Sandringham, are now being arranged by Mr. [illegible] Humphreys. Queen Victoria shortly before her death [illegible] to Mr. A. W. Robertson, formerly librarian of Aberd[illegible] cataloguing of the books at Balmoral, and he is just [illegible] this work to a close.

Mr. Andrew Carnegie is said to intend a further [illegible] upon his encumbering wealth, but as yet the chan[illegible] definitely fixed. Fifty-six million pounds is, it is under[illegible] the air" to descend in a shower of gold, and art and sc[illegible] indicated as possible recipients. The public librari[illegible] perhaps, plead that a Science and Art Department in e[illegible] with each of them would be a real fulfilment of the [illegible] philanthropic aims.

A Cromwell Library has been established at Na[illegible] contains valuable books and prints, to which some rel[illegible] battle of Naseby will be added. It is hoped that the [illegible] will be further augmented by the purchase or donation [illegible] works on the Civil War and Protectorate. It is in the[illegible] local collections that valuable safeguards may be found [illegible] the too frequent passage of our historical records a[illegible] Atlantic.

The report of the Society of Arts Committee [illegible] binding, to which reference was made in Literature la[illegible] accords with the experience of librarians. The unsuit[illegible] Russia and calf leathers has been proved over and ov[illegible] Morocco is undisputably the best material for libraries [illegible] being unsatisfactory for many classes of work. Th[illegible] library escapes the evil of tobacco smoke, but gas [illegible] many cases still the illuminating agent. We wish t[illegible] attention was paid to a serious defect in modern book[illegible] —the bad sewing. Contrasted with that of a time wh[illegible] were valued for themselves, much of it is very poor stuff[illegible]

At Lewisham a new library, containing 8,000 volu[illegible] been opened. The authorities have received materia[illegible] assistance in the shape of the gift of a site and contr[illegible] towards the cost of building and books amounting to £2,7[illegible] generosity which will assist a rate-supported institution [illegible] imposing conditions is rare enough to deserve recognitio[illegible]

We have received reports from the public libr[illegible] Croydon, Lincoln, the City of Westminster and Willesde[illegible] The first records the growth of the reference dep[illegible] issues; the quality of the reading is admirable. The [illegible] Committee give a short list of books "which have ne[illegible] the shelves," but without further particulars it is not [illegible] draw any deduction from this. We are not surprised t[illegible] of the books mentioned are unappreciated, but it is cu[illegible] find Schiller the solitary neglected writer in the div[illegible] "Drama and Poetry."

The Westminster report contains statistical info[illegible] about the five libraries amalgamated under the new [illegible] pality. An increase in readers is naturally anticipa[illegible] result of the inclusion of new library districts. The [illegible]

Correspondence.

ARCHÆOLOGICAL NOMENCLATURE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The "Victoria History of the Counties of England" lately acquired of Mr. Hartshorne the right of reproducing certain drawings which he had made of monumental effigies in the county of Northamptonshire. It was arranged that a detailed account of these effigies should accompany the illustrations. This account being full of heraldic description it passed through my hand as general editor of the heraldic portion of the work, with the result that I made several corrections of Mr. Hartshorne's blazonry. Mr. Hartshorne thereupon protested against any editing of his MS., and suggested various courses which might be taken with regard to it. While this correspondence, necessarily private, is still in progress, I am somewhat astonished to find that Mr. Hartshorne has allowed himself, without any warning to my Editor-in-chief or to myself, to take the whole question into print.

When Mr. Hartshorne claimed immunity from criticism for his MS. he was supplied with carefully considered reasons for every point in which alterations had been made. I understand him to have replied refusing to enter into any argument with me, as his opinions were unalterable and beyond argument. Yet in the interest of my work upon such a national undertaking as the Victoria History I must deal with Mr. Hartshorne's statements, however distasteful it may be for me to notice an adversary who has put himself out of court by the circumstances of his appeal.

Mr. Hartshorne's quarrel, in a word, is the quarrel of Yesterday with To-day. By dragging in the story of the chalices and patens he affords me good illustration of my point. Many years ago Mr. Octavius Morgan, having examined certain mediæval chalices, published the results of his study of them. In his pioneer work, being unable to discover the original names of those parts of the chalice which he would often have occasion to speak of, he arbitrarily applied to them names which seemed to him suitable, and to this vocabulary Mr. Cripps succeeded. Afterwards came Mr. Fallow and Mr. St. John Hope, and attacked the whole question of Church plate in the modern spirit. They discovered, examined, photographed, and arranged in periods every chalice and paten remaining in England of an earlier date than 1550, and, by the aid of inventories and the like contemporary documents, they gave each part of the chalice the simple and expressive English names which their mediæval makers had used. Messrs. Nightingale and Manning, great authorities upon ancient plate, hastened to approve of the revival of the ancient names, and for all students of archæology discussion is at an end, and has been any time these twelve years. But it is not at an end for Mr. Hartshorne. He had once learnt Mr. Morgan's words and approved of them, with the result that even to-day he is content to repeat his belief that the "ancient documents," which he has never examined, and which pronounce in every case for the change, support the case of yesterday against to-day.

In the case of heraldry Mr. Hartshorne's case is again but the wailing protest of "mumpsimus" against "sumpsimus." He having at some time in his life absorbed the mad Euclid of the late sixteenth century and seventeenth century blazonry as it are "time-honoured" and "picturesque symb courageous archæology of the writer of "Ye Fancye Bazaar" programmes would hardly c than this. The first word of the Bazaar prog way usually pronounced by its editor as it is wr tempted to wonder how Mr. Hartshorne prono and "sa."

So with the rest of Mr. Hartshorne's manif betrays the fact that he can never have seen an MS., or have wandered outside the pinfold of h His "ogres" (sic) and "hurts" and other verl once they are persuaded by an expert "to re story," reveal themselves as modern obscuriti part in the simple heraldic blazon of the Mide "courtly Norman French language" is in ve but a jargon of mis-spelt modern French epithe Latinisms. The "ancient language of the Pl neither art nor part in this gallimaufry, th although the ancient heralds blazoned arms for French—a French very far from Mr. Hartsh English was the tongue employed a traditi vigorous English blazonry began, which has antiquaries of to-day and to-morrow impossib For the satisfaction of Mr. Hartshorne I may "time-honoured or and argent"—I beg his pardo for gold and silver, never appear in English bla Ages, and are but survivals of the time when than heralds set themselves deliberately, in t to esotericize heraldic description.

I do not understand Mr. Hartshorne's path venerable Garter King of Arms in a questi practices of heraldry. Is it possible that studies of mediæval armour have received t the War Office? In another sentence the " Garters" are also appealed to. It would Hartshorne grasps the fact that the shades of Holmes will hardly understand his case. The " to whom he should appeal are Sir George eighteenth-century predecessors.

In conclusion may it be allowed me to say that given many years of research in the modern spir of the subject depending in great part upon th arms, I have examined personally the known exa have copied with my own hand almost eve assistance of that distinguished antiquary M the versions have been studied and collated. might entitle me to the courtesy usually accord in discussion. Yet Mr. Hartshorne, handbook himself to sweep aside the reasoned results o "mischievous and childish vagaries."

Mr. Hartshorne's own vagaries do not adjective as mischievous. In the twentieth centu must make way for "sumpsimus," and the on every branch of archæological enquiry will querulous challenge of a provincial antiquary.

Yours fai

OSW

P.S.—Since writing the above I have r "Oxonian" in your last issue. Here at least be made in favour of the decencies of contr

The last paragraph of "Oxonian's" letter can only be aimed at the publication of the "Stall Plates of the Knights of the Garter"—the first important contribution of the English Press to the study of heraldic art. By all means let "Oxonian" keep this work also out of his library, that awful place whose "scholastic standard" must not be "lowered" by the trivialities of the great English County histories. For he will find therein that the enamellers and artists of the fifteenth century were grossly ignorant of the heraldry of the handbooks, and that Talbot and his peers broke most of the "laws of heraldry," both in coat and crest, with perfect complacence.

"L'AIGLON."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir, May I say a few words of criticism on L'Aiglon from the standpoint of the play on the stage?

The fact which to me seems to preclude L'Aiglon from being a real success on the stage is that Madame Bernhardt plays the title rôle.

As Mr. Max Beerbohm has so well said, Sarah Bernhardt never once looked anything but a woman. Agreeing with this most entirely, I fail to see how real justice can be done to M. Rostand's conception of Napoleon's son until it is played by a young actor—or at least an actor—not actress, of genius. Again, the scene at Austerlitz, though impressive when read, must appear to most as melodramatic and theatrical when the play is acted.

Personally I was most convinced by the scene between the old Austrian Emperor, Metternich, and L'Aiglon; but even there L'Aiglon was (if younger than in the other parts of the play) a girl and not a youth.

Although it is impossible to regard the latest of M. Rostand's plays as a masterpiece, or in any way equal to Cyrano, yet his conception of the young Duke's life is a fine one, and worthy of a happier interpretation.

With apologies for encroaching on your space,

I am yours faithfully,

ROBERT H. STEPHEN.

Madeley-house, Richmond, Surrey, July 17, 1901.

UNPUBLISHED LETTERS OF DR. JOHNSON.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson, and Hodge will sell on next Tuesday, the 23rd July, eight unpublished letters of Dr. Samuel Johnson (now the property of General Macdonald), and addressed to Mr. Chambers. They range from October 27, 1762, to October 4, 1783. There seems to be doubt as to the person to whom the letters were addressed. The following extract may clear up the matter:—

> Sir Robert Chambers was born in 1737, at Newcastle-on Tyne, and educated at the same school with Lord Stowell and his brother, the Earl of Eldon, and afterwards (like them) a member of University College. It was by visiting Chambers, when a fellow of University, that Johnson became acquainted with Lord Stowell; and when Chambers went to India, Lord Stowell, as he expressed it to me, seemed to succeed to his place in Johnson's friendship.—Croker.

There is also a letter of Dr. Johnson to Mr. Chambers of Lincoln College; London, Nov. 21, 1751. This letter in the Life was communicated by the Reverend Mr. Thomas

last issue, although the letter is perhaps the precedi
Your correspondent no doubt "passes for reply."

1. To take up the glove thrown down in the first pa
A year or two ago I was unaware that the word "em had obtained recognition even in respectable Engli papers. How then could an inferior person like my that this is the correct form of employé. We cannot keep the Oxford or the Century Dictionary, or even a at our elbow, and most of us find lesser authorities gu for everyday use. On consulting my own the Dictionary (Collins, 1871)—not only do I find no m
"employee," but I find the following entry:—

> Employe (ong-ploy-â), n. (F. p.p. of employer). O > employed.

Now I am neither defending nor condemning my Coll take it that this entry is conclusive proof that "employee" was not the good English which you spondent assures us it is. Will he inform us when an became so?

In "ong-velope" I do not recognize the usual, or rate, a very common, pronunciation of the word, whic to be "on-velope"; and in this I do not see anythi hensible, for the simple reason that it has become the pronunciation, and is used by myriads, who, so supposing that they are talking French, do not even k
the word is of French origin.

Nor do I think that "depôt" is absolutely inde
If your correspondent allows himself to use the diere does in his correctest English form "naïvety," wh circumflex in "depôt" utterly unjustifiable?

The rest of the paragraph implies that most writers professing to know French take "portmanteau," voir," "memoir," and so on to be the true French form really so?

2. The second paragraph deals primarily with the sary importation of foreign words and phrases whe equivalents exist in English, and in this matter we a doubt agreed. But surely it is going too far to inclu index expurgatorius not only employé—already dealt w the perfectly innocuous "bouquet" which had English" even in Warton's day. Is every one who sp "bouquet" a "half-educated person with only a French and a very poor command of English?"

And now we come to the following amazing se
"Highly absurd, too, is the custom of pronouncing words as if they were French as (amongst others)
"cortayzh," "tomahto," "bah-relief," "trai'" "pro
"restauroug," or spelling them so as (among others)
"meter," "revery," "naïvety."

Great Heavens! Are we to give up our tomatoes our fathers—or, shall we say, feythers—preferred potat feel sure that we shall most of us persist in our ab rather than adopt "vaze," "bass-relief," "trate," menaid," and "restorante," and shall be quite content to "metre," "centre," "reverie," and the rest. By will your correspondent tell us what is the English spell pronunciation of "cortayzh?"

3. In the third paragraph it is proposed to Anglicize a of French words and expressions, but in most cases we in doubt as to the pronunciation of the naturalized w
the first syllable of "fiancee," for instance, to be pro

What of "blouse," "route," and "tour" themselves, which, we are told, are to be pronounced as in French? Would not the unsophisticated English pronunciation make them rhyme with "rouse," "pout," and "hour" respectively?

4. The fourth paragraph, dealing with literal translation of French idioms, needs little comment. But why are we to dub the inventor of "goes without saying" a snob? Your correspondent himself proposes to Anglicize "impasse" as "impass"; why is one process more gentleman-like than the other?

5. The fifth paragraph is open to attack on all sides. Having before encouraged us to claim complete independence in the spelling and pronunciation of naturalized foreign words, your correspondent here rebukes us for not "endeavouring to find out the true pronunciation and spelling of foreign names, such as Reims . . ." Are we then to abjure acquaintance with our Jackdaw of "Reams" until we have acquired the hideous native pronunciation of the name? Are we no longer to call Paris the city by the same name as the Trojan Prince? Are we never to think of a Seville orange without remembering that the double "l" is liquid, and that the Spanish name is a trisyllable? Are the French themselves to give up their "Londres" and their "Bâle"?

We are next told that "there could be no possible objection if by comparison with foreign tongues solecisms in English itself were corrected. Thus, analogy and etymology unite in declaring the following, generally simpler, spellings as preferable to those usually adopted," and there follows a list of 130 words or more. The list is too long to admit of close examination in this letter. As might have been expected it contains our old friends "labor," "traveler," "theater," and so on, and, indeed, it claims to pronounce the final word on most of the questions of orthography that have been the subject of debate for years. I may perhaps be allowed to notice a few instances of the new spelling that we are to adopt on the ground of analogy and etymology. We are, it appears, to write "caracter," because, I presume, the French write "caractère." But the Germans, on the other hand, write "charakter." Why is the English a solecism? And would the new spelling be more correct etymologically? We are to write "remarcable," although we write "remark"; and the French write "remarquer" and "remarquable." What has the new spelling to do with etymology or analogy? We are to write "criterium," because, presumably, it is the French form of "criterion." Why, then, are we to prefer the semi-Greek form "acoluth" to "acolyte," which is the French form? Here there is a trace of etymology; but where is the analogy? In a former paragraph we were told that "kilogramme" was a barbarism, and that we should write "chiliogram." Yet here we find "cronicle," "caracter," and "coler." Surely there is inconsistency here. We are to write "fantom" and "feasant"; why not "Filip" and "filosofer"? We are to write "cozy," in spite of the s in the German "kosen" and the French "causer"; why not "Jozyfeen," "buzy," "eazy," "pozy," "rozy," and plenty more?

6. In the last paragraph we have a list of over forty words, the pronunciation of which requires correction; but, inasmuch as we are left in doubt in a great number of instances as to the correction required, it is impossible to express either assent or dissent—one would have thought that the pronunciation of "humble," the first word in the list, was now pretty well settled. But we have no means of judging what your corre-

It correct to accent the prefix in some Latin w "cóntent," "répute," and the verbal root in mént," "perféct," "contráct"?

Yours faithfully,

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In Mr. Phipson's interesting compil phrases, many of which are dear to the lit Phipson), the appearance of the word to the been overlooked. A pleasant combination of its meaning to the brain more directly than u tions suggested by Mr. Phipson.

Who, for instance, would look at "cr
"cristal"? And surely it is the same with seems to lose half the power of its pictures the loss of the "t," and if ever there w
"renascence" is one.

Reading depends on the eye, and quick sary nowadays) on the appearance of the pag type and spacing but on the groups of wor good reader will take in half a dozen lines whi be in the first. In time we may be able to rea seconds, but not if it contains such things as "
"coud" (?), &c.

I am yours faithfully,

7, Pall-mall, S.W., July 15.

GOLDSMITH'S DEATH

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Lord Rosebery hardly stands in n
Wall's correction. Doubtless his Lordship Macaulay's biography of Goldsmith in th Britannica" (reprinted in his "Miscellan that essay the following passage occurs:—

"You are worse," said one of his m
"than you should be from the degree of fev Is your mind at ease?" "No, it is not recorded words of Oliver Goldsmith.

To refer to another matter; "Matelot" from your bibliography of Pierre Loti.
pathetic study of nautical temperament, wit curiosa felicitas, may well rank with its aut ments.

I am, Sir, yours truly,
M. GRE

243, Hackney-road, N.E., July 13.

HURRY CHUNDER.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—No one knows better than Mr. Kipli
Lord Curzon, the most indefatigable tourist amo has reminded the world that India is as big Russia. No critic could find serious fault with who should betray an ignorance, say, of the tr
and we must not be surprised if the novelist the Punjab and Rajputana by right of conq of detail when he writes of distant Bengal. Th duce into "Kim" a "teaplanter in Manipur are prosperous Frenchmen and Germans. It is possible that Mr. Kipling, in creating Kim's friend Hurry Chunder (I wish the name were not so disagreeably anomalous), had some particular stout Bengali in his mind's eye. But it seems a pity to erect the fat baboo into a conventional type; especially as the number of Bengalis employed on political business is probably small. One of them, at least, a slim, upright little man with a bright intelligent face, has penetrated more than once, in dangerous disguises, to Lhasa, and has experienced adventures far more thrilling than those of Mr. Savage Landor. One would have liked to see that type vary the conventional description of the fat and pompous baboo. Jos Sedley is not one of Thackeray's greatest successes, nor is he an adequate type of the Indian Civil Service. Similarly, portly pompousness no longer adequately describes the modern Bengali. The lamented Iswar Chandra Vidyasagar, the type of the learned ascetic, an Eastern Cardinal Newman, was a Bengali baboo. The religious reformers Ram Mohan Roy and Keshab Chandra Sen were neither portly nor pompous, and they were Bengali baboos. The poet of modern Bengal—the "Bengali Byron," as he has been called in a mixture of jest and appreciation—is a Bengali baboo. He has the slim oval face, the bright, dark eyes, the gracious and proudly submissive manners of an Italian or Spaniard of good family. Of course, it is open to Mr. Kipling to depict the Turveydrops of Bengal. Unfortunately, Mr. Kipling's readers in Great Britain and America are prone to take his portraits of rare and interesting specimens as types of the races to which they belong. It is not so long since the blameless Anglo-Indian matron was identified with Mrs. Hawksbee, and the British private was compelled to write to the papers to protest that the Army was not entirely composed of rascals so engaging as Ortheris, Mulvaney, and Learoyd. One would have thought that every middle-class English household had Anglo-Indian cousins, and could make the necessary discount for a novelist's imaginative mode of representation. But few Englishmen know the Bengali baboo. Lord Macaulay set a heavy foot on him, the late Mr. Aberigh Mackay continued the tradition, and Mr. Kipling himself has fallen into the rut. Has he forgotten that one of the most popular preachers in the United States of America is the Hindu reformer, Mr. Majumdar—a typical Bengali baboo? Like most of us who were born in India, Mr. Kipling in his infancy probably had the weird howl of the jackal thus interpreted to him:—

"Here—lies—a—fat—baboo—oo—oo—oo!"

To which all the other jackals answer—

"Where, where, where, where, where?"

Personally, I should like a thin baboo—for a change.

Mr. Kipling's fat Hurry Chunder is evidently going to be very amusing. But I wish Mr. Kipling could alter his baboo's name, and had not made him the usual fat man with a Johnsonese vocabulary. "Ali Baba" exhausted that amusing convention. Mr. Kipling, at his best, is so far above carping criticism that it argues no disrespect if I regret his smaller slips. And one of the worst of these, I must respectfully maintain, is

Ealing. "HURRY CHUNDER."

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Mr. Prothero's last volume of the Byron letters in Mr. Murray's new edition is practically ready, and contains an index to the whole. The sixth volume of the poetry, completing the Froude's Pecksniff. A few weeks ago the M[illegible] Parliament for the Universities of Oxford and Cambri[illegible] nally presented a copy of the Revised Version to the D[illegible] Chapter of Westminster for use in the Abbey services.

Shakespearean students should be interested in the an[illegible] port of the German Shakespeare Society, which has just pu[illegible] its annual report. It contains a bibliography of all th[illegible] musical compositions which owe their inspiration to Shak[illegible] and Professor Brandes contributes an article on the [illegible] translations of Shakespeare which have been made [illegible] German stage. The most popular seems to be the one [illegible] Schlegel and Tieck collaborated about a hundred years a[illegible]

Mr. Murray announces an illustrated edition of W[illegible] Cripps' well-known work on "Old English Plate," wh[illegible] gone through many editions since its first appearance [illegible] "The correspondence of Lady Sarah Lennox, 1745-1826," [illegible] In two volumes by Lady Ilchester and Lord Stav[illegible] another of Mr. Murray's autumn publications—will [illegible] elaborately illustrated, and contain a short political s[illegible] the period from 1760 to 1763, written by George Fox, fir[illegible] Holland, and other MSS. found at Holland-house.

Dr. Alexander Macbain is editing anew Dr. Skene's [illegible] Highlanders of Scotland," which was published in 1837, [illegible] long been out of print. Alluding to Skene's historic[illegible] Stevenson writing from Samoa to his cousin said:—

> Tell some of your journalistic friends with a go[illegible] to popularize old Skene; or say your prayers, and r[illegible] for yourself. He was a great historian, and I was his [illegible] clerk and did not know it, and you will not be in a [illegible] grace about the Picts till you have studied him.

The new edition is to be published by Mr. Æneas [illegible] Stirling.

Sir James Redhouse's well-known "Turkish-Engl[illegible] English-Turkish Lexicons," which have been published f[illegible] years by the American Mission at Constantinople, ha[illegible] taken over by Mr. Frowde. It is nearly ten yea[illegible] Sir James Redhouse died, and his great unfinished ma[illegible] dictionary is in the British Museum.

The Oxford University Press announces a life of [illegible] the first Buddhist Emperor—the "Buddhist Constanti[illegible] became a convert to Buddhism about 257 B.C. The [illegible] Mr. Vincent C. Smith, and will form the fourth supple[illegible] volume to the "Rulers of India" Series edited by the [illegible] William Hunter, who also wrote the first of the supple[illegible] volumes—"A Brief History of the Indian People," n[illegible] eighty-fourth thousand.

Mr. John Stanhope Arkwright, M.P., of Hampto[illegible] Leominster, who lately produced a small volume o[illegible] entitled "The Last Muster," has entered into partners[illegible] publisher with Mr. R. Brimley Johnson. The title of [illegible] will remain unchanged.

Mr. Thomas Greenwood is engaged upon an appreci[illegible] Edward Edwards, the founder of the public library move[illegible]

Books to look out for at once.

"Modern Europe, 1815-1899." By W. A. Phillips. Rivington[illegible] [Completing the series of "Periods of European History" by Mr. Arthur Hassall.]

"History of Intellectual Development on the Lines of Modern Eu[illegible] Vol. 3. By J. B. Crozier. Longmans. 10s. 6d.
[Political, educational, social, including an attempted [illegible]

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

BIOGRAPHY.

SOUVENIR OF SIR ARTHUR SULLIVAN. A Brief Sketch of his Life and Works. By W. J. Wells. [illegible] × 8½, 134 pp. Newnes. 3s. 6d.
[A popular sketch, with copious photographs, facsimiles, &c., and a list of works.]

MR. GLADSTONE AS CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER. A Study. By S. Buxton. 8¼ × 5½, 177 pp. Murray. 5s. n.

FRÉDÉRIC MISTRAL: Poet and Leader in Provence. By C. A. Downer. 7½ × 5, [illegible] pp. Columbia University Press and The Macmillan Co. 6s. n.

CHEZ NOS CONTEMPORAINS D'ANGLETERRE. By Charles Legras. 7½ × 4½, 302 pp. Paris, 1901. Ollendorff. Fr. 3.50.

CLASSICAL.

THE ELEKTRA OF SOPHOKLES. Ed. by M. A. Bayfield. 6¾ × 4½, 163 pp. Macmillan. 2s. 6d.

THE LATIN PRONOUNS IS, HIC, ISTE, IPSE. A Semasiological Study. By C. L. Meader, Ph.D. 8½ × 5½, 222 pp. The Macmillan Co. 7s. 6d. n.

FICTION.

JOHN TOPP, PIRATE. By W. Clemens. 7½ × 5, 302 pp. Methuen. 6s.
[An adventure story of fighting with the Spaniards in Queen Elizabeth's time.]

MY LADY'S DIAMONDS. By Adeline Sergeant. 7½ × 5½, 346 pp. Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.
[A detective story of stolen diamonds.]

A GREAT LADY. By Adeline Sergeant. 7½ × 5½, 293 pp. Methuen. 6s.

A WOMAN ALONE. By Mrs. W. K. Clifford. 7½ × 5½, 265 pp. Methuen. 3s. 6d.
[Three stories, of which the title-story, telling of a love marriage spoilt by the selfishness of the husband, is by far the longest.]

BERGEN WORTH. By W. Lloyd. 7½ × 5½, 276 pp. Unwin. 6s.
[The story of a murder mystery at the time of the Chicago riots, 1894.]

QUINCEY ADAMS SAWYER AND MASON'S CORNER FOLKS. By C. F. Pidgin. 7½ × 5½, 566 pp. Unwin. 6s.

HER GRACE'S SECRET. By Violet Tweedale. 7½ × 5½, 402 pp. Hutchinson. 6s.

MARRABLE'S MAGNIFICENT IDEA. By F. C. Constable. 7½ × 5½, 328 pp. Blackwood. 6s.

LITERARY.

AN ENGLISH COMMENTARY ON DANTE'S DIVINA COMMEDIA. By Rev. H. F. Tozer. 7½ × 5½, 621 pp. Clarendon Press. 3s. 6d.

NOUVELLES CONVERSATIONS DE GOETHE AVEC ECKERMANN. 1897-1900. 7½ × 4½, 320 pp. Paris, 1901. Editions de la Revue Blanche. Fr. 3.50.

THE LABYRINTH OF THE WORLD AND THE PARADISE OF THE HEART. By John Amos Komensky. Ed. and Trans. by Count Lützow. 7½ × 5, 347 pp. Sonnenschein. 6s.
[The first English translation of this interesting work of the Bohemian educational reformer (1592-1671). It closely resembles the "Pilgrim's Progress," which it preceded by about fifty years.]

MILITARY.

CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF THE BOER WAR. By R. Danes. 9 × 6½, 1,540 pp. Cassell. 7s. 6d.
[A popularly written narrative with copious pictures, some of them coloured. Comes down to April, 1901.]

ON THE WARPATH. A Lady's Letters from the Front. By Mrs. J. D. Leatherculey. 7½ × 5, 132 pp. J. Long. 3s. 6d.
[The authoress went out on hospital work in July, 1900, and was in the fort at Ladybrand during the siege in September. Personal experiences written in a very gossipy style.]

THE ARROW WAR WITH CHINA. By C. S. Leavenworth. 7½ × 5, 232 pp. Sampson Low. 3s. 6d. n.
[Reviewed on page 65.]

THE ARMY AND THE PRESS IN 1900. By a British Field Officer. 8½ × 5½, 44 pp. F. E. Robinson. 1s. n.
[This pamphlet is a protest against free criticism of the Army by journalists. Of the Press the writer thinks—"Quem Deus vult perdere prius dementat."]

MISCELLANEOUS.

A RETROSPECT OF SURGERY DURING THE PAST CENTURY. By J. Poland, F.R.C.S. 8½ × 5½, 97 pp. Smith, Elder. 5s.
[The Hunterian Oration, 1901.]

CYCLOPÆDIA OF AMERICAN HORTICULTURE. N.-Q. By L. H. Bailey. [illegible] × 7½. The Macmillan Co. 21s. n.

DICTIONARY OF ARCHITECTURE AND BUILDING. Vol. II. F.-N. By R. Brandon, Ph.D. [illegible] × 8. Macmillan. 25s. n.

LE SOCIALISME SANS DOCTRINES. By Alberts Metin. 8½ × 6, 261 pp. Paris, [illegible]. Alcan. Fr. 6.
[A careful study of the social and economic evolution of Australasia.]

PROSPICE. Sermons by the Rev. M. G. Glazebrook. 7½ × 5½, 250 pp. Rivingtons. 4s. 6d. n.

THE STALL PLATES OF THE KNIGHTS OF THE ORDER OF THE GARTER. Part III. By W. H. St. John Hope. 13½ × 10. Constable. 12s. 6d. n.
[Noticed on page 61.]

YOUR MESMERIC FORCES AND HOW TO DEVELOP THEM. By F. H. Randall. 7½ × 5, 151 pp. L. N. Fowler. 2s. 6d. n.
[Full instructions as to qualifications for, and method of, becoming a mesmerist.]

WAGNER, BAYREUTH AND THE FESTIVAL PLAYS. By Frances Gerard. 7½ × 5, 208 pp. Jarrold.

POETRY AND DRAMA.

THE PAYING GUEST. By Lucy Snowe. CRABBED AGE AND YOUTH. By W. K. Tarpey. (Carpet Plays.) 8½ × 6½, 72 + 61 pp. Brimley Johnson. 6s. n.

VICTORIA, QUEEN AND EMPRESS. "The Last Progress." 8½ × 5½, 23 pp. Virtue.

REPRINTS.

REVELATIONS OF DIVINE LOVE. By Julian, Anchoress at Norwich, A.D. 1373. Edited by Grace Warrack. 7½ × 5, 206 pp. Methuen. 6s.
[These visions of the fourteenth century Norwich mystic exist in two MSS., in the Bibliothèque Nationale and the British Museum. This is an edition, slightly modernised, of the latter, with introductions, bibliographical, biographical, and explanatory, and a glossary.]

ENGLISH DRAMAS IN THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY. New Edition. By J. A. Venn. [illegible] × [illegible], 401 pp. Longmans. 6s. n.
[First published 1895. This edition has many excellent full-page pictures from old portraits and prints.]

CHESS.

Address "Chess": Literature, Printing Hou

PROBLEM No. 203, by K. VARAIN, Munich.

BLACK. 9 pieces.

WHITE. 11 pieces.

White to play and mate in three moves.

PROBLEM No. 202, by A. Troitzky. White K Kt 4; B at K B 2; Kt at K R 5; paw Q B 2. Black (6 pieces)—K at K 5; Q at Q s Q 3, Q Kt 3, Q R 5. White to play and win.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A. C. W. and others. No. 201 is a revised version of No. 17 see "Literature," May 25th. If this version proves also una must be dismissed as unsound, but now it will probably work.

L. H. G. and others.—(1) To solve the ordinary problem moves, but look much deeper; (2) Raynor's "Chess," 1s.; Lawr 1s.; and Mason's "Principles," 2s. 6d., are all useful aids to beg

THE RICE GAMBIT.—Referring again to June 15, on this remarkable opening, Mr. Brooklyn Eagle, says that in his analysis Whites 18. Q–R 3 is Castles, and this leave posted at R 3. The following is from the same

One of the experts, who think they can establish the unsoundness of the Gambit, is Professor Berger, of Grätz, Austria, who proposes to accomplish his object by the following line of play:—1. P–K 4, P–K 4; 2. P–K B 4, P–P; 3. Kt–K B 3, P–K Kt 4; 4. P–K R 4, P–Kt 5; 5. Kt–K 5; Kt–K B 3; 6. B–Q 4, P–Q 4; 7. P×P, B–Q 3; 8. Castles (this constitutes the Rice Gambit), B×Kt; 9. R–K sq, K–B sq! This last move of Black's is Professor Berger's continuation, and on that basis he is playing what he terms correspondence game" with Mr. Rice, proceed 10. R×B, Kt–B 3; 11. P–Q 4, Kt–R; 12. From this point White has continued with different results, but now Mr. Rice aband challenges Professor Berger with 13. P–K 6 noted analyst will experience much difficulty w

RICE

BLACK

WHITE.

White to p

We give this interesting position, and analysis. Presumably if 13. P–K 6, B×P; the game can hardly be very good for White, to surrender the piece. His Queen's pieces ar and to say the least the King's side is weak an

GAME No. LXXXIX.—Played by the first the New York State meeting:—

FRENCH DEFENCE.

White. S. Lipschitz (New York)	Black. W. McCutcheon (Philadelphia)	White. S. Lipschitz (New York)

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 197. SATURDAY, JULY 27, 1901.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

NOTES OF THE DAY 73, 74, 75

"LITERATURE" PORTRAITS. XII. Robert Louis Balfour Stevenson 76

A VISIT TO R. L. STEVENSON—A "Personal View," by Morley Roberts 85

THE QUEST FOR STEVENSONIA 86

SOME MOVEMENTS IN VICTORIAN POETRY, by Arthur Waugh. I.—The Period and the Field 86

CURRENT LITERATURE—

The Ashanti Campaign of 1900 88

Renaissance Types 89

'Twixt Sirdar and Menelik 90

The Story of the Stock Exchange—Smollett—Some Home Truths about the Maori War 90, 91

The Hidden Model—Sirius and Other Stories—Cinders—The Author of "The Sky Pilot"—The Second Dandy Chater—The Survivor—Monsieur Beaucaire—The Heritage 92, 93

SALE AT MESSRS. SOTHEBY'S 94

CORRESPONDENCE—The Use of Foreign Phrases—The Young Cricketer's Tutor (Mr. A. Nutt)—The Late Mr. James Hamblin Smith (The Venerable Archdeacon Cheetham) 94, 95

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for 95, 96

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS 96

NOTES OF THE DAY.

We publish on page 76 a special article on Stevenson and his work, with several illustrations. On page 86 Mr. Arthur Waugh begins a series of articles on the Principal Movements of Victorian Poetry with a paper on "The Period and the Field." Next week we shall publish a special Victor Hugo number, with a reproduction of Mr. R. Bryden's woodcut portrait of Hugo, besides other illustrations. Mr. Arthur Waugh will continue his series with an article on "The Poetry of Faith and Aspiration."

* * * *

It is announced that Mr. Austin Dobson has retired from the public service, and has been granted a Civil List pension. His length of service has been considerable, for he entered the Board of Trade in 1856 at the early age of sixteen, and has remained there ever since. The atmosphere of Whitehall seems to be favourable to delicate literary grace. Formerly the Temple was the home of the Muses, and youthful barristers, not cursed with a superabundance of work, took naturally to the profession of letters. Now it almost seems as though the Civil that is graceful, delicate, and refined. Certainly no ot writer has caught so thoroughly the spirit and diet eighteenth century. It is his period, and he has confine self to it with almost monastic strictness. With the ex of a few scattered poems, it might be said that he never ve without its borders. And he not only knows his intimately, but has the uncommon talent of being able to d his knowledge under a light and humorous touch. Se writers are rare enough in these days: a scholarly writ is never dull is a veritable black swan in literature Dobson's "Collected Poems," issued some four years ba single volume, are the delight of every lover of graceful in prose his "Eighteenth Century Vignettes," in three have long been indispensable to all who have a kindness f gracious age.

* * * *

Books to read just published:—

"The Ashanti Campaign of 1900." By Capt. C. H. Ar D.S.O., and Lieut.-Colonel A. F. Montanaro, R.A. (Sand

"Renaissance Types." By W. S. Lilly. (Fisher Un

"The Hidden Model." By Mrs. Harrod (Frances F Robertson). (Heinemann.)

"Arrows of the Almighty." By Owen Johnson. (Mac

"La Bella and Others." By Egerton Castle. (Mac

"Love and His Mask." By Ménie Muriel Dowie. (mann.)

* * * *

Will the true story of the Appin murder, which pl prominent a part in "Kidnapped" and "Catriona," ever bea to transpire? Stevenson in his dedication prefixed to the says:—"To this day you will find the tradition of Appin c Alan's favour. If you inquire you may even hear th descendants of 'the other man,' who fired the shot, are country to this day. But that other man's name, inquire please, you shall not hear; for the Highlander values a s itself and for the congenial exercise of keeping it." The tr still remains. It is claimed that there are persons yet who know who shot Campbell of Glenure, and that the se transmitted from generation to generation. A railway present being constructed through the Appin country, an connect Oban with Ballachulish, near to which latter pla murder was committed. Perhaps the opening up of the c and the inrush of modern life will have some effect in solvi mystery. Coupled with the belief in Alan Breck's inn there is still among the Highlanders a strong sense o injustice done to James Stewart. But, for that matter, persons who know anything of the subject and of the in includes several of historical importance in connexion with Jacobite affairs after the Battle of Culloden. There is a very interesting letter by John Macpherson of Rancher to James Macpherson, of "Ossian" fame, containing much curious political information, and also particulars about the celebrated Jacobite Amazon known as "Colonel Anne." This lady was the wife of Mackintosh of Mackintosh, who held a commission in the Royal Army. Notwithstanding her husband's position she raised 300 men of his clan to join Prince Charles Edward.

* * * *

The extension westwards to St. Fillans of the Crieff and Comrie Railway will open up a part of Perthshire rich in literary lore. In the vicinity of Comrie is the eastern entrance to the ancient Royal deer forest of Glenartney, amidst the "hazel shade" of which Sir Walter Scott begins the eventful chase described in "The Lady of the Lake." Then the line about to be opened traverses Dunira woods, associated probably with the most exquisite of the creations of the "Ettrick Shepherd." At the eastern end of Loch Earn, and just opposite St. Fillans, is an artificial islet, known as Neish Island, which during the reign of James V. was the scene of one of those cruel tragedies at one time common in the Highlands. A remnant of the clan Neish which had taken refuge here was attacked during the night by members of the clan Macnab, who had carried a fishing-boat on their shoulders from Loch Tay to Loch Earn. The Neishes were all put to the sword with the exception of one youth, who escaped in the darkness, and whose descendants were known as McIldonies —children of the black lad. Strathearn has many such tales. Murrays, Drummonds, Macgregors, Neishes, and Macnabs stained the heather with each others blood, and were at one time the perpetrators and at another the victims of many a horrible tragedy. The present railway line stops at St. Fillans, but is to be continued westwards, along the side of Loch Earn, to Lochearnhead, where it will join the Callander and Oban Railway. The scene of Sir Walter Scott's "Legend of Montrose" is laid partly in this portion of Strathearn, his castle of "Darlinvarach" being generally believed to be Ardvolrlich Castle, on the southern shore of Loch Earn.

* * * *

The methods of anthology-compilers are sometimes remarkable. A correspondent, well enough known in the world of letters, has forwarded to us an enclosure which he received lately from one of these enterprising gentlemen. The title of a forthcoming collection of verse stands at the head of the sheet, and the author is politely requested to send a few of his "shorter poems to choose from, and also a brief memoir for insertion in the above work." A sample page is forwarded at the same time, and the flattering announcement is made that "each example quoted will be by some sweet singer, whose gifted song is worthy of being perpetuated in such a work" as the forthcoming anthology. This is well enough, and no doubt a little gentle flattery may not be amiss in lining your minor poet, who is notoriously a shy bird. The questionable part of the transaction lies in the intimation that an "Order Card" is enclosed, of which the wording may be held by censorious critics to have the air of a bargain. "Conditionally," it reads, "to my Memoir and examples of my Poetry appearing in ——, edited by ——, I herewith order" so many copies of the said work. The compiler who exercises this fine discrimination in selecting the highest examples of modern poetry is "A Fellow of the Royal Society of Literature."

* * * *

THE LAKE AND THE STAR

All night the blue Lake lay at rest.
One star shone from the sky afa
And the blue Lake's untroubled bre
Mirrored that star.

When each grey Dawn the Sun arose
And stars before him veiled the
She longed all day for the repose
Of starlit night.

"Star, who hast left the realms of s
With me to dwell, on me to shin
My heart shall be thy resting-place
For thou art mine."

One night a storm of wind awoke
The surface of her placid breast
Till on the strand her ripples broke,
In fierce unrest.

Dark clouds obscured the moon and
The star she loved shone down
As a caged lark beats prison bars
She beat the shore.

The white surf o'er her waters trail
Her bosom heaved by storm win
While through the tempest she bew
That one star, lost.

Yet shone that star with fiery glow,
Remote from her in its lone spot
Unchanged through shine or storm,
She knew it not.

BEATRIC

* * *

Edgar Allan Poe, as every one knows, short literature, and even argued that "Par only be enjoyed as a series of minor poe undoubtedly strengthened by the saddening Brooklyn library, the moral whereof has been p in the New York Critic. The statistics show the way in the pursuit of serious literature select company of those who tackle Hume light heart, what a small proportion persev Three dozen readers and more gathered ready first volume of "The Decline and Fall," and the gallant band has declined and fallen to Of the two dozen who began Hume, but o persisted to the close. Fifty per cent. fell awa perusal of the lively romance of the "Vicomte What proportion the remnant bore to those w of the eleven volumes that recount the Musketeers one hesitates to inquire.

* * *

Mr. Cosmo Monkhouse, who died last Sa characterized by some as "a belated Elizabeth say that he was one of those who preferred man reputation of the specialist. He did many thi perhaps he was not particularly eminent in a He was a useful public servant, an art critic w more than commonly catholic and a busy lo

The late Mr. R. H. Newell, an American author of some reputation as a humorist, was chiefly notable for the series of papers, signed "Orpheus C. Kerr," which he wrote during the Civil War. From 1869 till 1874 he was employed as a writer on the New York World, and for the following two years he edited Hearth and Home. Miss Eleanor Ormerod was well-known for her researches in entomology, on which subject she had published several manuals and text-books. She had received recognition from many scientific societies at home and abroad. Mr. John Farmer will perhaps be best remembered for his share in producing the "Harrow Song-book." Some of his songs, especially those he wrote to the words of the late Mr. E. E. Bowen, have already become classical. Certainly no other musician has succeeded better in capturing the spirit at once of the rollicking and sentimental sides of school life as represented in "Willow the King" and "Forty Years On."

We are sorry to learn that Mr. Henry Norman, M.P., has been laid up with a severe attack of sciatica.

The effects of the late Mr. C. S. Parnell are to be sold shortly by auction at Avondale. He had amassed, it is said, a very fair collection of books on engineering and kindred subjects.

Dr. Hume Brown, editor of the Register of the Privy Council of Scotland, has been appointed to the Sir William Fraser Chair of Ancient History at Edinburgh University.

Mr. Leonard Courtney's interesting article in the Contemporary on "The Making and Reading of Newspapers" has been reprinted in pamphlet form by the Social and Political Education League.

On Tuesday afternoon Messrs. Sotheby disposed of an important collection of autograph letters of Dr. Johnson. Two unpublished letters, to Mr. Chambers, fetched respectively £56 and £57. At the same sale a letter (1816) to Godwin from Shelley fetched £24.

"Sherlock Holmes" is due to make his reappearance in the August number of the Strand Magazine. "The Hound of the Baskervilles" is the name of the story.

The Swedish Nobel Prize, for the author who has produced the "most notable literary work in the sense of the ideal," will be awarded on December 10 of this year. The prize was arranged for under the will of Alfred Nobel, which also appointed the judges.

The printed books in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris are being rearranged. They are said to number about 1,200,000, and to occupy some two miles of shelving.

The Prophetic Novelist

The man of letters has always been prone to prophesy. This can hardly be surprising when we consider how difficult it is to attain to fame in any more legitimate fashion. There is always a chance, even if his books have no other value in the eye of the public, of the near enough to the truth for the prophecy hunter a fa should be encouraging to all future prophets. For in t of amusement it is the hits alone which count; and the tion of misses scored has, fortunately enough, no lat posterity. The writer of fiction can thus sit down r to paint the future. For one thing, a novelist need taken seriously; for another, he has the comfortable a that if, drawing his bow at a venture, he chance t target once in a hundred flights, his one successful amply atone for the misdirection of the rest. And reall a quick apprehension, an ingenious turn of mind, a acquaintance with modern scientific research, it is surpr this century of swift development) how frequently the of the story-teller are realized. M. Jules Verne, whos charmed our boyhood, now finds himself occupying the position of the intelligent anticipator of events. Long record of Mr. Phineas Fogg, the hero of "Round the Eighty Days," was beaten by an actual traveller of blood, and the exploits of recent French "submarin fair soon to rival those of Captain Nemo of the Nautil the veteran French author has always strictly confine to fiction, and has refused even to grant the intervie statement of his opinions as to the future of M. Santos-new airship. His English counterpart, as some have ca

—Mr. H. G. Wells—takes his prophetic gift more serio contributes now and again serious articles to the pa reviews in which his more fantastic descriptions of Mart Selenites are replaced by sober anticipations of change surface of the earth. A series of articles from his pe running in the North American Review, which "Anticipations: An Experiment in Prophecy." In fict Wells is apt to let his imagination carry him so far sometimes falls, perhaps, to visualize his conceptions they remain, at any rate, somewhat obscure to the read we may add, to the unfortunate artists who are called illustrate his stories as they appear serially in the ma
He is apt to journey into realms so remote from this into ages so distant from the present day, that we standard of comparison and are apt to find his desc cloudy and unsatisfying. In his "Anticipations" not venture so far afield, and we can consequently esti prophetic talent with greater ease. It is a very cons talent, and Mr. Wells' Pegasus trots quite comfortably the shafts of his review. It is none too common t novelist, and a novelist with so active an imagination a the author of "The War of the Worlds," discursi eminently sane and practical a fashion on such sub "Locomotion in the Twentieth Century," or "The Diffusion of Great Cities." The author of "Lookin ward" might have discussed such topics with equal grav then Mr. Edward Bellamy was a novelist rather by than by nature, and his imaginative faculty was of no v temper. We do not know that the gifted author o Coming Race" ever condescended to expound to the pu periodical his views on the immediate future. And, although Mr. Wells does this sort of thing quite admi good deal better, no doubt, than would any of his novelists—we confess to some doubt as to the wisdo proceeding. To deal seriously with the possible happe the next ten or twenty years, or even more, must seem accustomed to leap gaily over the centuries, somethin

Literature Portraits.—XII.

ROBERT LOUIS BALFOUR STEVENSON.

His Versatility.

"To know what you like is the beginning of wisdom and of old age," and Stevenson never grew old. In literature his tastes were catholic but changeable, and thus his collected writings form a complete library to fit all the moods of man. One apprehends that he never quite knew which literary form he loved best, and the resultant infinite variety makes him one of the most delightful companions in modern letters. By reason of the many sides of his character—those he develops especially for our entertainment, those he hides from us, those he half shows, and those we imagine he possessed—his work is continually interesting. He had the inestimable art of confiding a great deal but never telling everything.

From the English Illustrated Magazine, by permission of the Proprietors of the Illustrated London News.]

The "Edinburgh" edition of his works is, one is inclined to think, the most enjoyable library produced by one man of our time. If you be for the gaiety and pathos of childhood, he will give you a thousand pictures of the shining morning face; if you be for art and letters, his essays, of which he once wrote in a humoursome spirit:—

> My other works are of a slighter kind;
> Here is the party to improve your Mind!

will be difficult to match in the work of another; should you be of journeys beyond the dreams of many trav and above this collection, there remain the which one would be inclined to defy the worl being wiser, better, kinder, more loving, and m

Will he remain a Classic?

It has been said that during his lifetime S a classic, tho "Edinburgh" edition being the of his widely spreading fame. It is now litt years since his death, and yet one wonders—assured? As a contemporary he was splen haunted by the idea that the most deadly of th may unsay some of our most heartfelt rhapsodies one to-day who would sing as did Mr. Le Gallie

> Virgil of prose! far distant is the day
> That at the mention of your heartfelt na > Shall shake its head, oblivious, and say:
> "We know him not, this master, nor his
> Not for so swift forgetfulness you wrough
> Day upon day, with rapt fastidious pen,
> Turning, like precious stones, with anxio
> This word and that again and yet again,
> Seeking to match its meaning with the w
> Nor to the morning stars gave ears atten
> That you, indeed, might ever dare to be
> With other praise than immortality > Unworthily content.
> Not while a boy still whistles on the eart
> Not while a single human heart beats tru
> Nor while Love lasts, and Honour, and th
> Has earth a grave,
> O well-beloved, for you!

We have seemed to know him and so have honor a character is way of understa
but are we e posterity this tude? Last a out admirer of as of his wo through Bourn town the nut once given hi be remembere there from 188 that in musing
vore he wrote:

> For love of
> for the s
> Of those, my > country > Who early > windy o
> To plant a > where w
> The surly h > cormora
> I, on the li > inscribe
> The name of

The would-be

FRONTISPIECE TO MISS MARIE FRASER'S "IN STEVENSON'S SAMOA."
[By permission of Messrs. Smith Elder.]

work live?" And yet the speculation, unprofitable as it may be, is always with us, especially in regard to those of whose reputation we are most jealous. Many, indeed, have attempted to appraise his position in letters of late years: the pros weigh equally with the cons and in the meantime new editions of his books are frequent. An appeal to the commercial test merely shows the hopelessness of an attempt to gauge his present position. If one might paraphrase a dictum of his it would be said the true services of his work are inestimable in money (or fame) and will never be paid for. His power to delight, certainly the people of his own period, was remarkable in a time not especially devoted to literature; his hold upon his public was that of the friend who had grown to be a lover; and yet we are haunted by the thought of that callous critic, Time. In the epilogue to Mr. Cope Cornford's interesting book, the result of an "eager study" of Stevenson, he says that—

> With all Stevenson's brilliant endowment and all his amazing cleverness, the sane, serenely humorous vision of the great masters is denied him. Stevenson was no "natural force let loose." Rather was he the very type of the athlete in letters, with all his powers cultivated to their utmost, informed with a rare and brave spirit, running—with many flourishes and tricks of pace—the race that was set before him with all his might.

And there can be no doubt that he lacked a certain largeness which we look for in the immortals. And yet he was often great and his dreams were greater still.

The "End of a Man's Desire."

But what of Stevenson the man, did his work and life bring him contentment? If the end of a man's desire be spiritual happiness, all the means he employs will be means to that end, and Stevenson has been so candid and so fully published that one should be able to judge, without especial personal knowledge, if his labours were crowned with the inestimable reward of peace. If ever an author was carefully read, diagnosed and dissected, digested, re-read, written about, talked of and known, as far as one human brain can know another, that man was and is R. L. S. Barring a certain amount of ill-health such as comes to many thousands of men who still have to labour, his life after the early days was a series of artistic victories, and after "Dr. Jekyll," of monetary conquests as well. Fame brought him all her wreaths and gifts. Fortune, although he constantly, and rather foolishly, complained of the want of means, was in no way niggard. His work was widely recognized, and his letters have made him deeply known to us, and the conclusion of the whole matter is this, that it were well for humanity, for the peace and joy of life, if the artistic temperament were blotted out in sneers. The letters from Vailima, if they prove anything of interest to literary people, make it quite clear that the whole business is vanity. A few hours in his garden and a little rest often seem to be Stevenson's whole desire, or rather, expressed wish; against this is the craftsman's indomitable literary ambition and the passionate following by the poet of ignes fatui whose dancing afar ahead were clearly visible to him even in the earliest days, when it was intended that he should rather fix his eyes on those Northern Lights which his forefathers had made it their business to build and tend. Failing the final authoritative biography, which is being prepared for us by able hands, the view that Stevenson often regretted his mode of life is forced upon us by his letters; as time wore on his passionate love of literature did not a great deal of useful work, earned a fair wage, and would been somewhat surprised and not a little disgusted with Bohemian and gifted son. But in a thousand ways the fa family the th fathers; always i Scottish mental a although Edinbur not great He ha Norther disputat "Talk Talkers an exc account school he form convers style. Hi and con many ad in the br of his ca ties, the R. A. M. son; Mr ing Jenk biograph

R. L. STEVENSON.
From a Crayon Drawing 1884.
[From the English Illustrated Magazine, by permission of the Proprietors of the Illustrated London News.]

lived to write; the late Sir W. G. Simpson, "the im able Cigarette" of the "Inland Voyage," Mr. James Ferrier, now dead, Mr. Charles Baxter, and Mr. Henley, were among those of the society in which h and in conversation and general interchange of ide thoughts helped him to find his own point of view. Scottish too in his interest in ethics; as a moralist ever prominent and strenuous and, with perfect simpli modesty, ready to show all of us the right way and inclined to keep us strictly to it. He was of his country, too, in his romance; his dreams, his brownies, as he called them, were Scottish in their kind and fantasy. Born on the 13th of November, 1850, in Edinburgh, of which he has written many picturesque notes and a hundred cutting criticisms, he knew in his early life the meteorological purgatory of his native town.

"There," he said, "the delicate die

The Land of Counterpane.

But there also he spent a sheltered and, according to Miss Blantyre Simpson's account, a by no means unhappy youth. In the nursery days he doubtless suffered, but his nurse and mother were always at his side, and his own verse would lead one to suppose that his remarkable imagination created a world for him in which he reigned with delight. Stevenson, who was always at his best in penning a dedication, never wrote a more touching and beautiful one than that which precedes his volume of verse for children and, if such be possible, immortalizes his old nurse.

THE CHILD'S "GARDEN OF VERSE."
[By permission of Mr. John Lane.]

The "land of counterpane" was familiar to him through many a weary hour of childish illness. Those who can remember such days will remember also that they contained happy hours, when the imagination of the patient, taught by ill-health to seek for quiet delights, planned happinesses or wove tiny romances which were to befall him when he returned to freedom. What appears sometimes to be Stevenson's imaginative insight of children's joys and sorrows is often merely a recollection of his own experiences. How vividly do the following lines recall the happier moments of a sick child's life :—

And sometimes for an hour or so
I watched my leaden soldiers go,
With different uniforms and drills,
Among the bed-clothes, through the hills.

And sometimes sent my ships in fleets
All up and down among the sheets ;
Or brought my trees
and houses out,
And planted cities all about.

I was the giant great and still
That sits upon the pillow-hill,
And sees before him
dale and plain,
The pleasant land of

When the grass is ripe like grain,
When the scythe is stoned again,
When the lawn is shaven clear,
Then my hole shall reappear.

I shall find him, never fear,
I shall find my grenadier ;
But, for all that's gone and come,
I shall find my soldier dumb.

He has lived, a little thing,
In the grassy woods of spring ;
Done, if he could tell me true,
Just as I should like to do.

He has seen the starry hours
And the springing of the flowers ;
And the fairy things that pass
In the forests of the grass.

Adolescence.

From a delicate and "difficult" childhood, ofte "Child's Garden," Stevenson grew, one cannot a rather awkward adolescence. Edinburgh wa gipsy air, his taste in Spanish cloaks and hats. At the University he educated himsel ing the classes, and cultivated a system of the advantages offered him by his Alma M him a deal of trouble and landed him, one difficulties at home. Anyway he was consider Professor of Engineering, Fleeming Jenkin, h friend, had to be jockeyed out of a certifica eye. But if the elder Stevenson was encourag able document to believe that his son would profession he soon learnt the truth, and at the all idea of his building harbours and lightho and he began to study law. In 1875 he examination "with credit," as he says, and w Bar.

About this time he made the acquaintance o was then a patient in an Edinburgh hos frequently quoted, we cannot resist the temp Henley's excellent portrait of the Stevense period. Of late many have tried their hand Stevenson as he emerged from provincial lif citizen of the world, but no one has so complete the poet of the "Apparition."

Thin-legged, thin-chested, slight unspea
Neat-footed and weak-fingered ; in his fa
Lean, large-boned, curved of back, and t
Bold-lipped, rich-tinted, mutable as the
The brown eyes radiant with vivacity—
There shines a brilliant and romantic gu
A spirit intense and rare, with trace on
Of passion and impudence and energy.
Vallant in Velvet, light in ragged luck,
Most vain, most generous, sternly critic
Buffoon and poet, lover and sensualist ;
A deal of Ariel, just a streak of Puck,
Much Antony, of Hamlet most of all.
And something of the Shorter Catechist

In spite of the lines being intende

the first and only time that the master-passion of love closed its Titan grip fairly upon Stevenson. However nearly correct that may be, it is certain that the life romantic with him was mainly an affair of the imagination or, as with Watteau, of the spirit. Again, as youth retreated, the "Shorter-catechist" gained on the buffoon and poet, the Ariel and the Puck; in his home life he was evidently sincerely religious; perhaps something of his creed is expressed in "A Christmas Sermon." To be honest, to be kind, to earn a little and spend a little less, to keep a few friends, but those without capitulation—above all to keep friends with himself—these things were among his aims and desires but not entirely within the scope of his accomplishment.

All through his youth Stevenson pursued letters with avidity; his earliest games were not unlike his later stories, his dreams and fancies were developed, not changed, as he grew in years. During the time which he spent with his cousin Mr. R. A. M. Stevenson, the period following his call, he probably tasted the essence and charm of that unquiet and delightful epoch, youth, which, as he said, is ignorance of self as well as ignorance of life. "These two unknowns," he wrote, "the young man brings together again and again, now in the airiest touch, now with a bitter hug; now with exquisite pleasure, now with cutting pain; but never with indifference, to which he is a total stranger, and never with that near kinsman of indifference, contentment." In the days of which these lines may be said to be a picture, he learned to know life and something of the hearts of men. While sporting in the shade of that venerable city which he said he must always think of as his home even when most entirely bound to those "ultimate islands" of his final resting place, and again, while sharing the fortunes of his cousin in that once gay paradise of painters, the forest of Fontainebleau—of which he wrote with so graceful a touch—he was always and at all times preparing for his raid on literary fame.

Virginibus Puerisque.

In 1876, at the age of 26, "Virginibus Puerisque" proclaimed a new literary light. These essays contain some of his most delightful work, but, like "An Inland Voyage," the record of his canoe journey in Belgium with his friend Sir Walter Simpson, and the "Travels with a Donkey in the Cevennes," of which he once wrote:—

> It blew, it rained, it thawed, it snowed, it thundered—
> Which was the donkey? I have often wondered!

like both these agreeable volumes, this book did little beyond, what was indeed well worth doing, delight the more acute and sensitive among literary people and give unbounded pleasure to Stevenson's own circle of friends. "The New Arabian Nights" appeared in London about this time, but even then the author's fame was not widely known. The "Familiar Studies of Men and Books," which is just now appearing, we believe, in a new edition, did not exactly wake the echoes, although it possesses a quite exceptional charm. He himself spoke of the essays as the "readings of a literary vagrant," and adds, "One book led to another, one study to another. The first was published with trepidation. Since no bones were broken, the second was launched with greater confidence. So, by insensible degrees, a young man of our generation acquires, in his own eyes, a kind of roving judicial commission through the ages; and, having once escaped the perils of the Freemans and the Furnivalls, sets himself up to right the wrongs of universal history and criticism."

The Writing of "Treasure Island."

was living with his father and mother, and, one pres wife and her then little son Samuel Lloyd Osbourne—late his vigorous collaborator—at a house "lug known as the late Miss McGregor's Cottage." He occasion to amuse his young companion he made the island; "the shape of it took my fancy beyond exp he wrote, "it contained harbours that pleased me like and, with the unconciousness of the predestined, I tie performance 'Treasure Island.'" This very char method of feeling for an inspiration soon developed desired result; Stevenson was quickly at work upon that was to end his struggles and make his name a word.

It seems [he adds] as though a full-grown ex man of letters might engage to turn out 'Treasure Isl many pages a day and keep his pipe alight. But, al was not my case. Fifteen days I stuck to it, and t fifteen chapters; and then in the early paragrap sixteenth ignominously lost hold. My mouth was emp was not one word of 'Treasure Island' in my bo here were the proofs of the beginning already waiti
the 'Hand and Spear.' Then I corrected them, livi

R. L. STEVENSON'S MOTHER, 1854.
(From the English Illustrated Magazine, by permission of the Proprie Illustrated London News.)

most part alone, walking on the heath at Weybridg autumn mornings, a good deal pleased with what I and more appalled than I can depict to you in word remained for me to do. I was thirty-one; I was th a family; I had lost my health; I had never yet paid never yet made £200 a year; my father had quite bought back and cancelled a book that was judged was this to be another fiasco? I was, indeed, very despair; but I shut my mouth hard, and during the j Davos, where I was to pass the winter, had the res think of other things and bury myself in the novel Boisgobey. Arrived at my destination, down I sat on

That idea of being the head of a family and one who had lost his health did not leave him after a dozen such victories as would have made many a man contented for a life time. "The Black Arrow" followed "Treasure Island" serially in Young Folks' Paper, and, although it is said to have been very popular, I may own it is to me like the "Song of Rahéro," one of the few works of Stevenson which do not inevitably give pleasure; even in the de luxe setting of the "Edinburgh" many would find it difficult to read through. Essays in Cornhill and elsewhere were appearing about this time, and the work we have mentioned as being prepared more or less at Skerryvore was shaping itself and soon became of infinite interest to his circle.

"Dr. Jekyll."

But it was not until 1886 that his second success with the million was effected. "The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde" appeared to make its appeal to all classes of readers. It was short, a great quality in a hurried age; it was compact of exciting fantasy, it caught the reader at once and held him from start to finish. Its mystery, its force, its completeness sent it

GREYFRIARS.
[From "Picturesque Notes on Edinburgh," by permission of Messrs. Seeley.]

spinning across the English-speaking world. I remember seeing it produced in two well-known London theatres almost in the same week. The man in the street was at last familiar with the name of Stevenson; the bookstalls flamed with the covers of an enormous cheap edition. As Mr. Cornford says—in his life of Stevenson from which we have already quoted in the hope that all interested in the author of "Dr. Jekyll" will turn to it for the fullest information at present available—"The clergy at largely augmented." After the publication of " Mr. Hyde" the profession of letters must, in o become an easy one to Stevenson. Publisher service and the public eager for all he cared

"The Master of Ballantrae," which has been gr and many other novels of a popular character, s collaboration with Mr. Lloyd Osbourne, followed, of an ever-increasing circle of readers. I Stevenson's works the plays are least generally remain extremely interesting. When any one of produced on the stage it has received the pra few, and those who have had the privilege of Admiral Guinea read by the accomplished
Welch, can have no doubt as to the dramatic po which they are, at least, intermittently endowed.

Verse.

Thus we have seen Stevenson conducting the t
as he called it, in many ways; poet, essayist, playw historian, polemic, and intimate letter writer. Hi care and the natural power and grace of his everything he wrote with an interest to all, at lea in any way, the same paths as he followed. Amon men of yesterday, almost of to-day, he is one of those appeal to the literary man. Judged from the lasting art we believe that Stevenson the poet a letter writer will outlive the novelist and te although at the present time he is possibly better writer of "Kidnapped" and "Catriona" than "Underwoods" and "The Child's Garden o
"Familiar Studies of Men and Books," "M Portraits," or the early and later essays.

As Stevenson wrote in his dedication of "Un a friend:—

> Some day or other ('tis a general curse)
> The wisest author stumbles into verse but he was hardly the wisest author, and as into the writing of rhyme there can be no doubt h art of poetry with no little of that "broken tens which he applied to all sides of literature. He candid friend says—he was always particularly hap spoken criticism of his circle—to him of some of h

"I cannot understand why you do lyrics so badly," unafraid, and in the end his poetry like his prose admirable high spirit with excellent lucidity Poetry is the fine flower of the literary arts measure of a man's style and qualities. The inspiration of the highest were of course denied but from the point of view of the agreeable compan of a thousand moods, his verse is fully satisfyin delightful ring, a gusto in his "A Song of the Ro

> The gauger walked with willing foot,
> And aye the gauger played the flute;
> And what would master gauger play
> But Over the hills and far away?
>
> Whene'er I buckle on my pack
> And foot it gaily in the track,
> O pleasant gauger, long since dead,
> I hear your fluting on ahead.
>
> You go with me the self-same way—
> The self-same air for me you play;

Then follow you, wherever hie
The travelling mountains of the sky,
Or let the streams in civil mode
Direct your choice upon a road.

For one and all, or high, or low,
Will lead you where you wish to go;
And one and all go night and day
Over the hills and far away.

In another mood, but with the same engaging and reminiscent music, are the verses beginning "It is the season now to go." The picture of youth and spring is as beautiful as will be found in many a classic:—

It is the season now to go
About the country high and low,
Among the lilacs hand in hand,
And two and two in fairyland.

The brooding boy, the sighing maid,
Wholly fain and half afraid,
Now meet along the hazel'd brook
To pass and linger, pause and look.

A year ago, and blithely paired,
Their rough-and-tumble play they shared;
They kissed and quarrelled, laughed and cried
A year ago at Eastertide.

With bursting heart, with fiery face,
She strove against him in the race;
He unabashed her garter saw,
That now would touch her skirts with awe.

Now by the stile ablaze she stops,
And his demurer eyes he drops;
Now they exchange averted sighs
Or stand and marry silent eyes.

And he to her a hero is
And sweeter she than primroses;
Their common silence dearer far
Than nightingale and mavis are.

Now when they sever wedded hands,
Joy trembles in their bosom-strands,
And lovely laughter leaps and falls
Upon their lips in madrigals.

This poem contains so many extremely happy lines that perhaps one may take it as among his most brilliant essays in verse, while the "Lines to Will H. Low," which we quote, give the final gauge of his qualities and defects as a poet:—

Youth now flees on feathered foot,
Faint and fainter sounds the flute,
Rarer songs of gods; and still Somewhere on the sunny hill,
Or along the winding stream,
Through the willows, flits a dream;
Flits but shows a smiling face,
Flees but with so quaint a grace,
None can choose to stay at home,
All must follow, all must roam.

This is unborn beauty; she
Now in air floats high and free,
Takes the sun and breaks the blue

Still with gray hair we stumble on,
Till, behold, the vision gone.
Where hath fleeting beauty fled?
To the doorway of the dead.
Life is over, life was gay;
We have come the primrose way.

These verses, one has always felt, give his innermost f the subject of the avocation of art. The amusing and "Letter to a Young Gentleman who Proposes to Ent Career of Art" is, it sometimes seems, a trifle too c posé to contain the real feeling; it is admirable, inc attractive, but it is not more than a brilliant piece of true meaning he gives to his friend and fellow artist—i branch of æsthetics; it is this:—One must follow as best one can, with leaden feet through the wet w miry lanes, she will ever evade us, but ever be befo vision will sustain and reward us for all until at last we doorway of the dead and can say—

Life is over, life was gay;
We have come the primrose way,

and be grateful for that much of victory. Fata

DRAWING BY STEVENSON.
[From the Studio, by permission of the Proprietors.

the unattainable, the might-have-been, frequently col verse.

In a totally different connexion he speaks of "tha beautiful brother whom we once all had, and whom we lost and mourned, the man we ought to have been, we hoped to be." To have loved art and lost the belief can reproduce our most cherished dreams—that appears been an attitude of mind that assailed Stevenson at all and under many changing stars. It added to his gr charm; it gave to his humorous muse "die lachende Th Wappen" which enables him so quickly to touch all hearts. This was a moral Stevenson did not tire of repeati youth," he said, "we have sights of that House Beautif which we shall never enter. They are dreams and unsubst bility of telling us the essential beauty of his dreams, it caused him to be so exquisite a craftsman that his very means to an end almost realize the ambition of perfection.

But in his verse as a whole he was by no means pre-occupied with telling us of his beliefs and hopes. What may be called his occasional poems often show him in a different mood. The wit, the social philosopher, the gay companion, pleasantest of friends shine in much of his lighter work. One recalls in this connexion his lines to Minnie (with a handglass).

THE CHILD'S "GARDEN OF VERSE"
[By permission of Mr. John Lane.]

A picture frame for you to fill,
A paltry setting for your face,
A thing that has no worth until You lend it something of your grace.
I send (unhappy I that sing Laid by awhile upon the shelf)
Because I would not send a thing Less charming than you are yourself.

And happier than I, alas!
(Dumb thing I envy its delight)
'T will wish you well, the looking-glass,
And look you in the face to-night.

And what could be neater, more instinct with a polite and catholic charity, than the well-known envoy to "Underwoods"?

Go, little book, and wish to all
Flowers in the garden, meat in the hall,
A bin of wine, a spice of wit,
A house with lawns enclosing it,
A living river by the door,
A nightingale in the sycamore!

This was the spirit of the man, the one in which he faced the world and wished it well.

The Essays.

The passage from his verse to his literary essays is a very easy one, for the same spirit is clearly shown in both classes of work. Apart from the interest one has in his personal point of view in regard to such diverse writers—Thoreau and Villon, Walt Whitman and Pepys, Charles D'Orleans and John Knox, the essays are stored with many pages dealing broadly with life in general and art in particular. For example, in the Walt Whitman article he says:—

> We are accustomed nowadays to a great deal of pulling over the circumstances in which we are placed. The great refinement of many poetical gentlemen has rendered them practically unfit for the jostling and ugliness of life, and they record their unfitness at considerable length. The bold and awful poetry of Job's complaint produces too many flimsy

It would be a poor service to spread result, among the comparatively innocent of men. When our little poets have to be ploughman and learn wisdom, we must tamper with our ploughmen. Where a m circumstances preserves composure of m and tobacco, and his wife and children, dull and unremunerative labour; whe predicament can afford a lesson by the wa his intellectual superiors, there is plainly as well as something to be gained by teac
It is better to leave him as he is than to
It is better that he should go without th culture, if cheerless doubt and paralyzin to be the consequence. Let us by all me hide-bound validity of sensation and s which blurs and decolourizes for poor na pageant of consciousness; let us teach can to enjoy, and they will learn for them but let us see to it, above all, that we giv brave, vivacious note, and build the man we demolish its substitute, indifference.

In such paragraphs as these throughout son, while considering, say, the character a David Thoreau or the life of that student, po François Villon, manages to give us a good n and hint at a good many characteristics be found in the men he criticized, but were his own many-sided and contradictory natur

Travel and Fiction.

After his poems and essays, his account small, such as the "Travels with a Donkey are among Stevenson's most engaging work. In fiction "The New Arabian Nights," both series, "The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde" hold the essence of romance in solution. These, and a few tales—"Will o' the Mill," "Markheim," "The Lantern Bearers," "Providence and the Guitar," "Thrawn Janet," "Some South Sea Stories," and others—place him at once among the most entertaining and powerful writers of his period. The longer novels have been greatly praised. "Ebb-Tide" written in collaboration with Mr. Lloyd Osbourne, is a remarkable piece of work even from the hand of Stevenson; "Weir of Hermiston" is concentrated and powerful; the Balfour series and the early stories full of excitement, painted with skill and polished to the last degree, but they are not for every taste. Life may be like that to Stevenson, but it is not so to all of us. As has been said, however, you may take away half of the writings of this author and leave enough to furnish forth an epicurean feast. His wit shines over all his work, but the laboured and lengthy novel does occasionally obscure the wisdom, lightness, and insight that show so clearly in his shorter works.

As a social philosopher his dicta are admirable; one recalls from the entertaining "Letter to a Young Gentleman" the phrase:—

> If a man love the labour of any trade, apart from any question of success or fame, the gods have called him.

From the "Amateur Emigrant" this rather happy statement on a moot point:—

> To be a gentleman is to be one all the world over, and in every relation and grade of society. It is a high calling, to which a man must first be born, and then devote himself for life.

Of taking a wife he has said, "Marriage is terrifying, but so is a cold and forlorn old age."

His best, and best known, aphorism on the wedded state is, of course, that which says:—"To marry is to domesticate the recording angel," or, in a different mood—"To deal plainly, if they only married when they fell in love, most people would die unwed." Among his many qualities he was, in a sense, a fighter. He loved polemics and held that "the spice of life is battle, and that the friendliest relations are still a kind of contest." Was not this a cry of his heart:—

> O to be up and doing, O,
> Unfearing and unashamed to go,
> In all the uproar and the press,
> About my human happiness.

Like most accomplished writers, he could occasionally be intensely bitter at the expense of the million. "I have always suspected," he said, "public taste to be a mongrel product, out of affection by dogmatism," or, in another vein of equally caustic flavour "There is nothing so encouraging as the spectacle of self-sufficiency." But, after all, Stevenson is the last man one can attempt to create from his own or his characters' epigrams; he is far too many-sided for such a course to prosper.

Stevenson as a Journalist.

Owing to the very general interest literary people have taken in Stevenson's personality and artistic career, and owing, also, to the absence of any authoritative information in regard to some of the minor incidents of his life, a good many rather absurd stories and grotesque myths have grown about his name. Those sonian. No sooner, however, had the article been [illegible] an interesting chapter in the life of an always [illegible] than The Times receives a letter from the manager of the [illegible] in question—San Francisco Chronicle—in which he said:—

"The part of Mr. Bell's article regarding which I [illegible] to speak with positiveness is that in which he states [illegible] circumstantiality that Robert Louis Stevenson, late in [illegible]ter, 1879, arrived in San Francisco, and in the spring following year was "given a job" in the city department [illegible] San Francisco Chronicle, which he performed in such [illegible] satisfactory manner that the item he was assigned to [illegible] to be given to another reporter to put into English [illegible] the readers of the paper and the latitude of California [illegible] that later "he continued to write articles for the Sunday [illegible] of the Chronicle, but there is no indication that he [illegible] affectionately of them, for he never rescued them [illegible] files." Both these statements are absolutely false. [illegible] managing editor of the Chronicle at the time, and [illegible] knew every reporter, whether on the regular staff [illegible] merely detail work. I also read and accepted all the [illegible]scripts published in the Chronicle during the period [illegible] and can assert with positiveness that the Chronicle was [illegible] honoured by the offer of one from Mr. Stevenson. [illegible]

HIGH STREET, EDINBURGH.
[From "Picturesque Notes on Edinburgh," by permission of Messrs. [illegible]

trust to my memory solely on this point, but have ca[illegible] account books of the Chronicle to be carefully examin[illegible] no trace of Mr. Stevenson's name can be found in the[illegible] he worked a single day for the paper, or contributed an[illegible] or articles, there would be a record of the fact, for the[illegible] of the Chronicle are methodically managed. To make a[illegible] doubly sure, however, I have questioned the then city [illegible] of the Chronicle and others who were on the staff of the [illegible] in 1879 and 1880, and they all unite in saying that [illegible] absolutely no foundation for the statements I am here d[illegible] as they have already been denied in the columns [illegible] Chronicle. I wish to add something that should be con[illegible] on this point. The Chronicle, like most journals, tries [illegible] the most of such facts as the exigencies of [illegible]

Mr. L. Cope Cornford's book in Blackwood's "Modern English Writers" Series, as well as Stevenson's own candid articles and letters, give a fairly full picture of his life and doings. His early education and illness, his University training, and his reading for the Bar, his own self-culture, and his intense passion for letters, stimulated, one fancies, by his gifted cousin, Mr. R. A. M. Stevenson, prepared him excellently for the work he had undertaken. His romantic and unconventional marriage with a lady of intensely interesting character, if one may judge by the fragmentary allusions to her in his published writings: his enforced journeyings back and forth from climate to climate, and, finally, his settlement in Samoa, where he was at once the welcome guest, the friend, the master, and the entertainer of a people with whom he deeply sympathized, and whose rights he boldly championed, all these things show in his writings. "He has put into his books a great deal of all that went to the making of his life," wrote his cousin in an interesting magazine article some time ago, and, indeed, it is clear that not only the externals of his daily round were used for his artistic purpose, but the imaginings which haunted his youth and, doubtless, were with him all through life are employed in a thousand especially in his work other than fiction, w readers to him with very pleasant bonds; those books with interest were, in the non-personal se friends who followed his fortunes with increasing

When at last, on December 4, 1894, his as he desired it, while he worked and in the choosing, the English-reading public was Although proud of being a poet, he was proude
Scottish, as were all his race, and by a fello Barrie, was written one of the most pathetic of t to his memory. The following verses give a th sorrow of his native land and her consolation:

I've ha'en o'brawer sons a flow,
My Walter mair renown could win,
And he that followed at the plough,
But Louis was my Benjamin.

"The lad was mine!" Erect she s
No more by vain regrets oppress't
Once more her eyes are clear; her h
Are proudly crossed upon her brea

He was a son of S who could pitch delight in any pa
His sympathies all he asked wa which he would live, he would q himself with a circ
sories of home.
that "the wide beneath which he his Scottish birth Gallionne sang, i which we have al

High on his Southern Se
Our northern d Strange stars above his gr Strange leaves tropic splend
While, far bene
ing mile on m
The great Paci
deeps, Smiles all day secret smile.

He may have h thousand dreams

SWANSTON COTTAGE.
[Photograph by J. Patrick, Edinburgh, by permission of the Illustrated London News.]

pleasant ways in his works. It had always been his passion, his life, to write; and yet, at last, it appears to have become the burden of his days. One wonders whether his regrets and difficulties in regard to his last years of work were something of a literary pose, and if he made too much of the fact that—

Day after day the labour's to be done,
And sure as come the postman and the sun,
The indefatigable ink must run.

Again and again, as we have said, his letters call out bitterly when some work has at last been accomplished—"But O! it has been such a grind. The devil himself would allow a man to

of a host of qualities and characteristics k intimate friends, but, for those who have not ha of knowing him except through his writing epitaph might be—He was a man of exquisite a Swanston, so dear to Stevenson, still lies history. The hamlet is much as it was w it as "one of the least considerable of hamlets of a few cottages on a green beside a bu houses far out on the road to Fairmilch ganger started to play "Over the hills and

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON

Born 13th November, 1850.
Died 4th December, 1894.

Reproduced from the Wood-cut by R.
(By special arrangement with Messrs. J. M. Dent &

A VISIT TO R. L. STEVENSON.

A "Personal View."

By MORLEY ROBERTS.

It was late in May or early in June, for I cannot now remember the exact date, that I landed in Apia, in the island of Upolu. Naturally enough that island was not to me so much the centre of Anglo-American and German rivalries as the home of Robert Louis Stevenson, then become the literary deity of the Pacific. In a dozen shops in Honolulu I had seen little plaster busts of him; here and there I came across his photograph. And I had a theory about him to put to the test. Though I was not, and am not, one of those who rage against over-great praise, when there is any true foundation for it, I had never been able to understand the laudation of which he was the subject. At that time, and until the fragment of "Weir of Hermiston" was given to the world, nothing but his one short story about the thief and poet, Villon, had seemed to me to be really great, really to command or even to be an excuse for his being in the position in which his critics had placed him. Yet I had read the "Wreckers," the "Ebb Tide," the "Beach of Falesa," "Kidnapped," "Catriona," the "Master of Ballantrae," and the "New Arabian Nights." I came to the conclusion that, as most of the organic chorus of approval came from men who knew him, he must be (as all writers, I think, should be) immeasurably greater than his books. I was prepared then for a personality, and I found it. When his name is mentioned, I no longer think of any of his work, but of a sweet-eyed, thin, brown ghost of a man whom I first saw upon horseback in a grove of cocoanut palms by the sounding surges of a tropic sea. There are writers, and not a few of them, whose work it is a pleasure to read, while it is a pain to know them, a disappointment, almost an unhappiness, to be in their disillusioning company. They have given the best to the world. Robert Louis Stevenson never gave his best, for his best was himself.

At any time of the year the Navigator Islands are truly tropical, and whether the sun inclines towards Cancer or Capricorn, Apia is a bath of warm heat. As soon as the Monowai dropped her anchor inside the opening of the reef that forms the only decent harbour in all the group, I went ashore in haste. Our time was short, but three or four hours, and I could afford neither the time nor the money to stay there till the next steamer. I had much to do in Australia, and was not a little exercised in mind as to how I should, that time, be able to get round the world at all unless I once more shipped before the mast. I was, in fact, so hard put to it in the matter of cash that when the hotel-keeper asked three dollars for a pony on which to ride to Vailima, I refused to pay it, and went away believing that after all I should not see him whom I most desired to meet. Yet it was possible, if not likely, that he would come down to visit the one fortnightly link with the great world from which he was an exile. I had to trust to chance, and in the meantime walked the long street of Apia and viewed the Samoans, whom he so loved, with vivid interest. These people, Stevenson delighted in them. Man and woman alike and the whole world in the face, and went by, proud, and with the smile of a happy, unconquered race.

As I walked with half a dozen curious whom the hazards of travel had made my companions, from the main road into the seclusion of a shad palms, and as I went I saw coming towards me a man man behind whom rode a native. As he came near at him without curiosity, for, as the time passed, I wa reconciled by all there was to see to the fact that I meet this exiled Scot. And yet, as he neared and p knew that I knew him, that he was familiar; and very I was aware that this sense of familiarity was not, happens to a traveller, the awakened memory of a was an individual, and a personality. I stopped and him, and suddenly roused myself. Surely this was R Stevenson, and this his man. So might the ghosts of Friday pass one on the shore of Juan Fernandez.

I called the "boy" and gave him my card, and to overtake his master. In another moment my liter tion, this chief among the Samoans, was shaking hand He alighted from his horse, and we walked together t town. I felt a victim to him, and forgot that he w writings were what packed dates might be to one who first time under a palm in some far oasis; they were a tumbler compared with sérac. He was first a man a writer. The pitiful opposite is too common.

I think, indeed I am sure, for I know he could no he was pleased to see me. What I represented to hardly reckoned at the time, but I was a messenge great world of men; I moved close to the heart of thi fresh from San Francisco, from New York, from Lo spoke like an exile, but one not discouraged. T physique was of the frailest (I had noted with astonish his thigh as he sat on horseback was hardly thicke forearm), he was alert and gently eager. That soft, which held me was full of humour, of pathos, of tender I could imagine it capable of indignation, and of might be that his body was dying, but his mind w elastic, and unspoiled by selfishness or affectation. regrets; they concerned the Samoans greatly.

"Had I come here fifteen years ago I might h these islands."

He imagined it possible that international intri not have flourished under him. Never had I seen s man who would be king. He owned, with a shyly com that he had leanings towards buccaneering. The man were he but some shaggy-bearded shellback, appeale His own physique was his apology for being merely a novels.

We went on board the steamer, and at his reques steward show his faithful henchman over her. In the we sat in the saloon and drank "soft" drinks. It ple to talk, and he spoke fluently in a voice that was

I asked him to accept a book I had brought from England, hoping to be able to give it to him. It was the only book of mine that I thought worthy of his acceptance. That he knew it pleased me. But he always desired to please, and pleased without any effort. When the boy came back from viewing the internal arrangements of the Monowai, he sat down with us as a free warrior. He was more a friend than a servant; Stevenson treated him as the head of a clan in his old home might treat a worthy follower. As there was yet an hour before the vessel sailed I went on shore with him again. We were rowed there by a Samoan in a waisteloth. His head was whitened by the lime which many of the natives use to bleach their dark locks to a fashionable red.

The air was hot and the sea glittered under an intense sun. The rollers from the roadstead broke upon the reef. The outer ocean was a very wonderful tropic blue; inside the reefs the water was calmer, greener, more unlike anything that can be seen in northern latitudes. A little island inside the lagoon glared with red rock in the sunlight; cocoanut palms adorned it gracefully; beyond again was the deeper blue of ocean; the island itself, a mass of foliage, melted beautifully into the lucid atmosphere. Yonder, said Stevenson, lay Vailima that I was not to see. But I had seen the island and the man, and the natural colour and glory of both.

As we went ashore he handed the book which I had given him to his follower. He thought it necessary to explain to me that etiquette demanded that no chief should carry anything. And etiquette was rigid there.

"Mrs. Grundy," he remarked, "is essentially a savage institution."

We went together to the post-office. And in the street outside, while many passed and greeted "Tusitala" in the soft, native speech, we parted. I saw him ride away, and saw him wave his hand to me as he turned once more into the dark grove wherein I had met him in the year of his death.

THE QUEST FOR STEVENSONIA.

One of the strangest chapters in the history of modern book-collecting is concerned with the ardent quest of early pieces written by or associated with Robert Louis Stevenson. His first book, "The Pentland Rising: A Page of History, 1666," was privately printed in Edinburgh, 1866—this when he was sixteen years old. For a copy of the 8vo. booklet, in original light green wrapper, £13 10s. was paid in November, 1898. On the occasion of a charity bazaar in the Scottish capital, 1868, he wrote an allegorical dialogue, in which there is a humorous conversation between the Ingenuous Public, his Wife, and the Tout. For this 4to. of 4pp. £9 10s. has been paid at auction. In 1873 Stevenson contributed to the proceedings of the Royal Society of Edinburgh an essay "On the Thermal Influence of Forests," reminiscent of the fact that he came of a distinguished family of civil engineers. The reprint of this, in original blue wrapper, has fetched 11 guineas. In the same kind is a "Notice of a New Form of Intermittent Light for Lighthouses," 1871, valued in 1899 to July, 1886. A set of proofs of the story as Henderson found a purchaser at £30. It is said copies only were privately printed in Sydney, Damien; An Open Letter to the Rev. Dr. Hyd One of these was valued at £11. More remarka are the relatively enormous sums paid for some o Platz pieces, written and engraved as a frol between the autumn of 1880 and the summer of by Stevenson's stepson, Mr. Lloyd Osb Emblems," the rudely executed edition of whic priced at 9d., brought £30 10s.; "Not 1, and piece of four leaves, with title on front cove Canyon; or, Wild Adventures in the Far West, 8pp., issued at 6d., £13—and, to go no further, th concerned with "Rob and Ben; or, The Pirate cary," £16 5s. The craze for Stevensonia diminished; on the other hand, the fine Edi luxe of his works retains its value. When this was projected, grave doubt was expressed by the possibility of getting a thousand odd subscrib a volume for a set of twenty volumes. Not till S indeed, was the success of the venture assure special type on paper water-marked with the in son, this Edinburgh edition is the most satisfact yet produced. Including the bonus volume, wh Davos Platz issues and other pieces of juvenilia there are twenty-eight volumes, which cost ori £16 17s. 6d. In May last £37 10s. was realized As to original autograph MSS., £44 10s. was "The Body Snatcher," and £61 in July "Markheim."

SOME MOVEMENTS IN VICTORIA

I.—THE PERIOD AND THE FI

It is proposed, in the present short ser take a brief survey or bird's-eye view of th ments which have affected the poetry of the Vi era is now unfortunately closed, and it is not should already begin to regard it as a "por and to endeavour to recount its vicissitudes an achievements. And in the field of poetry this less difficult by the fact that, although the Victo ended but a few months ago, the flowering p poetry had spent itself before the death of Ten ten years since. The poetical activity of the l It is true, been marked by a certain feverish in certain fields, side by side with steady and duction in others; and these symptoms clearly survival of poetic intention and ambition. St suggestive activities, the last representatives of literary movements of the age had already pa there became any question of the succession to And so we are, perhaps, already sufficiently re partisan influence of the movements which the be able to regard their work, if not altogether d least with some degree of critical interest; we of the import and effect of the movements wh their prevalence it was more difficult to distingu Such, at any rate, is the object of the prese will confine itself entirely to poetical movements fact, the interests and anxieties of the Victorian period have entered into its poetry with an emphasis almost unparalleled in the history of English literature. The gradual advance of science, the consequent readjustment of disturbed dogmas, the enthusiasms and responsibilities entailed in the enlargement of national dominions—all these things have been reflected, sometimes directly, sometimes indirectly, in the poetry of the time; and often it is an oblique or indirect reflection that shows the prevalent tenour of thought most clearly. This is, indeed, the characteristic which distinguishes a literary movement from a literary school. A school of literature, and particularly a school of poetry, is easy enough to distinguish. It consists of a dominant leader, dictating a tone and attitude to a band of disciples; the band may be numerous and distinguished, but they add little of their own to the example of their master, and their discipleship is practically a phase of euphuism. But a movement is another thing altogether. In a movement there may be many and diverse spirits, suggesting widely different solutions to the same problem. They are combined only in their interest in the same aspect of thought or life, and in a certain harmony, which leads them indeed to pursue the problem towards the same goal, but not necessarily to pursue it along the same line. And in poetry their differences may seem, at first sight, even greater than their similarities. Difference of manner, variety of method, and all the changing complications due to metrical innovation, make it very difficult to trace with accuracy the by-ways and ramifications of a poetical movement. The student of literary movements, in short, has to be careful to avoid superficiality; he must not be too ready to assume that men who are alike in manner are also alike in spirit, or, on the other hand, that dissimilarity in method implies necessarily antagonism in purpose. The whole ground indeed is intersected and overrun with common rights and privileges, and the very inter-relation of interests is among the most fruitful sources of discussion.

It is not difficult, however, to discern certain main tendencies, and to the study of these the present series of articles will be directed. In confining ourselves to these we must, of course, court certain disappointments; for some of the most companionable poets of the period cannot be referred to any particular movement at all. It can hardly be maintained, for example, that the Victorian era has been marked by any conspicuous movement in the poetic drama: and the dignified and impressive figure of Sir Henry Taylor stands apart from an estimate which is concerned with tendencies rather than with individuals. In the same way William Barnes, our Victorian Theocritus, is really a law to himself, and can scarcely be referred to any definite fellowship of poets. And the list might be largely increased, including poets of a transition stage no less than those who have sustained an already falling note; so that many honoured names must necessarily be set aside in a discussion like the present. Still it is remarkable to see how many of the most individual poets of the time are clearly representatives of movements; and it by no means requires too curious an inquiry to trace their inspiration to its fountain-head.

The period, we have already noticed, has been one of continual change and intellectual restlessness. It has been marked by violent enthusiasms followed by reactions of disappointment. Political movements such as the Reform Bill, religious revivals such as the Oxford Movement and the Broad Church humanism of Maurice and Kingsley, have stirred warm anticipations which the subsequent course of events has not invariably realized.

started for the precise purpose of arresting what [illegible] founders a menacing torrent of innovation, and throu[illegible] period the criticism which they represented has been t[illegible] abandon the citadel of convention. Almost every fresh [illegible] movement in poetry has been opposed by the respon[illegible] of criticism; and consequently we find the rather st[illegible] existence of a poetry peculiarly susceptible to novel [illegible] side by side with a criticism strenuously directed to the [illegible] sion of anything that seems to threaten innovation [illegible] The natural result ensues. Poetry draws its scatter[illegible] closer and closer together; varying spirits combin[illegible] the same end, and the poetical movement becomes a l[illegible] accumulative power.

Victorian poetry, strictly speaking, began to flo[illegible] years before the historical commencement of the Vict[illegible] The field had been gradually clearing for a fresh p[illegible] burst. From 1822 to the close of his life, the "Eccl[illegible] Sonnets" and "Yarrow Revisited" were Wordswor[illegible] important publications. Coleridge died in 1834, and [illegible] been silent nine years, Samuel Rogers' last great poem [illegible] appeared as far back as 1828. In 1832 Crabbe and S[illegible] Scott both died, and with them two distinct poetic m[illegible] fell for a time into desuetude. Southey was occupied [illegible] congenial prose, and Moore's Irish melodies were e[illegible] Then suddenly in 1833 appeared two little volumes, [illegible] regarded, which heralded the new era. Tennyson's "[illegible] and Browning's "Pauline" were published within a fe[illegible] of each other, and with them Victorian poetry may [illegible] have put forth its shoots. Thenceforward for more [illegible] years English poetry was to flourish as never since th[illegible] Elizabeth. These two periods, indeed the Elizabe[illegible] the Victorian—stand out in sisterly companionship of [illegible] in the whole history of English poetry; but their c[illegible] are widely different. They differ both in the ideal w[illegible] espoused, and in the difficulties by which they were [illegible] hindered. In Elizabeth's time the concern of poetr[illegible] life of man and his relation to his fellows; in the [illegible] period it has been the soul of man and his relation to hi[illegible] Differently as the different schools have viewed this [illegible] they are none of them very far removed from its anxiet[illegible] whether they issue in aspiration and faith, in refle[illegible] doubt, in emotion, or in tired reaction, they are alik[illegible] to the vast expansion of ideas which modern science h[illegible] upon the intellectual world. John Stuart Mill said of B[illegible] "Pauline" that its writer possessed a deeper self-cons[illegible] than he had ever known in a sane human being, and it [illegible] this self-consciousness, self-analysis, or self-concern w[illegible] to be the dominant note of the poetry of the time. [illegible] inevitable outcome of this self-concentration, whether [illegible] effect in the introspective seclusion of the thinker [illegible] struggle for increased influence in the worker, was a s[illegible] of enthusiasms and ill-regulated aspirations which we[illegible] to dissolve themselves in disappointment. Movement [illegible] movement, one "impossible loyalty" gave place to [illegible] and the ideals of one generation became the contem[illegible] next.

How poetry has borne itself towards this turmoil of [illegible] ing hopes and interests we hope to be able to trace [illegible] the succeeding articles. One thing, it is clear, we [illegible] expect of it. So harassed and impeded by false cries an[illegible] illusions, its makers cannot have the buoyancy, the happi[illegible] fresh sense of life that lit up the energy of their El[illegible]

For one advantage which we derive from the study of poetic movements is this: we perceive with increasing certainty that the chain of intellectual vigour is unbroken, and that the continuity of poetry and the poetic spirit is perpetual. And even in so partial a study as that implied in the articles to follow we ought to be able to suggest, however inadequately, the way in which all true poetry, in spite of superficial discrepancies and apparent antagonisms, is really and indissolubly related. That, at least, is the object of the survey, be its shortcomings what they must.

ARTHUR WAUGH.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

ANOTHER ASHANTI BOOK.

THE ASHANTI CAMPAIGN OF 1900. By Captain C. H. ARMITAGE, D.S.O., and Lieutenant-Colonel A. F. MONTANARO, R.A. (Sands, 7s. 6d.)

There have already been several books on the last Ashanti war—notably those by Lady Hodgson and Captain Biss—but this is the first, so far as we know, that purports to cover all the ground. The long siege, the march of Captain Aplin's reinforcements, the retreat to the coast, the holding of the fort by the remnant, the operations of the relief column, the punitive expeditions—all these matters are the subject of separate narratives collected in a single volume. And all the stories are told clearly, if not brilliantly, and without superfluous verbiage. There is little piling up of the agony; but we see what happened, and how it happened. It is too long and complicated a story to be repeated here in all its details, but attention may be drawn to the more salient points.

Perhaps controversial points should come first. It will be remembered that some of the garrison expressed the opinion that they might very well have been relieved earlier. The discomforts of their position naturally encouraged such a sentiment, but Colonel Montanaro's reply seems sound military criticism. He says:—

> Captain Hall has been much criticized for not making a bold dash for Kumasi, but I fail to see how he could have done otherwise than he did. Captain Aplin and Major Morris, by cutting their way into Kumasi, did not raise the siege; by having more mouths to feed, the garrison suffered severely from short rations and even from starvation, whilst one hundred well-fed, able-bodied men could have held the Fort against any numbers of the enemy. It does not require any military education to know that it is useless to relieve a garrison unless you can either change the garrison and revictual it, or raise the siege, and by so doing open up the lines of communication. Captain Hall, therefore, deserves great credit for standing fast as he did at Esumeja.

The book is divided into two parts. Captain Armitage begins with the quest of the golden stool and ends with the arrival of the Kumasi column at Cape Coast Castle. Colonel Montanaro begins with the preparations on the Gold Coast and ends with the end of the war. Subsidiary episodes, for which Captain Aplin, Captain Parmeter, and Captain Bishop are the authorities, are incorporated in their proper places. On the whole, we should say that it is Captain Armitage who wields the most graphic pen, but his colleagues are almost as able writers. His story of his search for the golden stool, and of the night

Lady Hodgson seated on the Governor's palaver, and therefore looked on her as their "Queen Mothers." I was suppo Hodgson's son. So sure were the Ashan fall of the Fort and our capture that they but somewhere in the depths of the fore Hodgson and I were to have been escort until the Ashantis could send us as a pre White Queen, against whom, they said, they
The Governor, it is said, was to have been p

Very vivid, too, is the description of the bl when the worst of the retreat was over:—

> Our loads lay about in utter confusio > been dumped down by the carriers, who > like drunken men. The Governor and Lady > boxes waiting for the tent which never > sought shelter in the wretched hut I had ke > crush was so great that two huts, filled > collapsed from the pressure on the walls fro > occupants were with difficulty rescued.
> everywhere, and from them arose suffocating > as the damp wood spluttered and cra > trampling feet had churned the ground into > ankle deep. And upon this steaming ma > torrential rain fell silently, pitilessly, as t > to extinguish the wretched fires, round > shivering groups of natives. To find one > the question, and at nine o'clock, after see > and Leggett were as comfortable as circums
> I crept into a hut four feet square, and, dre > asleep in spite of the babel which arose from > carriers and refugees kept up an animate > whole of that night.

Colonel Montanaro's part of the book con account of certain bush operations of whic taken at the time by the Press. The lesso from the campaign are summarized in an appe printed separately as a pamphlet. The pecul of bush fighting are, naturally, made clearer actual narrative. It mainly consists of mar path through a thick bush and being sniped o bush, owing to the constant clearing, is thi borders the path:—

> This enables the enemy to carry out > with impunity, as he can creep up to within > the path, fire his gun, and be off through t > of the forest before the part of the colu > attacked can recover from its confusion. T > nerve-destroying or so harassing to a colu > Every man goes along the road feeling that > is being laid for at a range of a couple of > enough to unnerve the bravest. During > Expedition, an officer, while being carried i > the muzzle of a gun peeping out of the bu > his stomach and not a yard off. He con > outline of a savage pulling the trigger, a > with astonishment that he simply lay sti > man, as he thought, empty the contents of > He saw the flash of the priming as the fi > and made sure he was a dead man, but by > piece of luck the gun missed fire, but before thought he was a madman, and this being too much for their nerves they abandoned the stockade and ran. The white man whom the war chief so described was Major Mellis; but he apparently made a mistake in the number of white men who charged, as Mellis was accompanied by Captain Merrick.

Colonel Montanaro also has some interesting remarks on the hygienic aspects of the campaign. We read with interest that a wave of sickness which passed over the camp at Bekwai "was eventually put down to our living in the native huts," and he believes the unhealthiness of the huts to result from the Ashanti habit of burying their dead in their courtyards. The habit may have been a factor in the case, but hardly the chief factor. As recent researches have shown, the real reason of the unhealthiness of native huts is that there are always cases of malaria there, and that the anopheles mosquito which carries the infection of malaria imbibes and transmits it most busily in these abodes of filth. The book is quite the best Ashanti book that has appeared.

GREAT MEN OF THE RENAISSANCE.

RENAISSANCE TYPES. By W. S. LILLY. (Fisher Unwin. 16s.)

A book by Mr. Lilly on the Great Men of the Renaissance is for lovers of the period quite a literary event; and we may confidently predict that it will be as widely admired as it will be eagerly read. If his point of view on some subjects is not that of the majority of his readers, the circumstance should only add zest to their enjoyment. For even when they disagree with his conclusions they will find his philosophy bracing and suggestive, and none can be insensible to the charms of his style. Besides two chapters on the genesis and the results of the Renaissance, he presents us with five finished studies of typical great men—Michael Angelo, the Artist; Erasmus, the Man of Letters; Reuchlin, the Savant; Luther, the Revolutionist; More, the Saint.

At the risk of seeming ungrateful, we must remark that, even for the period from 1453 to 1527 to which the work is confined, Mr. Lilly's portrait gallery is far from complete. Why should we not have had Lorenzo, the Despot; Savonarola, the Reformer; Macchiavelli, the Statesman; Aldus, the Publisher; Ariosto, the Poet? The reason seems to be that, except in the sphere of Art, Mr. Lilly has a bad opinion of Italians. Great men, he allows, have been among them. "But how few! The race is lacking in veracity, in virility, and therefore in originality." We may observe that this censure seems excessive in the mouth of one who implicitly condemns the northern nations for withdrawing their obedience to a central authority composed almost exclusively for four hundred years of Italians. But this is only by the way. We do not think that Mr. Lilly has done justice to Italy as the pioneer of the Renaissance, and this for two reasons. He has chosen to illustrate only the latest phase of the movement, when its effects were in full operation beyond the bounds of the peninsula; and he is personally more interested in the "genesis" of the Reformation, with which Italy's connexion is but secondary and indirect. In his lives of Michael Angelo, Erasmus, and Reuchlin, he shows a peculiar anxiety to prove that they had no sympathy with Luther's revolt against the Papacy. But that revolt was not so much a feature of the Renaissance as a necessary consequence of it; and on that ground among others we should demur to the inclusion of

We do not recognize here that "general st[illegible] enlightenment of the human mind" which Mr. Lilly [illegible] from Pater as a definition of the Renaissance, and our [illegible] doubtless right in echoing Erasmus' lament that Luthe[illegible] hindered the progress of learning.

But we must demur still more strongly to Mr. Lilly's [illegible] that to Luther alone is to be ascribed "the Pr[illegible] Reformation and all that came of it." Such a view is of[illegible] quite unhistorical. It ignores the witness borne for long [illegible] the Vaudois valleys and in eastern Germany against the [illegible]tions of Rome; it overlooks the patient efforts of [illegible] for a century to reform the Church from within. It als[illegible] the fact that the Reformation was so far from being the [illegible] of one reformer that it took a separate colour from the ch[illegible] of each nation that received it. Some of the pleasante[illegible] of this volume are devoted to a comparison of two rival [illegible] of history the "Great-Man" theory of Carlyle, a[illegible] theory of Physical Determinism, of which Buckle may b[illegible] as the chief exponent. We agree with Mr. Lilly that t[illegible] more truth in the former; but his dictum about Luthe[illegible] "Great-Man" theory run wild. The mine had long be[illegible]structed; the train was laid; all that Luther did was t[illegible] the match. And it is quite untrue to say that the dis[illegible] doctrine of orthodox Protestantism to-day is Luther's [illegible] teaching on justification; if we had to name such a doct[illegible] should say it was the denial of Papal supremacy, i[illegible] Protestants were long preceded by the Eastern Church [illegible] many of Mr. Lilly's strictures upon Luther and his t[illegible] cordially agree; but we think that Luther has no clai[illegible] classed among the representative men of the Renaissance.

Of the other four biographies, the first two—those of [illegible] Angelo and Erasmus—are in our opinion the best. Mr. [illegible] a reverent student of the Florentine master; and the [illegible]tions of some of his greatest works are as true and pen[illegible] as they are happily expressed. Here, for instance, is a [illegible] of the glorious statues in the Medici Chapel of San Lore[illegible]

> Those tragic figures, in the wealth of profoun[illegible] meaning latent in them, resemble a Psalm of Davi[illegible] there is a deep undertone of fear in that divine shap[illegible] Thinker; or, rather, all the dreads of human life, [illegible] inexorableness of fate, rise before him as he looks [illegible] into infinity, and in his ears is the din of grossly [illegible] These are the works in which Michael Angelo has t[illegible] the death of the hopes, so vigorous and rich in prom[illegible] he sculptured his David. They are his monument, n[illegible] ignoble scions of the evil-hearted race whose names th[illegible] but to Florence, the "donna d'angelica forma"—one[illegible] glory of her freedom, the joy of a thousand lovers, no[illegible] and in darkness, no more to be called "the lady of kin[illegible]

The sketch of Erasmus is sympathetic and even ge[illegible] but it is somewhat lacking in proportion from an overs[illegible] to expose the misstatements of Froude. It is true [illegible] latter's Life of Erasmus is one of his worst performanc[illegible] his errors are well known to scholars, and the gener[illegible] should be aware by this time that they must not go to [illegible] for facts. Even Mr. Lilly himself, like Homer, occ[illegible] sleeps, as when he tells us that Erasmus spent nearl[illegible] months in Padua. His claim for Erasmus that he w[illegible] educator of Europe in good letters" is sound enough; [illegible] disparagement of Italian humanists as generally mere[illegible] is unjust. As great an educator as Erasmus, and, for hi[illegible] typical "Saint" of the Renaissance. His attraction for Mr. Lilly seems to lie in the fact that he died a martyr to his belief in Papal supremacy; yet to those who think that other dogmas were more worthy of such a sacrifice other "judicial murders," as that of Lady Jane Grey, may seem at least equally "black."

The last chapter is devoted to the thesis that the direct result of the Renaissance was not to liberate the conscience in religion or to establish political freedom, but rather to reintroduce into Europe the Cæsarism of the antique world. In Mr. Lilly's mind there seems here, as elsewhere, to be a confounding of the Renaissance with the Reformation; but he goes on to show that the tyranny of the State over the Church before the French Revolution was as marked in Catholic as in Protestant countries. Surely then this would prove that the encroachments of the civil power were not the result of the Renaissance considered as a revolt against Roman jurisdiction. They may be referred to different causes, with which religious belief had little to do—as the rise of nationalities, the conception of the Church as identical with the nation, and the theory of the divine right of kings. The reformers certainly never aimed at religious toleration, yet the cause of freedom was ultimately served by their success. The notion that "the Catholic Church" has always insisted on the separation between temporal and spiritual is a strange perversion of history. If so, how was it that the Papacy became a secular kingdom? and why does it still maintain that the temporal sovereignty of the Pope is necessary to his full spiritual authority? Such a view is as curious as the complacency with which Mr. Lilly ranks the Papal States along with England as one of the few bright centres of freedom in the dark despotism of prerevolutionary Europe.

THROUGH UNKNOWN ABYSSINIA

The name of Captain Wellby will be remembered as that of one of the many gallant officers whose lives the South African War has cost us. The posthumous appearance of his book of travel 'Twixt Sirdar and Menelik (Harpers, 16s.) reminds us of the loss we have sustained. He was not, indeed, a writer of conspicuous excellence; but he was a daring explorer who possessed in an eminent degree the talent of inspiring confidence and affection in his followers of the native races. The journey here described is a march from Zeila to Cairo through unknown Abyssinia—a tract of country more disagreeable than interesting—including the exploration of a portion of the shores of Lake Rudolph. As the explorer came down the Nile he expected to find the French in possession; and he and the garrison of Nasser stared at each other suspiciously through telescopes before setting out to make each other's closer acquaintance. Then it was found that the fort was held by Lieutenant M'Ewen, with 160 Egyptian soldiers; and further on there were abundant evidences of the great organizing powers of the Sirdar, as well as of the officers whom he picked to serve under him:—

> In the Soudan there is no such word as "Can't," and there a single officer does the work for which elsewhere two or three officers and a native staff as well would be required. An officer is told to build a palace at Khartum. The railway, at the time, is hundreds of miles distant; wood, too, is, practically speaking, an unknown quantity at Khartum. There are no bricks, no stones; there is only sand and water. There parted from them at Suez, where "It was t hear some of them say, on bidding farewell, our bellies are full, we will go with you again."

The book contains a brief biography o
Colonel Harrington, the British Agent Abyssinia, who emphasizes his great gift t natives, and shows to a certain extent ho done:—

> He came to Abyssinia when, owing t > Italy in the Abyssinian War, the prestige of > a low ebb indeed; so low that even Eu > positions were not absolutely secure from > typical of his character and disposition th > Europeans who were in a camp of over 5 > many of whom had never seen a white ma > about unaccompanied by any attendant, with > able incidents ever happening to him.
>
> One incident in his last journey I must
> —if proof, indeed, were needed—of his coura > Near Lake Rudolph, in opening a tin of pre > he cut the forefinger of his left hand; blood > so that he subsequently lost it. No medi > than Khartum, yet he marched miles in inte > a mortifying finger upright, during the whol > miserable march, concealing his pain, so > should not lose heart.

Colonel Harrington considers the journey " in African exploration." It certainly was so not in the value of the results achieved b modesty of the narrator prevented him from g idea of the difficulties which he overcam remarkable for Captain Wellby's great rel own trumpet; such modesty in an explorer welcome.

OTHER NEW BOO

Seven Hundred Years of Stocks.

Mr. Charles Duguid has written, and Pennell and Dudley Hardy have illustrated, T Stock Exchange (Grant Richards, 6s.). chronicler Mr. Duguid writes well—not s Bagehot, but much better than most of the is not quite such as to compel the interest of a indifferent to the subject, but his book will of any reader who starts upon it with a reaso curiosity. If it tends to dulness in place perhaps be found in the author's determinatio Within a reasonable compass he has relate knowable at least all that is worth rememberi and share markets from the time of Edward II Parliament forbade foreigners to "use or ex tion of 'brocage,'" to the present day.
matters alike are given the consideration du is full information about the Overend and crises, and also about the patriotic demonstra of which it was announced that Mr. Kru defaulter because he had not complied with hi are also sufficient particulars about membe change who have distinguished themselves on and the cycling track, and in other walks of li

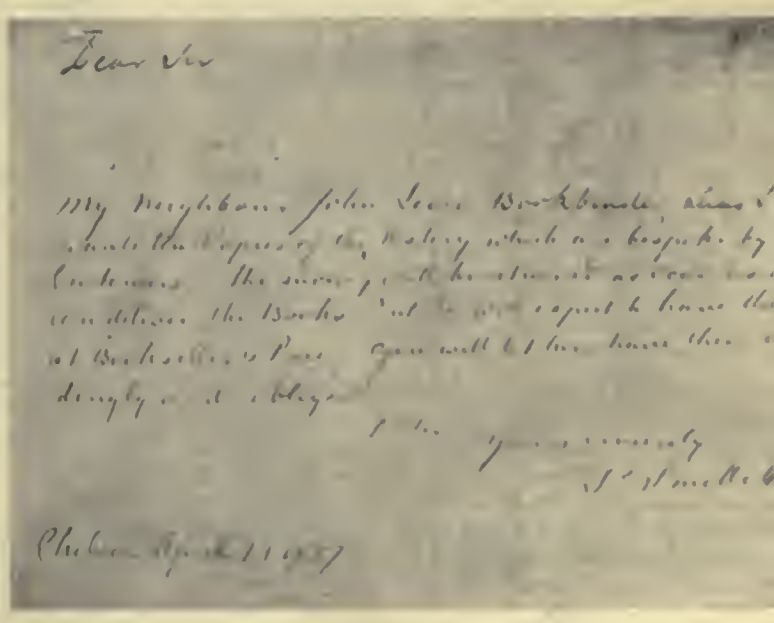
he had entirely forgotten, having passed the limit long before. "I've made my sum, and I'm off to-morrow," said Horace Smith, contented, despite the sneers of his friend at the sum, who described it as merely on the road to fortune. Horace Smith retired to his literary career at Brighton. Hesketine, although he quadrupled his £50,000, eventually died a disappointed, broken-hearted man.

It is not often that one gets a true story with so good a moral. In our own time it is to the literature of sport that the literary members of the House appear to devote themselves most successfully. "The House on Sport," a volume which had contributions from Mr. Guy Nickalls on Sculling, from Mr. B. J. Angle on Boxing, and from Mr. G. Lacy Hillier on Cycling, made about £1,000 for the Referee Children's Dinner Fund; while the names of cricketers who are members of the House include those of A. E. Stoddart, K. J. Key, A. P. Lucas, Ivo Bligh, Burnup, and Hadow. Mr. Dugnid may be congratulated on having written as satisfactory a book as the nature of the case permitted.

"Dr. Smollett."

It was right and proper and a happy thought to republish in Messrs. Constable's new SMOLLETT that author's relation of his journeys uniformly with his novels. He was a very typical Englishman abroad—much more typical than that more famous traveller, the Reverend Laurence Sterne, who covered some of the same ground a few years later. One does not picture him waxing sentimental over either a dead donkey or a fille de chambre, or admitting that they order any matter better in France or in any other foreign country. He is English, English all the way. He exults over the little English boy who was sent to school in France and made himself cock of the walk in a fortnight. He wonders why the King of Sardinia does not get Englishmen to man his navy. Of foreigners in general he holds that they have no manners and that their customs are filthy. He particularizes without reticence, giving us a clearer idea than any contemporary writer of what foreign travel in the middle of the eighteenth century looked like, felt like—and smelt like. One feels all the while that the only reason why he did not write to The Times about it was that The Times was not yet born. He badly needed some such medium for the expression of his opinion that the impositions from which he suffered were a discredit no less to the Government which permitted them than to the individuals who practised them. Missing it, he emphasized his views by taking landlords and postboys by the scruff of the neck and belabouring their shoulders with his cane, for all the world as though he were dealing with niggers in Central Africa. And they took his chastisement like lambs. It was very English. One can pass no other criticism; and one admires, with one's lower nature of course, though one does not approve.

As for the picture of travel that the book gives, one might search long to find a livelier picture of its discomforts. One has only to follow Dr. Smollett as far as Boulogne to realize the full difference between travelling to-day and travelling a little less general conspiracy against all those who go over seas Continent." They charged Dr. Smollett six guineas fo to take him to Folkestone. He "sat up all night in comfortable situation, tossed about by the sea, cold and and languishing for want of sleep." At 3 o'clock in th they turned him into a small boat to be landed. But privilege of the watermen of Boulogne to put passenge and the doctor and his family and his luggage had to ferred to another small boat in the open sea before the allowed to set foot on the beach, and to pay another the privilege. Then he had a mile to walk to his inn, he got there "all the beds were occupied, so th obliged to sit in a cold kitchen above two hours until the lodgers should get up." From this to the tr Marguerite is clearly a far cry, indicating a progress t'on to be proud of. Nor is it any wonder that such e set Dr. Smollett grumbling. He was away from ho years, and he grumbled all the time. It is, in fact, sista'ned Anglo-Saxon grumble that the book claims English literature. Dr. Smollett was a scholar. H about the historical associations, and could quote J Persius, and roll out classical allusions like a walking But that is nothing. Almost all the travellers of th except the commercial traveller—could do that.



interest lies in his realism—often quite unfit to q his impenetrable Anglo-Saxon prejudices. He was so bad as the Scotsman who, having seen the Falls of remarked that there was a greater curiosity at Peebl shape of a peacock with a wooden leg; but he was n deal better. At any rate, he went through France like a bull through a china shop, and the resulting eminently readable, though not conspicuously literary. Constable, in reprinting it, have rendered a real s serious students of the times.

SOME HOME TRUTHS ABOUT THE MAORI WAR, by L

FICTION.

Character and Style.

THE HIDDEN MODEL (Heinemann, 3s. 6d.), by Mrs. Harrod (Frances Forbes-Robertson), is a remarkably original and powerful story. A very young and beautiful girl, Leslie Godwin, has, for a reason which the reader may discover, murdered a well-known man. Among a colony of artists is one famous portrait painter, Wyatt Hamilton, whose elaborate painting quarters contain a secret room. On this account and because of a certain sympathy between them, Leslie flies to Hamilton to gain a moment's rest before she gives herself up. Here the interest of the story begins. The author seems strongly opposed to the death penalty for murder and it is possible that she intended to add to the polemics of the subject. But the result of her essay is a poignant tragedy. Not the melodrama of the murder or the question whether the crime deserved capital punishment, but the psychic result of the act upon Leslie herself, and through her upon Wyatt Hamilton, makes the vitality of the book. Mrs. Harrod causes it to be convincing by her able characterization. Hamilton's mother and sister, the clique of artists and men of the world who match the events, even the excellent servant at Hamilton's studio, all live. Another arresting point is that Mrs. Harrod has style; not always the most admirable style—but a style distinctive and noteworthy. Perhaps the following little description of a part of the secret room in which Leslie finds a shelter will give some idea of it :—

> The washstand only was strangely beautiful, but unusual in that it seemed a part of the room, and was, indeed, hollowed out of the wall at the corner; a square sink of deep red bricks, and with a brass tap whose handle was a bestriding faun exquisitely sculptured; from its shadowy corner it gave a note of strange queerness, and remotely dominated the room. The genius who had wrought that handle had surely planned this secret refuge and the garden without, when the house had already been far on its way to completion.

Or this paragraph which describes the sudden appearance of Leslie in Hamilton's house :—

> The slender figure of a girl, beautifully dressed, stood in the doorway. Her face was devastated by a haunting terror, and behind this terror Hamilton perceived, through her stricken eyes, a living pain that was really awful—pulsating. A dissecting blade seemed on her tortured soul, to which the body had lent its senses that the flesh and spirit together should suffer dire outrage. Hamilton recognized on the instant's view of her that some awful thing had happened; suffering could not otherwise be so visible on the human countenance. Reserve, even in expression, is the instinctive refuge of suffering men and women; nothing but appalling disaster could so effectually strip the soul of its conventional shields.

These examples, however, contain no instance of one trick of Mrs. Harrod's, the old-fashioned one of underlining. We cannot recall it especially in "The Potentate" or "Odd Stories." The present book, however, suffers from it very distinctly. But this is a very small affair; as a whole, "The Hidden Model" is one of the most interesting and original

Carnaby" must, we fear, be advised to look to h first half-dozen pages of "Sirius" are suffi depress the most devoted admirer; and the re although ingenious, is not very entertaining. The of the novelist is our especial delight, but there the trivial impinges upon the foolish. We sear for those "sparkling gems of wit and wisdo sarcasm" which her works are said to contain clever phrases, and in one tale, at least, a little taste. One wonders if the following conversatio considered Attic wit :—

> "I am so sorry, Major Newdigate" (Lad > dropped her dinner-napkin three times).
> sliding scale; I haven't the faintest idea what > it sounds income-taxy and death-dutiful."
>
> "Pray don't regret the circumstance, my > a pleasure for me to do anything for you, and > pleasure is so intense as to be 'almost pain.
> think it would be a good plan if I sat under th > throwing it back?"
>
> "I daresay it would; and you would > crouching under the shadow of the table-cl > defiance and a dinner-napkin at me. A sort of > to Ajax defying the Lightning, don't you know
>
> "But it might slightly interfere with th > versation if Ajax were hiding under the table > dining above it. It is bad enough below t > worse below the table, I should imagine."

However the story from which this is quot becomes interesting and contains a good idea heroine, Josephine, inundates her admirer, t Laurence, with well-watered wit he is easily plea ready with some such reply as "You are awfully wish we could honestly say as much to the aut
But it must not be supposed that there are her book. "Frank Wikeney's Bill" is a poli of some cunning, with that wonderfully fresh me in-law. "An Artistic Nemesis" is neat and conversations do not touch life. Without going Fowler's twenty-one stories we have no doub hint our disappointment. But, on the other ha will perhaps find plenty to enjoy in "Sirius,"
not set the table in a roar nor the river a-flame.

Cinderella.

CINDERS (Pearson, 6s.), by "Helen Mathe excellent example of that clever lady's skill of so She has observed widely since the days of " Rye." But the old élan is not lacking; in the the beauty, and Cinderella—"Cinders," of co vigorous a couple of drawings of English women in recent fiction. Miss Mathers may occasional fail to get at the heart of life, but those who simple, straightforward, and interesting a sto tells how "Cinders" fights "that half-dimpl eventually, after many adventures, comes by love will be more than commonly hard to please.

The Author of "The Sky Pilot."

A new book is promised in the autumn fro author of "Black Rock" and "The Sky P

published in Toronto, and when recast for publication in book form was published by a British firm. In New York the manuscript went begging, one publisher reporting that he had three experienced readers to pass judgment on it, and their verdict was that it had too much religion and temperance in it. More than one of the great publishing houses would now be glad to publish his books, for the sale of "Black Rock" has run to 100,000 copies.

"Too much religion and temperance," indeed! The phrase hales us back to an age—not so very long ago, to be sure—when literature and women and certain other things and persons walked gingerly in fetters that now rust in the scrap-iron heap. The door of literature has been opened very wide. Vice has walked in, holding her head high, and staring us out of countenance. Virtue, too, even in the forms of "religion and temperance," has claimed her right to be seen and heard as she is, not as she is caricatured. We do not condemn her as out of place in literature off-hand. When we meet her there we allow her claim to be judged on her literary merits, and as these are great or small, we give her a high or a low place. If the merits are undiscoverable, we show her respectfully to the door and beg her to take her proper place, which may be a very respectable place, among the tracts. Now, as Ralph Connor introduces her to us, virtue is a literary lady. We have no doubt, as we read "The Sky Pilot," that the author would like us to fall in love with her; but he never preaches her charms at us, and the most anti-religious reader, with a literary conscience, can hardly say that she bores him. "The Sky Pilot" has been disparaged because it "doesn't come to anything." The critic was disappointed apparently because the "bad" people were not paraded in the last chapter as a row of kneeling figures at a penitent form. He was looking for a tract and found only a novel of real life. The reality of the life described will not be accepted without questioning, even by those who approach Ralph Connor simply as a novelist. The "scion" of an ancient English family, and still more his wife, seem incongruous enough in a setting of rough ranching life; but no one familiar with the extraordinary mixture of castes to be found in the Far West will dogmatize about impossibility or even improbability. Whether every character in the novel is drawn from life or not, the character-drawing is essentially veracious. The young parson himself, the "sky pilot"—a nickname long worn by the sailors' missionaries who board ships arriving in the Channel and perhaps elsewhere—is not the less convincing because he is exceptional. If he were exceptional only in the simplicity of his heart, we might have our doubts; but he is exceptional also in the demoniac speed of his throwing at baseball. That invincible college throw is naturally a great factor in the muscular Christian's career of conquest among hearts long emancipated from the observances of eastern civilization. The conquest he achieves is natural enough, and we follow it with interest through Ralph Connor's pages; the victory turns none of the sinners into plaster saints, but leaves them as fresh and western as they were before. Ralph Connor does not worry himself to find "the word," but he gets the right word for his purpose as a story-teller, not the word that distracts attention from the story to the style. His humorous situations are not farcical, and his pathetic incidents remain within the reticent and dignified limits of British grief.

Aura Popularis.

when the pen of Charles Dickens was laid aside. Life, to the author of "The Second Dandy Chater," is artif dramatic; his men and women, quite intentionally we be "characters" well adapted to a stage play; his inci admirable mechanism; his result wide and certain popula reader be gifted with sufficient simple faith to admit Mr premises, he will find the complications which lead to t ingenious and exciting. Early in the book we are told hero, Philip, "possibly from having led a solitary lif habit of communing with himself. This convention con us to learn that he has returned mysteriously to h village and that he possesses precisely the same appe that of the squire, Dandy Chater. As a matter of fa that gentleman's elder brother, but has been dismissed inheritance when a baby, for the rather poor reason father disliked the idea of having twin sons to foll place. Philip no sooner sets foot in his village th develop at lightning speed. He has soon seen Mr murdered and assumed that gentleman's place in t In all his adventures he trusts to blind Chance to g and that divinity, with the able assistance of the aids him with an energy and aptness that ordinary mor implore in vain. But it will be seen that this situation with interest, with possibilities and complications be dreams of the most voracious reader. Dandy Chater w loved, and misunderstood. But when all that we ha known, il y a anguille sous roche, and what sort of we leave the excited reader to find. It is enough to say Tom Gallon has written one more admirable story— trative, deep, or analytical, but boldly superficial, entertaining, and above all, popular.

An Enjoyable Novel.

THE SURVIVOR (Ward, Lock, 6s.), by Mr. E. Phillip heim, is a great advance on any other book by thi The characters of Douglas Guest and Emily de Reus struggles of the hero, under a weight of suspicion, a dozen disabilities, to survive, will be followed with de all who take up this freshly, excellently planned, and story. Douglas runs away to London from an unhappy home, and after many exciting chances, and despairs, h by a fortunate essay in journalism to victory. At outset he meets with the aristocratic lady who a influences his fortunes. "The Survivor" is an a example of the modern novel; cunning in construc acute study of passion and character; analytical, engrossing, distinctive. It has in it the essence of while every incident convinces and every persona It should please many diverse classes of readers.

MONSIEUR BEAUCAIRE, by Booth Tarkington (2s. 6d. from Mr. Murray. Print and paper, cover and picture dainty; and the contents are dainty too. The sto sublime young barber who imposes himself upon Soc upon the affections of the exquisite Lady Mary Carlis he is attacked and exposed by his outraged rivals. Wh instead of abasement and withdrawal, he shines forth Highness Prince Louis-Philippe de Valois, Duke of Duke of Chartres, Duke of Nemours, Duke of Montpensi Prince of the Blood Royal, First Peer of France," and F knows what besides! Lady Mary has scorned him

SALE AT MESSRS. SOTHEBY'S.

The collection of early printed books and incunabula which Messrs. Sotheby sold last week was remarkable for the number of illustrated volumes which it contained. Many of the illustrations, like those in the rare Savonarola tracts and other Florentine prints, were in exceptionally fine condition. It was no surprise to find prices running high. For the Venetian and the early French books there was also considerable competition. The sale, however, emphasized the low level to which the Plantin books have now fallen. A fine copy of the Horge, with its beautiful plates, printed by the famous Antwerp house in 1573, fetched only twenty-nine shillings. The following were among the more notable books sold :—

	£	s.	d.
Æsopi. "La Vita di Esopi Historiata." Venice, 1505	52	0	0
Amman. "Charta Lusoria." Nürnberg, 1588 ...	50	0	0
Appianus. "Romae Historiae." Venice (Ratdolt), 1477	3	3	0
Barberus. "Opuscula." Rome, circa 1475	27	10	0
Biblia. "Pistole Lezzione et Vangeli," &c. Florence, 1578	71	0	0
Boccaccio. "Il Decamerone." Florence, 1516 ...	19	0	0
Bonaventura. "Incominciano," &c. Venice, 1500 ...	40	0	0
(Capranica). "Incomincia el Prophemio." Florence...	175	0	0
Cessole. "Libro di Giuoche." Florence, 1493 ...	123	0	0
(Columna). "Hypnerotomachia." Venice, 1499 ...	30	0	0
Dante. "La Comedia." Brescia, 1487	27	10	0
Dante. "La Comedia." Venice, 1491	26	0	0
Horae. "Officium Beate Marie." On vellum. Venice, Hertzog, 1493	395	0	0
" " " Venice, Stagninum, 1512	125	0	0
" " " Venice, Marcolini, 1545	54	0	0
" "Officium Romanum." Venice, Scotum, 1544	55	0	0
" "Heures a lusaige de Rouen." On vellum. Paris, Simon Vostre, 1502	39	0	0
" "Dive V'ginis Marie." Paris, Hardouyn, 1514	50	0	0
"Vita Epistolae de Sancto Hieronymo Vulgare." Ferrara, 1497	39	0	0
Ketham. "Fasciculo de Medicina." Venice, 1493	61	0	0
Vavassore. "Esemplario de Lavori." Venice, 1532	40	0	0
"Libellus de Natura Animalium." Monte Regali, 1508	180	0	0
"Libro da Compagnia." Florence, 1493	70	0	0
Musaeus. "Herone et Leandro." Venice, 1494. The first Aldine book, and in particularly good condition	40	0	0
Petrarca. "Rime Volgari." Venice, 1492	13	10	0
Ptolomy. "Cosmographia." Ulm, 1482	68	0	0
Ptolomy. "Cosmographia." Rome, 1490	20	0	0
Savonarola. "Tractato contra li Astrologi" ...	35	0	0
" "Compendio di Revelatione." 1495 ...	40	0	0
" "Dyalogo della Verita Prophetica" ...	150	0	0
" "Tractato della Amore di Jesu Christo." 1492	46	0	0
" "Tractato dell humilita." 1492	39	0	0
"Thibault Académie de l'Espée." Elzevir, 1628 ...	14	0	0
Tory. "Champ Fleury." A beautiful copy. Paris.

Correspondence

THE USE OF FOREIGN PH

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—While there is room for difference of truest English spelling or pronunciation of cited, in nearly all cases analogy or precedent contentions and determine the proper forms. reasons in every instance would require a hope shortly to publish. I only plead for as m and as little ambiguity as possible, and the ju on its merits, unbiased by personal or local pr Anglicization should be the steady aim : let t little regard for ordinary readers who do Fortunately the vital genius of the language g as in "closure," "employee," in spite of all the

With regard to the particular points call The aspirate should be sounded wherever words but "hour," "heir," "honor," "hon tives : surely we have difficulties enough letter without seeking to introduce fresh co sound of "ou" in "tour"—as of "i" in "capr is established English, and is the correct and in "blouse," if only to distinguish this In "fiancee" as in "financier" short "i" euphonious and in the line of progress, lik "fertile." The diëresis in "naïve" has a pu not necessary), the accent in "depôt" non letter "z" should be used wherever poss adopted it uniformly for the termination " already write "hazard," "assize," in defi

The forms "fantom," "feasant," "sulf justified on every ground, and if asked : why I reply : why indeed ? seeing that w "fantastic," "frenzy." But one step omission of useless letters in Reims and B the pronunciation, but considering that the F is absurdly pronounced "antilleeze" it wo stitute the correct form "Antilias" (Span. for self (or "egoïsm") being more "ro incorrect "t," that is mere childishness. Wh instead of the affected littérateur ? Then rather than the Italian forms regime, debut Indeed "Italian renaissance" is almost a terms, the proper phrase, if a foreign wo being rinascimento. But I fail to perceive wh "cortege," "accouchment," "massage," " any more "detestable" than "essen "couch," "passage," "portrait" ; or "debu

I thought there could be no mis suggested pronunciations in my last paragra is spelt with an "h" it should be sound words conformed to precedents like "sche "predict," "stalactites," or to ordinary Thus when the same word serves as noun an should be (always wherever possible) on t the former and on the second in the latte cases let the leaning be towards consistency.—

EVACUSTES

"The Young Cricketer's Tutor" is styled an "unapproachable classic"; for many years it was also unprocurable save at a very high price. The issue of Mr. Whibley's edition afforded another proof of what is so well known to booksellers—namely, that the best way of killing the demand for a rare book is to reprint it in a cheap form. The fact that any one can procure this "unapproachable classic" for one shilling is sufficient to deter him from doing so. But perhaps readers of Literature will be more interested in the Homer of cricket than the average cricketer, who cares as a rule for nothing beyond halfpenny-paper gossip about his favourite game.

ALFRED NUTT.

 In using the phrase, that Nyren "did not even write his own book," the writer of the article had no intention of disputing his authorship. So far as the furnisher of the material can be termed the author of a book, Nyren is indubitably entitled to that name in respect of "The Young Cricketer's Tutor."

"L'AIGLON."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir, Unless Mr. Stephen is referring, as I scarcely think, to the brilliant lines in Act I., Scene XII., of L'Aiglon he is surely making a slip in speaking of "the scene at Austerlitz." I conclude he means the scene at Wagram. Since writing my last letter to you on L'Aiglon another interesting point has been brought to my notice by Professor Gallio. History on the stage may be divided into three classes:—

1. The historical plays of the French classicists in which the subject is pre-eminently man—e.g., Le Cid and Cinna.

2. The historical drama of Shakespeare, in which the subject is particularized to the history of one main character.

3. That of the romantic school, which shows us a man in his personality. The heroes of this drama are not really dramatic figures, but what is interesting about them is the human. To this third class L'Aiglon belongs. In it the Duke is not truly dramatic. He is human, and his character displays a moribund psychology. Yet he is interesting to the educated, to the æsthetic, to the historically inclined audience. Flambeau, on the other hand, pleases that portion of the audience to which the Duke's character appeals but slightly. In introducing Flambeau, Rostand is playing to the gallery.

I remain, Sir, yours faithfully,

WALTER W. SETON.

Derwent-house, Anerley, S.E., July 22.

THE LATE MR. JAMES HAMBLIN SMITH.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In your notice of this famous "coach" in Literature, July 20, you say that he "contented himself some fifty years ago with the modest position of 'Captain of the Poll.'" This was not the case. He was, in fact, thirty-second Wrangler, and sixth in the second class of the Classical Tripos in 1850, a year noticeable as being the last in which candidates for Classical Honours were required to have first attained Mathematical. I took my B.A. degree at the same time, and I well remember that Mr. Smith was unwell during the Classical examination. But for this illness, his name would probably have stood higher in the list.

Yours faithfully,

S. CHEETHAM.

Rochester, 22nd July, 1901.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHER

Mr. Graham Balfour's Life of his cousin, Rob Stevenson, which Messrs. Methuen will publish in th will be uniform with the Edinburgh edition. Mr stayed with R. L. S. in Samoa for a year or two, an graphy was entrusted to him by Stevenson's family. T is rich in unpublished MSS., letters, diaries of tr reminiscences of friends, as well as a valuable fr autobiography. A complete bibliography of Stevens is also given. Another collection of unpublished w R. L. S. is announced by Mr. Howard Wilfred Bell, of Miss Ormerod's "Reminiscences," with which she the last months of her life after giving up her cate work, were finished shortly before her death. The tw published by Mr. Murray—probably towards the end of

A new edition of Samuel Richardson's novels is a by Crosup and Sterling, of New York. Following a custom of publishers in the United States the only cop are twenty impressions on Japan paper in twenty vol Holland hand-made paper in twenty vols., 1,242 on deckle-edge paper in eighteen vols., and a sworn state no other copies are or will be printed is given to pr The edition is edited by Professor Phelps of Yale U who furnishes a life of the author and a special prefa novel. Facsimiles of engravings which appeared in the 1742, and of letters by Richardson to Mr. Dancomb Richardson by Dr. Johnson, dated February 19, 1756, of the edition.

The "Thoughts from Ruskin," selected by Attwell, which has been one of the most popular volum Allen's "Pensées" Series, is to be followed by two v "Pen Pictures from Ruskin"—descriptive passages Caroline H. Wurtzburg. The first series deals with de of men and women, man's handiwork, and places, an ready in the autumn; the second series, treating of plants, animals, and natural phenomena, is not due spring. Other autumn books announced by Mr. A a new volume of essays by Maurice Maeterlinck; "T to Rome: Notes of Travel in Italy," by Hilaire Bel sixty illustrations from drawings by the author; "Earl of Venice; from the Origins to the Conquest of Const in 1204," by F. C. Hodgson, M.A., and "The Celtic ment, and Other Essays," by Francis Grierson.

The "Original Papers" of the late Dr. John H F.R.S., are about to be published by the Cambridge U Press in two volumes. Dr. Hopkinson was killed with his children in an Alpine disaster in August, 1898. Pr the whole of the papers included in the two volumes h reprinted from various periodicals and books, and h edited by Mr. B. Hopkinson, who has written a m accompany them. The first volume contains the p technical subjects; the second, those of a more character.

Messrs. Simpkin, Marshall are now publish subscription, for Mr. Christopher A. Markham, F.S.A. on the "Stone Crosses of the County of Northampton. eighty crosses are described, and about sixty-six of t illustrated, mostly from drawings by the author. In amptonshire two of the original crosses erected in me

Books to look out for at once.

"Alice of Old Vincennes." By Maurice Thompson. Cassell. 6s.
"Menasseh Ben Israel's Mission to Oliver Cromwell." By Lucien Wolf. Macmillan. 21s. net.
[Contains a reprint in facsimile of the three tracts published by Menasseh, with a history of the negotiations between the Jews and Oliver Cromwell which resulted in the foundation of the present Anglo-Jewish community. Three portraits.]
"Roman Public Life." By A. H. J. Greenidge. Macmillan. 10s. 6d.
"The Transit of Civilization from England to America in the 17th Century." By E. Eggleston. Hirschfeld. 6s. net.
"A Commentary on Tennyson's 'In Memoriam.'" By Professor A. C. Bradley. Macmillan. 4s. 6d. net.
[Aims strictly at explanatory interpretation, æsthetic criticism being avoided.]
"A Book of Brittany." By the Rev. S. Baring Gould. Methuen 6s.
[Uniform with his books on Devon, Cornwall, and Dartmoor.]
"Tristram of Blent." By Anthony Hope. Murray. 6s.
"The Shirts of Happy Chance." By H. H. R. Marriott Watson. Methuen. 6s.
"An Uncongenial Marriage." By Cosmo Clarke. White. 6s.
"Women Must Weep." By Sarah Tytler. Long. 6s.
"The Heretic." By R. J. Lees. Long. 6s.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

BIOGRAPHY.

HIS MAJESTY KING EDWARD VII (Bijou Biography). By H. Whates. 5¼×3¼. 143 pp. Drane. 1s.

FICTION.

THE "CHICOT" PAPERS. By K. Hedgard. 7×5. 171 pp. Arrowsmith. 1s.
THE VIRGIN AND THE SCALES. By Alice Dawson. 6¾×4¼. 212 pp. Arrowsmith. 1s.
THE INNOCENTS ON THE BROADS. By E. R. Suffling. 7½×5. 323 pp. Jarrold. 3s. 6d.
[Humorous stories connected with the Norfolk Broads.]
HIS LAWFUL WIFE. By Jean Middlemass. 8×5½. 317 pp. Digby, Long. 6s.
LOVE THE ATONEMENT. By Francis Campbell. 8×5½. 365 pp. Digby, Long. 6s.
A BLACK VINTAGE. By M. Gerard. 8×5½. 313 pp. Digby, Long. 6s.
MARY HAMILTON: Her Life and History. By Lord Ernest Hamilton. 7¾×5¼. 348 pp. Methuen. 6s.
[One of the "Queen's Maries." A tale of the times of Bothwell and John Knox.]
LOVE AND HIS MASK. By Menie Muriel Dowie. 7¾×5¼. 312 pp. Heinemann. 6s.
[A novel introducing scenes from the War in South Africa.]
BOTH SIDES OF THE VEIL. By R. Marsh. 7¾×5¼. 305 pp. Methuen. 6s.
[Eleven short stories in Mr. Marsh's customary forcible style.]
A HARVEST OF STUBBLE. By W. E. Hooper. 7¾×5¼. 178 pp. Brett.
MISTRESS NELL. By G. C. Hazelton, Jun. 7¾×5¼. 295 pp. Murray. 2s. 6d. net.
[A novel about Nell Gwyn based on a play by the author.]
THE LITTLE TIN GODS. By Jessie E. Lipscomb. 7¾×5¼. 332 pp. Hurst and Blackett. 6s.
NO VINDICATION. By Mrs. C. Kernahan. 7¾×5¼. 322 pp. J. Long. 6s.
JESSIE. By G. Marlowe. 8×5½. 333 pp. Digby, Long. 6s.
HENRY BOURLAND. By A. E. Hancock. 7¾×5¼. 433 pp. Macmillan. 6s.

GEOGRAPHY.

TOPOGRAPHICAL AND PHYSICAL MAP OF PALESTINE. By J. G. Bartholomew, F.R.S.E., and G. A. Smith, D.D., LL.D. 11×7. T. and T. Clark. 10s. 6d.

LAW.

THE CASE FOR THE FACTORY ACTS. Edited by Mrs. S. Webb. 7¾×5¼. 233 pp. Grant Richards. 2s. 6d.
[Mrs. Humphry Ward contributes a preface; the Editor and four other ladies supply a chapter apiece.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

INDEX TO THE PERIODICALS OF 1903. Vol. XI. 10×7¼. 215 pp. "Review of Reviews." 15s. n.

ORIENTAL.

DAWLATSHÁH'S MEMOIRS OF THE POETS. (Persian Historical Texts, Vol. I.) Ed. by E. G. Browne. 9¼×6¼. Luzac. 18s. n.

PHILOSOPHY.

HISTORY OF INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT. Vol. III. By J. B. Crozier. 9×6. 465 pp. Longmans. 10s. 6d.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

THE STUDENTS' ENGLISH LITERATURE. By A. H. Thompson. 7¼×5. 833 pp. Murray. 7s. 6d.
THE HOUSE OF DREAMS. By W. J. Dawson. 5th Edition. 7¾×5¼. 135 pp. H. Marshall. 2s. 6d.
LA BELLA AND OTHERS. By Eleanor Castle. 7¾×5¼. 320 pp. Macmillan. 3s. 6d.
[Short stories with a plentiful seasoning of sword-play.]
THE STORY OF ALFRED THE GREAT. 2nd Edition. By W. Hawkins and E. T. Smith. 7¾×5. 162 pp. H. Marshall. 2s. 6d.
THE BIBLE: ITS MEANING AND SUPREMACY. 3rd Edition. By F. W. Farrar, D.D. 9×6. 328 pp. Longmans. 6s. n.
THE LIFE AND TIMES OF SYDNEY SMITH. By S. J. Reid. (Cheap Edition.) 7¾×5. 382 pp. Sampson Low. 2s. 6d.
THE MARCH OF THE TEN THOUSAND. Trans. by H. G. Dakyns. 7¾×5¼. 264 pp. Macmillan. 3s. 6d.
[A sketch of the Life of Xenophon and a translation of the Anabasis with maps and notes, reprinted with corrections from volume I. of "The Works of Xenophon."]

CHESS.

Address "Chess": LITERATURE, Printing House

PROBLEM No. 293, by A. C. WHITE, New York.
BLACK. 13 pieces.

WHITE. 9 pieces.
White to play and mate in two moves.

PROBLEM
G. VAN BR
BLACK.

WHITE.
White to play and

PROBLEM No. 295, by G. Reichelm.—Wh
K at Q 5; Kt at Q 6; pawn at Q R 3. Black Q R 3; pawns at Q B 4, Q Kt 3, Q R 2, Q R 5. and win.

PAUL MORPHY, 1837-1884.—Much discussio is still proceeding, as to whether Morphy was a genius than our present champion, Lasker. We to attempt a settlement of the vexed questio was born at New Orleans, June 22, 1837. He the moves early, because there are well-authe of the lad of 12 to 15 playing with father and u gaining the upper hand. He graduated at Spr in 1854, and was called to the Bar in 1857, at w master of four languages. Morphy knew ve intuitively, of the theory of chess; but the cor openings seemed to come to him "by inspiratio
the age of 13, met and defeated Löwenthal.
Frenchman Eugene Rosseau often, 1849-50.

In 1857, when his fame had been noised abr in the first American Chess Tournament an though Louis Paulsen was one of the players.
came to Europe hoping to meet, among others,
It does not appear that the English Champ anxious to play a match, or indeed any game American, who, however, among other bri defeated Anderssen, Löwenthal, Harrwitz (n noted), Mongredien. The match with Anders his greatest feat. In two years, 1857-58, plished all his real work and establish in comparison with which every other player's insignificance. Whether Anderssen, Zukert Lasker, or either of them, were, upon the cannot easily be demonstrated. He was a magnitude. His combinations were almost guished by accuracy and brilliancy combined.

Morphy returned to America in May, 185 honoured. He issued a challenge to the wo pawn and move—that is to say, Morphy woul to any player. He then retired from chess, forthcoming. The later years of Morphy's shadowed by a species of insanity and b including the war between North and South.
a positive morbid aversion to the game, and appears to have been limited to a few games, with Mr. Chas. A. Maurian and one or two Paris and New Orleans. Morphy died sudd town, July 10, 1884.

GAME No. XC.—Played by the Russian c

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 108. SATURDAY, AUGUST 3, 1901.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

NOTES OF THE DAY 97, 98, 99
POEM "THE LESSON," by Rudyard Kipling 99
"LITERATURE" PORTRAITS. XIII. Victor Hugo 102
VICTOR HUGO, ROMANCIER.—A "Personal View," by M. Paul Bourget 100
BIBLIOGRAPHY OF VICTOR HUGO 108
SOME MOVEMENTS IN VICTORIAN POETRY, by Arthur Waugh. II.—The Poetry of Faith and Aspiration 109
CURRENT LITERATURE—
Books on Dante—
Readings on the Paradiso—The Inferno—Purgatorio—Life of Dante—Yale Studies in English—An English Commentary on Dante's "Divina Commedia"—Catalogue of the Cornell Dante Collection Presented by Willard Fiske 111, 112, 113, 114
A Garden Diary—A Book of Flowers—A Garden in the Suburbs—Gardening for Beginners 114, 115
Arrows of the Almighty—New York—Plato's Handmaiden—A Woman of Yesterday—Thais—Ever Mohun—Once Too Often 115, 116
OBITUARY—The Bishop of Durham 116
LIBRARY NOTES 117
AMONG THE REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES.—I. 118
CORRESPONDENCE—The Use of Foreign Phrases 118
AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for 118, 119, 120
LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS 120

NOTES OF THE DAY.

We publish on page 102 a special article on Victor Hugo and his work, with illustrations. On page 100 M. Paul Bourget contributes a "Personal View" on Victor Hugo as a novelist. Mr. Arthur Waugh continues his series of articles on Victorian Poetry with a paper entitled "The Poetry of Faith and Aspiration." Next week we shall publish a special Carlyle number, and Mr. Waugh will carry on his series with an article on "The Poetry of Reflection and Doubt."

* * * *

Messrs. Archibald Constable will shortly have ready a new Shakespeare in twenty volumes, which bids fair to be the popular edition of the twentieth century. The text will be a finally revised edition of the "Whitehall Shakespeare," which was itself remarkable for the beauty and clearness of its type and the lightness of its paper. Each volume will contain three illustrations, reproduced in Edinburgh from water-colour drawings by Byam Shaw, Patten Wilson, Leslie Brooke, W. J. Cowper, and other rising artists, and with a title-page and end-papers designed by Lewis F. Day.

* * * *

and humour of the creator of Mrs. Poyser and Mr. Br Stephen, who unites gifts as writers, critic, and biog easily to be rivalled in combination, has a real recreate a living image of the woman of genius who so powerful an influence on her generation. The o and somewhat laborious character depicted by Mr. Cr the whole of her, though no doubt it was the side most of in her latter years to the worshippers at her s a living biography is but the due of one who after some phase of eclipse begins again to be universally recogn the least brilliant star in the great constellation of novelists.

* * * *

Books to read just published:—

"A Commentary on Tennyson's 'In Memoria Professor A. C. Bradley (Macmillan).

"Marrables' Magnificent Idea." By F. C.
(Blackwood).

"Alice of Old Vincennes." By Maurice Thompso

"The Coward." By R. L. Jefferson (Ward, Loc

"The Skirts of Happy Chance." By H. B Watson (Methuen).

* * * *

On Monday next the well-known firm of Simpkin, Hamilton, Kent, and Co. move into new premise street, Haymarket, that portion of their business hitherto been carried on in the premises behind S Strand. These are doomed to disappear under the the improvement of the Strand. The building which become the headquarters of book and periodical dis
the West-end is of considerable historical interes fact none other than the old Royal Tennis Court built in 1673. The walls of the court remain ver their original state, but floors, of course, have b making it now thoroughly suitable for the requirem trade. Mr. Francis Hooper, R.I.B.A., acting up gestions of Mr. Herbert Kent, is responsible for th ment of the rooms for their new purpose.

* * * *

The news has just reached Paris and London of t
tion of a circular of the Grand Vizier at Constantinople Mussulman families to employ European governesses to give hospitality to French, English, or German compagnie. This may have seemed merely a picturesqu of Ottoman nationalism. As a matter of fact, it afford instance of the power of a book to effect a revolution i
A novel entitled "La Courtisane de la Montagne

The book is a curious plea for a revival of Ottoman patriotism. No novel for years has had anything like the vogue which it is now obtaining in the East.

* * * *

An uncommon feat in the publishing arena is now being performed in the offices of the Queen. Although the readers of that paper had already enjoyed a portion of "A Winter Pilgrimage," by Mr. Rider Haggard, it was only on July 20th that they first had the opportunity of reading Chapter I. The first half of the book is in fact being published after the second half. We do not know of any previous instance of this sort in the serial publication of the book. The portion that had already appeared proved so acceptable to readers of the Queen that, like Oliver Twist, they asked for more.

* * * *

An interesting find is announced by the Morning Post concerning one of the most remarkable episodes in all literary history—the somewhat chequered friendship between Voltaire and Frederick the Great. A German historian, seeking for material concerning Carlyle's hero, has discovered several unpublished poems by Voltaire in the Royal archives at Berlin. One of these is quoted, describing a pilgrimage made by the philosopher in 1743 to Frederick's sister, the Margravine of Bayreuth, familiar to all readers of Carlyle's voluminous history. Here is a verse from the poem in question :—

Les pélerins s'en vont dans leurs voyages,
Courir les saints et gagner les pardons ;
Plus dévot qu'eux, je fais mes stations
Chez des héros, des belles et des sages.
Voilà des saints en qui j'ai de la foi
Et l'Évangile où tout esprit doit croire.
Bayreuth, Berlin sont des temples pour moi,
Et c'est toujours le temple de la gloire.

* * * *

The National Antarctic Expedition is eminently well found in point of literature. A few days before the gallant ship Discovery—may all good fortune attend her—left the East India Dock a large quantity of books were taken aboard which embraced "all sorts and conditions" of literature from the six-shilling "sensational" to the most abstruse of scientific treatises. In the living room of the crew there is a small bookcase, standing opposite the clock with the legend on its face "Discovery leads to Discovery," containing some two hundred volumes. As may be imagined they consist entirely of popular literature, novels, and a few bound volumes of well-known magazines. Almost the first to catch one's eye, on account of its flaring red boards, is Jules Verne's "Antarctic Mystery." Mr. Punch occupies a good deal of space, and a more genial companion for a dark Antarctic night it would be hard to find. "Treasure Island," "Alice in Wonderland," "Through the Looking Glass," and "Westward Ho!" are there, as well as representative stories of Dumas, Rider Haggard, Besant, Fenimore Cooper, Captain Marryat, and Guy Boothby, and odd volumes of the Quiver, Good Words, Cassell's, Pearson's, and the Royal magazines.

* * * *

In the ward were two or three sets of books are shelved on

Mr. James Greville Clark, editor of the Ch died on Sunday last at his residence in Caterham.

We are informed that Mrs. Creed, an A writer of some note, is at present in London, havi join in the general exodus of Australian writers.
known perhaps as "Gouli-Gouli" of the Sydney

The authorities of the British Museum Lil issued two supplementary volumes—"Brax-
"Bruys-Bzovius"—of the Catalogue of Printed

Professor W. S. McCormick, the secretary o University Trust, was formerly a book publish His firm issued, among other things, an excellent Whitman's "Leaves of Grass."

It is stated that Mme. Sarah Bernhardt's son on an adaptation of Henryk Sienkiewicz's novel " Fire," which he expects to finish in time for p next year.

Dr. Carl Peters, the well-known explorer, h home news of some interesting archæological disc Mashonaland frontier. One of these is a figure posed to date some 2,500 years before our era, whi with a number of hieroglyphic characters, as yet

The view from Richmond-hill, for the preser
Mr. George Meredith and others have fought been saved by the acceptance of an offer to sell Estate to the London County Council for £70,000.

Among a recent gift of five pictures to Museum is a portrait of a man with the wo Rabelais" painted on the right-hand top corne
The painting is by Lagneau, and is stated to resemblance to one or two rare contemporary e great French humorist.

A portrait of William Shakespeare, 22in. by collection of Lord St. Leonards, was sold at Sot day for £25 10s. The artist is unknown.

There are fourteen first class men in the List just published at Oxford—a record number.
were not more than four.

The Trustees of the British Museum are ab more parts of their series of selected Babylonian inscriptions. The first volume contains conside to the Chaldean Epic.

In the High Court on Tuesday Mr. Utley, a awarded £200 damages against Sir Tatton and L libel published by the latter in the Review of the

M. Léon Daudet has been slightly wounded i duel.

A memorial service was held on Friday Abbey for the late Bishop of Durham, who from a canon of Westminster.

Literary Examinations.

Examinations of all sorts are a fruitful source of jest, and from time to time you may see in the magazines articles from the pen of some fortunate examiner whose labours have provided him with a fund of good stories. Such articles are interesting and amusing to the general reader, who likes nothing better than to witness the downfall of others, and derives a pleasant sense of superiority from the reflection that so much ignorance exists in the world. But the paper which Mr. H. C. Beeching contributes to the current number of Longman's Magazine is of a different and a more serious cast than most. It does not consist merely of a string of disconnected anecdotes, but aims at the heart of a question very important to lovers of literature. It is now about three months since we published an article from his pen on "The Teaching of Literature," and in the present paper, which he calls "Some Notes on an Examination," Mr. Beeching amplifies and extends his views on the subject, fortifying them with a sufficient number of amusing examples. Should English literature be taught at all—and if it should be taught, are we at present teaching it in a reasonable manner? Briefly, these are the two questions, raised in the first instance, we believe, by Mr. Andrew Lang, to which Mr. Beeching essays to reply. Mr. Lang answered the first boldly in the negative, and so easily disposed of the whole matter. His arguments were, as we understand them, that many eminent men of letters have produced sound literature before literature, as a subject, was ever included in any school curriculum; that the works of recent writers who had received the doubtful advantage of a modern education were not conspicuously better than those of a former age; and, finally, that literary appreciation is an inborn gift that cannot be acquired by the aid of the most cunning of teachers. Mr. Beeching, on the other hand, holds that English literature should be taught, but that the present method of teaching is not the best. As a matter of fact, this is unfortunately true. The gentlemen who set examination papers are largely to blame for this. They demand, as a rule, for such an examination as that for the London University matriculation, a general acquaintance with the whole of English literature, and the inevitable result is that the pupil flies to handbooks where he can read about the great authors, and pick up his criticism ready made. Mr. Beeching takes Milton as one example of the melancholy results of this practice. It is a remarkable fact, he says, that almost all the candidates who attempted a life of Milton knew that his father was a scrivener, and that the poet was born in Bread Street, "though a few by a natural confusion said Milk Street." Most of them knew that he had three wives and that his daughters were unsympathetic. But beyond this he was as likely as not to be confused with other poets, such as Shakespeare, Byron, Spenser, Shelley, and Chaucer; and the lists of his works were amazing in their variety. When we consider how many lists of entirely unknown books had been committed to memory on the chance of their being asked for, this is perhaps hardly surprising. And the "literary judgments" were no less remarkable. "Milton wrote in very varying metres and used 89 per cent. of Anglo-Saxon verbs" (which appears to be an imperfect reminiscence from the Tennyson handbook). "The 'Paradise Lost' like a stately temple is vast in conception but involved in detail." "Milton's style was sublime and comprehensive, and at the same time soothing." Mr. Beeching suggests, and we agree with him, that it would have been more salutary for these young people to have been set to master a single book of "Paradise Lost" instead of being

THE LESSON.

[Reprinted from The Times of July 29.]

Let us admit it fairly, as a business people should,
We have had no end of a lesson: it will do us no end

Not on a single issue, or in one direction or twain,
But conclusively, comprehensively, and several time Were all our most holy illusions knocked higher than kite.
We have had a jolly good lesson and it serves right!

This was not bestowed us under the trees, nor yet in a tent,
But swingingly, over eleven degrees of a bare brow
From Lambart's to Delagoa Bay, and from Piet Sutherland,
Fell the phenomenal lesson we learned—with a fain
no other land!

It was our fault, and our very great fault, and not t of Heaven!
We made an Army in our own image, on an I seven,
Which faithfully mirrored its maker's ideals, e mental attitude—
And so we got our lesson: and we ought to a gratitude!

We have spent some hundred million pounds to p once more
That horses are quicker than men afoot, since two a four:
And horses have four legs and men have two legs,
four goes twice
And nothing over except our lesson—and very price.

For remember (this our children shall know:
near for that knowledge)
Not our mere astonied camps but Council and College—
All the obese, unchallenged old things that stif us—
Have felt the effects of the lesson we got—an a money could buy us!

Then let us develop this marvellous asset which we al
And which, it may subsequently transpire, will much as the Rand:
Let us approach this pivotal fact in a humble mood—
We have had no end of a lesson: it will do us no

It was our fault, and our very great fault—and

VICTOR HUGO, ROMANCIER.

A "Personal View."

By PAUL BOURGET.

Il y a toujours un extrême intérêt à voir un artiste qui a excellé dans un genre quitter ce genre pour un autre et appliquer ses facultés à un type d'œuvres pour lequel il ne semblait pas fait. Il est rare que cette tentative soit suivie d'un entier succès, et, pour citer des cas d'ordre très différent et très inégal, assurément les fresques de Michel-Ange ne valent pas ses marbres, les mémoires scientifiques de Goethe ne valent pas ses poèmes lyriques, et tout près de nous les romans de Victor Hugo ne sauraient s'égaler aux Feuilles d'Automne et aux Orientales, pas plus que les vers de Sainte-Beuve ne se comparent aux Lundis. Cela dit, il faut reconnaître que dans son effort pour s'adapter à des formes rebelles, le génie demeure toujours le génie. Sa vigoureuse énergie créatrice se manifeste même à travers les inexpériences et les insuffisances. Il dénature tout ensemble et il féconde ce genre dans lequel il a voulu couler sa pensée. Qui a pu regretter, devant les prophètes et les Sibylles de la chapelle Sixtine, que le statuaire de la Nuit se soit essayé à ce paradoxe audacieux d'une sculpture peinte ? Qui n'a admiré, dans les conversations avec Eckermann, les pages où l'auteur de Faust développe ses vues de demi-savant, mais si ingénieuses, sur les métamorphoses des plantes, sur l'unité de plan dans la création ? Plus près de nous, et dans un moins glorieux domaine, quel amoureux de la poésie Française n'a goûté le charme singulier de ces élégies analytiques que Sainte-Beuve a appelées les Consolations ? Qui enfin n'a senti en suivant, épisode par épisode, la tragique aventure de Jean Valjean dans les Misérables, qu'il était là en présence d'une création sans analogue, anormale, et, si l'on veut, monstrueuse—au sens que les Latins donnaient à ce mot—par beaucoup d'endroits, mais d'une telle puissance dans la conception et l'exécution qu'il manquerait quelque chose à l'histoire de l'art du roman, si ce livre n'avait pas été composé ?

Ce sont quelques-uns des caractères de Victor Hugo romancier que je voudrais fixer ici, en me bornant, pour plus de précision, à ces Misérables qui sont vraiment son récit en prose, le plus représentatif. Car, dans Notre-Dame de Paris le romancier en lui subissait encore l'influence de Walter Scott, et les récits qui ont suivi, L'Homme qui Rit, Les Travailleurs de la Mer, Quatre-vingt-treize, accentuent les défauts des Misérables, sans en égaler les qualités. Le premier de ces caractères consiste en ceci que Victor Hugo a, dans le choix des personnages, dans l'établissement du milieu, dans la matière même de son œuvre, accepté cette position qui est celle du roman moderne depuis Balzac et qu'il faut bien, faute d'un terme plus précis, appeler réaliste. Mais il l'a acceptée avec une imagination et une facture épique. Comme les maîtres du réalisme, un Balzac lui-même, un Stendhal, et, hors de France, un Dickens, un Thackeray, un Turgénieff, c'est un morceau c'est l'enfant d'une prostituée qui Valjean rec ramasse petite servante à tout faire dans un banlieue, coupe-gorge tenu par les Thénardier bandits. Et cette destinée de misérieux s'ach obscurs complots politiques du règne de Louis-Phil nués dans des cabarets borgnes par des étudia de bas agents, et aboutissant au combat des rues, comme une opération de police publique.

Vous retrouvez dans ces données, si vous philosophie esthétique, le parti-pris des écrivains document, de ceux qui prétendent réduire le chapitre de l'histoire des mœurs. Mais ces donné ment grossières et basses, sont maniées et interp des plus étonnants génies lyriques qui se rencontrés, et voyez les se développer, se t magnifier jusqu'à devenir l'épopée de la rév revendication sociale. Ce forçat, qui est entré par le vol d'un pain dans une boulangerie et qui a celui d'un panier d'argenterie dans une armoire, d de plus en plus grandiose de l'âme plébeienn instinctive, que les sévérités implacables d'un entrailles jettent au désespoir et au crime, et q bienfaiteur attendri relève presque miraculeuse lumière. L'évêque artisan de cette rédemption, n'est plus seulement un excellent prêtre, d'u indulgente et douce. Il devient lui aussi un type, digne de prendre place dans la Légende dor poverello d'Assise. La prostituée dont le forçat n'est pas elle non plus une simple créature dégrad et chez qui un sentiment animal de maternit l'abjection d'un sort abominable. Elle appar Victime, presque sacrée par l'excès de l'injustice sur qui l'égoïsme de l'Homme a exercé sa pire c enfant elle-même sauvée par Jean Valjean, ce enfant, c'est toute l'enfance, comme jeune fille, Pureté, et, une fois éprise, tout l'Amour. Tous c dans un décor, dans des événements, dans un " p quotidienne s'amplifient jusqu'au symbole par une de vision psychologique d'autant plus saisissante physique, elle, reste précise et nette comme Telle description de Paris, celle par exemple d
Jean Valjean traverse la nuit pour échapper à Javert entre le boulevard de l'Hôpital et le cul-cette description, dis-je, pourrait prendre place tant chaque détour de rue y est indiqué, presque de maison, et l'individualité des héros qu' carrefours, evoqués presque photographiqueme dessinée autrement que celle des guerriers l l'Iliade ou des Sept Chefs devant Thèbes !

L'effet immédiat d'un pareil contraste est un d qui produit chez le lecteur, suivant ses habitude d'esprit, un enthousiasme excessif ou une rév excessive, mais qui ne permet guère l'indifféren intelligences formées aux rigoureuses méthodes

insignifiante, cette délinéation sommaire, mais épique, est un enchantement. Si tout est démesuré dans le roman tel que le conçoit Victor Hugo, rien n'y est médiocre. Certes, les simplifications forcées des caractères risquent d'aboutir à d'étranges erreurs d'optique morale. Il existe peu de scènes, dans toutes les littératures, plus absolument fausses, pour n'en citer qu'une, que celle du Chapitre X., dans le premier livre, que le poète révolutionnaire a appelé :—"L'évêque en présence d'une lumière inconnue." C'est celle où il fait s'agenouiller Mgr. Myriel pour demander la bénédiction d'un Conventionnel mourant. Il n'est même pas besoin d'avoir sur l'imbécillité béate ou sanguinaire de '89 et de '92 l'opinion aujourd'hui établie chez tous ceux qui ont étudié scientifiquement ces deux périodes, pour comprendre l'absurdité d'un pareil renversement des rôles. Il suffit d'admettre que toute mentalité a ses lois nécessaires et qu'un honnête homme comme Mgr. Myriel, du moment qu'il demeure évêque, croit à l'Eglise. Non seulement cette foi n'est pas conciliable avec l'étonnement admiratif que le romancier lui prête devant les pauvretés du Conventionnel, mais elle ne lui permet pas d'humilier devant un homme, si grand soit-il, une majesté qui, reçue par un sacrement, n'est ni humaine ni personnelle. N'importe. Cette hypothèse d'une solennelle rencontre entre deux principes incarnés, l'un dans un Juste, l'autre dans un mourant, pour déraisonnable qu'elle puisse paraître, a cependant une grandeur, du moins d'intention. L'écrivain s'est mépris sur la valeur comparative des doctrines que l'évêque et le Révolutionnaire représentent, mais il a vu l'importance du rôle que joue la doctrine dans les heures sérieuses de la vie. Il a affirmé, ce que les romanciers de mœurs semblent trop souvent oublier, que l'homme n'est pas mené uniquement par des intérêts et des sensations, et que la foi aux idées est un des facteurs essentiels de la volonté. Il eût certes été plus grand s'il eût été capable de cette vérité dans la perspective qui met à leur place les divers systèmes et qui ne confond pas une religion explicative de toute l'âme humaine, comme le Catholicisme avec un morceau de phraséologie électorale tel aussi médiocre que la Déclaration des droits. Mais il est grand encore, par cette conviction, si profonde en lui, que les drames les plus émouvants de la vie sont des drames de conscience.

Un artiste littéraire est toujours récompensé de sa bonne foi, même lorsqu'il se trompe. C'est ainsi qu'avec ces simplifications inacceptables, ces partialités violentes, et, il faut avoir le courage de le dire, ces surprenantes ignorances, l'auteur des Misérables a pourtant réussi, parce qu'il était sincère dans sa conception du roman, à composer un livre qui restera, d'abord comme le monument de la plus étonnante vigueur d'imaginative—rappelez-vous le Champ de bataille de Waterloo, le Couvent des Vierges, l'auberge Thénardier tout de merveille ; et—résultat bien inattendu—il restera aussi comme un œuvre infiniment significative, et, au demeurant, documentaire au même degré que la Madame Bovary de Gustave Flaubert ou l'Assommoir de M. Emile Zola, les deux romans peut-être où l'esthétique réaliste a trouvé, chez nous, sa formule même résumé dans des vers célèbres toutes les p[illegible] aussi toutes les limitations de son génie quand il s'[illegible] une âme.

Mise au centre de tout, comme un écho [illegible] était cet écho à vingt ans, lorsqu'il composait [illegible] Ballades et qu'il laissait passer dans ses strophes [illegible] tion de la France épuisée de guerres et de co[illegible] saluant dans ses princes héréditaires sa tradition re[illegible] si peu de temps, hélas ! Il était cet écho, quand, célébrait Napoléon, à l'époque du renouveau de fe[illegible] partiste qui suivit 1830. Il l'était enfin quand, rallié à la cause de la démocratie, il écrivait sur sa les pages républicaines des Misérables. Il s'est était milieu du XIXe. siècle, en France, une conception [illegible] presque religieuse de la Révolution qu'il faut comp[illegible] bien se rendre compte de tout ce qui s'est passé et [illegible] peu raisonnable en politique, dans ce pays-ci, cinquante dernières années. Nulle part de cette conce[illegible] traduite avec un relief plus saisissant que dans ce r[illegible] discours tenus par les jeunes gens qui dressent la bar[illegible] la partie, intitulée "l'Idylle rue Plumet et l'Épopé[illegible] Denis," expliquent l'état d'âme des insurgés de J[illegible] Commune, mieux que ne feraient des volumes d'analys[illegible] de sentimentalisme Jacobin qui circule d'un bout [illegible] l'ouvrage est encore aujourd'hui celui dont s'e[illegible] portions profondes du socialisme Français. L'étrang[illegible] justice, anarchiste, d'après lequel sont modelés l'évê[illegible] Jean Valjean, Fantine, Marius, Enjobras, vous le [illegible] encore aujourd'hui dans des discours de réunions pub[illegible] des articles de journaux, sur des affiches qui portent [illegible] de 1901, mais qui réellement manifestent une disposit[illegible] établie aux environs des années où Hugo conçut les [illegible] L'expérience et la réflexion paraissent bien démont[illegible] Idéal est aussi dangereux qu'il est faux. Fût-il plus [illegible] encore et plus faux, il existe, il est indispensable pou[illegible] la position exacte des poètes en France. N[illegible] vous ne l'apercevez plus nettement que dans ce[illegible] d'un poète qui a, sans s'en douter, et quand il croya[illegible] Homère et Eschyle, apporté une contribution ca[illegible] psychologie de son époque. C'est le cas de rappele[illegible] comparaison qui assimile l'œuvre d'écrivains à une[illegible] faite par derrière. Ils y travaillent sans en voir [illegible] Certes Victor Hugo eût été bien surpris, quand, à [illegible] House il corrigeait de sa puissante écriture les épr[illegible] Misérables, si on lui avait dit que le meilleur de son t[illegible] sisterait à intéresser quelques dilettantes épris de fort[illegible] et à mener de quelques notes essentielles un historie[illegible] phe du genre de M. Taine ou de M. Lecky. Et pou[illegible] est-il pas ainsi ?

Many visitors to Paris of a literary turn of mind [illegible] a visit to No. 6, Place des Vosges, formerly known as [illegible] Royale, where Victor Hugo lived from 1831 to 1848. [illegible] lyle's house in Cheyne-row, this seventeenth-century [illegible]

Literature Portraits.—XIII.

VICTOR HUGO.

Victor Hugo has placed it on record that his most precious gift to his day and generation was, in his own opinion, his personality. That, of course, is as it may be. Whether you agree with him depends upon many things, but mainly upon whether you are or are not a partisan of literary sacerdotalism. What is quite certain is that the gift in question was freely offered and eagerly accepted. This popular writer was as vain as a professional beauty, and was taken as seriously as an Archbishop. Wherever he went, and whatever he did, the centre of the stage was always left vacant for him, and he never failed to occupy it with dignity and gestures in the grand style. That he might be worthy of it, he studied and rehearsed, supplementing a personality that was naturally striking by the artifice of lies and false pretences.

VICTOR HUGO.
[From "Victor Hugo," by J. Pringle Nichol, by permission of Messrs. Swan, Sonnenschein.]

The Hugo Family.

This seems a hard saying, but the facts are there and chapter and verse can be given. The man of genius on whom Victor Hugo aspired to model himself was Chateaubriand, and he differed from Chateaubriand in not being a scion of a noble house. His way out of the difficulty was to invent ancestors and boast of them. He gave out, and caused it to be recorded in at least four "semi-official" biographies—those written by Sainte-Beuve, by M. Barbou, by Alexandre Dumas and by his wife—that he was the descendant of an old Lorraine family, "noble since the year 1331." He spoke of certain lost documents which prevented him from giving as many details as he would have liked. It has

it, as George IV. came to believe that he had battle of Waterloo. But his original audac legend throws a flood of light upon the n Throughout his life it was his habit, withou facts of the case, to strike any attitude that the pose was always life-like; the pose of a at the same time a man of genius. We shal examples of it presently.

Victor Hugo's father, Joseph Leopold Sig as has been said, a distinguished officer in the
He is famous as the man who ran to earth the guerilla chieftains of that age—Charette, w Diavolo, who was hanged, and Juan Martin, th who was garotted. While chasing Charette fell in love with Sophie Trébuchet, the daught
—armateur, incorrectly translated "armourer English biographies—and married her in Royalist, and Victor Hugo afterwards gave o of Feuilles d'Automne, that she had been Madame de Bonchamps and Madame de la Roc was a picturesque statement, but there was n in it. During the whole of the Vendean w Trébuchet never left the city of Nantes; and, included many priests and nuns, she herself wa

The poet, who was her third child, was where his father was in garrison as chef de
The house still stands, and is indicated by though the poet left it as an infant in long afterwards revisited it. His wanderings bega was sent to Elba. As Dumas puts it, Victor to live in the very island in which Napoleon wa
Then his father was promoted to be lieuten major) and sent to join King Joseph in Italy Hugo went back to Paris with the childre lieutenant-colonel, having received further p his family, who came and resided with him in marble palace at Avellino. But Joseph Bonap to the Throne of Spain broke up the circle a went to Madrid, and his family to Paris. They called the Feuillantines, of which the astronomer Lalande. "My life," the poet has on amidst the flowers. In the garden of th rambled as a child, I wandered as a youth, wat culling butter-cups, seeing no one but my m brothers, and the good old priest who peramb his hook continually beneath his arm." Thi who seemed so appropriate in later days when evolved his sacerdotal manner, was really a who had married his cook. It is not a very impo but it is thoroughly characteristic.

School Days.

In 1811, Colonel Hugo, believing Joseph B to be established on a sound basis, summo Madrid. They travelled with the treasure escort, and took nearly three months to reach
When they got there, the younger brothers, E were sent to school at the Jesuit College of the was not unnatural, they quarrelled a good deal pupils. Eugène got his face sliced open Belveraño with a pair of scissors. Victor aven after years by bestowing the name of Belve

The boys were now at school at the Collège Decotte, and Victor Hugo's precocious genius was beginning to reveal itself. He had written a tragedy, a melodrama, a comic opera, odes, elegies, idylls, epigrams, everything. In his copybooks he had scrawled the sentence: Je veux être Chateaubriand ou rien. From his school, at the age of fifteen, he sent in a poem in competition for a prize offered by the Academy. "The piece ended," says Sainte-Beuve, with the lines:—

> Moi qui, toujours fuyant les cités et les cours, > De trois lustres à peine ai vu fuir le cours.

"It struck the judges as so remarkably good that they could not believe in the three lustres, and thinking that the author was trying to impose upon them, they only accorded him a mention instead of the prize." The sober truth, officially recorded, is that the judges were perfectly well aware of the competitor's youthfulness, and only mentioned him because of it, as an "encouragement." Sainte-Beuve's attention was drawn to the discrepancy, and he replied, in a letter to M. Biré:—"Very likely my story is incorrect; but it is nevertheless authentic. The passage was based upon a statement made to me by Victor Hugo himself." Here, again, the hand of the artist is at work upon the Hugo legend.

BUST OF VICTOR HUGO IN 1844.
From the Marble by David d'Angers.
[From the Magazine of Art, by permission of Messrs. Cassell.]

Emotional Lyrics.

Yet Hugo was a precocious poet, though not quite the infant prodigy that he claimed to be. He was famous throughout France before he was twenty-five—famous throughout Europe before he was thirty—famous alike as a lyric poet, a dramatic poet, and a novelist. His kingdom is among emotions rather than ideas. He is of the school of Shelley rather than of Matthew Arnold. Mr. Swinburne has indeed found that some of his songs unite "the subtle tenderness of Shelley's with the frank simplicity of Shakespeare's," quoting in support of his contention:—

> Près de vous, pure et fidèles,
> Ils accourraient nuit et jour,
> Si mes vers avaient des ailes,
> Des ailes comme l'amour.

Whether one is prepared, or not, to go all the way Swinburne, who writes that "nothing of Shelley's ex for limpid perfection of melody," at least one r it as the true musical poetry that lingers in the The note of sorrow is struck as surely and melodiousl lines that follow:—

> EN FRAPPANT À UNE PORTE.
>
> J'ai perdu mon père et ma mère,
> Mon premier-né, bien jeune, hélas!
> Et pour moi l
> entière
> Sonne le glas
>
> Je dormais e > deux frère > Enfants, nous é > oiseaux;
> Hélas! le sort > deux bière
> Leurs deux h
>
> Je t'ai perdu
> chère, > Toi qui rempl > orgueil, > Tout mon des > lumière
> De ton cercu
>
> J'ai su monte > descendre,
> J'ai vu l'aube
> en mes cie > J'ai connu la p > la cendre
> Qui me va mi
>
> J'ai connu le > profondes, > J'ai connu les > amours, > J'ai vu fuir les > ondes,
> Les vents, le
>
> J'ai sur ma
> orfraies,
> J'ai sur tous me
> l'affront,
> Au pied la p > cœur des p > L'épine au fr
>
> J'ai des pleurs
> qui pense,
> Des trous à ma
> lambeau;
> Je n'ai rien
> science;
> Ouvre, tombe

We find another emotion, again exquisitely rendere hymn of evensong:—

Quand la vie est mauvaise ou la rêve meilleure,
Les yeux en pleurs au ciel se lèvent à toute heure ;
L'espoir vers Dieu se tourne, et Dieu l'entend crier.
Laissez tout ce qui pleure Prier.

C'est pour renaître ailleurs qu'ici bas on succombe.
Tout ce qui tourbillonne appartient à la tombe.
Il faut dans le grand tout tôt ou tard s'absorber.
Laissez tout ce qui tombe Tomber.

Exquisitely chiselled lyrics. The method is an advance on the methods of earlier poets. Victor Hugo might well have been content to let his fame rest on them instead of on the attitudes that he struck. But the cult of the Muses and the cult of the Ego were never, in his case, separable ideals. Chateaubriand had called him "un enfant sublime," and he studied sublimity in all his doings, or at all events in the colour that he put upon all his doings. His life, in short, might be described as the parody of the saying that the man who wants to be a great epic poet must make his own life a great epic poem. For, however anxious Victor Hugo may have been to make his life an epic poem, he was always still more anxious to give the world the impression that that was what it was.

"Père de famille."

One notes this particularly in the part of the Hugo legend which deals with Victor Hugo's marriage. It is represented to us as a marriage romantically preordained before the birth of either bride or bridegroom, at the bride's father's wedding-breakfast. "May you have a daughter," General Hugo is alleged to have said on that occasion, "I will have a son, and they shall marry each other. I drink to the prosperity of their household." There is not the faintest reason to believe that he ever said anything of the kind, but the story improved the legend, and therefore it was woven into it. The wedding took

BUST OF VICTOR HUGO, 1884.
From the Bronze by Rodin.
[From the Magazine of Art, by permission of Messrs. Cassell.]

with vainglorious arrogance by Sainte-Beuve, v in a rare book bearing the title "Livre relates the whole story of the intrigue from the En entrant, je la vis, ma future maîtresse,

À côté du génie un peu reine et déesse.

Letters have been published which show Hugo regarded the situation. He seems to pained than indignant. The liaison termina Beuve left Paris for Lausanne in 1837 ; and, th glad, confident morning again, Victor Hugo's was, to a certain extent, patched up. "He k Pons in "Sainte-Beuve et ses Inconnues," " lection once the lo
It plea to tim presen
In 186 to Mlle to tha the le hably
the fa
all th gratitu
it. S most i he sai to me,
same. presen
let the you.'"

M himsel matrim
He h attach till hl tain the da who fa as Ma lady f exile—
Guern
Madam speaks
"the the po discere genius
"very trice," was th daily also to Hugo' looked

she sat in the shadow of the great cu heavy folds. Her forehead was of marble, colour, her eyes almost lifeless. I drew my system. Many of his plays were far from being great popular successes—though popular success comes to the poetical drama more frequently in France than in England—but the production of one of them was always a great literary event. Hugo, with an enthusiastic following behind him, was fighting the classical traditions of the French stage in the interest of romanticism. His purpose was to free the rhythm of the Alexandrine from restrictions which made for monotony by the introduction of the movable cæsura and the "enjambement"—or "running on" of sentences without regard to the limitations of the couplet—and by the use in verse of the ordinary words of common speech. "Je mis un bonnet rouge au vieux dictionnaire" is his own proud account of the achievement. But the battle was hard and violent. The great field-day was on the first production of Hernani. There are many accounts of the incident, most of them too long to quote; but the events of the evening are nowhere better summed up than in the "Life" written by Mr. J. Pringle Nichol:

Both parties felt instinctively, on the eve of the representation of Hernani, that the real day of battle between them had come. The "classics" understood that the drama was to be, so to say, a gauntlet thrown in their face, and prepared themselves to protest noisily against its anticipated literary audacities. The "romantics," on their part, organized bands of young men, mostly authors and painters, enthusiastic for the new artistic development, and to these were distributed tickets of entry with Hierro, the Spanish word for iron, stamped on them, symbolizing the firmness they were expected to show in proclaiming in the teeth of all opposition their admiration for Hernani and their zeal for the "romantic" cause. On Thursday, February 25th, the pit entrance of the Théâtre Français was, from an early hour in the day, besieged by a multitude of strangely-attired, unconventional-looking youths, eager to applaud the new tragedy, and to terrify, if possible, its opponents among the audience. Conspicuous among these fervents of the faith was Théophile Gautier, eighteen years old only, but already an author, and an Hugolâtre intransigeant, with his long hair streaming over a doublet of rose-coloured satin. The young men entered early, taking possession of the galleries and pit, and beguiling their time of waiting by singing songs of the hour and by pleasantries in use at the artists' studios. When the higher-priced places began to fill, and each well-known upholder of the old order was saluted with sarcasms and jeers, it became evident that the evening was going to be stormy. Hardly had the curtain risen on the traditional three knocks than the "classics" of the balcony and boxes found their worst anticipations realized. It was apparent that the plot and action of the piece were quite away from the traditional lines, and that its style was not le style noble, to which French audiences had hitherto been accustomed when they went to hear metrical tragedy. The bald-headed, and, apparently, slightly-deaf gentleman boxes misinterpreted this into "Vieil as de p l'aime."—"Old ace of spades! he loves her," unjustifiably, began to bellow his exasperation;—" too much! Vieil as de pique. Le cochon!" Nothing one of the poet's partisans, determined to approve at retorted loudly:—"Vieil as de pique, it's capital! local colour. Bravo, Hugo!"

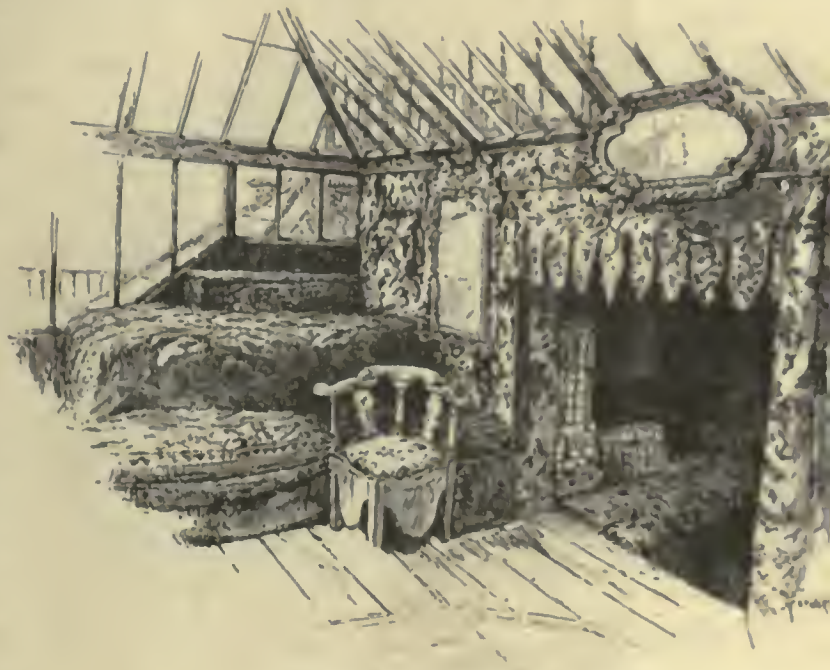
In spite of interruptions and the constant clamou on this evening, and many subsequent to it, Hern success. It ran through a goodly number of represent made the sensation it was intended to make. Sai wrote to a friend after its seventh performance:—" of romanticism has, by the mere fact of Hernani, vanced a hundred miles."

Another way in which Victor Hugo served the in the drama was in insisting that the playwright and player should be master in the theatre. English pla who groan under the tyranny of the actor-manage actress-manageress, and are expected to alter lines,



THE STUDIO, HAUTEVILLE HOUSE.
[From Good Words, by permission of Messrs. Isbister.]

scenes, to suit their whims and caprices, must find s very refreshing in the story of the passage of arms Victor Hugo and Mlle. Mars. While the play was be to the company that lady proposed emendations with h full of chocolate almonds. Hugo politely refused to mak She repeated her suggestions at rehearsal, declaring play would be hissed if they were not accepted. Th remained courteous but firm. When the rehearsal was followed the actress into her dressing-room and invited resign her part. She was amazed and indignant; glimpse of the worship—one might almost say the ritual—in Madame Ancelot's "Les Salons de Paris," published in 1858:—

> When Hugo, with bent head and dark and thoughtful eyes, recited in his powerful but monotonous voice a few stanzas of a beautiful ode which he had just composed, could one use such words as "admirable," "superb," "prodigious"—words which had just been spoken in his presence in honour of some mediocrity? It was impossible!
>
> So there always ensued a silence, lasting for several seconds. Then one rose and approached him with visible emotion; one grasped his hand; one lifted one's eyes to heaven. The crowd would listen, and a single word would be heard to the great surprise of the uninitiated, and this word which echoed in every corner of the room, was—
>
> A Cathedral!
>
> Then the orator would return to his place and another would rise and exclaim—
>
> A Gothic Arch!
>
> A third, after looking round, would hazard—
>
> A Pyramid of Egypt!
>
> Then the assembly would applaud and relapse into awe-struck silence. But this was only the prelude to an explosion of voices all repeating in chorus the sacramental words which had just been separately pronounced.

Nor was it only from a clique that the poet received this veneration. Gradually the whole of the cultivated world claimed leave to join in incense-burning, and Mr. Pringle Nichol tells us that

> When, on summer evenings, he stepped encircled by a band of worshippers, on the balcony of his house, dressed, as always, simply, in grey trousers, a black frock-coat, and a turned-down collar, he could not fail to observe that the Place Royale was generally sprinkled with strangers, Parisians or provincials, with occasionally among them an Anglo-Saxon tourist, come on the chance of a glimpse of his pale close-shaven face with its fine eyes and magnificent forehead.

The time came, however, when Victor Hugo's plays ceased, at all events temporarily, to attract. Les Burgraves was a hopeless failure. On the eleventh night the house only held £53 2s. 6d.; whereas at the Odéon a classical play was drawing houses of £220 and upwards. It was becoming evident that, if Victor Hugo wanted to keep his name before the public, he must make some new departure. Whether for this reason or for some other reason, he plunged into politics.

An "Adaptable" Politician.

His political opinions may, perhaps, be best described as "adaptable." It is, at any rate, the fact that he was a warm supporter of every régime that did anything for him. He was a warm legitimist under Charles X., who gave him a pension, a warm Orleanist under Louis Philippe, who gave him a peerage, and an advanced democrat under the Republic, which made him a Mayor. Napoleon III. did nothing for him, and he forthwith went into Opposition, with the results which we shall see. Yet there is no reason to believe that he was consciously inconsistent. Whatever his attitude, he always justified it by the same passionate appeal to the same abstract virtues. He was quite prepared to sing the praises of Napoleon—he began to sing them. He supported Louis Bonaparte's candidature for d'un Crime," that the poet organized and led to resist the massacre of citizens. He tells us omnibus that was stopped on its way by a re he put down the window, and shouted " Bonaparte! Those who serve traitors are tra On which story M. Biré remarks sardonically:

> Victor Hugo has not altogether invente omnibus. Only the part which he attribute precisely the part which he played. M Arnaud (of Ariège), who, after having re "L'Histoire d'un Crime," said with a sm M. Albert de Rességnier:—"It was I, not lowered the window, put my head and h it, and began to harangue the regiment protesting, with all my force, against the Constitution and the treachery of the pre All this time, Victor Hugo, sitting beside the tails of my coat, and saying, over and quiet! Be quiet! You will get us all mass

Be that as it may, Victor Hugo judged disguise himself as a workman and flee to January 9, 1852, he was formally expelled fro in the interest of the general security.

His ejection was, in many ways, the best have happened to him. The heated atmos strife was no more favourable than the co adulation to the production of the best wo capable. In exile he had time to take stock of things out, and turn them over in tranquillit It is true, were hurled from his retreat in the the poet discharging his thunderbolts with the of an Olympian Zeus. But it did not take forge them. He once more had leisure to writ d'Islande" dated from 1823, and "Notre Dam 1831. Now, after an interval of about thirt "Les Travailleurs de la Mer," "Quatre-V "Les Misérables."

His Literary Position.

These are the works for which Victor Hug They have been selected as works of geni uncritical multitude, but by judges whose authority. The Edinburgh Review, while Misérables" as "this series of improbabl incongruous collection of rambling disquisit dictory amplifications," admits that it has certain quarters, as "the great prose epic century." The Quarterly Review so accept "In dealing," we read, "with all the emotions, fears which go to make up our common hu Hugo has stamped upon every page the hall- Mr. Swinburne, of course, is even more enthu the novels so great that "it would be the v impertinence for any man's presumption to classification or registry of his five great rom order of actual merit." He speaks of thei greatest Frenchman of all time."

That verdict, at all events, cannot sta essentials of greatness are obviously wantin habitually lies, not, as Napoleon habitually tangible ambition, but merely to titillate genius and insanity—a reflection which gains point from the fact that there undeniably was madness in the Hugo family—it would be unjust to say that close inspection reduces them to sound and fury signifying nothing. But it is just as certain that they appear of less and less importance to the student of literary history as time goes on, and that the really great literary influence of the age of Victor Hugo was not Victor Hugo, but Balzac. From Balzac descend Flaubert, de Maupassant, de Goncourt, and Zola. From Hugo only Mr. Hall Caine descends.

Exile.

Victor Hugo's exile was to last for eighteen years. First he went to Brussels where, being far from wealthy, he occupied a single room in the Grande Place, and dined with other exiles—Emile de Girardin, Edgar Quinet, Emile Deschanel, &c.—at a little restaurant near the Galeries Saint Hubert, where a banquet of several courses was served for one franc, "bière comprise." He began to write his book on the Coup d'État. "I attack Louis Bonaparte," he wrote, "at this hour when he is firm upon his feet, and master of his country. He is at his apogee. So much the better. That is what I want." But, after this preliminary blare of trumpets, he delayed the publication of the attack until Louis Bonaparte was not only fallen from his high estate, but actually dead and buried. M. Biré suggests that it was not safe to try to impose the Hugo legend until certain witnesses were out of the way. In spite of the delay, some of them have spoken, and their evidence, as we have seen, discredits the legend in many of its particulars. He published, however, "Napoleon le Petit," the MS. being copied by Mme. Dronet, the actress, who accompanied the poet to Brussels, while his wife and daughter stayed in Paris, arranging for the furniture to be sold by auction. According to the Hugo legend, the book made such a sensation that the Belgian Government got frightened and passed a law—the Loi Faider—to give itself the power to expel him. The statement is made in "Pendant l'Exil." As a matter of fact, the law was directed against quite other proscripts, who had attacked Napoleon in the Bulletin Français. Victor Hugo thought that their crown of martyrdom would become him, and he put it on. But the truth is that he had already left Belgium when the Loi Faider was introduced.

He went first to England, thence to Jersey, thence to Guernsey, where he lived for many years in Hauteville-house, which he bought for £1,000. He had not entirely escaped from politics. From time to time he launched his thunderbolts, making his voice heard like that of a Hebrew prophet admonishing an Israelitish king. But he had time to get back to literature—to write novels as well as poetry, to read and criticize Shakespeare. Though he sometimes stooped to the arts of the charlatan in order to keep his name and personality before the world, he lived, on the whole, a tranquil and even a dull life. Many pilgrims have given us glimpses of it. Perhaps M. Assolim is our best witness.

his look-out. Passing the word of command to his which he had made the slave of his genius, he set work tranquilly at a chef d'œuvre, as his accustomed now he had written his hundred verses, or his tw of prose. . . . Then, his legs feeling a little st had formed the habit of standing when he wrote an about when he composed—he descended his staircase heavy hangings muffling the noise of his footsteps, an his great thoughts, giving himself a rest from the remainder of the day. . . How often has he not re "A little work wearies one; plenty of work amuses

The Return to Paris.

During all these years Victor Hugo was incr literary reputation and at the same time impressing with his strangely magnetic personality. On ever occasion he made himself as conspicuous as a man w coat would be in the stalls of the opera. And this wi tiring the fickle Parisian populace or getting laughe pains. When the war broke out, and it was seen Empire would fall, people actually found time to other—What will Victor Hugo do now? What he

THE RED DRAWING ROOM, HAUTEVILLE HOUSE.
[From Good Words, by permission of Messrs. Isbister.]

to return to Paris, where he could hardly have been with more enthusiasm if he had been a conquering fresh from rolling back the tide of the invasion, a he remained during the siege. The fragment of his dia published by M. Paul Meurice, shows us how naturally old age as in his youth, he stepped into the full glar limelight, taking the centre of the stage:—

> We arrived in Paris at 9.35 o'clock. An immen awaited me. It was an indescribable welcome. I spoke f once from the balcony of a café and thrice from my c
>
> When I took leave of this ever-growing crow escorted me to Paul Meurice's, in the Avenue De

I copy the following from a newspaper :

M. Victor Hugo had manifested the intention to leave Paris unarmed, with the artillery battery of the National Guard to which his two sons belong.

The 144th Battalion of the National Guard went in a body to the poet's residence in the Avenue Frochot. Two delegates waited upon him.

These honourable citizens went to forbid Victor Hugo to carry out his plan, which he had announced some time ago in his address to the Germans.

"Everybody can fight," the deputation told him. "But everybody cannot write 'Les Châtiments.' Stay at home, therefore, and take care of a life that is so precious to France."

I do not remember the number of the battalion. It was not the 144th. Here are the terms of the address which was read to me by the Major of the battalion :—

The National Guard of Paris forbids Victor Hugo to go to the front, inasmuch as everybody can go to the front, whereas Victor Hugo alone can do what Victor Hugo does.

"Forbids" is touching and charming.

M. Biré, however, tells a story which forms an interesting gloss upon these last remarks. It was at Bordeaux where Victor Hugo, in a képi and a red shirt, was sitting on a Committee of the National Assembly. He told of his desire to march against the Prussians, and appealed for confirmation to Admiral La Roncière Le Noury, who had commanded the marines during the siege :—

"Yes," he continued, "my noble friend, my gallant friend the admiral, over there, will tell you that I wished to share his dangers, that I repeatedly asked leave to do so." The Admiral, unable to stand it any longer, turned to his neighbour, and whispered, making a screen of his hand : "It isn't true, it isn't true. Why, one day I asked him to lunch in my fort, and he was afraid to come."

Once more we see the Hugo legend in the making, and observe that it was not the disciples who made it but the master.

The End.

Victor Hugo was now 69, and the remaining years of his life, though marked by literary activity, were outwardly uneventful. After the Commune he went to Belgium, but was expelled because his visible sympathy with the Communists made him a centre of disturbance. On his return to Paris, however, he was unmolested ; and his home in the Avenue d'Eylau, subsequently re-christened the Avenue Victor Hugo, "became," says Mr. Pringle Nichol, "at once the quasi-sacred centre of literary Paris and a shrine to which curious strangers from all corners of the earth made pilgrimage. Here, on his days of reception, came Jews, Turks, Peruvians, and Chinamen, to each of whom in turn, after shaking hands with his wonted elaborate courtesy, he said a welcoming word." On his eightieth birthday there was a demonstration in his honour, "when a large fraction of the people of Paris assembled beneath the balcony where stood the poet between his two grandchildren, Georges and Jeanne." He died in 1885 from the result of a chill caught by riding on the outside of an omnibus ; and a procession of 150,000 people followed him to the grave, whither he was borne, according to the directions given in his will, upon a pauper's hearse.

Thus he died, as he had lived, more theatrically than any man of letters had ever lived and died before him. The qualities of the charlatan and the man of genius were strangely and have kept the eyes of Europe focussed admirin for so long. Victor Hugo stepped into the cen in the twenties and was still standing there f Even Voltaire, whose case furnishes the near whose influence still lives, while that of Hu away, enjoyed a less protracted pontificate than

FRANCIS

BIBLIOGRAPHY OF VICTOR H

A complete bibliography of Victor Hugo wou
His most important works may be classified as fo

I. Poetry.

Odes et Poésies Diverses, 1822.
Nouvelles Odes, 1824.
Odes et Ballades, 1826.
Les Orientales, 1829.
Les Feuilles d'Automne, 1831.
Les Chants du Crépuscule, 1835.
Les Voix Intérieures, 1837.
Les Rayons et les Ombres, 1840.
Les Châtiments, 1853.
Les Contemplations, 1856.
Les Chansons des Rues et des Bois, 1865
L'Année Terrible, 1872.
La Libération du Territoire, 1873.
L'Art d'être Grand-père, 1877.
L'Expiation, 1877.
Le Pape, 1878.
La Pitié Suprême, 1879.
L'Âne, 1880.
Les Quatre Vents de l'Esprit, 1881.
Toute la Lyre, 1889.
Dieu, 1891.

II. Dramas.

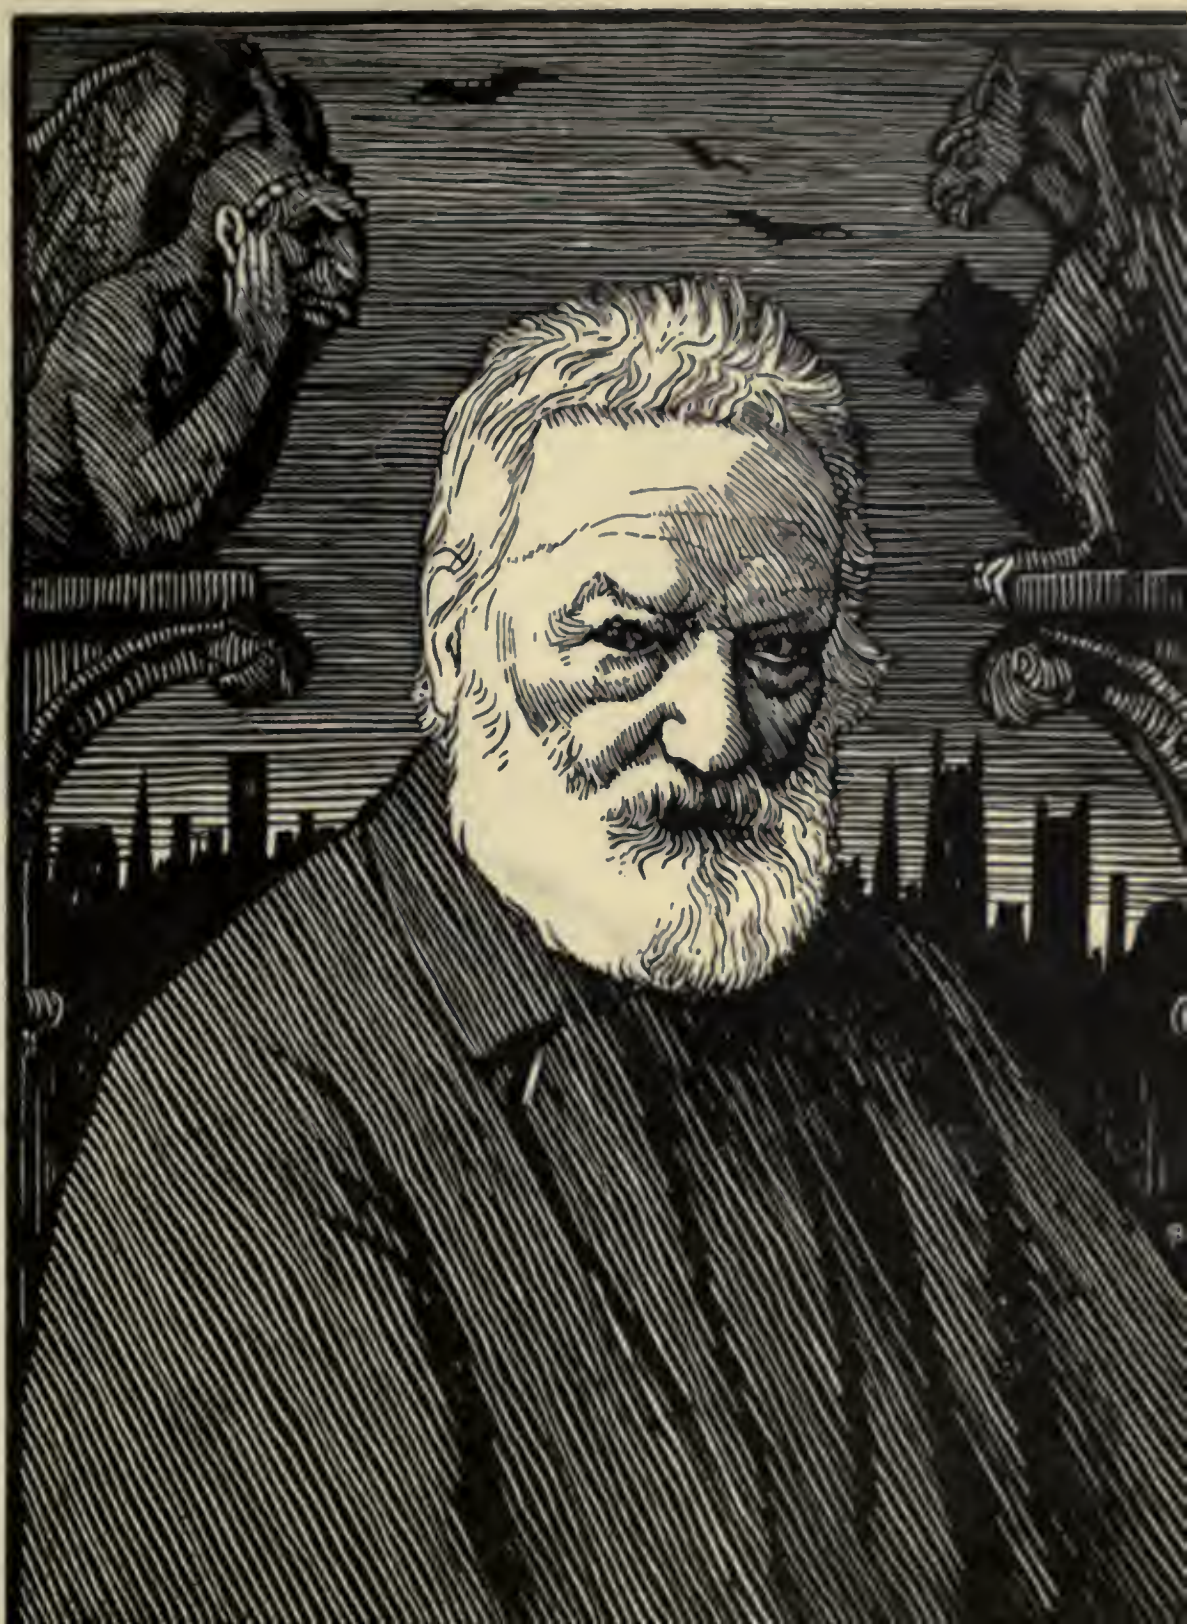
Cromwell, 1827.
Hernani, 1830.
Marion de Lorme, 1831.
Le Roi S'Amuse, 1832.
Lucrèce Borgia, 1833.
Marie Tudor, 1833.
Angelo, Tyran de Padoue, 1835.
La Esmeralda, 1836.
Ruy Blas, 1838.
Les Burgraves, 1843.
Torquemada, 1882.
Amy Robsart, 1889.

III. Fiction.

Han d'Islande, 1823.
Bug-Jargal, 1826.
Le Dernier Jour d'un Condamné, 1829.
Notre Dame de Paris, 1831.
Claude Gueux, 1834.
Les Misérables, 1862.
Les Travailleurs de la Mer, 1866.
L'Homme qui Rit, 1869.
Quatre-Vingt-Treize, 1872.

IV. Miscellaneous.

Littérature et Philosophie Mêlées, 1834
Le Rhin, 1842.
Napoléon le Petit, 1852.
John Brown, 1861.
William Shakespeare, 1864.
Actes et Paroles, 1841-1876.
Mes Fils, 1875.



to be trusted when it cannot be checked. The nearest approach to an official biography is M. Alfred Barbou's "Victor Hugo et son Temps," 1882. This is a beautiful picture-book, but it accepts and perpetuates the Hugo legend with uncritical simplicity. Of the critical biographies the best are those of M. Edmond Biré, who has devoted a considerable series of monographs to the subject, all written in the tone and temper of an iconoclast. Their titles are :—

"Victor Hugo et la Restauration," 1869.
"Victor Hugo avant 1830," 1883.
"Victor Hugo après 1830," 2 tom, 1891.
"Victor Hugo après 1852," 1894.

Another valuable volume of personal recollections is "Victor Hugo Intime," by Madame Hugo's cousin, M. Alfred Asseline; and the memoirs of contemporary French men of letters are naturally full of references. See the memoirs of Théodore de Banville, Maxime du Camp, Alexandre Dumas the elder, Théophile Gautier, Eugène de Mirecourt, Auguste Vacquerie, and M. Zola's "Documents littéraires; Études et Portraits," 1881.

There are also some English lives :—

"Victor Hugo: A Sketch of his Life and Work." By J. Pringle Nichol (Swan Sonnenschein's Dilettante Library).

"The Life of Victor Hugo." By Frank T. Marzials (Walter Scott's Great Writers Series).

"Victor Hugo: A Memoir and Study." By James Cappon (Blackwood).

Critical studies of Victor Hugo's works abound. A full bibliography of them, compiled by Mr. John P. Anderson, will be found in Mr. Marzials' book mentioned above. The list fills fifteen columns, and there is a further list of magazine articles filling thirteen columns. The most notable French authors on the list are :—MM. Brunetière, Jules Claretie, Émile Faguet, Henri Houssaye, Jules Janin, Le Comte de Lisle, Louis Veuillot, and Alexandre Vinet. Among English books on the subject the one which stands out pre-eminently is :—

"A Study of Victor Hugo." By Algernon Charles Swinburne (Chatto and Windus).

But the student may also be referred to various volumes of collected essays, in which essays on Victor Hugo are included. As, for instance :—

"Master-Spirits." By Robert Buchanan (H. S. King, 1873).
"Studies in Literature, 1789-1877." By Edward Dowden (Kegan Paul, 1878).
"The Afternoon Lectures on Literature and Art," delivered in Dublin, 1861 (Bell and Daldy, 1864).
"The Poets and Poetry of Europe." By Henry Wadsworth Longfellow (Low, 1854).
"'Con Amore,' or Critical Chapters." By Justin McCarthy (Tinsley, 1868).
"Essays, Modern." By F. W. H. Myers (Macmillan, 1883).
"Essays on Poetry and Poets." By the Hon. Roden Noel (Kegan Paul, 1886).
"Familiar Studies of Men and Books." By Robert Louis Stevenson (Chatto and Windus, 1888).
"Lectures on the French Poets." By Walter Herries Pollock (Longmans, 1879).
"The Works of Father Prout," 1881.
"Essays and Studies." By Algernon C. Swinburne (Chatto and Windus, 1875).
"Critical Essays and Literary Notes." By Bayard Taylor, 1880.

SOME MOVEMENTS IN VICTORIAN POE

II.—THE POETRY OF FAITH AND ASPIRATIO

The Victorian era was, as we have seen, broken u numerous and conflicting movements, and at first sigh interests and expectations which they arouse seem u reconcilable. But, upon closer examination, it will be fou all these diverse enthusiasms are related and very related to two main distinguishing characteristics of the two waves that steadily advance until they fill and flood, were, all the creeks and inlets of contemporary thought. advance of science and the advance of the democratic spir one widening the intellectual horizon and illuminating sort of hidden corner of tradition and authority, the breathing energy and ambition into the dry bones of an and decadent section of society—these two great movem emancipation either absorb or direct all the other inter the period. The spirits which are frankly revolutionary, in antagonism with tradition and authority, they a those which are jealous of old forms and loyalties they indeed absorb, but they still direct them, turning the of their thought, and forcing them at least to weigh, and i degree to recognize, claims which had never before e into the serious consideration of literature and life.

And of all scientific systems the one most character the period is, of course, that of Evolution. The Victori was indeed well advanced before Charles Darwin set f "The Origin of Species" what may be called the first t evangel of Evolution, but the ideas which he there crystal had long been in the air, and their gradual growth m traced in the spiritual, no less than in the scientific, lite of the time. And side by side with this theory of p derivation and interrelation, this doctrine (one might call it) of universal brotherhood, there was steadily grow new principle of individual emancipation and liberty, fo in literature by the careless, happy optimism of Macaulay one side, and on the other by John Stuart Mill's em earnest doctrine of utilitarianism. The Reform Bill o promised an enlargement of interests that seemed to lea an indefinite millenium, the people was at last to get li thought was free, and the old order overwhelmed. Und such towering waves it was natural that much of the ol and aspiration should go down: natural, too, that some resi should be made, and some attempt to reconcile the pre theory with the earlier and still, happily, current belief natural attitude of man is not so much one of revol compromise; and the characteristic attitude towards i tion is one of temperate reconciliation. And so it i surprising to find that the most prominent and disti poetry of the epoch is that in which the theory of evolut implicit, in which some of its corollaries are delib accepted, but which, at the same time, accepts them unconsciously, and directs its whole endeavour to the rai man's ideals above the material sphere of interest, perm the material world with spiritual significance. This is w call the poetry of Faith and Aspiration, and we find it, sus by the fortunate longevity of its leaders, the most cont and characteristic movement of the age.

But here at the outset we must discriminate, for this sentative phase of poetry is not to be confused with religious or devotional poetry, strong and fruitful as anxiety, conceived in the very intensity of contemporary interest, is another thing entirely; and of this the period affords us three eminent examples, singularly different both in scope and method, so different, indeed, as to seem at first sight completely diverse, and yet all closely united in faith in the progress of man and in that continuity of spiritual energy which postulates the immortality of the soul.

Tennyson, Browning, and Coventry Patmore—it would be difficult to choose three contemporary names suggesting more various and divergent trains of thought. In method they are altogether dissimilar. Tennyson's exquisite lyricism is as unlike Browning's rugged but penetrating bursts of music as both are to the elaborately constructed, cumulative harmonies of Patmore's full-toned odes. Nor do they differ less in personality. Tennyson is eminently social, almost universal in sympathy; the progress and life of the people is his perpetual theme, even his most intimate poems end upon an impersonal note. Browning, on the other hand, is concerned exclusively with the individual soul as the microcosm, dissecting and analysing the motive, probing the personality, and arguing from the single example to the generalization. Finally, Patmore is self-centred, introspective; by far the most self-conscious of the three, and by far the narrowest in interest; and yet rising on the wings of self-realization to heights of spiritual ecstasy sublimely unclouded by controversy. These are widely different natures indeed; and yet they are closely related in a brotherhood of purpose. And first, let us consider them with relation to the dominant theory of evolution.

For evolution, as a scientific theory, Tennyson entertained apprehensions, not for its own sake, but for the difficulties which accompany it in the common mind. The thoughtless man would make it a stumbling block, while to the intelligent it should be a "sounding watchword."

Evolution ever climbing after some ideal good,
And Reversion ever dragging Evolution in the mud.

. . . . . .

Many an Æon moulded earth before her highest, man, was born,
Many an Æon too may pass when earth is manless and forlorn,

Only that which made us meant us to be mightier by and by,
Set the sphere of all the boundless Heavens within the human eye,

Sent the shadow of Himself, the boundless, thro' the human soul,
Boundless inward, in the atom, boundless outward, in the whole.

The theory, he saw, was capable of infinite spiritual expansion; its danger was that, confined to the material sphere, it might lose all spiritual significance and stifle human ambition. So, with a really wonderful adroitness, he fitted it into his scheme till it became its inseparable part and parcel. To Tennyson the secret of the world was the law of order, the gradual progress by steps of slow improvement; and into this theory the doctrine of evolution very naturally fitted. "I believe in progress," he said once, "but a progress conserving the hopes of man"; and, as Professor Dowden has very pertinently pointed out, the whole fabric of his philosphy is symbolized in the decoration of Merlin's Hall in "The Holy Grail." For

Four great zones of sculpture, set betwixt
With many a mystic symbol, gird the hall:
And in the lowest beasts are slaying men,
And in the second men are slaying beasts,
And on the third are warriors, perfect men,
And on the fourth are men with growing wings,
And over all one statue in the mould orderly progress that the individual must interests of the race, his passions and enthusias general pæan of hope and aspiration. But for the individual altogether. He must realiz into shape like clay upon the potter's wheel.

Ay, note that Potter's wheel,
That metaphor! and feel
Why Time spins fast, why passive lies ou
Thou, to whom fools propound,
When the wine makes its round,
"Since life fleets, all is change; the Past g

Fool! all that is, at all,
Lasts ever, past recall;
Earth changes, but thy soul and God sta
What entered into thee,
That was, is, and shall be:
Time's wheel runs back or stops: Potter

Here again is, implicitly, the evolution applied now directly to the individual. Eve find it in "Evelyn Hope"

No, indeed! for God above
Is great to grant, as mighty to mak
And creates the love to reward th
I claim you still, for my own love's Delayed it may be for more lives y
Through worlds I shall traverse, n
Much is to learn, much to forget Ere the time be come for taking yo

Had we space, instances might, of cour indefinitely, but we have already enough t tendency, and its distinguishing differenc using its life here as a palæstra or exercis faculties and emotions, is hereafter to gro comes to the measure of the perfect man.
faculty must be neglected, no healthful em
the perfection of nature will be the harmony

In Patmore we find a rather different inte
we have said, by far the most self-conse poets, and his natural tendency to introspect his adoption of that form of the Christian encourages self-analysis and self-judgment.
too, he gathered its most beautiful and inspirin of the universality of the divine Love, which sort of pantheism of the affections, seeing L God, and God everywhere in Love. With him have full sway, as being manifestations o and it is in moments irradiated by the ec
the poet feels himself closest to the God Love itself. Here, too, though scientific th possible from the poet's interest, the sens development is faintly perceived and recog has always been recognised, in the Christia understood.

I, trusting that the truly sweet
Would still be sweetly found the t Sang, darkling, taught by heavenly Songs which were wiser than I kne
To the unintelligible dream
That melted like a gliding star,
I said "We part to meet, fair glea

Sole vigour left in her last lethargy,
Save when, at bidding of some dreadful breath,
The rising death
Rolls up with force;
And then the furiously gibbering corse
Shakes, panglessly convuls'd, and sightless stares, Whilst one Physician pours in rousing wines,
One anodynes,
And one declares
That nothing ails it but the pains of growth.
My last look loth
Is taken; and I turn with the relief
Of knowing that my life-long hope and grief
Are surely vain,
To that unshapen time to come, when She
A dim heroic Nation long since dead,
The foulness of her agony forgot,
Shall all benignly shed Through ages vast
The ghostly grace of her transfigured past
Over the present, harass'd and forlorn,
Of nations yet unborn.

This is apparent pessimism; but at the close the depression is relieved by hope, by the sense of the evolution of national history, and of the permanent influence of English character and ideal. Tennyson, too, felt the dangers of democracy, and was often gravely depressed by it, but he, too, and much more emphatically than Patmore, ended in confidence of the progress of the human race.

Light the fading gleam of Even? light the glimmer of the dawn?
Aged eyes may take the glowing glimmer for the gleam withdrawn.
Follow Light and do the Right for man can half control his doom—
Till you find the deathless Angel seated in the vacant tomb.

And Browning, indomitable optimist, was still more confident. For this is his picture of himself.

One who never turned his back, but marched breast forward,
Never doubted clouds would break,
Never dreamed, though right were worsted, wrong would triumph,
Held we fall to rise, are baffled to fight better,
Sleep to wake.

And if in these three voices Browning's seems the only one unquestioningly confident, it is well to remember, as we tried to indicate in the opening article of this series, that the period through which these three poets moved into honoured age was one of more than ordinary expectation and disappointment. The popular ideals of the forties and the fifties are already withered and laid aside; and these men, who saw the era set out with such high hopes, may well have been given pause by its failure to realize their promises. And there were moments when they all—yes even Browning—were depressed by the course of events, and uncertain whether the spiritual future of the nation was not to drift upon the rocks. Nevertheless, they emerged in confidence. They were confident in the permanence of those ideals which had been proved in the past, confident, too, of the survival of spiritual energy, and of the immortality of the soul. In this, of course, they were by no means alone; the poetry of their time was rich in high aspiration and in fidelity

CURRENT LITERATURE.

BOOKS ON DANTE.

Mr. Vernon's Readings of the Commedia.

Mr. Warren Vernon has at length after many year remitting and curious labour brought his Readings Commedia to a close. The present volumes, Readings Paradiso (Macmillan, 21s.), consist of text, translation, commentary, and full critical and exegetical notes. The of editions of the Paradiso within the last few years is app in inverse ratio to its popularity, which may be taken a that Dante scholars are resolved to bring in readers f highways and market places. Each commentator, feel the neglect of this poem is altogether undeserved, seeks reason for its non-popularity. Mr. Ruskin, in his pa way, said that the Inferno was preferred because its th more horrible and morbid; Mr. Butler sees in the incident and human interest the barrier that warns readers. And Mr. Vernon thinks that the poem may be to modern "unbelievers" because of its metaphys theology. This strikes us as an unfortunate remark. all to-day inevitably unbelievers in Ptolemaic Astrono very few even amongst Roman Catholics can accept ei science or theology which the poem expounds. But we do that this indifference can as a matter of fact be expl terms of belief: indeed the bibliography prefixed edition is itself a sufficient refutation of this sta Dante is studied and revered by men of all habits of m creed; and whatever the reason there can be little that the acceptance or non-acceptance of any religious fo does not supply the differentia. The difficulty is in the matter itself; for, although the poem abounds in lyrical of exquisite and delicate beauty, yet these can intellectually enjoyed when the architectonic con are known. Now that Dante is being read as a wh Paradiso will take its place along with the Infer Purgatorio, and students will work at the metaphys theology as an intellectual exercise knowing that onl cost of this labour will the structure and grandeur of t be revealed. The difficulty is a purely intellectual on first instance, as much so as the study of the calcu conic sections. There can be no question that there a aridities in the Commedia regarded merely as a sensuous but the student will find even the arid places worth the ing if only for the lyric ardour which frets the textur poem as the sun's rays fret the morning mists. The tra is in no way remarkable, the object being to make the intelligible rather than to give a version which might pleasant reading to those ignorant of Italian. An it lays no claim to high literary excellence it least clear and workmanlike, as the following passage the best known in the whole Comedy—will show.

"Thou wilt have to abandon everything belov tenderly, and that is the shaft which the bow of exile let fly (i.e., the first sorrow of exile). Thou wilt experience how bitter (lit. salt) tastes the bread of oth what a wearisome pathway it is to have to go up a other people's stairs. And what will lie heaviest shoulders will be evil and senseless companions wi politics of his time was something more than negative. Sometimes the translation falls below the level of the notes. For instance, after reading that "svernare" has two meanings (1) to hibernate, and (2) to sing in the spring (as in xxviii., l. 118), that is, to un-winter, we turn to the translation of

> "L'Altro ternaro. . . .
> Perpetualemente Osanna sverna," only to find the beautiful metaphor entirely veiled in

> "The next Triad . . is perpetually singing Hosannah."

Similarly, in the translation, the wind which leaves the sky "splendido and sereno" is called the North West; but in the two passages referred to in the notes from Virgil and Boethius it is the North East wind which clears the skies. Sometimes an infelicitous word mars a whole sentence. "When they descended into the flower from rank to rank they deposited something of the peace and burning love which they had won while they fanned their sides."

Again, for a defect of another type, take the translation of

> Ciò che non more, e ciò che può morire
> Non è se non splendor di quella idea
> Che partorisce, amando, il nostro Sire.
> (xiii., 52-55.)

"That which cannot die, and that which can die, are naught else but the beaming of that Idea to which our Sovereign Lord in His Love gives birth (i.e., things both corruptible and incorruptible are the emanation of Love in the Mind of God)." Does not the Italian mean, in effect, that all things organic and inorganic are made according to the conceptual model or form existing in the mind of God, and that therefore all things are copies, or reflections of that form and not a beaming of or emanation from it? If so, the above translation does not bring out the full meaning of "splendor."

If, however, Mr. Vernon's translation sometimes falls below the level of his own notes he can tell of many pitfalls avoided. Such an one is concealed in "mescere"; how many translators have resisted turning this by "to mingle," whereas the true meaning is "to pour out," as Mr. Vernon conclusively shows by examples of its use in Tuscany. Also how natural to translate "Solvi il tuo caldo disio" by "Unloose thy warm desire," before we have read (p. 137) that "solvere il disio" = "saziare il disio," and that accordingly the meaning is "Satisfy thy ardent wish."

We are sorry that Mr. Vernon did not write for this volume an introductory note on Thomas Aquinas' philosophy, so much of it at least as is necessary for understanding the Paradiso; as it is, the reader who is supposed to be unable to understand Italian is expected to read mediæval philosophy in mediæval Latin.

Cary's Translation.

The chief merit of Cary's translation of the "Divine Comedy" is the notes, and now that these notes have been revised for an edition of Cary in Messrs. Methuen's "Little Library" by Mr. Paget Toynbee, who has also entirely rewritten the purely biographical part of the life, the young Dante reader may accept unreservedly the facts and figures as giving the latest conclusions of expert students. The INFERNO (1s. 6d.) is well printed and is much more attractive than the editions of this classic with which we are all familiar. It is a pity, however, that the engraving for the frontispiece is taken from the picture in the Duomo at Florence of Domenico di Michelino, as this is the third time it has been used recently. Would it not be well to literary world at the beginning of the nineteenth fessed in a letter to Cary that she could see no famous simile (canto iii., 79-85), a translation of w sent her. In another letter she expresses w

"longevity of Dante's fame." Horace Walpole's c Inferno is equally curious. "Extravagant, absu in short a Methodist Parson in Bedlam." To Scot the poem appeared unhappy and "the personal strange mode of revenge, presumptuous and unint was not until after Coleridge had made spe (February, 1818) in one of his lectures to the "tra its success was assured. The frontispiece is fro of a drawing of the Bargello fresco before it was all recognition by the painter Marini.

Dr. Carlyle's Translation.

When Dr. John Carlyle hit upon the idea of text of the Inferno, together with a translation, notes, he was told that he would "make a pick book such as has not been seen in this country." classic translation (first edition, 1849, second, 1 Oelsner, by permission of Messrs. George Bell and his edition of the INFERNO (Temple Classics, 1s. 6 in plan and form with the Paradiso in the sa Oelsner is responsible for the notes and for the sl in the translation made necessary by the rejection reading; but all such changes are enclosed brackets. Two very illuminating short essays steed are appended, dealing with the "Chrono Sin-System of the Inferno—a fuller treatment of ject will be found in an appendix to his and Ma
"Essays on Dante," being translations from D
"Dante-Forschungen." We have noted the followi "porte" for "porta," p. 38. Par. xv. for P
"rutishness" for "brutishness," p. 395; and "
,"Incontro," p. 101.

Biographies of Dante.

Mr. Paget Toynbee draws almost entirely DANTE (Methuen, 3s. 6d. n.) from the Florent and biographers Villani, Compagni, Boccaccio, supplements their mainly narrative matter with the writings of modern Dante specialists, on the fessedly, that a thing once well said ought to whole rather than said again less well. The litt of good things, and the general reader will find t from Villani particularly delightful, quite ap interest he might have in Dante. Considering already some half-dozen thoroughly sound Engl the poet, it might appear that room for this ne granted grudgingly; but it deserves a place selections, which are long enough to express so grave charm and child-like interest in life's chronicle historians, to say nothing of the use m volume on the Original Portraits of Dante and Ric Rifugio di Dante," which have been taxed heavil ness to the account of Dante's Remains at Rave discussion on the "Mask," the supposed Giotto f portraits of the poet. The story of Dante's life ceding his exile is related with great precision, alt should have added an interrogation mark to the s while Dante was still absent at Rome, the maker' Charles arrived in Florence." Mr. T

Teutonic invaders. Emperor and Pope, Ghibelline and Guelf, and later Whites and Blacks, all play their part in this struggle; but it is not until we are in possession of this illuminating principle that we are able to discover the vital elements in the conflict. If Dean Church's account is retained it is scarcely fair to the "general reader" to pass on to the Buondelmonti incident of 1215 without comment, seeing that an acute stage in this civil war was probably reached a hundred years before on the death of Matilda, Countess of Tuscany. Later on, Mr. Toynbee plunges us into the Bianchi and Neri dispute in this manner:—

> Florence at the time of Dante's election to the priorate was in a dangerous state of ferment owing to the recent introduction from Pistoja of the factions of the Blacks and the Whites, which divided the Guelf party in Florence into two opposite camps, and were the occasion of frequent brawls and bloodshed in the streets;

and adds,

> These factions, according to the old chroniclers, originated in Pistoja in a feud between two branches of the Cancellieri, a Guelf family of that city, &c.

We ask, is it quite fair to the "general reader" for whom Mr. Toynbee has written this book to give the idea that the febrile condition of Florence at this time can be explained in terms of merely accidental irruptive forces? It is not that the naïve accounts of Dino Compagni and others are not needed; but just as the author adopts modern critical methods in discussing the portraits of the poet, so one naturally expects that here and there a corrective principle, gathered from the modern historians, would be slipped quietly into a footnote or incorporated in an introductory paragraph. Many readers, we feel sure, will date their interest in mediæval literature, politics, and life from their reading of this book, even if that interest does not urge them to the special study of Dante's writings.

The tenth volume of YALE STUDIES IN ENGLISH is a translation of the Lives of Dante by Boccaccio and Bruni (The Earliest Lives of Dante, H. Holt and Co., New York), by J. R. Smith, of Yale. The translation from Boccaccio is the first complete version in English, as Mr. Wicksteed omitted from his volume "certain disquisitions, inserted by Boccaccio in his Life of Dante," containing neither "biographical material nor bearing upon any disputed points in Dante's character." Of Bruni's life, besides the present translation and Mr. Wicksteed's, there is another, still unprinted, which was read for the first time at the Walworth Free Library on the occasion of the unveiling of a bust of Dante. The short account given by Filippo Villani (before 1348-c.1404) of Dante's unsuccessful Embassy to Venice is also included. According to Villani it was from the effects of a fever caught during this journey that Dante died at Ravenna a few days after his return. The text used for the Boccaccio is Macri-Leone's edition, 1888, and for the Bruni, Lombardi's, 1822.

A Commentary on the Commedia.

Commentaries detached from the narrative and music of the original seem, like the Shades in the Sixth Cornice of "Purgatory," "twice dead" (cose rimorte), thrusting upon the reader ashes for beauty and the heaviness of learning for art, but only apparently, for—pace Mr. Lang—a highly allusive poem unannotated is at best a fragment. Neither æsthetic sensitiveness nor intelligence can, unaided by scholarship, hold the pass of interpretation. Dante over and over again bids his to increase his intellectual enjoyment of the poem and e deepen its sensuous charm. By means of summaries, t of difficult passages, topographical, biographical, a phical notes the author succeeds in attaining his prin making "Dante's meaning clear to the reader of his p an average there are six pages of commentary to ev but surely space might have been found for ma diagrams, and an index of proper names—although sim followed is Dr. Moore's, for which Mr. Paget Toynbe a very admirable index, Mr. Tozer has evidently another an unnecessary luxury.

As the space at our disposal forbids detailed critic comment merely on a few matters which the turning o suggested. Mr. Tozer translates Canto ii., ll. 43-5, of t as follows:—"There (in Heaven, where Christ is pre two Natures) that verity which we hold by faith will b by means of a process of reasoning, but will be self-e

DANTE IN RAVENNA.
[Reproduced from the Gold Medal Statue by F. Derwent Wood the primary truths which man believes," adding, in e of the final clause, "it will be known by Intuition primary truths as the sense of personality, of right a &c., which come to us without any conscious process ing. Our knowledge will then be immediate, not But surely Messrs. Wicksteed and Oelsner are right in Again, why is no reference made to Mr. Butler's fascinating appendix to his edition of the Purgatorio on the dreams in Cantos IX., XIX., and XXVII.? The explanation there given differs so essentially from the orthodox interpretation that at the least the author might have alluded to it. On what authority does Mr. Tozer translate "Non vede più dall'uno all'altro stilo" (Purgatorio, Canto XXIV., l. 62) by "finds no further distinction than this between the two styles"? Again, why in the face of Mr. Gardner's note is "e risplende" translated by "yet it shines"? In conclusion, why do Mr. Tozer and other commentators quote Aristotle from the Greek text rather than from the Latin translation with which Dante was probably familiar?

The Cornell Collection.

In the CATALOGUE OF THE CORNELL DANTE COLLECTION PRESENTED BY WILLARD FISKE, compiled by Theodore W. Koch (Ithaca, New York), the story of this collection is interestingly told by Mr. Fiske himself. In his search for Petrarch books in April, 1892, Mr. Fiske came across a copy of the last Stagnino Edition of the Divina Commedia bearing the date 1536. He purchased the book and sent it to the Cornell University Library. This was the earliest acquired volume of the collection—now numbering some 7,000—above catalogued. Later he visited the book marts of Europe and purchased every Dante book he could get hold of and forwarded it to the University. In an incredibly short time the library reached its present colossal proportions. "My gift," he modestly observes, "of such a considerable collection to Cornell University was thus really the result of my unwillingness to refrain from a delectable self-indulgence, or, in other words, of my inability to evade temptation and free myself from the enthralling spell of bibliomania. This robs the giver of any special credit and renders gratitude unmeet. One might as well laud—or thank—the prodigal spendthrift for the sums he expends in his rounds of dissipation." One wishes that some other bibliomaniac would in a like spirit spend his wealth and leisure for London's sake, the University of which owns some half dozen Dante books. The catalogue runs to 600 pages, and besides the usual catalogue information contains occasional criticisms, the names and dates of the journals in which reviews and letters on disputed passages occur, and a valuable appendix of 30pp. dealing with iconography alone. As an example of the thoroughness with which the work of cataloguing has been done we select the following under "Blake."

> Blake, William. Illustrations of Dante; seven plates designed and engraved by W. Blake.
>
> In Alex Gilchrist's Life of Blake, 1863, vol. I., pp. 331-335, is given an account of Blake's work on Dante, with a small cut of the illustrations to Inf. XXXIII., 79, and in vol. II., pp. 216-223, a descriptive list of ninety-eight Dante sketches mostly unfinished. Plate 13 in Volkmann's "Iconografia dantesca," 1897, reproduces the illustration to Inf. XXV.; see also pp. 97-99 of the latter work. See also Yeat's W. B. William Blake and his Illustrations to the Divine Comedy, 1896.

It will be seen that this catalogue is invaluable to Dante students and deserves a place next to Toynbee's Dante Dictionary.

No sale-room glamour surrounds the name of Victor Hugo. He did not play at printing as did Robert Louis Stevenson, nor, save for their plates, are works by him eagerly sought. Not for the last fourteen years at any rate have copies of "Odes et Poésies," 1822, and "Han d'Islande," 1823, the two earliest works from his pen, occurred at auction in this country. In 1899 an editio princeps of "Les Misérables," 1862, a work issued in ten languages, was valued at £1 11s., this indicative, for one thing, of the considerable number of copies in existence. A

OTHER NEW BOOK

The Garden.

"It is with a sort of angry helplessness, instinctive feeling of self-defence, that one tu accumulated, such elaborate horrors, and tries to whatever little pursuit happens to lie nearest So speaks Miss Emily Lawless in A GARDEN DI 7s. 6d. n.). The diary extends from September, September following, and, unfortunately for the the period of our most lamentable disasters in So relationship is of the author's rather than of ou robs the book of merit from the point of view It is a diary with an occasional reference to the gar portion of the book is made up of trite comments African war, and we quite sympathize with "V when asked if there was "anything fresh," ende the authoress's chatter about "regrettable" more profitable channel by asking, "Is Ane flower with you yet?" What is said about the g said before and what is said about the war need n Miss Lawless is, moreover, none too careful to phrases, and even her quotations, such as "the r all the fulness thereof," are misquoted. She much of a gardener or she would not confess tha called a weed by its proper botanical name in her couch-grass, the common and easily-overcome gardeners, was too much for her. It is a book of with easy references to Ojibway Indians and p questions such as "These Crowfoots—why no crowfeet?" Crow's feet, perhaps, but never cro

A BOOK OF FLOWERS, by Nellie Benson an (Grant Richards, 1s. 6d.), is the seventh of the " for children. In the preface Eden Coybee th Hilderic Friend for his delightful book on Flower Lore," but it is to small purpose. The b tains a very few pages of text printed in larg literary matter is of the smallest importance. It by twenty or more drawings printed in colours. represents with moderate faithfulness a flower flower there is a child. It is an affectation of sim please the idle eye. It is misleading to place daisy between winter jasmine and the snowdrop. reasonable relation whatever.

Mrs. Leslie Williams in her A GARDEN (John Lane, 5s. n.) gives a pleasant and chatty acco and successes in an ordinary "oblong" garden If she is content to move in more generally than Mr. Wells in his "Suburban Garden," enthusiastic, and this chronicle of her trials and pleasant reading for other workers in like case. but scanty honour in this Eden, and as the Dri figures in mock severity before the reader. gardener at heart, and he likes his gardening more or less, as circumstances allow, but ce minimum of cost; whereas the true garden enth incapable of thrift in face of a seed list or ca modest list of plants forming a suggested colle cold greenhouse is to be commended as a sens for a first attempt at glass gardening, and chapter "About buying Plants" will still

Mr. Cook has spared no pains in compiling this book. Among many excellent chapters one may perhaps be allowed to select three—those on Bulbous Plants, the Rock Garden, and Roses. These are mines of information, and with the precise directions and clear diagrams given every reader should be inspired to take his own Rose cuttings and even attempt his own budding. The directions for the Cultivation of Fruit, again with the help of careful diagrams, are particularly clear and apposite, and should be of much assistance to the gardener in grafting and pruning. Insect pests, soils, manures are in turn treated trenchantly by Mr. Cook, and a collection of Useful Hints will save many a heartache to the enthusiastic amateur who too often gains his experience first hand. A Calendar of simple monthly work and a Gardening Chart bring this valuable work to a close, the latter admirably fulfilling the purpose of the author, "to compress as much useful information into as small a space as possible and to give the beginner a ready guide to matters of garden importance." The illustrations are plentiful and whole-page reproductions are given on almost alternate pages, and should serve as incentives to effort when showing the perfection attainable by careful cultivation. The pictures in the chapter on Bulbous Plants are perhaps as pleasing as any, but with such a wealth of choice it is difficult to make a special selection.

FICTION.

A Non-Combatant.

ARROWS OF THE ALMIGHTY (Macmillan, 6s.) is a powerful book, in some ways. The title, for example, is rather forcible; the green and white cover, with golden arrows bursting from the clouds, arrests the eye at some little distance. You open the book, and find a first chapter of disappointing Baltimore flirtation, slangy, with no apparent motive, in an aggressively American style. Possibly you stop here—and miss a book that is worth reading. For Mr. Owen Johnson has got hold of some interesting characters, and has contrived to paint in John Gaunt a decidedly uncommon portrait of the strong and silent man. He exploits at least one fundamental trait of humanity not often handled by the novelist. And, since we must have the American Civil War once again—the backbone of four-fifths of present day American literature—he displays some little originality in placing his hero in the Commissariat department, and some ingenuity in proving to us that there may be at least as much action and interest in this usually despised position as at the front. John Gaunt's methods with the fraudulent contractor (who was very much to the fore about that time) provide plenty of exciting reading, and expose him to quite a sufficient amount of personal danger. Mr. Johnson handles his love-scenes prettily. His English is—very American. But he has the essential qualities of a story-writer. We grow to feel a certain affection for some of his characters—which is always a good test of their drawing—and Marjory is a very charming heroine. The conclusion is not original, but it is satisfactory, and it would be difficult to suggest a better way. The book has already, apparently, had some success in America.

An American Novel.

Mr. Edgar Fawcett's NEW YORK (Sands, 6s.) is a painstaking

let him read the first fifty pages of "New York." undertake that, no matter how high his spirits, reduced to a normal state. The author is not always but he is quite skilful enough to make us miserable. George is at last to be made happy with Doris Jessel to rejoice. George and Doris have worked in the stricken districts of New York for many days, and aft experiences this is how the woman speaks:—

> "I have been thinking of all the mad sin George, over yonder, beneath some of those dim of the folly, too—the infinite selfishness—fashi struggling pretension, overbearing plutocracy, st aristocracy. I have been thinking how evil thri good lies abased. All the darkness and melancho pierced me! And yet I cannot despair. The change, George, however long delayed. It may tak in coming, but the real result is sure. I will tell She leaned closer to him, with parted lips. "Al all that gross worldliness there are higher, wis spirits at work. I know of one—so do you know of

A woman of such pretentious style will hardly be but the author of "New York" appears to believe i can congratulate Mr. Fawcett on one more exam earnestness and sincerity, but there are other gift humour for example, which would be of equal servi intense "purposefulness" displayed in this work.

Madame Jeannette.

Some years ago Mr. G. S. Street produced a "The Wise and the Wayward," in which he exposed sub-cynical fashion, the meanness and folly of h general and of one self-satisfied lady in particul neatly and smartly done, and on the whole, it did n too unpleasant aftertaste, because Mr. Street has grace of humour, which is capable of casting a fr over much that less dexterous hands might mak But here comes "Lucas Cleeve" with PLATO'S H (John Long, 6s.), and proceeds to tell very much the in a less pleasing manner. In the place of Mildr who was a creation, we have Amelia Ventry, monstrosity—and not at all the sort of monstrosity respecting people would care to meet. Lucas Cleeve for character; she has drawn the Rollit family vivi if bitterly; but she spoils her picture, in our think too common fault of using too pronounced colours, persistently at bold effects, and the result is too of violence. The same error of judgment is apparent in of writing. Sometimes her desire to be forcible at leads her to write high-flown nonsense—"when the swelping in the roseid ooze," we read on page 45, fo As for the story itself, it is a tragedy that, told restraint, would have been more moving. There is a of acuteness in the psychology, and a good deal of op phrasemaking, and a perpetual straining after smart clever, and will very likely find a good many rea does not leave a pleasant taste in the mouth.

Fraternia.

Fiction has not infrequently dealt with the subj model colony in some form or other, and A WOMAN DAY, by Caroline A. Mason (Hodder and Stoughton, 6 it truthfully and unsparingly, and not without force a Burgess, and his mother are excellent. John Gregory, the revivalist preacher turned working reformer, is a commanding figure, perhaps not quite adequately realized. The Ingrahams are admirable, with the exception of Oliver, whose air of melodramatic villainy is rather out of place in so serious a picture, for the book is pitched in a sober key. It will hardly be popular, but it is a sound piece of work.

Anatole France in English.

M. Anatole France is, of all modern French writers, the most difficult to translate into English. Perhaps that is why publishers have shown so little desire to publish translations of his books—though we had "The Crime of Sylvestre Bonnard" in 1891. Readers who enjoy M. Anatole France can, as a rule, read French authors in the original. Still, many who do not read French would be glad to know more of M. Anatole France, and they will be grateful to Mr. Charles Carrington, the Parisian publisher, for giving them an English version of THAIS, the most perfect, perhaps, in form of the numerous works of M. Anatole France. The translator would probably be the first to acknowledge that he has not quite conveyed the essence of the writer's style, but he has given us a sincere piece of work, one that will enable English readers to get a notion of the abundance of ideas and felicity of phrase which mark this history of the penitent courtesan. There is a good introductory sketch of the author, with a list and an appreciation of his works. In format this version of "Thais" is far superior to the French edition.

Bedlam Broken Loose.

Mr. F. T. Jane is a remarkable writer. We have read a good many of his works, and we have come to the conclusion that, when once fairly started on a story, he loses all control over himself. At the beginning everything goes well enough. Here, for example, in EVEN MOUTS (Macqueen, 6s.) Mr. Jane has apparently sat down with a copy of "Lorna Doone" in front of him and the fixed determination of producing a Devonshire romance after the manner of Mr. Blackmore. For the first chapter or so he adheres to this laudable resolve, and we have quite a promising scene. But then begins the story, and Mr. Jane grows madder and madder; his dialect becomes more and more pronounced; there is the most astonishing mixture of modern slang and rustic Devonshire; his characters play hide and seek among church tombs, attack each other with sword and pistol and any weapon that comes handy, and pay generally no more attention to the laws of the realm than if they were living in the Middle Ages. Mr. Jane mingles farce and tragedy together, and the worst is he does not seem to know which is tragedy and which farce. The central idea of the story is sound enough. In capable hands it might have been made quite interesting. But the author has chosen to let loose an asylum of lunatics in his pages, and it becomes quite impossible to take their actions seriously. There is a pretty frontispiece by the author, for Mr. Jane can draw considerably better than he can write.

Miss Florence Warden.

ONCE TWO OFTEN (John Long, 6s.) masquerades as a novel, which is, to put it mildly, not quite fair upon the reading public, since it is merely a collection of three stories of that awkward length which cannot fairly be described either as long or short. Miss Florence Warden is the author, and the stories in themselves are much what might be expected from her practised hand, which is to say that they aim at curdling the blood, that

OBITUARY.

THE BISHOP OF DURHAM.

With the death of the Bishop of Durham, whi Saturday last at Auckland Castle, the last of the friends, theological and episcopal, has passed Lightfoot and Archbishop Benson, both his juni
Dr. Westcott had still several years of active wo With his death a particular generation, and a of theological writers seems to have ended.
ness hardly say, another distinguished man, was more particularly linked with that of Dr. W private pupil, he, like Archbishop Benson, had Dr. Hort. A fifth name, not so well known, respected and beloved, might be added, that of Ellerton, once Rector of Barnes, a hymn-writer literary gifts and a man of singular charm of char long friend of Dr. Hort.

Brooke Foss Westcott was the son of Mr. F Westcott, a scientific man and secretary to Gardens at Birmingham. He was born in 18
Edward's School he was four years the senior o remembered in later years with what awe he used first class saying their lesson, Westcott leaning hand, "the only boy who was permitted this clear that Westcott, as well as Benson and Ligh lifelong inspiration from that king of schoolmaste
It may not be fanciful to trace to the same influe istics which were shared by the three friends, in so very unlike—the preference of Greek to Lat excessive care for the minutiæ of verbal schol different ways, the failure to attain to a genu English literary style. In each case, in the three impressive writers, effect was produced by w to be said, not by the manner in which it was sai unpolished, almost rough, directness, Bens quaintnesses of phrase, and Westcott's elabor minute and mystical, seemed at times to obscur ness of the message which they desired to express

These three, with Dr. Hort, were the most promi indeed the leaders, of what came to be known as School, on which they impressed in a remarkable prominent of their own characteristics. This scho had warm recognition in Germany as well as a speaking races, was in a sense the correlative school of historians, the school of Stubbs and Green and Bryce. It was not primarily conc interested in, history at all. It may seem at ti have lacked historical discrimination. On the oth equally accurate in investigation, and its investig more minute. It broke new ground in the detaile of manuscripts, in textual criticism, and in exhaus
How far it was pioneer rather than permanent seen. Critical questions have entered upon a stag on which Lightfoot and Hort and Westcott did y
But the work that they did forms a distinct theological literature of the nineteenth century.

Dr. Westcott's career combined the four diffe of labour in which an English clergyman finds o service. He was for twelve years a parish priest, years an assistant master, for twenty years a of the place and work of Cathedrals in the corporate life of the Church. As a University Professor he exercised an influence as profound, though not perhaps as popular, as that of Lightfoot. His appointment in 1890, at the age of sixty-five, to the great see of Durham was a choice, like Lord Beaconsfield's of Dr. Lightfoot, thoroughly justified by the result. Dr. Westcott revealed, as Bishop of Durham, unsuspected gifts as a ruler and a remarkable power of dealing with critical social questions. His interests indeed were markedly special. This may be seen in many of his books and notably in his later expositions, probably the clearest and most directly impressive things that he wrote, of the principles of the Christian Social Union, of which he was President. Side by side with his social, may be placed his very keen missionary interest. This in its literary aspect may be traced in what is perhaps his greatest literary success, the "Religious Thought in the West" Here we can give it no more than a passing allusion.

The main literary work of Dr. Westcott's life falls into two classes, textual and exegetical. Of the former the great monument is the edition of the New Testament in the original Greek with introduction and appendix, written in conjunction with Dr. Hort, and published originally in 1881. This was one of the few books of the last century to which the term "epoch-making" may be applied without exaggeration. While even now it is too soon to estimate its ultimate influence it may be certainly said that it will stand side by side with that of the Novum Instrumentum of Erasmus. The method of textual criticism adopted was distinctly one of induction. The lines on which it proceeded have been, we may venture to say, in spite of the vigorous persistence of still living opponents, generally accepted by scholars.

While the work that Dr. Westcott thus did in conjunction with Dr. Hort will probably be of more permanent stability, his more purely literary undertakings were naturally more popular. His "History of the New Testament Canon," his "Bible in the Church," and his "Introduction to the Study of the Gospel" have each of them at least some elements of enduring value, though the last does not occupy the same position in relation to critical questions of the day that it did when it was published thirty years ago. His commentaries on the Gospel and the Epistles of St. John and on the Epistle to the Hebrews have a combination of merits which will secure for them a long life. These are, besides the care with which the text is prepared (though in the case of the Gospel we have no full text from the editor's hand), the extraordinary minuteness of investigation and comparison with which the exact shade of meaning that may be attached to each word is elicited or suggested, and the singular beauty of poetic and spiritual insight with which the meaning of the writers is elucidated. Sometimes it must be felt that in his passion for correspondences, and correlations, and parallelisms, Dr. Westcott tends rather to overlay than to illustrate the text; but it is impossible to deny that no commentator has shown a more deeply sympathetic insight into the hearts—if it may be so expressed—of the Biblical writers than he shows in regard to the enthusiastic poetic spirit of the Evangelist and the prophetic and expository fire of the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews. Particular interpretations may seem to be too elaborate, or at times incomplete or perverse, but as a whole the work is that of a scholar who both in accuracy and in sympathy reached the point of genius.

Writing of Dr. Benson and their youth together, Bishop Westcott said "We saw visions, as is the privilege of young-

"Westcott and Hort" first appeared in two volumes twent ago, and four years later came in a smaller edition in one v It has always sold steadily in both forms, while the edition has been reprinted no fewer than nine times s first appearance in 1885. In the more expensive two- edition it now appears with the correction of a few erra the addition of some supplementary notes required discovery of various important documents since the first was published. "For the rest," wrote Dr. Westcott preface to the last edition, "I may be allowed to say arguments have been advanced against the general pl maintained in the introduction, and illustrated in the since the publication of the first edition which we considered by Dr. Hort and myself in the long course work, and in our judgment, dealt with adequately." Dr cott's first book "Elements of Gospel Harmony"—e into the "Introduction to the Study of the Four Gospel in its eighth edition—was published just half a century a won the Morrisian Prize. Most of his other earlier boo also classics; his "General Survey of the History of the of the New Testament"—his second publication, 185 its seventh edition; "The Bible in the Church," 1864 tenth edition; "The Gospel of the Resurrection," 186 sixth edition; and "The Revelation of the Risen Lor fifth edition. His Essays in "The History of Religious T in the West," which appeared as a volume in the "Eve Series (1891), as well as in several ordinary editions, were i as fragments of a design which he formed very early in l idea being "that a careful examination of the re teaching of representative prophetic masters of the We help towards a better understanding of the Power of the Ch Creed." Several of these Essays appeared in the C porary Review as long ago as the sixties. Among hi works published by Macmillan are his Commentaries on St Epistles and the Epistle to the Hebrews; his volume of s "On the Religious Office of the Universities," 1873, Strength to Strength," 1891—three sermons in memory of schoolfellow, friend, and predecessor in the Bisho Durham, Dr. Lightfoot; "The Historic Faith," 1890, edition), "Christus Consummator," 1887 (third ed "Social Aspects of Christianity," 1887; "The Gospel of 1893; "The Incarnation and Common Life," 1893 "Christian Aspects of Life," 1897—most of which have b printed. Messrs. Macmillan also publish a volume of selectio the writings of Dr. Westcott, edited by the Rev. S. Philli entitled "Thoughts on Revelation and Life." "The Par Psalter," arranged by Dr. Westcott for the use of ch published by the Cambridge University Press; and his on "The Gospel According to St. John," reprinted "The Speaker's Commentary," by Mr. Murray.

LIBRARY NOTES.

The University of Tokio has acquired the library of t Professor Max Müller, which includes some unique S manuscripts and many fine illustrated works. As public could not be voted for its purchase, the Japanese Par being in recess, Baron Isawaki generously purchased an sented the collection. So another important library England, and it is time to recognize that the East in competition for knowledge with us. America has a many literary treasures from this country, and now a still young in western ways, enters the arena.

The annual meeting of the Library Association, to at Plymouth this month, promises to be successful. Amo subjects to be treated are "Modern book productio affects libraries," "Reference Libraries," "Technical tions," and "Methods of Cataloguing"—a subject on "quot homines, tot sententiæ" is the rule.

Among the questions discussed at the meeting of the cient mental food. Numerous cases each containing from fifty to one hundred volumes have been shipped to South Africa, to form travelling libraries among the hospitals. The books have been purchased, by means of Lady Sarah Wilson's fund, after very careful selection. This matter of selection is important, for although the invalid, in his enforced quiescence, is ready to read almost anything, the rubbish which has been sent out in the name of charity is creditable neither to the hearts of the donors nor the heads of the recipients.

The foundation stone was laid on July 25 for a new Public Library in Wells-street, Camberwell. Lord Llangattock has presented the site, while the cost of the library will be defrayed by Mr. Passmore Edwards.

Preparatory to writing his life of Edward Edwards, Mr. Thomas Greenwood has been spending some time at Niton, Isle of Wight, where Edwards ended his days. He has also visited the place in Essex where Edwards' mother and sisters lived and died. It is not creditable to the library world that no single memorial exists of the fellow-worker of William Ewart in the founding of our public library system. Even his resting-place is unmarked, but Mr. Greenwood proposes to place a simple monument over the grave.

AMONG THE REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES.—I.

"The Tactics of the Submarine," since the recent exploits of the Gustave Zédé have revived interest in this subject, will no doubt be one of the most widely read articles in the Monthly Review. Mr. Hilliard Atteridge, the writer, has himself once been under water in a French submarine boat, or "submergible" boat as he would prefer to have it called. He is a firm believer in the future of the modern submarine, which he maintains should attack with everything but her dome immersed, and at night, thus doing away with the necessity of reconnoitring through that very imperfect engine, the periscope. Other possibilities of successful attack are opened up by the towing method, employed in the recent French manœuvres; and it has also been proposed to convey small submarines, of the Goubet type, on board of cruisers. Mr. Leslie Stephen contributes to the same number an essay "In Praise of Walking" that recalls now and then the delightful chapter on "Walking Tours" in "Virginibus Puerisque; while Mr. Nisbet Bain has an interesting article on "Maurus Jókai," and Mr. Havelock Ellis discourses on the respective abilities of the Fair and the Dark.

Macmillan's pursues its accustomed path, gathering flowers a little out of the beaten track. "The Letters of Elizabeth" are not concerned with the sprightly lady whose "Visits" appeared some little time ago, but with a certain Elizabeth Girling, daughter of a farmer at Weston in Norfolk, who flourished about 1796. The writer clips some pleasant extracts from her correspondence, addressed to various members of her family. "Sabrinae Corolla" is a dreamy essay on the Salopian atmosphere, rather prettily written, and Mr. H. T. Sheringham has a pleasant and interesting article on fly-fishing. In the same publishers' Temple Bar Mr. Crockett continues his serial, "The Firebrand," and Mr. J. R. Mozley contributes a personal note on the late T. E. Brown, poet, humorist, and master at Clifton.

Mr. Andrew Lang's musings in Longman's this month deal in his customary fashion with many varied topics—Mr. Howells and his views of literature in Society, one or two picturesque anecdotes in the field of Psychical Research, a few remarks on starving villagers by the organization of a num port companies, and the utilization of the g Punjab. Sir Hubert Jerningham continues his a Reminiscences," and Ada Cambridge has a "Thirty Years in Australia." An important by the Rev. William Greswell in "The Lan South Africa." He is all for the suppressio and the sole use of English as the official medi

The Italian Review contains an article on League, by "Argus," or, to give him his r Gaetano Lino. Italy was the first country to f in starting an association of this kind, but i have languished until the naval battles of Ca aroused interest and impressed public opinion.
Lino himself produced a book which treated o war—an Italian "Battle of Dorking," in fact, of on land, and to-day the league numbers some members. There is some talk now of holding sho of Italian maritime industries and commerci Milan. To the same number "Violet Fane" c —"Victoria."

Correspondenc

THE USE OF FOREIGN PH

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Your correspondent, Mr. A. Phip of July 22 on "Foreign Phrases," says th
'depôt' has no purpose." But this, surely, accent in "depôt" has an historical value, as the letter s has been omitted.

"Depôt" is, of course, derived from the
the past participle of which would be "depos

Our word "deposit" preserves the s, and doing.

I am, yours faithfully,
GEO

Grosvenor Club, Bond-street, W., July 29.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I am afraid I shall have to wait promised book for answers to most of my q say that I am convinced by the replies which second letter, but I will only make one rejoin

Mr. Phipson defends the diaeresis i "naivety" on the ground of usefulness, a cumflex in "depôt" on the ground of usele altogether at variance with him. "Depot" to the eye the word as it is generally pronoun should either amend his pronunciation, and amend his spelling and write "depo."

Yours faithfully,

AUTHORS AND PUBLI

The deepest sympathy has gone out to M the publishing firm of Messrs. George Be death of his daughter, Miss Mildred Bell, w the Alpine disaster last week. Mr. Bell w

"Memoirs and Letters of Sir James Paget." Edited by Stephen Paget, one of his sons. Longmans.

"The Life of Sir William Hunter." By F. H. Skrine. Longmans.

"Mary Rich (1625-1678), Countess of Warwick: Her Family and Friends." By C. Fell Smith. Longmans.

"Some Recollections of Henry Schomberg Kerr, R.N., S.J." By the Hon. Mrs. Maxwell-Scott, of Abbotsford. Longmans.

"The Women of the Salons, and other French Portraits" (including Madame de Staël, Madame d'Épinay, Madame de Sévigné, and the mother of Napoleon). By S. G. Tallentyre. Longmans.

"Noble Women of our Time" (twelve biographical studies). By F. D. How. Isbister.

"Robert Browning." By the Rev. Stopford Brooke. Isbister.

"Robert Louis Stevenson." By Graham Balfour. Methuen.

"The Life and Times of George Joachim Goschen, Publisher and Printer, of Leipzig, 1752-1829." By his grandson, Viscount Goschen. Murray.

"Felicia Skene, of Oxford." By Miss E. C. Richards. Murray.

"The Autobiography of Sir Harry Smith, of Aliwal." Edited by G. C. Moore Smith. Murray.

Mr. Thomas Wright of Olney—Cowper's biographer—is now busy writing "The Life of Edward FitzGerald." He has a large quantity of unpublished material relating to FitzGerald and his circle. Mr. Wright has, we understand, ascertained many new facts from Bedfordshire and Northamptonshire people who knew FitzGerald and his friends personally. Mr. Wright's large edition of "The Letters of William Cowper" will be published shortly by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton. It will contain practically two hundred more letters than Southey's edition. An edition of "The Letters of Daniel Defoe" are promised by the same author.

One of the most important books of the autumn season, so far as Messrs. Swan Sönnenschein are concerned, will be a "Victorian Anthology" under the editorship of Sir Mount Stuart Grant Duff, whose voluminous "Notes from a Diary" abound in personal references to the principal poets of the Victorian era. The coming volume will include a large collection of poetry, limited, however, to examples which Sir Grant Duff considers really representative. Where necessary there will be introductions to the different selections by the editor, who also contributes a general introduction to the volume, besides personal and descriptive notes. The living poets, as well as the dead, will be represented.

Mr. Walter Skeat, sometime scholar of Christ's College, Cambridge, and late of the Federated Malay States Service, will follow up "Malay Magic" (Macmillan), published last year, with a volume of translations entitled "Fables and Folk Tales from an Eastern Forest." The Cambridge University Press will publish it during the autumn, with illustrations by Mr. F. H. Townsend. The tales were taken down from the lips of the Malay peasantry during the Cambridge Expedition of 1899, through the remoter States of the Malay Peninsula.

Military books again promise to play a prominent part in the autumn publishing season. One announced by Messrs. Longmans—"Historical Record of the 14th (King's) Hussars"—takes us from 1715 to the present South African War, for which the regiment embarked at the end of 1899. The author is Colonel Henry Blackburn Hamilton, who served in the Afghan war as aide-de-camp to Sir Samuel Browne, and with his regiment in the Boer war of 1881, and now commands at Ventersdorp with the local rank of brigadier-general. "The War of Murray by Colonel John Biddulph, was not only the fa the Indian Army, but the man who first recognised the genius of Clive. Clive served under him at the cap Devicota in Tanjore in 1749, and it was on this occasi the friendship began which lasted between them throug Lawrence dying in London in 1775 very shortly after death. Hannah More wrote the epitaph on his tomb village church of Dunchideock, near Exeter, erected by t Family, who also set up the tall monument to his me Haldon Hill not far away. The monument in West Abbey—erected by the East India Company and surmou a bust of Lawrence by Taylor—bears the inscription:— Discipline established, Fortresses protected, Sett extended, French and Indian Armies defeated and restored in the Carnatic." A few letters of Lawre included in the British Museum Addit. MSS.

Our congratulations to Mr. Anstey on the hap performance of his Man from Blankley's at the Prince of W It is probably owing to the success of the dramatized that Messrs. Longmans have just announced a new and edition of Mr. Anstey's book, "The Man from Blankle Other Sketches," with the illustrations, by Mr. Partridge, which must have simplified the task of putt piece on the stage. The work originally appeared in Pun was republished in book form eight years ago.

Mr. Herbert A. Farley will, in future, represent Sir Pitman and Sons, Ltd., in the provinces, and will tra commercial, shorthand, and elementary school publications firm in succession to the late Mr. E. W. Tyrrell, w suddenly in June last. The leading feature of the sh publications next autumn will be the revised edition "Instructor" ready in September next.

"A Short History of the Hebrews to the Roman P by the Rev. R. L. Ottley, will be published on the 20th i the Cambridge University Press. In dealing with the patr and nomadic times the author has followed the plan of K his "History of the Hebrews." Seven maps are include Helen Mathers is issuing immediately her novel, Wildfire," at 1s., paper, type, and number of page identical with the 6s. edition, the only difference being cover, which is of cardinal red paper.

Messrs. Longmans' new list is peculiarly strong in b psychical research. Beside the long-expected work i volumes on "Human Personality, and its Survival after D by the late Frederic Myers, they announce a book b Horace G. Hutchinson on "Dreams and their Meani which he reviews the various theories and speculatio dreams, and a volume on "Intuitive Suggestion," by Thomas, author of "Spiritual Law in the Natural World."

Among the other new books announced by Longmans are "The Epistles of Erasmus, from his E Letters to his Fifty-second Year, Arranged in Order of Time English translations being printed with a commentary con the chronological arrangement and supplying furthe graphical matter—by Francis Morgan Nichols; two v by the late Dr. Creighton, "The Church and the Natio a reprint of a memoir of Sir George Grey, privately pri 1884, with the memorial sermon preached by Dr. Creig Embleton Church, Northumberland, on December 23, 18 an introduction by Sir Edward Grey; "The Old Pal Whitehall" by Dr. Edgar Sheppard; "Leisurable St by the Rev. T. H. Passmore; "The Ministry of Grac the Bishop of Salisbury; "Ordination Addresses," by t

Books to look out for at once.

"American Diplomatic Questions." By J. B. Henderson. Macmillan. 14s. net.
[Deals with the dispute over the Fur Seals and Behring Sea Award; the Inter-Oceanic Canal Problem; the relations of the United States and Samoa; the Monroe Doctrine and the question of the North-east Coast Fisheries.]

"The Origin of Thought." By D. Nickerson. Paul. 6s. net.

"Fortune's Darling." By Walter Raymond. Methuen. 6s.

"A Prose and a Dreamer." By Nelson Lloyd. Heinemann. 6s.

"Episode of a Desert Island." By Author of "Miss Molly." J. Murray. 2s. 6d. net.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

ARCHÆOLOGICAL.

ROMAN PUBLIC LIFE. By A. H. J. Greenidge. 8 × 5¼. 683 pp. Macmillan. 10s. 6d.

ART.

ANIMAL STUDIES. No. I. By C. Reid Wishaw. 7½ × 9½. Stewart. 1s.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE SAINTS AND MISSIONARIES OF THE ANGLO-SAXON ERA. Second Series. By the Rev. D. C. O. Adams. 7½ × 5. 431 pp. Mowbray. 6s. n.

EDUCATIONAL.

EUCLID'S ELEMENTS OF GEOMETRY. Books I.-V., VI. and XI. Ed. by C. Smith and Sophie Bryant. 7 × 4¾. 460 pp. Macmillan. 4s. 6d.

COMMERCIAL EDUCATION AT HOME AND ABROAD. By F. Heorer and J. Graham. 7½ × 5. 267 pp. Macmillan. 6s.

FICTION.

THE STORY OF EVA. By Will Payne. 7¾ × 5¼. 378 pp. Constable. 6s.

THE WOOING OF SHEILA. By Grace Rhys. 7¾ × 5. 301 pp. Methuen. 6s.

THE COWARD. By R. L. Jefferson. 8 × 5¼. 296 pp. Ward Lock. 6s.
[A novel of [illegible] by the author of "Across Siberia on a Bicycle."]

ZYLGRAHOF and Other Stories. By J. C. Shannon. 7¾ × 6. 161 pp. Simpkin Marshall. 2s. 6d.

ALICE OF OLD VINCENNES. By M. Thompson. 7¾ × 5¼. 419 pp. Cassell. 6s.
[A novel that has sold largely in the United States. It deals with the capture of Vincennes by Colonel George Clark during the American Revolution.]

THE SKIRTS OF HAPPY CHANCE. By H. B. Marriott Watson. 7¾ × 5¼. 325 pp. Methuen. 6s.
[A story of modern times full of whimsical adventure.]

HISTORY.

THE TRANSIT OF CIVILIZATION FROM ENGLAND TO AMERICA IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY. By E. Eggleston. 8½ × 5½. 344 pp. Hirschfeld.
[Contains an examination into the civilization of the seventeenth century, the mental outfit of the early colonists of America, and other kindred subjects.]

PRIMITIVE MAN. By Dr. M. Hoernes. (Temple Primers.) 6 × 4. 135 pp. Dent. 1s. n.
[A translation by Mr. James Loewe from the German of Professor Moriz Hoernes.]

LITERARY.

A COMMENTARY ON TENNYSON'S "IN MEMORIAM." By A. C. Bradley, LL.D. 7¾ × 5¼. 223 pp. Macmillan. 4s. 6d. n.

ROBERT BROWNING AS A RELIGIOUS PREACHER. By A. C. Pigou. 7¾ × 5¼. 132 pp. Cambridge University Press. 2s. 6d. n.

MEDICAL.

A MANUAL OF MEDICINE. Vol. III. Ed. by W. H. Allchin, M.D., &c. 8 × 5¼. 617 pp. Macmillan. 7s. 6d. n.

MISCELLANEOUS.

CRANKISMS. By Lisle de Vaux Matthewman. 6½ × 5. 100 pp. Philadelphia: Clarke. $1.00.

NATURAL HISTORY.

FAMILIAR BUTTERFLIES AND MOTHS. By W. F. Kirby, F.L.S., F.E.S. 9¼ × 7½. 144 pp. Cassell. 6s.
[A popular account of the more interesting British butterflies and moths, profusely illustrated with coloured plates.]

A JOURNEY TO NATURE. By J. P. Murray. 6½ × 5. 315 pp. Constable. 7s. 6d. n.

POETRY.

STRAY VERSES. By C. B. Doughty. 7 × 4¾. 80 pp. H. Marshall. 2s.
[A volume of verses by a clergyman on religious subjects.]

THE LAST MUSTER and other Poems. By J. S. Arkwright. (The Breviary Series.) 5 × 3½. 67 pp. Grant Richards. 3s. n.

GRANUAILE, A QUEEN OF THE WEST. By C. E. Pascoe. 7 × 5. 203 pp. Jarrold. 5s.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

MENASSEH BEN ISRAEL'S MISSION TO OLIVER CROMWELL, 1649-1655. Ed. by Lucian Wolf. 10½ × 7¼. 191 pp. Macmillan. 21s.

KENILWORTH. (School Ed. of Scott's Works.) 7½ × 5. 466 pp. Black. 1s. 6d.

THE STORY OF THE FAIR MAID OF PERTH. THE STORY OF ROB ROY. (Scott Readers for Young People.) 6¼ × 5. 87-86 pp. Black. 6d. each.

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

CHESS.

Address "Chess": Literature, Printing Hous

PROBLEM No. 208, by OTMAR NEMO, Vienna.

BLACK. 8 pieces.

WHITE. 8 pieces.

White to play and mate in three moves.

PROBLEM No. CARL KO

BLACK

WHITE.

White t

Problem No. 208, by Alfred de Musset.— — K at K Kt 8; R at K R 7; Kts at K 5 and (2 pieces)—K at K sq; Kt at Q Kt sq. Three

Problem No. 209, by W. A. Shinkman.— K at K B 3; Q at Q Kt 5; R at Q 6. Blac Q B 7; B at Q B 8; pawn at Q B 6. White

Problem No. 210, by W. A. Shinkman. K at K 2; Q at K R 6; R at K Kt 7; bishops at at Q B 6. Black (2 pieces) K at Q 4; pawn at

Solutions.—Problem 189, Jespersen (3 followed by Q–B 8, &c. No. 190, Lissner (191, L. Müller (3), key P–B 8 Kt. Thus: P×P; 2. R–Kt 4, &c. Key threatens 2. Q 3. R–Kt 4, mate. No. 192, Troitzky White R–K 5; 2. K–B 5, &c. No. 193, Warde No. 194, Obermann (3), 1. Q–R 2, P×R; 2. P Q–R 2. B–Kt 8; 2. Q–R 3, &c. Or 1. &c.; 2. P×P ch, &c. Near tries by Q– No. 195, Stratégie—White draws by 1. 2. Kt–Kt 6 ch, P×Kt; 3. R–R sq ch, is pat (stalemate). Other variations. No. Q–Q Kt sq. No. 197, Karstedt (3), key generally by 2. Q–Q 6 ch, P×Q; 3. B Reichelm—White wins by R–Q R 7, &c. "Vexillum," key Kt–K 6, threatening 2. Q

Correct solutions as follows:—M. L. Br 189, 193, 197; L. G. Hunt (Liverpool), 195, (Grand Rapids), 176, 177, 179 to 181, 183, J. D. Tucker (Ilkley), 193, 194, 196, 197; Ar 179, 182, 184, 191, 193; R. L. Antrobus, A. C. W. (Bromley), 175, 189 to 199; White P 175; W. M. Seely, 191.

Notes by Correspondents.—A. C. W. sends the follow 193, Reichelm.—1. R–Q R 7, R–K 3 (best); 2. K–B 5, R–K R 4. K–K 6, R–K 8 ch; 5. K–B 7, R–Q R 8 (?), 6. R–K 7 R–K 8 (best); 7. Kt–K 4, R–K Kt 8; 8. K–B 6, R–K 10. Kt–Kt 5 ch, K–R sq; 11. Kt–B 7 ch, K moves; R–R 8 mate. At move 8 it looks as if White could win the R 8. K–B 2; 9. Kt–R 6 ch, K–R 3; 10. R–R 8 ch, K–Kt 4; and draw. If Black Rook avoids K R 3, the following is the line 2. R–Q B 7, R–Q R 3; 4. R–Q Kt 7, R–Q B 3; 5. Kt–K B 6 K–Kt 2, 7. Kt–K 8 ch, &c. Of course, if Black Rook check follows and White wins easily. This is a very fascinating numerous chances of playing for stalemate. A complete analy but I think I have indicated the correct play in some of the che

Game No. XCI. Played at Jönköping:—

White. W. Klein.	Black. M. Andersson.	White. W. Klein.
1 P–K 4	P–K 4	22. B–B 3
2 Kt–K B 3	Kt–K B 3	23. Kt–B sq
3 Kt–P	P–Q 4	24. Kt–Q 5
4 K Kt–R 3	Kt–P	25. Q–B 2
5 P–Q 4	P–Q 4	26. Kt–K 6

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 199. SATURDAY, AUGUST 10, 1901.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

NOTES OF THE DAY 121, 122, 123
"LITERATURE" PORTRAITS.—XIV. Thomas Carlyle... .. 123
BIBLIOGRAPHY OF CARLYLE 131
WELSH LITERATURE OF THE VICTORIAN ERA.—A "Personal View," by T. Rhys Jones 132
SOME MOVEMENTS IN VICTORIAN POETRY, by Arthur Waugh. III. The Poetry of Reflection and Doubt ... 134
CURRENT LITERATURE—
Recent French Books—
L'Affaire du Collier—Lettres à la Fiancée—Portraits Intimes—Les Sports et Jeux d'Exercice dans l'Ancienne France—Essai de Critique de l'Histoire Militaire des Gaulois et des Français—Grands Ecrivains d'Outre-Manche—Histoire Politique de la Révolution Française 136, 137, 138, 139
LESSONS FROM WORK 139
Typhoid the Destroyer of Armies and its Abolition—The Author of "The Peep of Day"—Notes on St. Mary's Parish Registers, Nottingham 140
Tristram of Blent—The Grip of the Bookmaker—Marrables' Magnificent Idea—Her Mountain Lover..... 140, 141
SALE AT MESSRS. SOTHEBY'S 141
AMONG THE REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES.—II. 142
CORRESPONDENCE—The Appin Murder (Mr. Walter Shaw) 142
AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for..... 143
LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS 144

NOTES OF THE DAY.

We publish on page 123 a special article on Carlyle and his work, with illustrations. On page 134 Mr. Arthur Waugh continues his series of articles on Victorian poetry with a paper on "The Poetry of Reflection and Doubt." Next week we shall publish a special illustrated Ibsen number, with a reproduction of Mr. R. Bryden's wood-cut portrait of Ibsen.

* * * *

On page 132 we publish an article on Welsh Literature à propos of the National Eisteddfod of Wales, held this week at Merthyr Tydvil. This curious institution still shows signs of much vitality after a chequered career of some seven centuries. The first Eisteddfod—the word means originally "session"—of which we have definite information was held at Caermarthen in 1451, but it is pretty certain that the meetings took place at least as early as the thirteenth century, and tradition boldly carries them back to the sixth. The existence of the Eisteddfod to-day is a standing witness of the intense patriotic enthusiasm of the Welsh. It is supported chiefly by the working classes; it depends upon no great organization, and it possesses no permanent endowment. And the poets whose verses are recited are sprung almost entirely articles are contributed to an encyclopædia. Mr. ( written for the defendants' "Encyclopædia of Spo articles on "Coarse Fish," "Pike," and "Trout," wh republished subsequently without his consent or th Affalo, the editor, in a book called "The Young Sp

Mr. Justice Joyce gave an injunction, holding that right in the articles did not belong to the publish absence of any special agreement, and an inquiry was o be made as to damages.

* * * *

Books to read recently published :—

"Tristram of Blent." By Anthony Hope. (Murr

"Asia and Europe." By Meredith Townsend. (C

"Main Currents in Nineteenth Century Lit
Vol. V. By George Brandes. (Heinemann.)

"A Daughter of the Veldt." By Mr. Basil (Heinemann.)

* * * *

The resuscitation, in the current number of th Magazine, of that popular favourite Sherlock Holmes o question of literary ethics of some interest. Has the right to revive a character whom he has once del done to death? From the point of view of literary pr has, of course, every right; he can do what he pleases own creation. But Dr. Conan Doyle's action in the c famous detective is somewhat disquieting. We shall ne now, so to speak, when we are safe; and fascinating ch long since comfortably buried in the pages of some novel, may spring up to confound us on every side. W for instance, that Mr. Guy Boothby is now giving us " Farewell" in the pages of a contemporary. But hav guarantee that the mysterious doctor, whose fathom and black cat used to stare at us some time since fro hoarding, is really going to bid us farewell in earnest?
he will appear again, to undergo a fresh series of adventu fact is, a popular character study is now so profitable that few authors can afford to let him rest quietly in the

* * * *

"The Hound of the Baskervilles," in which the detective appears once more, is not the usual type of Holmes story. It is on a larger scale altogether, August number of the Strand does not carry us very far mystery. But the opening is gruesome enough to p lovers of the weird and terrible. Dr. Watson drops qu again into his accustomed attitude as the admiring ch
But the story at present looks more like developi direction of psychical research than of the ordinary mundane detective work.

question their taste, but you must not quarrel with their details. When a critic of "The Story of an African Farm" complained that there were no lions in it, the South African author could retort that that kind of African romance was best written in Piccadilly, and be sure that the laugh would be on her side. The fashion, however, was not always so. Time was when imagination was opposed to knowledge and preferred. While a romantic world was full of Hugo's "Les Orientales," it took an Oriental professor to object that making Oriental poetry without knowing the East was like making rabbit pie without the rabbit. And when Tom Moore complacently recorded the compliments he received for his description of Cashmere in "Lalla Rookh," the very point he was proud of was that he had never set foot in the country. It is quite in this old-fashioned spirit that Mr. Shorthouse seems to be complimented now.

* * * *

A SONG.

I.

Along the liquid sand she came,
Beneath the azure skies;
With tripping feet all rosy-pink
Between the seaweed and the brink—
A maiden with a lovely name
And lovely, lovely eyes.

II.

The salt-spray 'neath the sunny south
Flashed in her wind-blown hair;
And on her cheeks a blush was born—
The blush Aurora brought at morn,
When, softly kissing face and mouth,
She left her roses there.

III.

And from her parted lips a song
Came blowing on the breeze;
Waking the wond'ring world to hear
A message from the Golden Year—
How "Life is sweet and love is strong"— In merry words like these:—
"Song of the ocean swell,
Rain of the silver-spray;
Fairy-forests under the wave,
Emerald-isle and coral-cave;
Pebble and pearl and lilac shell
Strewn on the golden bay.
Song of the sapphire deep,
Song and silence and sigh;
Tides that ebb and tides that flow,
Waves that wake and winds that blow;
Give me a heart that pure shall keep—
Love that will never die."

H. J. S.

* * * *

A bust of Arthur Rimbaud has been unveiled at Charleville. It is the work of M. Paterne Berrichon, who wrote a curious study of Verlaine's friend. Rimbaud was a sort of Villon, a vagabond of genius, who led the most miserable of existences, and has left one fine poem, "Le Bateau Ivre." He was the inventor of the theory of the colour of the vowels. If all the candidates for a single compartment in the national anthologies of the ordinary issue becomes XXVI.A of the p and the pages are also differentiated by t initial letters. Thus the number of pages in appears, to the casual observer, to be the same, chapter must be hunted some time before it When it is found, the careful reader of "Sister T is a book that must be read with head or lef inclined to think that its omission from the lar merely because it was thought to be inessential story of Evelyn Innes' soul no jot further. The a paragraph at the end which perhaps gives some the subject of Sister Mary John's attitude toward as a whole the chapter is rather for the bibliom not too harsh a word for the collector of literary the lover of the art of fiction.

A well-known Bulgarian writer and poe Schopow, has been sentenced to three years' im refusing to perform compulsory military service.

Mr. Carnegie has offered to provide money f of a free library at Montrose on condition
Libraries Act is adopted and a suitable site prov

It is reported from New York that Mr. Carne offered $150,000 to the City of Montreal for a provided that the city authorities guarantee a annually for its support.

Mr. Andrew Lang has written to contradict the was engaged upon two books dealing with the late

The Archbishop of Canterbury will preach th special service to be held in Winchester Cathe of the commemoration of King Alfred the Great.

The new Rector of the Edinburgh Academy i Hawksworth, of Clifton and Queen's College, been for seven years an assistant master at Rugb

Mr. C. A. Pearson, it is stated, has purcha paper, and intends bringing out next week the N be run on the same lines as the Daily Express, but

Dean Farrar attained the age of seventy on It is forty-three years since "Erle, or Little first of his numerous works, was published.

Mr. Stephen Phillips, we read, is at wor having for its subject Joan of Arc.

The Westminster Gazette has submitted a Visits of Elizabeth" to a working man, with candid review. The result appeared in the W about three-quarters of a column of very depreci

"The Book of Beauty" in Punch this w upon the style of Mr. Henry Harland. There is "Literary" column for a ladies' paper.

M. Edmond Rostand, in spite of being fo by his doctor, is said to be engaged upon a nove regard the writing of prose as coming under the

It is said that Yvette Guilbert is writing

The Purity of the Language.

Mr. Asquith, in his address delivered the other day to the University Extension students at Oxford, took occasion to say a few words as to form and expression, and that indefinable quality, on which so many professors have written so many widely differing opinions—style. He lamented that we were starting the twentieth century with so few to guide us in the right path. The great masters of style—Tennyson, Froude, Matthew Arnold, Stevenson—are dead, and to all appearance there is no one to take their place. In the meanwhile he suggested that each of his hearers might, in his humble degree, do something to maintain the purity and to prevent the debasement of our language. He added that never had the need for such a task been more patent or more urgent. The mistakes of the ignorant are hard to endure, but the strange terminology of the scientist is almost equally afflicting. "The uncouth and pseudo-classical terminology of the men of science," the "tortuous and nebulous phrases" of the philosophers, the "pretentious conventionalities" of the art critic, and the "slipshod slapdash of the newest school of journalists"—these are all equally repugnant to the educated man. It was not amiss that Mr. Asquith should put in a plea for clearness, simplicity, and naturalness of expression; and, in that connexion, that he should say a word or two in favour of the study of Greek. But it is an open question whether the assimilation of any amount of Greek would produce any appreciable effect upon the purity of the English language. In all ages men of culture have been apt to pin their faith upon some master of style, dead or living, and to lament any deviation from the strait path that was sufficient for him. Some purists even at the present day would have us use no word that was not sanctioned by the authority and example of John Dryden. It does not matter whom we select as our model; the result of any hard-and-fast rule of this kind must always be to cramp the language rather than to purify it, and to substitute for freedom and a necessary growth an affectation of archaicism. We have nothing much to say against the little experiments in measured diction, such as Mr. Vivian's revival of the Rambler, which serve now and again to recall pleasantly enough the style and manner of a bygone age. They have, if not their use, at any rate their archeological interest. But the "purity of the language"—that much-abused term—is not to be safeguarded by any amount of scholarship. In fact, it is not to be safeguarded at all. So long as English is a living language, just so long will it continue to grow, and to develop, and to add to its resources; and the most that the scholar can do is to put a drag upon the wheels of its progress. After all, the "slipshod slapdash journalist" has also his useful function to perform. He is the advance guard; his lively fancy (which may sometimes, we admit, be too lively for the taste of some of us) invents the store of new expressions from which our language by degrees selects the fittest and adopts them for her own. We may speak of slang and of barbarous locutions, but what is slang to-day may in a few years have become a classic phrase. It would not be easy to point to a single man of genius, from the days of Shakespeare downwards, who has not been accused in his time of designs against the purity of the language. Turn to the letter from Sterling to Carlyle, which is quoted at length in the next article, and note how many of the words condemned there have now become usual enough in good literature. It is the man of genius who picks up the disregarded gold from the rubbish-heap of contemporary conversation and issues it stamped with

Literature Portraits.—XIV

THOMAS CARLYLE.

Thomas Carlyle has been more written about, a widely different aspects, than almost any human be last century. Lives, memoirs, reminiscences, and app to the number of two thousand, more or less, concerni man and his work, afford at all events some indica influence that he has exerted upon the mind of the Vic The consequence of this mass of still accumulating l that few readers of books, whether in the British E America, have not some superficial acquaintance wit facts of Carlyle's life. They know probably that Scottish birth; they connect with him, rather lo barbarous-sounding names as Ecclefechan and Craig they have a vague idea that he studied in Edinburgh, lady whom he shamefully ill-treated, came to London the "French Revolution" in such spare hours as

[From the "Carlyle's House Catalogue," by permission of Mr. George devoted to dyspepsia and quarrelling with his n Thanks to Mr. Froude, and to the controversies that h over the publication of his "Life" and "Remini Carlyle has become indubitably the best-known literary his day. And, whatever may be the ultimate fate of hi those books that preached the Gospel of Silence at su and with so many passages of heart-stirring eloquence— of the man himself will always remain one of the most fa and absorbing in the history of English literature. His for success was as long and as bitter as that of John (about which the curious may read in the interesting "Carlyle's House Catalogue" published by the Carlyle's House Memorial Trust), was purchased by the committee of the said trust in May, 1895, and has since then been open to visitors as a sort of Carlyle Museum. It is rather curious to look back now, even at this modest distance of time, and to note the difficulties which beset Mr. George Lumsden, the moving spirit in this enterprise, in the execution of his very laudable resolve. For some reason or other, almost every newspaper in the kingdom threw cold water upon the project, refused to notice it at all, or damned it with faint praise. It was left for the Speaker, almost alone among the more important papers, to come forward with an article of generous and eloquent approval. It is perhaps hardly worth while, now that the whole matter is a thing of the past, to resuscitate the arguments that were used on either side in this forgotten controversy, but it may be as well to quote here Carlyle's own opinions on the subject of memorial houses, as given by Mr. Reginald Blunt in his excellent little book on "The Carlyle's Chelsea Home." These are a few of the disjointed records of his visits to the homes of Luther, Goethe, and Schiller:—"Goethe's House;—were in Goethe's room; a little

[From the "Carlyle's House Catalogue," by permission of Mr. G. Lumsden.]

garret not much bigger than my dressing-room—and wrote our names in silence." "Eisenach with its Wartburg where Luther lay concealed translating the Bible; there I spent one of the most interesting forenoons I ever got by travelling. . . . They open a door, you enter a little apartment, a very poor low room with an old leading lattice window, to see the most venerable of hours and more, Schiller's for one. . . . Sch still more affecting; the room where he wrot exactly like the model, the bed where he died, a his dead face. A poor man's house, and a brave at his post there." Elsewhere, too, Carlyle has keen appreciation, the visits he paid to the speare, Johnson, Newton, Smollett, Burns, a pictures of the dwellings of Steele, of Elizabet of Sterling, as we'l as of those of Goethe, Schille hung upon his own walls at Cheyne-row.

Carlyle's Parentage.

But for the present we may leave the Cl retrace in a few words the less-known history o life. He was born on December 4, 1795, "in a of a room, 9ft. by 5ft., over the arch at Ecc father was a stonemason, who had become a sm mother, whose maiden name was Janet Aitk domestic servant. His kindred were Annandal
In the fifteenth century there had been a Torthorwald, from whom, in later years, a Du traced Thomas Carlyle's descent with apparen document caused much amusement when it v Cheyne-row, but Carlyle himself—no mean g inclined to believe in the correctness of this f was not the man to lay any stress upon it, corr him it was sufficient that in his mother he had " fairest descent—that of the pious, the just, and that his father was a man who walked "as in t of heaven, and hell, and the judgment," although he had a predilection for the society of the tw his mother he learned to read, with his father he of arithmetic at the age of five. From him, t still more valuable lesson—the importance of t of conscientious work. There are few passages in touching than those in his "Reminiscences of J Ecclefechan, Mason," where he speaks of the so his father accomplished in his own sphere of acti

> The force that had been lent my father > expended in manful well-doing. A portion of t > beneficent traces of his strong hand and stron > that he undertook but he did it faithfully and > I shall look on the houses he built with a cer > rest. They stand firm and sound to the heart a > district. No one that comes after him will > was the finger of a hollow eye-servant. They > for me of the gospel of man's free will.

It is easy to see from what source Carlyl seated hatred of all scamped work, of shams, and sion of the "eternal verities." In his own w he was always steadfast in his refusal to write t to make any concessions to the supposed taste of believed himself, says Mr. Froude, to have capability for literature than for any other occu did not on this account take his profession any th
When matters were almost at their worst, and offer of employment on The Times, through ling, he refused solely from a fear that he mi associated with sentiments that were at varian
It was impossible for him to wear harness—" light as was required by booksellers and edit from Mr. Froude:—

And it was not industry and exactness alone that he learned from his father's example; some of his marvellous command of words came also from the same source. Edward Irving, after a conversation with James Carlyle on one occasion, turned to the son and said:—"I have often wondered where you acquired that peculiar, original, and forcible manner of expressing your ideas. I have discovered that it is an inheritance from your father."

Education.

Carlyle's education was continued for a short time at the village school, then by Mr. Johnstone (the "burgher minister") and his son, and afterwards at the Annan Grammar School. It was clear enough by this time that he was no ordinary boy, and it was decided to send him to the University with a view to his ordination to the ministry—the common goal of a promising son even in the poorest Scottish household. Accordingly, he walked to Edinburgh—a distance of some eighty miles or more—to attend the classes there. The November term of 1809 saw him arrive, a boy of not quite fourteen years; as an old man of seventy he referred to this early journey in his inaugural address, on being installed as Rector of the University. Young as he was, he formed friends at Edinburgh who were ready to believe in his future. Character and intellect alike were far above the level of the ordinary undergraduate. He read widely, and "Tristram Shandy" is said to have been his favourite book about this time. He contemplated an epic. To fill up the time before his ordination, as well as to earn some much-needed money, he started school-teaching, and returned for a while to Annan as first mathematical tutor, at about £70 a year. The projected ordination was never to take place, but in 1814 he went so far as to deliver an exercise—a "weak, flowery, sentimental" sermon in English—and at Christmas, 1815, he composed a Latin discourse on the question Num detur religio naturalis.

MISS WELSH.
(From the Miniature by Macleay, 1828.)
(From the "Carlyle's House Catalogue," by permission of Mr. G. Clay.)

able as further evidence of the faith that his friends already had in the future of the struggling schoolmaster. Already, she said, his abilities were beheld by his acquaintance "with wonder and delight," and in time they must be known to the world. "Genius will render you great" were her final words; "may virtue render you beloved!" Something, no doubt, must be allowed for a natural tendency to gild a refusal of this kind with ornament, but the prediction remains a remarkable one from a young lady concerning a man who was as yet wholly unknown to fame.

Edinburgh and Craigenputtock.

In September, 1818, Carlyle returned to Edinb had saved £90 by his interlude of scholastic life, an now to qualify for the Bar. Here he obtained his fi work, being employed by Sir David Brewster to articles to the "Edinburgh Encyclopædia." Throu agency he obtained a tutorship with the Bullers at £ —money which he expended, with characteristic ge supporting his brother John as a medical student and a farm for his brother Alexander. He translated Meister" and a less interesting task—Legendre's "G for which last work he received £50. Irving, now recommended him to Mr. Taylor, proprietor of th Magazine, who employed him to do a series of "Portra of Genius and Character." He was now fairly sta literary career; his marriage, over the sequel of whic unnecessary ink has been spilled, was soon to take October 17, 1826, he married, at Templand, the la forward known as Jane Welsh Carlyle, and the pair se in their first home (after a considerable amount of arg the bride's mother) at Comely Bank, an Edinburgh sub next four years he spent there and at Craigenputtock wrote most of the "Miscellanies." Jeffrey, founder of the Edinburgh Review, made his acquaintance and t with great consideration, obtaining for his brother was now a qualified doctor, the post of travelling ph the Countess of Clare. From Jeffrey, too, he borrowe with which, the MS. of "Sartor" in his bag, he first descent upon London.

"Sartor Resartus."

Begun about the October of 1830, and intended for a magazine article, "Sartor Resartus" (as it was called) was not the best imaginable introduction t London publishers. However, it had been finished i of July, 1831; Mrs. Carlyle had pronounced it "a genius," and she was a less partial critic than are mo literary men. Carlyle set out with it to try his fort interesting bibliographical note by Mr. A. W. P Macmillan's new editio graphic description of the he met with at every turn with whom the book had at first, was worried with troubles, his literary adv out of town, and he ret manuscript confessing th not been able to read i hundred to one." They did decline. In the meantime, however, Jeffrey's influence had been exerted with Murray, and Carlyle received an offer to print an edition of 750 copies on the half-profit system. It seems that Carlyle understood that Murray wished him to try elsewhere first, and accordingly he took the book to Colburn and Bentley before coming to a definite agreement—a fact which caused Murray to withdraw his offer unless he could first "get it read by some literary friend." The report of the "taster" in question is that which Carlyle appended to later editions of the work; it was "slightingly prefixed" to the edition of 1838, and temporarily withdrawn twenty years later. The opinion, well-known as it is, is possibly worth quoting once more:—

THOMAS CARLYLE, AGED 58.
[From "The Carlyle's Chelsea House" (Bell), by permission of Mr. Reginald Blunt.]

> The author of "Teufelsdröckh" is a person of talent; his work displays here and there some felicity of thought and expression, considerable fancy and knowledge; but whether or not it would take with the public seems doubtful. For a jeu d'esprit of that kind it is too long; it would have suited better as an essay or article than as a volume. The author has no great tact; his wit is frequently heavy, and reminds one of the German Baron who took to leaping on tables, and answered that he was learning to be lively. Is the work a translation?

The Reform Bill was then lying heavy upon the minds of men, and books were not easy to sell. In May, 1833, Carlyle wrote again to Fraser, proposing to cut the book up into strips and publish it in his magazine, and the offer, after some doubt,

(£82 1s. in all), but declined to republish in bo ever, some sixty copies were made up by the m and thus as "a readable pamphlet of 107 pa without break," it did actually appear, bearing the words "Reprinted for Friends." It was not a real English edition was produced, 500 copies b Messrs. Saunders and Ottley on the half-profi did the "beast" (as Mrs. Carlyle was wont to abused work) at last "get itself published," pronounced by the author dingy and ill-managed or nearly correct, as to printing."

It has been said, not altogether withou
"Sartor Resartus" is a rare example of a prose from its want of metrical form. Carlyle was ind but he was a poet without the gift of song, and thoughts and images scattered in such profus pages missed their mark at first, and are, perha so fully appreciated as they should be, for th that there has always been a scarcity of re appreciating fine prose. "Sartor Resartus" fine thought and noble diction, but they lie th part unknown, or known only to the few. Ta the passage at the close of Book III., chapte believe was the one selected by the late Sir J his most memorable utterance. We have only the last paragraph:—

> So has it been from the beginning, so will > Generation after generation takes to itself
> Body; and forth-issuing from Cimmerian Ni > mission APPEARS. What Force and Fire is in e > one grinding in the mill of Industry;
> climbing the giddy Alpine heights of Scie > dashed in pieces on the rocks of Strife, in war w > and then the Heaven-sent is recalled; his > falls away, and soon even to Sense becomes a v
> Thus, like some wild-flaming, wild-thundering t > Artillery, does this mysterious MANKIND th > in long-drawn, quick-succeeding grandeur, thro > Deep. Thus, like a God-created, fire-breathin > emerge from the Inane; haste stormfully acros > Earth; then plunge again into the Inane. E are levelled, and her seas filled up, in our passage: can the Earth, which is but dead and a vision, resist Spirits which have reality and are alive? On the hardest adamant some foot-print of us is stamped-in; the last Rear of the host will read traces of the earliest Van. But whence?—O Heaven, whither? Sense knows not; Faith knows not; only that it is through Mystery to Mystery, from God and to God.

"We are such stuff
As dreams are made of, and our little Life
Is rounded with a sleep!"

And, in rounding his own noble prose with these lines from Shakespeare, it is difficult to avoid thinking that Carlyle felt the inadequacy of his own vehicle for the thought he had to utter.

The Question of Style.

We have devoted so much space to this one book because in a sense it is the most characteristic of all Carlyle's works. It exemplifies, in full measure, his most admired virtues and his most abused faults; it contains many passages of noble eloquence and deep thought, and also much that the most devoted student of Carlyle may be excused for finding somewhat wearisome. He was saturated with German literature, which he had been one of the first to introduce into England, and his own account of Richter would serve well enough as a description of "Sartor." "The style and structure of the book appear alike incomprehensible. The narrative is every now and then suspended to make way for some 'Extra-Leaf,' some wild digression upon any subject but the one in hand; the language groans with indescribable metaphors and allusions to all things human and divine; flowing onward, not like a river, but like an inundation. . . ." This would be true enough of Carlyle's own book. He notes elsewhere that, for the benefit of Richter's own countrymen, there was published before his death "K. Reinhold's Lexicon for Jean Paul's Works." There has not been, to our knowledge, a Carlyle Lexicon for English use, but others besides his early reviewers have no doubt wondered what the writer meant by "Baphometic fire-baptism."

There are possibly still many who regard Carlyle's style as a mass of affectation who seriously think that the man whose literary conscience forbade him to write a word that he did not feel, even in those days at Chelsea when money was urgently needed, had deliberately adopted an uncouth manner for the sake of attracting the attention of the public. As a fact, few men have ever written more naturally. His offence lay in using his own natural voice instead of the conventional manner of the age. He spoke very nearly as he wrote, and his private letters are to the full as "mannered" as his books. It is interesting to look back now and read Sterling's letter, published in the "Life of John Sterling," and to notice how many words and phrases which he condemns there as novelties have become part and parcel of our language. Carlyle, after all, was a Scot by birth; he had read widely in German literature; and it is not surprising that a man with his training, and with his passion for getting to the heart of any matter he wrote upon, should chance now and then upon a strange locution. "Sartor" is naturally, considering its subject, written more in the German manner than his other works. It was ostensibly a translation, with comments and excursions by the translator, and it could not well have been other than German in character. Written repaying by their value the disadvantage of novelty must be added new and erroneous locutions; "wh tissues" for all the other, and similar uses of the w

"orients" for pearls; "lucid" and "lucent" as if they were different in meaning; "hulls" p for coverings, it being a word hardly used, and then the husk of a nut; "to insure a man of misappreh
"talented," a mere newspaper and hustings word,
I believe, by O'Connell.

I must also mention the constant recurrence of s in a quaint and queer connexion, which gives a and somewhat repulsive mannerism to many sent these the commonest offender is "quite"; which

[From "Sartor Resartus," illustrated by E. J. Sullivan. By permission of Messrs. George Bell].

almost every page, and gives at first a droll kind of e but soon becomes wearisome. "Nay," "manifold," " enough significance," "faculty" (meaning a man's or moral power), "special," "not without," haunt t
as if in some uneasy dream which does not rise to th

John Sterling, fervent admirer of Carlyle as he was, was still a citizen of his age, a contemporary of Lamb and Hazlitt and other upholders of the traditional English prose. But, unlike most of the other critics, the spirit touched him in spite of the "barbarous language." The style of the "French Revolution" troubled John Carlyle almost as much as that of "Sartor" had troubled Sterling. There "actually was some profit" in these admonitions, wrote the author. They reminded him at any rate that there were always two parties to a good style—the contented writer and the contented reader.

Carlyle's Humour.

Humour is undoubtedly the conspicuous quality in all Carlyle's writings—but it is a humour of a different type from any that had previously appeared in English literature. It resembles that of Jean Paul rather than that of Sterne. It has his depth, and his light-flashing unexpectedness; it has also, in full measure, that fine tenderness and sympathy which is inseparable from all true humour. In certain of its qualities it bears some resemblance to that of Swift. It has the same element of simplification—of reducing everything to its lowest terms—of stripping off all occasional and unnecessary trappings and displaying the essential facts. But although he had sometimes a touch of Swift's savagery, he had none of his coarseness. His humour, as he says of Richter's, is the product "not of contempt, but of love, not of superficial distortion of natural forms, but of deep sympathy with all forms of nature." Leigh Hunt, who was one of Carlyle's earliest London acquaintances when he came to Cheyne-row, was keen-sighted enough to perceive his deep underlying tenderness. "I believe," he wrote, "that what Mr. Carlyle loves better than his fault-finding is the face of any human being that looks suffering, and loving, and

AN INTERIOR AT CHELSEA

[From the picture by Mr. Tait, reproduced from "The Carlyle's Chelsea Home," by permission of Mr. Reginald Blunt.]

London and its Inhabitant

It was on June 10, 1834, that the Carlyles London, in the Chelsea home at 24, Cheyne-r numbered 5—which is indissolubly associated readers of the "Life" and "Reminiscences. to London, it has been said, at a time when the nineteenth century was about at its Shelley and Byron and Keats were dead; decadence; Wordsworth was living far off solitary among his mountains. It would be mo perhaps, that the chief surviving names in Eng hopelessly alien from Carlyle's school of thoug hesitate to put into plain language his opinions in and out of season, and his opinions were exp extraordinary power of getting to the roo which makes his descriptive flashes the most portraiture that literary history affords. It is that when he went into society "at the Bull Austins', and in a gradually increasing "stared at as if he were a strange Suddenly, into a London filled with eleg this Dioge tern seekin "His conve to quote or Froude, "w His unspa singular in one who c with him, startling t was unobt asked for h it in his m and when contemptu ing, 'too young a m by far for t whom he literary L Blessington priestess, expected t pathetic we Ishmaelite, giance was descriptions of celebrities whom he met—some in his diary, sometimes in his correspondence, respect admirable—incisive, humorous, and bea stamp of truth. They bring the man before than reams of wordy analysis. Take this of We can:—"I will warrant him one of the stiffest Parliamentary athletes anywhere to be met wit present—a grim, tall, broad-bottomed, yellow-s brows like precipitous cliffs, and huge, black, unweariable-looking eyes under them; amor nose, and the angriest shut mouth I have an formation of the London Library, and the eminent mathematician had failed to display any interest in the scheme. "Did you ever see him?" he writes to his brother; "a mixture of craven terror and venemous-looking vehemence; with no chin, too—a cross between a frog and a viper, as somebody called him."

Carlyle' of seizing t was never displayed t

Some Literary Judgments.

The inside of a man—his solid worth or his lack of it—was equally patent to this keen vision. He has several allusions to

[From the "Carlyle's House Catalogue," by permission of Mr. G. Lumsden.]

The Study.

Macaulay, and from these we can form, on the whole, an admirably just opinion of the rising star of literary England of that day. "Of Macaulay I hear nothing very good—a sophistical, rhetorical, ambitious young man of talent." A later impression is less unkind, or more softly phrased:—"An emphatic, hottish, really forcible person, but unhappily without divine idea." And another is substantially the same:—"He has more force and emphasis in him than any other of my British coevals. Wants the root of belief, however. May fall to accomplish much. Let us hope for better things." Considering that these two men stood back to back, so to speak, surveying opposite poles of thought, these criticisms display almost more than Carlyle's customary insight into character. The two men rarely met, but one occasion is thus noted in the Journal:—

> March 11, 1848.—Friday last at Lord Mahon's to breakfast; Macaulay, Lord and Lady Ashley there, &c. Niagara of eloquent commonplace talk from Macaulay. Very good-natured man; man cased in official mail of proof; stood my impatient fire-explosions with much patience, merely hissing a little steam up, and continued his Niagara—supply and demand; power ruinous to powerful himself; impossibility of Government doing more than keep the peace; suicidal distraction of new French Republic, &c. Essentially irremediable, commonplace nature of the man; all that was in him now gone to the tongue; a squat, thickset, low-browed, short, grizzled little man of fifty. These be thy gods, oh Israel!

It is tempting to go through the whole gallery of portraits—Bulwer Lytton, the "dandiacal philosophist"—"intrinsically a poor creature this Bulwer; has a bustling whisking agility and restlessness which may support him in a certain degree of

of men who had no facts to tell him, or who packed up matter "into epigrammatic contrasts, startling exagg claptraps that will get a plaudit from the galleries Coleridge, too, sunk into dim nebulous obscurity at I no facts were to be got, but merely misty theories. ment of Coleridge—"that mass of richest spices putr a dunghill"—was expressed at greater length in his on "Table Talk":—

> . . . A great possibility that has not realized itsel did I see such apparatus got ready for thinking, an thought. He mounts scaffolding, pulleys, and tackle all the tools in the neighbourhood with labour, wi demonstration, precept, abuse, and sets—three bricks. honour the man. I pity him (with the opposite of co sees in him one glorious up-struggling ray (as it we perished, all but ineffectual, in a lax, languid, character. This is my theory of Coleridge—very from that of his admirers here. . . .

but not so very different, we imagine, from that of mo now, and certainly more illuminating than many longer careful dissertations.

Carlyle as an Historian.

The writing of the history of the French Revolu long been in Carlyle's mind before the scheme actu definite shape. He had, as Mr. Froude says, "written subject, on Voltaire, on Diderot, and on Cagliostro," a by him, still unpublished, his account of the episo Diamond Necklace, which contains one of the most elo poetical passages he ever wrote. He settled down det the work within a few months of his arrival in London first book (the original first volume) was completed ary 7, 1835. The story of its destruction in Mill's hou bringing of the news, and of Carlyle's words as t closed on the distracted philosopher after a stay two hours, is too well-known to need repetition he book had to be begun again, and, what was we have left him), and with a certain amount of not unnatural complaining. The fact was, the practice of literature was always distasteful to Carlyle; he was the most conscientious of men; and the writing of history (in which a conscientious man can barely hope ever absolutely to satisfy himself of the truth) was the most laborious form of literature that he could well have undertaken. He searched "dry-as-dust" records until his patience exploded in fiery denunciation of the compilers of rubbish-heaps; he seemed to make no progress towards the goal; he saw himself swimming in vacuo; and now and again, in despair, he turned the key upon his unfinished manuscript and strove to banish it from his mind. It was finished on January 12, 1837, "on a damp evening, just as light was failing. Carlyle gave the MSS. to his wife to read, and went out to walk. Before leaving the house he said to her:—'I know not whether this book is worth anything, nor what the world will do with it, or misdo, or entirely forbear to do, as is likeliest; but this I could tell the world—You have not had for a hundred years any book that comes more direct and flamingly from the heart of a living man.'" Here is the secret of the book's vitality. It was a history written in contempt of all form and precedent, unlike any history that had ever been written before. It was a man talking about real men and women, not about pasteboard figures in Royal trappings. Carlyle formed his own conception of each and all of the actors in that dramatic epoch, and projected them vividly upon the pages of his book. Some of his conceptions may have been wrong, but they were all most eminently life-like. And, whatever may be the faults of the "French Revolution" as an historical work, it will live for this reason. It is filled with humanity; it is not a

MRS. CARLYLE.
[From "The Carlyle's Chelsea Home," by permission of Mr. Reginald Blunt.]

in fact, with each succeeding work Carlyle fe more acutely—and finally it resolved itself int letters, with more or less voluminous comments
In fact, the book completed itself without his k book so completed can seldom be entirely sa different way, the monumental "Frederick," in is hardly a model of arrangement. Conscientic may be carried too far, and it is something of a reader to find, in Book II., a sudden plunge bac misty antiquity of Brandenburg and Henry th thorough, but is it necessary? "Frederick painfully produced of all his works, veritably, far the most heartrending enterprise he had e contains as fine a gallery of portraits as any of the very massiveness of its scheme must prev widely read. Yet Emerson could say of it tha was the wittiest book that was ever written; would think the English people would rise up in the author for by cordial acclamation, and sign him with oak leaves, their joy that such a hea them." Most of us to-day are content to take s on trust, and allow it to rest quietly enough a stone to the author's reputation.

Some Remarks on Philosophy

And what, in fine, of Carlyle's philosoph apt to judge a writer of this sort, after a laps persistence of his opinions in the world; and, h views on slavery and some of his more extrava on the right of the strong to command obedienc sway thought at the present day, they cheerfull false guide. The value of Carlyle's philos philosophies, is not to be reckoned by the abstra random precepts. He was a great moral force, genius," said Emerson, "is his moral sense, his solo importance of truth and justice." He brus finespun webs of the Radical school, the elabor Mill and Bentham, and pierced down to immutable laws. To quote from an essay pub ago in the Daily News, by Mr. G. K. Chester men to study less the truth of their reasoni truth of the assumptions upon which they reas views, even when unsound, were generally a wholesome antidote to the commonly receiv day. No man ever has formulated, and no formulate, a scheme of philosophy that shall s through the ages. What was true in Carly become part of th thought; what was or is perishing. "Si and similar rhaps

seriously now by no living man; we do not believe, at the opening of the twentieth century, in the divine right of the strong to rule the weak; but we do recognize, through his teaching, the value of a regard for realities, of reverence for human worth, and justice, and truth, and of sound and conscientious work. And, as happens with but few writers, the life of the man is a faithful exposition of the cardinal principles that he preached.

E. H. LACON WATSON.

BIBLIOGRAPHY.

The following list of Carlyle's works, with date of publication is chiefly compiled from Mr. J. P. Anderson's Bibliography at the end of Dr. Garnett's "Life of Carlyle."

Uncollected Articles.

ARTICLES IN "EDINBURGH ENCYCLOPÆDIA."

Vol. xiv., part 2.—Montaigne, Lady M. W. Montagu, Montesquieu, Montfaucon, Dr. J. Moore, Sir John Moore. 1820-3.

Vol. xv., part 1.—Necker, Nelson, Netherlands, Newfoundland, Norfolk, Northamptonshire, Northumberland. 1820-3.

Vol. xvi., part 1.—Mungo Park. 1820-3.

Vol. xvi., part 2.—William Pitt, Earl of Chatham; William Pitt, the younger. 1820-3.

"NEW EDINBURGH REVIEW."

Joanna Baillie's Metrical Legends. 1821.

Goethe's Faust. 1822.

"LONDON MAGAZINE."

Schiller's Life and Writings. 1823-4.

"FRASER'S MAGAZINE."

Cruthers and Jonson. 1831.

Peter Nimmo; a Rhapsody. 1831.

"EXAMINER."

Louis Philippe. 1848.

Repeal of the Union. 1848.

Legislation for Ireland. 1848.

Death of Charles Buller. 1848.

"SPECTATOR."

Ireland and the British Chief Governor. 1848.

Irish Regiments (of the new era). 1848.

Collected Writings in the Magazines.

"EDINBURGH REVIEW."

Jean Paul Friedrich Richter. 1827.

State of German Literature. 1827.

Burns. 1828.

Signs of the Times. 1829.

Taylor's Historic Survey of German Poetry. 1831.

Characteristics. 1831.

Corn Law Rhymes. 1832.

"FOREIGN REVIEW."

Life and Writings of Werner. 1828.

Goethe's Helena. 1828.

Goethe. 1828.

Life of Heyne. 1828.

German Playwrights. 1829.

Voltaire. 1829.

Novalis. 1829.

J. P. F. Richter again. 1830.

"FOREIGN QUARTERLY REVIEW."

German Literature of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries. 1831.

Goethe's Works. 1832.

Diderot. 1833.

Dr. Francia. 1843.

"FRASER'S MAGAZINE."

Richter's Review of Mme. de Stael's "De l'Allemagne." 1830.

Cui Bono? and Four Fables by Pilpay, junior. 1830.

Thoughts on History. 1830.

Luther's Psalm. 1831.

Quae Cogitavit (On History Again). 1833.

Count Cagliostro. 1833.

Sartor Resartus. 1833-4.

Death of Edward Irving. 1835.

The Diamond Necklace. 1837.

On the Sinking of the Vengeur. 1839.

An Election to the Long Parliament. 1844.

Thirty-five Unpublished Letters of Oliver Cromwell. 1847.

Occasional Discourse on the Negro Question. 1849.

Early Kings of Norway. 1875.

Portraits of John Knox. 1875.

"WESTMINSTER REVIEW."

The Nibelungen Lied, 1831.

Mirabeau. 1837.

Parliamentary History of the French Revolution. 1837.

Sir Walter Scott. 1838.

Varnhagen von Ense's Memoirs. 1838.

Baillie the Covenanter. 1842.

The Prinzenraub. 1855.

"NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE."

Death of Goethe. 1832.

"EXAMINER."

Petition on the Copyright Bill. 1839.

"LEIGH HUNT'S JOURNAL."

Two Hundred and Fifty Years Ago; a Fragment about Duels.

Books and Translations.

Elements of Geometry and Trigonometry (Legendre). (A translation, with notes and additions and an introductory chapter on Proportion.) 1824.

Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship. 1824.

Life of Friedrich Schiller. 1825.

German Romance; Specimens of its Chief Authors, &c. (Musæus, La Motte Fouqué, Tieck, Hoffmann, Richter, Goethe.) 1827.

The French Revolution; a History. 1837.

Sartor Resartus. 1838.

Critical and Miscellaneous Essays; collected and republished. 1839.

Chartism. 1840.

On Heroes, Hero-Worship, and the Heroic in History. (Six lectures, reported, with emendations and additions.) 1841.

Past and Present. 1843.

Oliver Cromwell's Letters and Speeches, with Elucidations. 1845.

Latter Day Pamphlets. 1850.

Life of John Sterling. 1851.

Development [illegible] Nigger Q[illegible] with additions. ([illegible] Magazine.) 1853.

History of Friedrich [illegible] called Frederick [illegible]-65. (Vols. I. [illegible] 1858; Vol. III., [illegible] Vol. IV., Feb., [illegible] and VI., March, [illegible]

Inaugural Address a[illegible] 1866.

Shooting Niagara; [illegible] (Reprinted from Maga[illegible]ine, with a[illegible] corrections.) 1867.

Mr. Carlyle on the W[illegible] on the war between France, reprinted [illegible] Times.) 1871.

The Early Kings of [illegible] 1875.

Reminiscences of Th[illegible] (Edited by Mr. J. [illegible] 1881.

Reminiscences of my [illegible] in 1849. (With a pr[illegible] Froude.) 1882.

Last Words of Tho[illegible] (On Trade Unions, [illegible] by J[ane] Carlyle [illegible] 1882.

CARLYLE AS SCHOOLMASTER.

It is doubtful whether any of Carlyle's Kirkcaldy [illegible] now alive, but till within comparatively recent [illegible] were old men who remembered him and the flogging [illegible] boys, they received from him. It was a curious pie[illegible] that Carlyle should have been chosen for the school [illegible] started or revived as a rival to that presided over [illegible] Irving. For one of the chief objections to Irving, if n[illegible] the chief, was his severity; while Carlyle, it appears [illegible] whit less severe. One of Carlyle's pupils became in ti[illegible] of Kirkcaldy, and throughout life was his firm fri[illegible] Carlyle made few friends during the two years he l[illegible] town; in fact, it is questionable if he ever had any t[illegible] from Provost Swan. He wrote of the people of th[illegible] "a pleasant, honest kind of fellow-mortals, som[illegible] quietly fruitful, of good old Scotch in their works [illegible] more vernacular, peaceable, fixed, and almost geni[illegible] mode of life than I had been used to in the Bord[illegible] reason why he made no friends among them is indica[illegible] plainly by himself:—"I always rather liked the peop[illegible] from a distance chiefly, chagrined and discouraged by [illegible] one had." He was "moody and retiring," and Irv[illegible] to have been his sole companion. The two often [illegible] rambles together in Fifeshire. In the space of two y[illegible] however, "got tired of schoolmastering," an occupat[illegible] was congenial to neither, but was especially dist[illegible] Carlyle.

It is a long time now since the movement for an [illegible]

AN UNPUBLISHED LETTER FROM CARLYLE.

Mr. A. Edmund Spender, of the Western Morning News, has sent us a copy of the following letter, written by Carlyle à propos of his work on Cromwell. It is from a private collection of autographs in the possession of Miss Champernowne, Wood Manor, Totnes, and has never before been published. The name of the recipient does not appear, but he was evidently the author of a history of wages about the year 1844:—

Chelsea, March 23, 1844.

My Dear Sir,—Thanks for your newspapers and news. I was afraid you had abandoned your project of a history of wages, in which, I suppose, some labour is already invested. It is always good for a man to have some main current running through his field of speculation; it wholesomely draws off so many things, and yields some good issues far better than one expected, at last. I am so far from having done with Oliver Cromwell, it is yet odds with him whether I have got him fairly begun! No business ever fell to my hand a hundredth part so difficult.

It is like the summing up of the general stupidity of England for two centuries past, this state in which I find the hero Oliver. All books ever written upon him are torpedo monsters and belong to the realm of Nox and Erebus; how to write one now that shall belong to the other realm is not easy!

This book of the Chatham Society is what causes me to write to-day. If it be such a volume as I hope, it may save me many a headache in the British Museum.

Lancashire, Ashton, Stanley Brereton, &c., &c., especially Latham House and Chester, and the siege of Manchester, and massacre of Bolton, these are things I do not wish to omit—and they lie among the Museum "Pamphlets on the Civil War," some 40,000 or so in number!

Can you send me a correct table of contents of this Chatham volume: then the price of it if it is to be sold, or the way to borrow it, beg it, or do all to steal it, if it prove suitable and not saleable!

Yours always truly,

T. CARLYLE.

LETTER FROM CARLYLE TO ALLAN CUNNINGHAM, APRIL, 1831.

My Scripture were still lies in the scales, which way inclining I cannot say, except in the spirit of a Prophet that ever prophecyeth evil. On Saturday I shall perhaps know more. Meanwhile, as ever, it is our part to defy the Devil, whether he come in the shape of Bookseller or another. I shall to say always: A fig for thee Nicholas!

Your letter to Wilkie I shall with my WELSH LITERATURE OF THE V ERA.

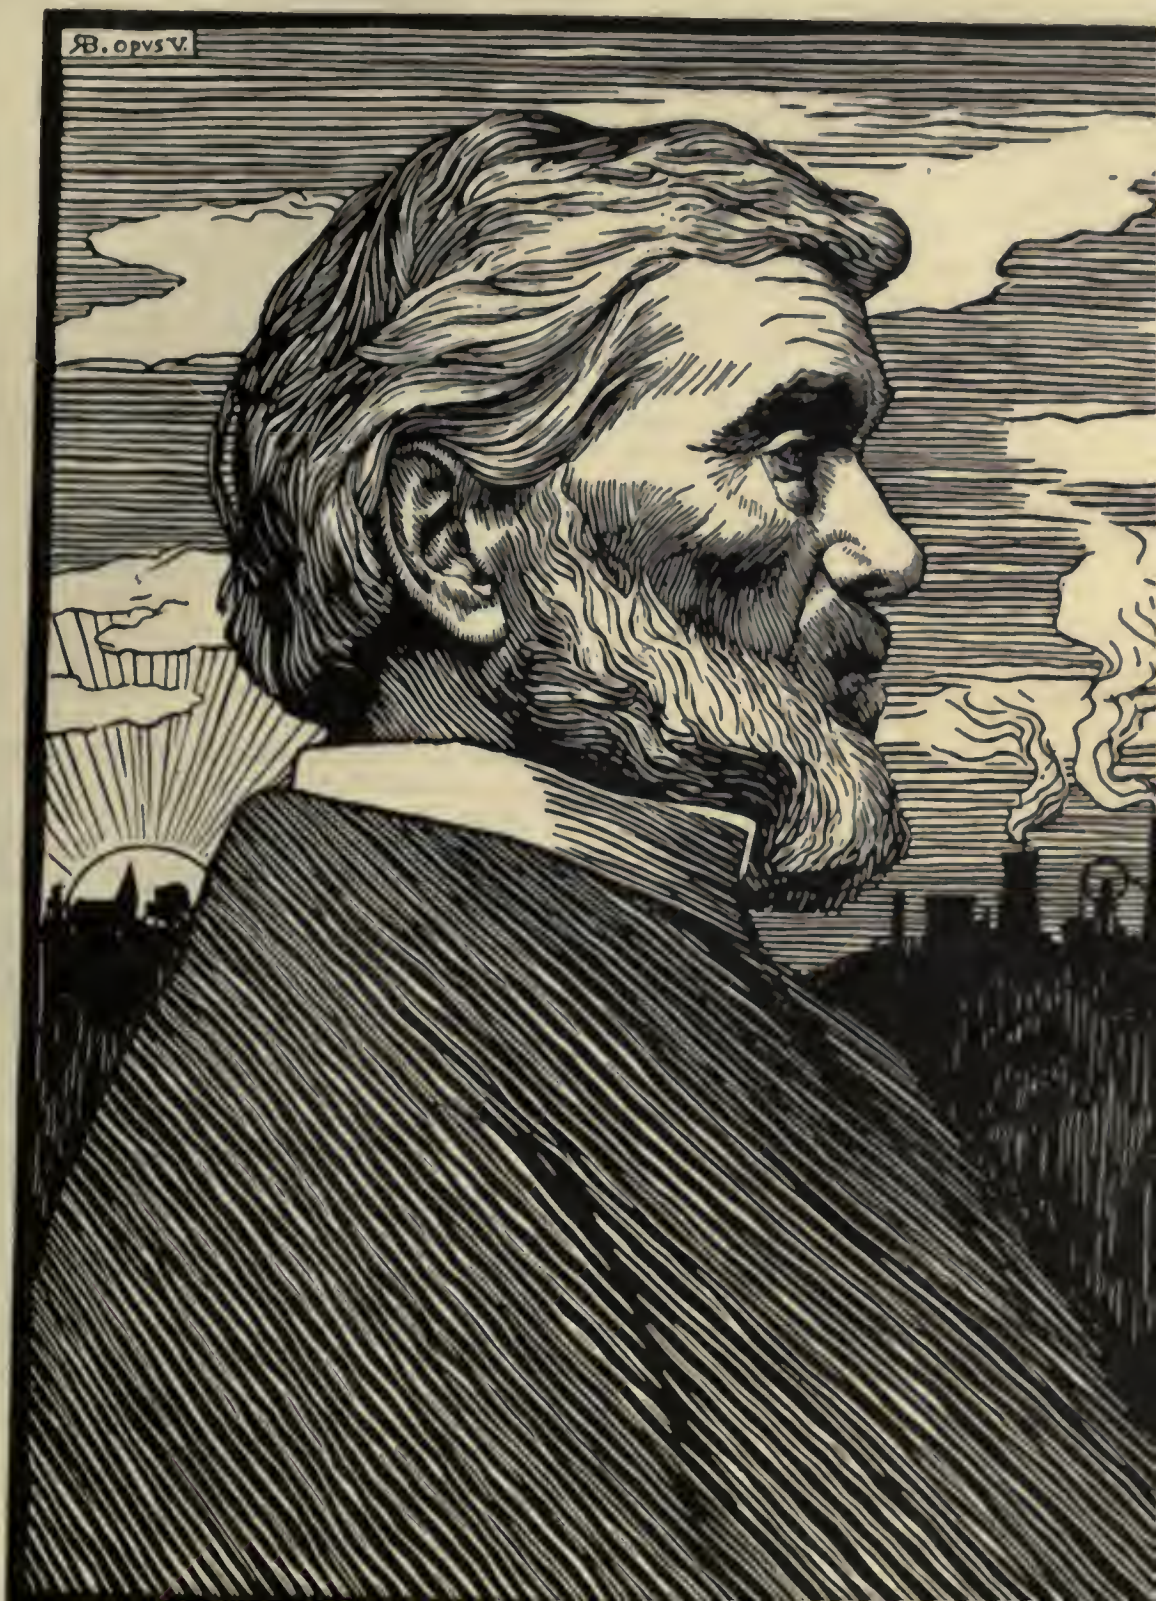
A "Personal View"

By T. RHYS JONES.

The Welsh National Eisteddfod held this we the century naturally directs the thoughts to a survey of their literature in the recent in common with other units of this heteroge has caught the inspiration of the period which with the passing of our beloved Sovereign, a extreme conservatism, has felt in the isolation of i the quickening influence of the intellectual activi powerful neighbour. Still, this external impetu and thought is confined mainly to the latter century. The privileges of higher education hav been extended to the Principality, and, while t gifts of other nations have been fostered and di Universities, the genius of the Welsh people h solely by its own primitive and imperfect ins atmosphere created by the Eisteddfod and the st of Welsh religious life have not been conducive growth and cosmopolitan character of the lite Celtic neighbours. Its prose has suffered from limitations of its religious prejudices, while the r alliterative measures have sadly fettered the muse gift of the Welsh nation, however, has attai standard of excellence in the whole range of its hi ing from the time of Aneurin and Taliessin in the than that of the period under our notice.

The literature of a nation is a true reflection thought, and the most cursory examination of Welsh writers during the la reveals that theology is pre dominant factor of the pe prejudicial it may have prov ing the intellectual outlook people, it has been the one inspiration to its prose and Its wealth of hymnology, wh come of its religious reviva greater influence over the of the people than all the fam woven alliterative poetry of Even the product of the Eis is a purely national instit meated with the same spirit of its most successful efforts almost invariably sacred; has produced very little of a character during the last has a claim to permanency.

Towards the beginning



B. OPVS V.

healthier tone to Welsh religious thought, and prepared the ground for the next phase in the development of its literature, of which Dr. Lewis Edwards was the directing genius. The publication of his essays in the "Traethodydd" gave to Welsh prose the much-needed impulse of a vigorous and cultured mind, and his literary and theological contributions are among the most precious legacies of the last century to Welsh literature. The philosophical and many-sided character of his writings directed the literary instincts of his countrymen from the mere rut of religious controversy to the broader and richer pastures of international thought, and Welsh peasant folk were made acquainted for the first time with the glories of Shakespeare and Goethe.

A still more interesting feature in the further development of Welsh prose was the acknowledgment of fiction as an accepted factor in its literature, with which innovation the name of Daniel Owen is indissolubly associated. Though not the pioneer in works of this kind, he was the first to succeed in overcoming the strong religious bias which then existed in the Principality towards light literature. Calvinism has had a most depressing influence upon the lighter aspects of Welsh life and thought. "Anything approaching the novel," as one writer justly remarked, "met with the stern and uncompromising censorship of the Church, yet right from the heart of this intolerant and colourless Puritanism, that viewed all traces of mirth and gaiety with suspicion, arose this prince of Welsh humourists. It was the dawn of a new era in Welsh literature, and had come as a godsend to lend hue and colour to the oppressive sadness of Welsh religious thought." As an interpretation of Welsh character his works deserve to rank with those of Barrie and Ian Maclaren in Scotland, and no better tribute could we pay to his art and genius, and the influence they have exerted over local prejudices, than the fact that there is scarcely a Welsh home but where "Rhys Lewis" figures as prominently as the essential family Bible or the hymn poems of Williams Pantycelyn.

In addition to the prose works which were the immediate outcome of the religious movement in Wales, the Eisteddfod has been productive in works of a more national and literary character. For centuries it has been the nursery of the literary gift of the people. In the absence of academic honours as an incentive to intellectual effort, the Eisteddfod has served as the people's university, whose prizes constituted a popular method of rewarding merit; a rough-and-ready degree of the people that gave a certain status to talent and learning. Such conditions, though invaluable as a stimulus, have not been conducive to high-class literature, and fragmentary and immature productions are the natural result of what oftentimes prove to be uncongenial themes with insufficient time allotted to their treatment. Still if it has not given birth to a literary prodigy, or led to new avenues of intellectual activity, it has produced, on the whole, much good literature, and accumulated a mass of material which will be of the utmost service to future historians and litterateurs. Until quite recently we had to thank the Eisteddfod for the only work which lays any pretence to a complete and all the finer [illegible] of the human heart. It [illegible] eminently becoming the religious movement th[illegible] thoroughly leavened Welsh national life, and [illegible] prelude to the renaissance of letters in the P[illegible] Other contemporaries scarcely less gifted further [illegible] this period of promise, and the names of Eben Fa[illegible] Hiraethog, and a host of others are as familiar to [illegible] as Byron and Tennyson are to lovers of English [illegible] Thus far it was the majestic strain of ode and epic [illegible] the most prominent feature of Welsh poetry, but the [illegible] people, who revelled in the hymn tunes of "Pantyce[illegible] more or less indifferent to these laboured product[illegible] master singers. It was the lyric muse of John Ceir[illegible] that stirred the heart of the nation to an app[illegible] secular poetry in Wales, by his inimitable love songs [illegible] pastorals. He touched a chord that had lain dormant [illegible] days of Dafydd ap Gwilym, and his message affords [illegible] first indications of the Welsh muse outgrowing th[illegible] clothes of its provincial conservatism, and frater[illegible] kindred spirits of other nations. His "Myfanwy" [illegible] very forcibly of the love rhapsodies of Burns and Mo[illegible]

> * O Love! in the violet and rose,
> I see but thy beauty and grace;
> Morn's splendour and night's starry eyes,
> But mirror the light of thy face;
> When the star of the morning grows bright,
> Hangs clear 'twixt the sky and the sea,
> All nature is blessed in her light;
> To this soul, O my love, thou art fairer, O swe[illegible]
> A thousand times purer to me.

"To the Welsh muse, heart is more than mind," rem[illegible] truly one Welsh writer recently, and Ceiriog's mess[illegible] eminently such as appeals to the heart. By his genu[illegible] of nature his poetry finds a ready response in the [illegible] illiterate peasant folk, whose humble life he has ha[illegible] the glamour of his muse.

Natur oedd ei gân drwyddi.

The charm of flower and stream and the haunti[illegible] tion of home and childhood were the themes he m[illegible] dwell upon. A greater contrast to Ceiriog's playful [illegible] not be imagined than that of the mystic muse of Islw[illegible] inherited Ceiriog's love of nature, but with an infini[illegible] insight into the heart of things. His poetry is absorb[illegible] deep religiousness which pervades Welsh poetry [illegible] century, but the spiritual element that is woven into [illegible] of his poetry finds expression, not in mere narrat[illegible] a deeper interpretation of life and nature. In his m[illegible] musings he has much in common with Wordsworth, [illegible] reminded in the following of the latter's ch[illegible] mysticism.

> * Are the stars o'erhead
> Things as divine and glorious as pussy
> Is wont to sing? Is't not some power in us,
> Some memory of a yet diviner world,
> And things illumined by the light of God,
> That dowers the stars with beauty, gives them
> And grandeur? 'Tis in us the stars have bei[illegible]
> And pussy's self is but the memory

* These range from an admirable encyclopædia, known locally as the "Gwyddoniadur," of which a second edition was published in 1893 in ten massive volumes containing 10,000 articles, and in the production of which £20,000 had been expended, to publications of the magazine type. Nor is the love of reading among the Welsh public on the wane, for quite recently no less than 20,000 copies of a 3s. 6d. Welsh book were sold, which is a remarkable sale for a miniature nation like the Welsh. The chequered history of its periodicals is not the least interesting phase of its literature. The limited circulation, which is further contracted by the various sectarian interests, is mainly responsible for the unstable character of its journalistic enterprises. Towards the end of our period it had gained greater stability, and there were published in the vernacular two quarterlies, two bi-monthlies, 28 monthlies, and 25 weeklies, making a total of 32 magazines and 25 newspapers. In addition to these there were 11 dailies and 79 weeklies published in English. The majority of Welsh magazines are connected with the various religious denominations, and its newspapers likewise generally represent some sect or industry.

The religious awakening that has so deeply influenced the literary productions of the Welsh people in the past is being gradually superseded by the educational movement. The former has inspired Welsh poetry with a grand moral sublimity, and quickened not merely the moral sensibilities, but the intellectual powers of the people. Still it has not been an unmixed blessing. Welsh Puritanism has proved a stern parent, and the effects of its well-intended restraints are only too apparent in the stunted growth of every phase of Welsh life and thought. In its relation to literature its bias and intolerance have seriously retarded its natural growth and development, and it is only the genius of a rare spirit such as Daniel Owen or Ceiriog that has succeeded in overcoming its set prejudices. The admirable system of higher education to which we have already alluded is gradually leavening the literary instincts of the people, and the broadening influence of English and other literatures is becoming more pronounced in the current productions of Welsh writers. Under the fostering care of education, with its added privileges and wider sympathies, the literary propensities of this undeniably gifted people will find a fuller exercise, and its immature peasant literature will become an important factor in the European literature of this century. Signs are not wanting of this cosmopolitan tendency. In Elved we have a representative exponent of the modern spirit in Welsh poetry, and a still more remarkable instance of this may be found in a charming collection of lyrics just published, which bear ample traces of their author's acquaintance with the trend of German as well as English thought. Another outcome of this educational movement is the tendency to adopt more generally the English language in the expression of its literary gift, a departure which has been so worthily anticipated by Sir Lewis Morris in poetry, Mr. George Meredith in fiction, and Mr. Ernest Rhys in the fields of criticism. The recent publication of "The Welsh People," which has already been reviewed in these

SOME MOVEMENTS IN VICTORIA

III.—THE POETRY OF REFLECTION A

The intellectual and poetic movement which consider is of peculiar interest, since it differ and essential respect from almost all the other d the period. Movements, whether political or li rule, it seems almost unnecessary to say, in common enthusiasm either constructive or destr directed towards the achievement of some posit support of some definite and stimulating ideal. not only of movements of advance, but also retreat; reaction itself is addressed to the ameli fixed and appreciated wrong, and it is as easy to upon which the retreat is based as that to whic advance was directed. But the intellectual an ment which now comes under our consideration i action nor of reaction; its attitude is essentially undefined. It stands midway between spiritua the one hand, and scepticism or resignation, or resigns much, without resigning all, and it is its own bearings, halting between two opini doubtful.

And its interest and importance are very mu the fact that, while it is representative of tendency very wide-spread and penetrating, th that tendency is confined, and inevitably con narrow area indeed. The tendency, we say, because the natural attitude of the reflectiv current enthusiasms is one of hesitancy and diss on the other hand, the expression of such hesitan or at any rate in poetry, is rare; since th expression invites enthusiasms, and prosper influence, while it withers and desiccates und indecision. In the present movement, which we of Reflection and Doubt, two names only stan ously, representing two attitudes, divergent but the spiritual aspirations of their day; and i Matthew Arnold and Arthur Hugh Clough we quintessence of an intellectual movement whi spreading at the present time far more widely th their own, and which is continually re-echoed helpful addition, in the "minor" verse of the y tion. This movement has, therefore, an unus the student of tendencies, since it is inextri with the advance of culture during the last fifty the influence of that reverend University, whose to go out into all lands, as her sons increase achievement. This is, indeed, the Oxford moven and it follows, no less certainly than it reacts fr great Oxford movement, whose beautiful influence to-day testifies to the integrity an which it was founded.

"There were voices in the air when I was a Arnold, and they were voices of great persuasive It is only when we consider the apathy into whi of the Church had fallen towards the close of century, when we recall the divorce from lea extended itself throughout the forms of publ we can form any idea of the sudden access of war which that movement instilled into the religion Nor was the revival one of form alone, or eve first place. The outward symbols of beauty, re

Newman and Pusey, voices of decision and energy like those of Hurrell Froude and W. G. Ward, and it is not surprising that they carried men along with them. Still, even from such beneficent and spiritual influences there could not but be reaction; and when it followed that opposition and dissension split the ranks and separated the brotherhood, it was inevitable that questionings and hesitancies should arise. Newman was lost to the Anglican fraternity, and with his secession the whole movement was exposed to misunderstanding and misrepresentation. Storms began to beat against the citadel, and in the minds of the reflective the natural question formed itself, unanswered at least to their satisfaction—"You talk to us of authority, but where is your authority grounded? Even yourselves, it seems, are divided upon its claims. Is there, after all, any authority that is impregnable?"

Then again, and with a different import, there were voices in the air at Oxford, voices of "men contention-tost." Arthur Hugh Clough, who had at first followed the Tractarians, "like a straw," as he himself said, drawn by the wind, was among the first to break with their influence. But their parting was a parting of friends. There is nothing of revolt or of violent separation in that breaking up of association which inspired the Oxford poetic movement; and, in bidding farewell to his friend Ward, Clough did so with a breadth of outlook full of hope in the future.

> But O blithe breeze; and O great seas,
> Though ne'er, that earliest parting past,
> On your wide plain they join again,
> Together lead them home at last.
>
> One port, methought, alike they sought,
> One purpose hold, where'er they fare,—
> O bounding breeze, O rushing seas!
> At last, at last unite them there!

This is certainly not the poetry of scepticism, and Clough's position with regard to the central movement of spiritual ideas has been often misjudged by the thoughtless. His nature was, in fact, one of singular candour, "of Homeric simplicity," as Arnold described it, and he could tolerate in himself no compromise with insincerity. No "light half-believer of a casual creed," he was unable to reconcile himself to the authority of religion, but it was no part of his intention to wage war on that account against those who could. His whole attitude to life was warm and genial. He loved the open air and the healthy life; he was rich in enthusiasm for the aspirations of his fellow-men, and if he chose to be a law to himself, he was at any rate content to keep that law in strenuous and virile obedience.

> Come back again, my olden heart
> I said, Behold, I perish quite,
> Unless to give me strength to start,
> I make myself my rule of right:
> It must be, if I act at all,
> To save my shame I have at call
> The plea of all men understood,—
> Because I willed it, it is good.
>
> Come back again, old heart! Ah me!
> Methinks in those thy coward fears
> There might, perchance, a courage be,
> That fails in these the manlier years;
> Courage to let the courage sink,
> Itself a coward base to think,
> Rather than not for heavenly light,
> Wait on to show the truly right.

sincere and manly isolation from that current spiritual which, could he have gone with it, he would have hime fully adorned. His abnegation of it is remote from trick of singularity; it is centred in a spirit that is itself and open to the world, leading a fresh and empha ing to Tennyson's familiar and often perverted sentim

> There lives more faith in honest doubt,
> Believe me, than in half the creeds.

When we turn to Arnold we find ourselves face to very different temperament and a different art. technique Arnold possessed almost all the qualities whi lacked, and his workmanship—deliberate and exquisite highest order of literary finish. His detractors, in sa worst, could only say that he is an academic poet to his admirers, a body which probably now includes all who fitted to judge of poetic excellence at all, would justly that the classic spirit which Oxford lives to keep alight taken to itself fresh fuel, and combined classicism with "on one far height in one far shining fire." The litt he said against Arnold's method may be said in very f It is perhaps arguable that the classic convention occasion into over-elaborate assumption of the poetic Some of the similes in his longer poems are beaten o the limits of similitude, and present the appearance excrescences than of illustrations. There was, furthe tendency to overwork the dignity of classic allusion: that fine picture of the Sicilian shepherds in "Thyrsis suggestion upon suggestion until the poem was only culty drawn back to its English atmosphere, and the v to the main theme was affected with a sense of violent These trifling foibles gave his work an occasion mannerism, to which some critics, unacquainted, per the source of the illustrations and the traditions sought to maintain, have not been slow to take But this said, and said with all due reser remains nothing but admiration for Arnold's manner, and for the delicate felicity with which rates and contrasts effects, whether pictorial or in language which seems almost infallibly at his com sustains the highest traditions of reflective and analyt and adds to the tradition just enough of modern use to make his medium recognizable as his own.

In all this he is entirely different from Clou differs from him just as radically in temperament. vigour, the modulated optimism, springing like a Clough against the intervention of depression, the part in Arnold's composition.

> Say not the struggle naught availeth, cries the one; but to the other the struggle, na determinedly as it is undertaken, seems always to be l failure and oblivion. "Thou waitest," he says to his sel

> Thou waitest for the spark from heaven! a > Light half-believers of our casual creeds,
> Who never deeply felt, or clearly willed,
> Whose insight never has borne fruit in dee
> Whose vague resolves never have been fulf
> For whom each year we see > Breeds new beginnings, disappointments ne
> Who hesitate and falter life away,
> And lose to-morrow the ground won to-da
> Ah! do not we, wanderer! await it too?
>
> Yes we await it!—but it still delays, and effectual to ourselves, but look at the majority of our fellow-creatures. What does all our intellectual effort do for them?"

What is the course of the life
Of mortal men on the earth?
Most men eddy about
Here and there—eat and drink,
Chatter and love and hate,
Gather and squander, are raised Aloft, are hurl'd in the dust, Striving blindly, achieving Nothing.

And then, to console themselves for a purposeless and effortless existence here, they promise themselves every form of material and spiritual satisfaction, "hereafter in a better world than this." This was the self-satisfied, smug doctrine of compensation which Arnold could not away with.

Foil'd by our fellowmen, depressed, outworn,
We leave the brutal world to take its way,
And, Patience; in another life, we say,
The world shall be thrust down, and we up-borne.

And will not, then, the immortal armies scorn
The world's poor, routed leavings? or will they,
Who failed under the heat of this life's day,
Support the fervours of the heavenly morn?

No, no! The energy of life may be Kept on after the grave, but not begun;
And he who flagg'd not in the earthly strife,
From strength to strength advancing—only he,
His soul well knit, and all his battles won,
Mounts, and that hardly, to eternal life.

The mere recital of that noble sonnet would serve to remind us, if indeed we needed such reminder, that Arnold's dissatisfaction with existing conditions of life and faith would by no means lose the name of action. His melancholy, of which perhaps criticism has always made enough and to spare, was no anæmic plaint of a spoilt child of fortune; and in purpose, if not in expression of purpose, he and Clough were close-knit brothers. The difference was that each saw, as it were, one aspect of the disease of life, and each prescribed one remedy. To Clough the compensating joy lay in the life of humanity; to Arnold the anodyne was the life of ideas.

Sit, if ye will, sit down upon the ground,

says Clough,

Yet not to weep and wail, but calmly look around Whate'er befell,
Earth is not hell;
Now, too, as when it first began,
Life is yet life, and man is man.
For all that breathe beneath the Heaven's high cope,
Joy with grief mixes, with despondence hope.
Hope conquers cowardice, joy grief;
Or at least faith unbelief.
Though dead, not dead,
Not gone, though fled;
Not lost, though vanished.
In the great gospel and true creed,
He is yet risen indeed;
Christ is yet risen.

He sees the consolation of life in the common emotions of mankind, while Arnold avoids them, to live for cultivation of the beneficent idea alone.

A fugitive and gracious light he seeks,

So do these twin-brethren of the Oxford spiri supplement one another, until in combination th perfect stature of the Gentle Mother's strenuous son. The ideals for which they stood, and the po they would have steeped life, did not immediat acquiescence. Clough's reputation was chiefly po for years Arnold's favourite depreciation of himse popular author "had more than a rhetorical sign in the ideals which they established we seem to of that spirit which Oxford is diffusing more wide and if it is to the spirit of Clough that we ov University activity against the miseries of t Arnold's example that informs the thought of O and abroad with a certain reserve towards u ecstatic enthusiasms, but also with a perpetu faith in the permanence of the idea, and in the of the life that sets itself some high ideal, and s it without remission—

Still nursing the unconquerable hope,
Still clutching the inviolable shade.'

And this movement, which was at first a rea ecclesiastical movement which preceded it at actually come, with the process of time, to work with its old dissentient; so that even those who and Arnold just that stimulus of spiritual aspirati find in Tennyson and Browning find in them still counterpart in that intellectual aspiration fro religion can never be divorced. In Arnold's ov are all seekers still," and the surest consolations are found in those few and dauntless spirits, wh strong infection of our mental strife," "keep nearer to the true goal of all of us, to the ideal, to beauty, in a word, which is only Truth see side."

ARTHU

CURRENT LITERATU

RECENT FRENCH BOOKS.

The Diamond Necklace.

A book on Marie Antoinette is always wele so when, like L'AFFAIRE DU COLLIER, d'après Documents, by Frantz Funck-Brentano (Paris: Ha it is written by the erudite historian of the E "Drame des Poisons," and contains entirely ne When the mass of perverted or invented facts, pa and legendary accretions, is removed, the famous in the light of a clever swindle, important only rank of some of the personages involved in it. swindle was the work of a woman of noble orig life, pretty Madame de la Motte, an authentic de Valois Kings, with something in her blood of intrigue, whose adventures, when thrown out in the searchlight of history, make us think of Beck wriggling into a front seat in the ever-thronged To complete the likeness with Thackeray's hero along with her an officer of broken fortunes, featured, M. de la Motte. Nothing is wanting i picture where splendour mingles with unpaid bills the Mont-de-Piété the pawnbroker's shop q

the fleurs-de-lys in the Atlantic. But for the last hundred years the nobility has been sadly deteriorating; this latest scion of a noble house is an effeminate prelate, indulging in all the freaks of fashion, and accepting without a protest of common sense the prodigious impostures of Cagliostro. A certain Mlle. de la Tour, whom later impostors would have called a medium, was once made to see Marie Antoinette in a crystal globe containing pure water:—

> "Il lui demanda ensuite,", proceeds the report of the girl's examination before the judges, "si elle ne voyait pas un vieux bonhomme vêtu de blanc, qui se promenait dans le jardin, qui venait pour l'embrasser; elle dit qu'elle le voyait. . . . Puis Cagliostro l'avertit qu'elle allait voir le Cardinal à genoux, tenant en main une tabatière dans laquelle il y aurait un petit écu. . . la jeune fille dit qu'elle voyait effectivement le Cardinal. . . . Alors le Cardinal, très ému, dit que c'était incroyable, extraordinaire. . . . Il avait l'air pénétré de joie et de satisfaction."

As a chansonnier put it:

> Mais le Pape, moins honnête,
> Pourrait dire à ce nigaud:
> Prince, à qui n'a point de tête
> Il ne faut point de chapeau!

The Cardinal's credulity is diverting, no doubt, but it is none the less distressing to think that the fate not only of a dynasty, but of a great country, was in such incapable hands.

Louis de Rohan, for reasons which it would be too long to explain here, was not in favour with the Queen; this Madame de la Motte knew, and she soon made the Cardinal believe that the disfavour was due to a misunderstanding that Marie Antoinette was anxious to dispel. A forged correspondence was then established and led to an interview in the Park of Versailles between the Cardinal and the Queen, whose part was played by one of Madame de la Motte's accomplices. Finally the Queen was supposed to have commissioned her forgiven liege to purchase a costly necklace, made for the notorious Du Barry, which the old King's untimely death had prevented her having. Once in possession of the jewel, Madame de la Motte broke it up and began disposing of the diamonds, some of them being sold even in London. When the bills fell due, at "the quart d' heure de Rabelais," as the French say, the whole swindle came to light. Rohan was arrested on the charge of forgery and lodged in the Bastile. After a protracted judicial inquiry, the Cardinal was acquitted, and Mme. de la Motte sentenced to be whipped, branded, and imprisoned for life.

M. Funck-Brentano's book is a plea, not only for the Queen, over whom suspicions long hung, but for the Cardinal, generally looked upon as an accomplice. The reader will, no doubt, be convinced that the author is quite right, and readily acquit the Cardinal on the score of weak-mindedness; as to the Queen, she needs no justification, after the eloquent vindication which M. Labori—ere long destined to play a foremost part in a judicial affair as momentous in its consequences in the nineteenth century as was the Affaire du Collier in the eighteenth—some years ago enthusiastically undertook. Of course the Queen was the only real victim of this unfortunate affair. During the long months pending the trial, pamphleteers assiduously bespattered her with calumnies; and in true heartless Parisian way, the people applauded every insult heaped upon her, whom they envied for her beauty, her happiness, her high rank. The shortsightedness of her natural protector, the King, is not astonishing in one of such shallow capacities, who, instead of instances will suffice; he has been patient enough t by inferences drawn from forgotten deeds, Madame de drawing-room at the apogee of her chequered career the help of a Paris jeweller, to reconstitute the famous a photograph of which is inserted in the work and below. English readers will learn with interest Funck-Brentano is preparing as a sequel to this work the death of the Queen; a fact which perhaps accou inadequate dénouement of the story. We learn what the jewellers who made the necklace and of some of plices in the swindle, but Madame de la Motte weeping but not repentant, in a cell at the Salpêtrière

Victor Hugo's Love Letters.

It is a difficult question to determine how far it is to disclose a writer's private life. Perhaps the right said by Matthew Arnold when our conception of man was shattered by the publication of the poet's le in that case something might have been said for publica

THE DIAMOND NECKLACE.
[From "L'Affaire du Collier," by permission of MM. Hachette

the letters existed every one knew, and misgivings contents roused curiosity. An idealist poet leading a life might prove an interesting study, if it did not light on the poet's work. We can also conceive of a private correspondence revealing a character wh from us, that of Virgil, for instance, whom some s withstanding his tender lines, to have been Alexandrine.

family being related to a Foucher family, Victor often met Adèle Foucher; he was seventeen, she a year younger. On April 26th, 1819, they declared their love, and forthwith, like the most ordinary pair of lovers, wrote lyrical effusions to each other. After three years' courtship, the usual difficulties of dissatisfied father and heart-broken mother and meagre resources being overcome, Victor and Adèle were married on October 12th, 1822. The only tragic incident is the death of the poet's mother, one of the chief obstacles, be it said, in the way of the pair. The comic element is afforded by General Hugo, the poet's father, whose readiness to give the consent required by the French law is explained by his own desire to have his son's forgiveness for having married again, in an almost clandestine manner, three weeks after his first wife's death.

The letters do not shed a single ray of new light on Victor Hugo's character. They are chiefly made up of the namby-pamby sentences that an ordinary youth, with a turn for literature, dashes off with a vast amount of self-satisfaction. Between the lines appears a pretty, intelligent girl, a little arch, perhaps, in spite of a great display of shyness, as befits a young lady brought up in strict bourgeois and Catholic principles. Theirs, after all, is the story of a very commonplace Luxemburg garden idyll.

Strange to say, Hugo speaks little of his work, of his future plans, of his assurance of glory—an evident proof, of course, that these letters were never intended for publication. However, he commits himself twice to a definition of poetry that seems to have startled Adèle, brought up in classical literary principles.

> En deux mots, la poésie, Adèle, c'est l'expression de la vertu; une belle âme et un beau talent poétique sont presque toujours inséparables. Tu vois donc que tu dois comprendre la poésie; elle ne vient que de l'âme et peut se manifester aussi bien par une belle action que par un beau vers.

The opinions even of Victor Hugo at seventeen are not very interesting.

Having conscientiously read this latest of Victor Hugo's posthumous publications, we must record our impression of its absolute worthlessness. There was only one person who could read these letters over with interest—she to whom they were addressed. Madame Hugo had carefully hidden them away, and it has been a most unwarranted sacrilege to remove them. No doubt when young Victor penned them in the Rue des Petits-Augustins, with his head all in a ferment about grandiloquent dramas and odes and ballads, he was, as Chateaubriand called him—by the way, more for party purposes than from solid conviction—an enfant sublime; but, after all, he was only an enfant, and he spoke and wrote like an enfant.

A Modern Bachaumont.

The fifth series of the biographical sketches and interviews which the son-in-law of M. Sarcey, M. Adolphe Brisson, has been publishing annually has just come out in Paris, under the now well-known title PORTRAITS INTIMES (Colin). M. Brisson is a sort of modern Bachaumont, the famous author of the indispensable "Mémoires Secrets." As a matter of fact, nothing could be less secret than the revelations of M. Brisson; he has all the audacities of the modern interviewer, but happily so much good humour and so wide a knowledge of men and things that he never gives offence. His curiosity ranges from Thérésa to Eusapia Palladino, and from Mr. Kruger to M. Bourget. During his visits to the members of this motley throng he almost always succeeds in making them say many things worth hearing, placing them the while in characteristic surroundings. A general

D'EXERCICE DANS L'ANCIENNE FRANCE. A study air amusements of Frenchmen is the last t that was to be expected from the very le bookish, historian of "The Novel in Shakesp and of "Shakespeare in France Under the
But in his breezy picture of the wayfaring land in the fourteenth century there were pages proving that such a subject as that of sp France would not be uncongenial to M. Jus can be no doubt that the book is original an Moreover, it is pre-eminently timely. It may described as a legitimate way of being a French

Most of the sports revived in France of certain spirit of Anglomaniac snobbishness ar French games transported to England, and, for Jusserand usually explains, temporarily forgotten their origin. The very word sport, now used i reality, an old French word to be found in Ra the purists need not hesitate to use this word being too English. The ancient form of the F desport, or desporter. M. Jusserand takes u games which most resembled war; the tourn which, in the sixteenth century, had almost e
the tourney, the pas d'armes, a picturesque exer
in the defence or attack of a passage, a bridg city gate-way. On all these violent and really d ments, M. Jusserand is the most complete and historians, while his publishers have contrib illustrations. One of his most interesting chapte with the privileged and sacred animals, the dog
But, it is not only the violent, open-air sports attention. One long chapter deals with the "
the game of "soule," and of "crosse," the Fren cricket, and, no doubt, of the Indian variet United States as an importation from Canada, and crosse." "Pall mall" preserves the name of former "jeu de mail," which was a game m England when the Stuarts affected French manne and this game, which the doctors of Montpellie as a panacea for all maladies, is but a vari
"crosse." Few of us are aware, no doubt,
"chicane," which is almost as English as it is name of the "jeu de mail" as played amidst and difficulties of the open country, and comes f rather Persian word τζυκανίον (tchaugan) designa Byzantine Emperors, a sort of polo, which the
from the East, and which the Crusaders fou Constantinople. There are long chapters, all short, on sport in the sixteenth century, sport un and sport in the eighteenth century, leading up ing "epilogue" in which M. Jusserand sums conclusions after his long and fascinating inqui clusion very favourable to French capacity for sp achievements of French automobilists and ball have weakened M. Jusserand's arguments.

French Military Genius.

M. Théodore Duret, the art critic, the hist from 1870 to 1873, the collector, moreover, of the Japanese illustrated books sold recently to the N has published a brilliant little book entitled Es
DE L'HISTOIRE MILITAIRE DES GAULOIS ET DES FR
de la Revue Blanche). The task he sets himself the Germans, who have always waged war to obtain land, the French crusaders as well as Napoleon's Republican troops have launched forth on adventurous quests with vigour and dash, winning victories of which they were utterly unable, owing to their temperament, to reap the benefits, and which they have rarely put to any practical end. The thesis is not an absolutely new one, but the originality of M. Duret's book consists in the closeness of the demonstration, and he must be considered to have proved his point.

"Gazouiller un patois d'hirondelle barbare."

Such is the ambition of Mary Duclaux—Madame James Darmesteter—the writer of GRANDS ÉCRIVAINS D'OUTRE-MANCHE (Calmann Lévy, 3f. 50c.), and the "patois" is excellent French, with now and then some charming metaphor savouring more of Ruskin's mother-tongue than of Voltaire's crisp diction. There is an unmistakable foreign ring in the following sentences, faultless though their construction may be:—"Le Mené, Théoel, Pharés du surmenage cérébral est écrit sur presque toutes les tombes des Rossetti"; "cet homme paresseux, qui n'a jamais cessé de clamer le mea culpa de sa paresse, a laissé une œuvre considérable." Yet the fact that such sentences appear in the Revue de Paris before being published in book form is sufficient proof of the unceasing disrespect shown in France for time-honoured Academical formulas of style. The subject-matter of the book is no less new to French readers than the style. The four articles on the Sisters Brontë, Thackeray, Robert Browning and E. B. Browning, and Rossetti are not critical articles for readers acquainted with the writers criticized, but introductions to the study of their works. Perhaps the first essay, that on the Sisters Brontë, is the most successful. Of course the author knows her subject thoroughly, and she uses entirely new material—Charlotte Brontë's letters to Miss Nussey, recently published by Mr. Shorter in his "Charlotte Brontë and her Circle," which were not accessible to her when she wrote Emily's life in the "Eminent Women Series." Through the essay on the Sisters Brontë blows the bracing wind of Yorkshire Moors, some of which is sadly needed among the crowd of Paris men of letters cramped up in stuffy little cénacles where the germs of an alarming psittacism are so prone to develop. To think and to write according to the bent of individual talent once the threshold of school and University has been left is an ideal far removed from the present French reality. The signs are many of the breaking-up of the old seventeenth-century constitution according to which the Republic of Letters in France is still governed. Shakespeare, out of the precincts of the reviews that M. Brunetière edits or inspires, is no longer looked upon as a barbarian. Foremost in the work of emancipation has shone the Revue de Paris, giving hospitality to all forms of art, from Tolstoi and d'Annunzio to Rudyard Kipling.

The French Revolution.

M. Aulard, Professor at the University of Paris, has comprised the results of his studies of a quarter of a century in the HISTOIRE POLITIQUE DE LA RÉVOLUTION FRANÇAISE. This book is the precise narrative of the efforts to apply from 1789 to 1804 in French institutions the principles of the Declaration of Rights. To produce this volume M. Aulard has chosen for study merely the political facts, a limitation of his task which has already swollen his book to the dimensions of an encyclopedia. For twenty years M. Aulard has been doing naught else but re-reading the laws of the Revolution, the newspapers, the speeches, the election programmes, the biographies of the persons who played a rôle in it. The result is this monumental great mistake to say "the Revolution did or did not that thing," the truth being that the Revolution was ideal which Frenchmen tried to realize partially, a since then, certain writers have sought to confound, the often incoherent application of it, or with event by its very enemies with a view to destroying it. M. Aulard seek to stem the vogue of M. Clémenceau word, le bloc.

DR. WESTCOTT'S LAST BOOK.

LESSONS FROM WORK. By BROOKE FOSS WESTCOTT D.C.L., Bishop of Durham. (Macmillan. 6

A doubly pathetic interest attaches to this book. I cated to the memory of Dr. Westcott's wife, "for years my unfailing counsellor and stay." It was publi a month of its eminent author's end of life on earth. In spirit will it be accepted, we feel sure, by admirers of t genius and lofty character. But it needs no apo driftwood, as it were, of the last twenty years of strenuous life, it has the notable marks that belong to of old men's experience. It is a summary of much been long taught. It is none the less inspired by vis future. As a young man Brooke Foss Westcott, as he and he repeats it in his "Lessons from Work"—saw his old age he dreamed dreams, but dreams that were remote from the world in which he lived.

The papers of which this book is made up, essays speeches, are not, we are told, selected with any de but "they are bound together by one underlying th each case (wrote the Bishop) I approached my sub light of the Incarnation; and I have endeavoured to first to last how this central fact of history—the life illuminates the problems which meet us alike in work and in our boldest speculations." The central Christianity was indeed, to the last, the golden thre ing all Dr. Westcott's life and work. There is so autobiography in the book, in the charge with which it in the sermon preached at the commemoration of B at Trinity College, Cambridge, last December—two years after the same preacher had preached in the on the same subject—and "at the end" the Bishop's out with a special distinctness. The words which seem to us especially characteristic:—

> At the close of life, when we look back over ence, the conflicts and controversies which we hav assume new proportions. We can discern more cl before the essential questions which they involve an the disturbing exaggerations caused by the secondary become conscious of the illusoriness of partial v learn to distrust speedy results. And if we are tempt for less in the near future, our confident expe "the times of restoration of all things" is strengthe vision of a continuous movement in the affairs of clearer sense of its direction. At the same time which we have long dwelt, which we have often l express, which we have tested in the stress of life, us with irresistible force.

There is much that is familiar in the book—devotion to the detailed study of the Scriptural text, keen and enthusiastic advocacy of Christian missio

Physical Science. Two generations ago the conflict between them was a commonplace of controversy. Now that both of them are better understood it is felt that a conflict between them is impossible." There is a fine restatement of the principles on which the Bishop's work for Biblical study and criticism has been based. This and much more that is suggestive and interesting will be found in "Lessons from Work." It is a book which very fitly sums up a life of devotion to duty. It is one which will be read with deep interest by those whose interests are as wide as those of its author, and rise from social difficulties to their solution in the light of Christian principles.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Protecting our Protectors.

Although not literary in subject the monograph on TYPHOID THE DESTROYER OF ARMIES AND ITS ABOLITION (Baillière, Tindall, and Cox, 1s. n.), by Dr. Leigh Canney, M.D.Lond., is of wide general interest, and merits the attention of those engaged upon Army reform or that still wider public who are desirous for the protection of humanity from disease. Dr. Canney has shown clearly that there was no escape in any war during the past century from the most severe penalties consequent on water-borne typhoid. This he attributes very largely to the absence of effective protection or purification of all drinking water in war. He shows how in all European countries, and even in Egypt, epidemics entirely cease with protected water. The Army alone among large bodies of men, he says, continues on active service without full protection, and hence the enormous casualty lists from South Africa. He believes, and it seems with reason, flies and dust to be very weak media for conveyance of typhoid, and that if an army starts free from typhoid, it will remain so in all probability until the germs are taken in by unprotected water. He therefore insists upon the need of a Royal Water Corps Section of the R.A.M.C. charged with the responsibility of preventing typhoid, dysentery, and cholera in war and in peace. The method suggested, that of boiling, is simple, rapid, and, it would seem, effective in the hands of such a corps as is proposed. According to his plan the fuel adds 1-750th to the daily transport only. If Dr. Canney can prove, as we understand from a note is his intention, that in camps using nothing but boiled or protected water for drinking purposes, flies and dust are powerless to originate an epidemic, then there can be no doubt that it is urgent Thomas Atkins should be made acquainted, as speedily as possible, with the action, methods, and purposes of a Royal Water Corps, to be backed by the whole disciplinary strength of the Army such as is suggested. The divergent views at present held of "air-borne" and "water-borne" typhoid seem to hint that it would be of great value to humanity if the medical profession, in conjunction with representatives of the R.A.M.C., should appoint a committee to enquire into the precise facts upon which the "air-borne" theory is or may be based. Although Dr. Canney's subject is a highly technical one, his views on preventable disease are set forth in a manner which will interest all readers who desire to inform themselves upon a point of poignant interest to thousands of Englishmen at the present moment.

The Author of "The Peep of Day."

Even to some of those who have outlived the theology of twenty-sixth year, and she was two or three years when she became intimate with no less remarkabl H. E. Manning, the future Cardinal. This s friends argued and corresponded ad libitum, Miss Bevan's surprise, Manning either thoug already "converted," or believed her unable to that in 1832, "by her mother's desire, Miss B correspondence with Mr. Manning." Perfect sa been said, is not incompatible with the lack of a se In after life, when "chaffed" by the Quarter Mortimer wrote "Let me be foolish, for Chri eyes of the world"; and it is to be feared times had the prayer, as she would have said But she belonged to a section of English soc transmitted to its descendants a moral fibre of in the root of which cannot have been nourished by It is unfortunate that the simple annals of Mrs. should have been narrated so baldly as they are for surely the narrowest career in the religious brought to a woman so gentle and so refine experiences capable of being recorded in a ma even those "worldly" persons of whom her niece evidently believes the population of Great Brital composed. For instance, we suspect the Rev. T of having been something much more human preaching automaton depicted in these pages.

Nottingham Records.

NOTES ON ST. MARY'S PARISH REGISTER 1566-1812, by John T. Godfrey (Nottingham: consists of a series of extracts, with annotations, of the principal old parish church of Nottingha much biographical matter relative to old Nott and is sure to be appreciated in the district. of quaint details or illustrations of the social will not find much to gratify their tastes. Perhaps notice is that which tells of the habits of Ha an eccentric widow of good property, who died the High Pavement, aged seventy-nine, in 1775. A liarities she entertained the idea that the Ch ought to be observed on the Saturday. By way her belief the good lady insisted, with the grea in going to church at St. Mary's every Saturday best apparel, and would do no kind of work that d she attended worship, but in her ordinary cloth secular occupations for the rest of the day.

FICTION.

ANTHONY HOPE'S NEW BO

Anxious admirers of Anthony Hope's earlier forward eagerly to each new novel of his in the thrilling romance like "The Prisoner of Zenda" may possibly heave a sigh or two of modified reg ing a chapter or two of THISTRAM OF BLENT (Mur will probably, however, become reconciled to th they have finished the book. Indeed, Anthony seldom dull. As it was said of David Garric envy, that he could act on a gridiron—some vers give "act a gridiron," possibly an even hard doubt, could Mr. Hawkins write agreeably about best piece of work, the most artistic, that the author has yet done. The Tristrams are well in the centre of the composition, so to speak; they hold our attention from the first, and dominate the rest of the dramatis personæ, as is right and fitting. Mother, son, and wife—all three are finely imagined, original, and, above all, singularly interesting studies. They surprise us with a hundred unexpected turns, but they are always true to themselves—to their own very remarkable Tristram nature. And every single one of the large and varied group of people whose fortunes are mixed up in theirs—Mina and her uncle, Neeld, the respectable barrister whose editorial proclivities make him a confused participant in the great secret; Sloyd, the estate agent with irreproachable dress and hat of preternatural glossiness—they are one and all sketched in with the deftest of hands and the keenest observation. It is a great deal to have accumulated so excellent a gallery of living and lovable men and women. For it is perhaps not the least charm in Anthony Hope's latest novel that there is not one of his characters but has something amiable in it. "Tristram of Blent" is a novel without a villain. Even Major Duplay, whom the hardened novel-reader will be disposed to mistrust at first sight, develops ultimately into a gentleman not without his good points.

The book is excellently well written. That, of course, goes without saying. There are some dramatic moments in it which remain in the memory; we might instance the meeting of Tristram and Mina on the bridge, and again, perhaps, the appearance of Mr. Disney at the critical moment of the interview with Lord Southend and Lady Evenswood. But the real interest of the book lies in the unexpected turns which the remarkable blend of stubbornness and pride in the Tristram character gives to a not uncommon plot. Another man, or woman, would have taken this idea and made nothing of it: Mr. Hawkins has worked it into a story that will stand as one of his best. It is a thoroughly good piece of workmanship from start to finish.

An Ex-Bookmaker.

Mr. Percy White has cleverness enough and to spare. There are not many writers—even in an age when everybody writes—who have so completely mastered the art of delicate innuendo as he, who can convey so much in so few words, or so deftly conceal a sting in the end of a sentence. THE GRIP OF THE BOOKMAKER (Hutchinson, 6s.) is probably as clever as any of his novels, and this is no light praise. But it fails to get hold of the reader; the grip of Alf Harris, alias Mortimer Gordon, the bookmaker who so judiciously invested his winnings on the Turf, lies stronger upon his son than upon us. Here is a character out of the common run, admirably executed, and yet there is something lacking in it. The fact is, Mr. Percy White can draw manners à merveille—better than he can draw men and women. His characters are deftly painted; they act and speak naturally; you cannot lay your finger upon any error in the novelist's judgment; but you suspect him of some lack of humanity. He manifests no sympathy with them, and in consequence they fail to arouse sympathy in us; we feel that he is regarding them, with a sub-cynical smile, as amiable and on the whole quite interesting puppets. They are—and it may be added that they get through their parts excellently well. And the book is a good piece of work, skilfully executed; of which the sole fault is that it fails to touch the heart.

The Wisdom of the Simple.

Books about company-promoters and their kind have been son, make a pleasant group, drawn with insight and ju of harmless malice—a family raised suddenly from means to great wealth. And Clara Lett is a creation of novelist might be proud. But we are not prepared to any one of Mr. Constable's figures is thoroughly life-l bulk of them are something more: they convince in o caricaturist's touch, which is a pretty sure sign that t has the right stuff in him. And they are all amiab least they all have their good points—even Mrs. Sturro and the man Cockshott. The financial part of Marrable ficent idea may or may not be sound, but the moral by Mr. Constable are unexceptionable. Simplicity throughout—which is all as it should be, although b perhaps we are not very close to the realities of life. exceptionally interesting novel, and we were as sorry to bye to Walter Semple, that sanguine but simple enth the author himself.

An American Novel.

The third issue of Mr. Heinemann's Dollar Library to give us the fruit of the American "graft on t English literature," is entitled HER MOUNTAIN LOVER, in Mr. Hamlin Garland's well-known, cheery, cos style how Jim Matterson, "the real thing—cowbo trailer," is sent by his partner in a mine, "Doc" Ra London to effect a deal. First, however, the doc an "switched him on," as they say in the Dollar Library pretty and familiar type of frank and free young Yanke Bessie Blake. Jim in London is a wonderful figure, a a serious flirtation in England. But it seems afte "the girl was only foolin'," Bessie, however, has to ha explained and has to explain a little affair of her own only foolin', too; and so Bessie and Jim each belo other and Mr. Garland has furnished a simple, quite story.

SALE AT MESSRS. SOTHEBY'S.

The last important book sale of the season tool Sotheby's last week. The rare Caxton was of e interest, while the profusely-illustrated volumes on t which belonged to the late Mr. Augustin Daly afforded of the art of extra-illustrating carried to excess. The were among the principal books sold:—

Symonds. "The Renaissance in Italy." 7 vols. First e Aiken. "The National Sports of Great Britain," 182 First ed., with the coloured plates in perfe condition ... ...
Hawkins. "Life of Edmund Kean," 1869-1887. 2 vol extended to 3 vols. by the insertion of many po traits and views ... ...
Shakespeare. "Works." Boydell's ed. 9 vols. "Pericles," "Poems," "Biography" by Knight and "Portraits" by Norris; the 13 vols. extende to 44 vols. by the insertion of some 10,000 plate play-bills, &c. ... ...
Genesta. "Some Account of the English Stage, 1660 t 1830." 10 vols. extra illustrated and enlarged t 28 vols. by the insertion of many hundreds of por traits, play-bills, &c. ... ...
Montaigne. "Essayes," 1603. First ed. ... ...
Shakespeare. "Poems," 1640 (imperfect) ... ...
Spenser. "The Shepheard's Calender," 1597; "Colin Clout," 1595; "Fowre Hymnes," 1596, in 1 vol.

	£	s.	d.
Bergomensis. "De Plurimis Claris Mulieribus." Ferrara, 1497. With the plates in excellent condition	28	10	0
"Promtorius Puerorum." Pynson's print of 1499. A good copy of this very rare first ed. of the first English and Latin Dictionary	205	0	0
Shakespeare. "The Second Folio." A perfect copy, though somewhat stained, and measuring 335mm. by 218mm.	136	0	0
Caxton. "The Royal Book," 1487-88. A fine and perfect copy. The appearance of this book in the auction-room is an excessively rare occurrence. Only five perfect copies are known to exist, and the other four are in public libraries. The last perfect copy sold at auction was in 1829, when it was bought by Lord Spencer for £61 19s. In 1889 a slightly imperfect copy was sold for £365	1,550	0	0

AMONG THE REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES.—II.

The National Review is chiefly remarkable this month for Mr. A. P. Sinnett's article called "New Light on Shakespeare." The Baconian theory of Shakespeare's plays crops up so regularly about this time of the year that many will probably pass this paper by without a second thought, preferring not to plunge again into so hackneyed a controversy. But Mr. Sinnett tackles the subject from a new point of view. His theory, or rather the theory of Mrs. E. W. Gallup, explains the cipher more intelligibly than any previous writer has done. It is, in short, a biliteral cipher which is not a cryptograph of the kind that the user must have in his mind all the time he is composing, but one that could easily be arranged subsequently, while, for example, correcting the proof-sheets. And this, of course, may mean that the cipher was not necessarily the writer's work at all. Mr. Austin Dobson has in the same number one of his charming essays on Old London, "St. James's Park" being the subject selected for his paper. Other interesting articles are "A Plea for Re-opening the Rand," by Mr. P. J. MacDonell, and on "The Execution of Marshal Ney," by Sir Rowland Blennerhassett.

"How America really feels towards England" is the subject of an article in the Nineteenth Century by Mr. S. E. Moffett, of the New York Journal, which is deserving of some study as a sufficiently candid expression of the way in which the bulk of the people regard us. "Four years ago," says the writer, "America's attitude would have been one of sympathy for the Boers, intensified by hostility towards England. Now it is one of sympathy for the Boers, checked by friendship for England." But the friendship, Mr. Moffett is careful to point out, is based solely on self-interest, and will last only so long as the policies of the two Governments are consistent. In the same number Mr. Sidney Low criticizes the War Office Report, and calls attention to the danger that may come with reform. Mr. Henniker Heaton takes up again with zest the congenial task of belabouring the Post Office, in an article termed "Postal Pettifogging," and Mr. T. A. Brassey calls attention to the difficulty of carrying on the business of the Empire in the House of Commons, and suggests local legislatures for England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, together with an Imperial Parliament.

The Fortnightly contains some reflections by Miss E. L. Banks on the published love-letters of Victor Hugo and Bismarck. Certainly the latter never intended the publication to take had left to take part in the relief of Kimber Howard, "Henry VIII.'s Lord High Admiral," another informative article by Mr. Percy Cross

Mr. Carr Laughton throws further light upo English ships at the attack at Trafalgar.

"On the Monks' Island," in the Gentl is an account of St. Honorat, off Cannes to a branch of Cistercians who follow Trappist rule. Dr. A. H. Japp contribute
"Study of Nightjars," at home and abroad, Hills has a paper on "The fight at Bow, 1648," which, with the exception of the siege of the last struggle of the Royalists against t forces. "The Evolution of the Modern G title of a scholarly article from Mr. Daniel Joh

Mr. William Orpen is the subject of an ap Artist from the pen of Mr. Wilfrid Meynell, reproductions of some of the author's best
"The Fracture" and "A Lady in Black," le year. And in a second article on "Modern F Hans Baluschek's work is analysed, and there are on amateur photography and on furnishing at

Mr. Arthur Tomson writes pleasantly in t the ancient town of Dorchester, and illustrate some picturesque drawings. "Caravaggio and —the Pietà of the Vatican—is the title of a s
by Mr. John Ayscough, while Mr. Francis Ja artist selected for treatment. In the Magazin Sinding, a Danish sculptor, and Mr. Walt painter, are discussed—the latter by the sa who treats of Mr. Francis James in the above tion.

The Badminton of this month has so coloured plates. The pictures in this popul steadily improving in number and quality, bu is hardly so strong as usual. The Century is good number, both in matter and illustration.

The article of most general interest Review is by Mr. W. W. Glenny, on "T Thames."

We have also received Cassell's Magazin
Idler (Midsummer Fiction Number), and the L

Correspondence

THE APPIN MURDER.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I note that in your issue of the reference to Stevenson's "Kidnapped," you t problem—namely, "Who was the real murder Glenure?" Perhaps the most prevalent suggested by the novelist, too) is that the Cameron of Mamore. I have thought, then, t some interest to let you know that last year old and very full report of the trial of Jam almost compels one to think that "the man wh was neither a Cameron nor James Stewart latter's son. So clearly indeed is this conclusi

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Carlyle's "French Revolution," edited by Mr. C. R. L. Fletcher, Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, and "Oliver Cromwell," with an introduction by C. H. Firth, and notes and appendices by Mrs. Lomas, are to appear in three volumes each in Methuen's Standard Library. The latter includes numerous new letters of Cromwell. Messrs. Ward, Lock have also arranged to bring these two works out in one-volume form in the new series of the Minerva Library—a series which has just included "Sartor Resartus," "Past and Present," and "Heroes and Hero-Worship" in one volume. All these books, by the way, appear in Messrs. Ward, Lock's series of "Nineteenth Century Classics," edited by Mr. Clement Shorter. The finest edition of Carlyle's works, of course, is the Centenary Edition, edited by H. D. Traill, and published by Messrs. Chapman and Hall. Mr. C. H. Firth is also the author of a volume on "Cromwell's Army" for Messrs. Methuen.

Other works announced by Messrs. Methuen are "A History of Russia from Peter the Great to Alexander II.," by W. R. Morfill; "A History of the British in India," by A. D. Innes; "A History of English Literature: From its Beginnings to Tennyson"—a translation from the German of L. Engel, by J. H. Freese; "A History of the Police in England," by Captain Melville Lee; "A History of the Old Testament," by G. W. Wade; and "Regnum Dei: The Bampton Lectures of 1901," by Dr. Robertson, the principal of King's College, London.

Mr. Gosse and Mr. Heinemann have already done much to acquaint the monoglot English reader with contemporary Continental fiction by their "International Library" of "Spiritual Baedekers." They have now another series in hand to be called "A Century of French Romance." It is to consist of twelve selected novels to illustrate successive phases in the evolution of modern French fiction. The volumes will have the advantage of fine paper and print, and will be illustrated with coloured plates by living French artists. Each will have an introduction by a well-known critic, a biographical note by the editor, and a bibliographical appendix on the portraits by M. Octave Uzanne. The series will contain "La Chartreuse de Parme," by Stendhal; "Les Deux Jeunes Mariées," by Balzac; "La Tulipe Noire," by Dumas père; "Mauprat," by George Sand; "Carmen" and "Colomba," by Mérimée; "Notre Dame," by Hugo; "Le Roman d'un Jeune Homme Pauvre," by Feuillet; "La Dame aux Camélias," by Dumas fils; "Madame Bovary," by Flaubert; "Le Nabab," by Daudet; "Renée Mauperin," by the Goncourts; and "Pierre et Jean," by Maupassant. Stendhal's "introducer" will be Mr. Maurice Hewlett; Balzac's, Mr. George Moore; Dumas père's, Dr. Garnett; George Sand's, Mrs. Craigie; Mérimée's, Mr. Arthur Symons; Hugo's, Mr. Lang; Feuillet's, Mr. Henry Harland; Dumas fils', Mr. Gosse; Flaubert's, Mr. Henry James; Daudet's, Professor Trent; the Goncourts', Mr. Fitzmaurice Kelly; and Maupassant's, Lord Crewe.

The selection is a good one so far as it goes, but it is not possible to exhibit the French fiction of the period adequately in a dozen volumes. It would take the whole dozen to exhibit Balzac alone on anything like an adequate scale. Even Stendhal is not fairly represented without "Le Rouge et le Noir" to supplement "La Chartreuse de Parme," which is, nevertheless, the best single choice. Then two phases of George Sand, the first and best known and the last and most faultless, are not illustrated by "Mauprat." Moreover, Maupassant's essential virtue is best shown in his short stories. However, for what we are about to receive, we ought, no doubt, to be truly thankful, and there is a welcome infusion of new blood in the introducers. Mr. Maurice Hewlett ought to find himself particularly well suited with "La Chartreuse de Parme," and Mr. Harland with Feuillet's light and graceful work.

Mr. W. E. Henley's new volume of verse, which Mr. Nutt bulk of Mr. Henley's poetical work as definitely revise Mr. Nutt will also publish a volume of "Views and H by Mr. Henley, to form a companion to the "Essays o ture" which originally appeared in 1890. The ne collection comprises the appreciations contributed Henley to the memorial catalogues of the Glasgow and E Exhibitions of 1886 and 1888 (including the hi Romanticism in painting in the Nineteenth Century);

tion from the Raeburn of 1890, from the Dowdeswell e of French and Dutch Romanticists, 1889, and from the contributed to the Magazine of Art, the National Obse
the Pall Mall Magazine.

Mr. Nutt also announces an edition of Sheridan first printed from his MSS., with a fragment of his comedy, A Journey to Bath. The new edition is e Mr. W. Fraser Rae—whose life of Sheridan appeared t ago—with an introduction by Sheridan's grandson, the of Dufferin and Ava. The same publisher has an h volume in hand on "Shakespeare and Music," by Louis who gives a collection of the chief musical allusions in of Shakespeare, with an attempt at their explana derivation, together with much of the original music.
number of Mr. Nutt's series of "Arthurian Romances sented in Malory," will be "Morien," translated fo time from the original Dutch by Jessie L. Weston. " forms an episode in the vast thirteenth century compilati as the Dutch Lancelot, which has preserved a number of A romances, the French originals of which have disappe all, save the few students who have glanced at the 80 of the thirteenth century Dutch original, "Morien" is p unknown. Uniform with the series of "Arthurian unrepresented in Malory" will come a collection of " Lais of Marie de France," translated into English fo time, with notes and an introduction, by Edith Another of Mr. Nutt's announcements is that of a repri first English version of "The Pleasaunt Historie of La Tormes, a Spaniarde, wherein is contained his marvellou and Life, drawen out of Spanish by David Rowland of A London, 1586. Lazarillo de Tormes is the origina Picaresque novels.

Mr. Clement Shorter was recently taken to prophesying a great revival of Dickens. He has not to wait for his revenge. The other day we annou "Imperial Edition" of Dickens, to be issued by the Publishing Company with Mr. Gissing's "Character
Now we understand that the Oxford University P arranged with Messrs. Chapman and Hall for a complete of Dickens to be printed on the famous Oxford India pa Oxford Dickens will be in seventeen volumes—boun cloth and leather—and will include all the original illus
The publication will begin in the autumn.

"John Henry Newman," in the Westminster Bio will be published by Messrs. Kegan Paul in the early The life has been written by Mr. A. R. Waller—who the new Hazlitt for Messrs. Dent in collaboration Arnold Glover—and Mr. G. H. S. Burrow.

Messrs. Sampson Low are inviting subscriptions History of the Meynell Hounds and Country, 1780 to 1
J. L. Randall, illustrated with forty full-page phot plates of portraits, hunting scenes, and maps of run published in two volumes, uniform with "The Ann Warwickshire Hunt."

"The Universal Obligation of Tithes," written b known barrister, dealing with the subject among al and from the earliest times, will be published immedi
Mr. Elliot Stock.

Mr. W. B. Clive has removed to 157, Drury-lane, W

Books to look out for at once.

"The Children of the Nations." A Study of Colonizatio Problems. By P. Bigelow. Heinemann. 10s. 6.

"Rotticelli." By E. Steinmann. (Monographs on Artists.) Grevel. 1s. n.
"The City Temple Pulpit Sermons." Vol. 5. By John Parker. Hodder and Stoughton. 3s. 6d. n.
"Essays from the Guardian." By Walter Pater. Macmillan. 8s. 6d. n.
"De Omnibus." By Barry Pain. Fisher Unwin. 1s. and 2s.
[The life and philosophy of the omnibus conductor as told by himself.]
"The Eternal City." By Hall Caine. Heinemann. 6s.
"Souls of Passage." By A. E. Barr. Unwin. 6s.
"By Rock and Pool and Other Stories." By Louis Becke. Unwin. 6s.
[A collection of reminiscences and recollections of fishing and natural history in Australia and the South Seas.]
"The Striking Hours." By Eden Phillpotts. Methuen. 6s.
"The Devastators." By Ada Cambridge. Methuen. 6s.
"Four Leaved Clover: an Everyday Romance." By "Gray Maxwell." Heinemann. 6s.
"Sir Hector: the Story of a Scots Gentleman." By Robert Machray Constable. 6s.
"The Skipper of Barncraig." By Gabriel Setoun. Constable. 6s.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

DRAMA.

APHRODITE AGAINST ARTEMIS. By T. Sturge Moore. 7½×5½. Unicorn Press. 2s. 6d. n.
[A drama after the Greek fashion and in blank verse.]
HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR. By R. Marshall. 7×5. 152 pp. Heinemann. 1s. 6d.

EDUCATIONAL.

INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION AND RURAL EXODUS. By C. C. Rogers. 7×5. 67 pp. Humphreys. 6d.
ELEMENTARY GEOMETRY PLANE AND SOLID. By T. F. Holgate. 7½×5. 440 pp. The Macmillan Company. 6s.
HENRY V. (School Shakespeare.) Ed. by R. Brimley Johnson. 7×5¼. 206 pp. Blackwood. 1s.

FICTION.

JOHN HENRY. By Hugh McHugh. 6¾×4. 96 pp. Heinemann. 1s.
SISTER CARRIE. By T. Dreiser. (The Dollar Library). 7½×5. 357 pp. Heinemann. 4s.
[The adventures of a country girl in Chicago.]
TOM FLAHERTY'S GHOST and Other Tales. By Major J. Short. 7½×5. 295 pp. Simpkin.
FOR ALL TIME. By C. R. Fenn. 7¾×5¼. 369 pp. Digby, Long. 6s.
A MODERN SLAVE DEALER. By A. P. Crouch. 7¾×5¼. 308 pp. Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.
THE CONTINENTAL DRAGOON. By R. N. Stephens. 7¾×5¼. 299 pp. Ward, Lock. 6s.

HISTORY.

TIME TABLE OF MODERN HISTORY, A.D. 400-1870. By M. Morison. 12×15. 188 pp. Constable. 12s. 6d. n.
[Contemporary events in different countries arranged in separate columns, opposite their respective dates.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

TRANSACTIONS OF THE BIBLIOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY. Vol. V., Part II. 9×7. Bladon, East, and Bladon.
THE FEEDING OF ANIMALS. By W. H. Jordan. FARM POULTRY. By G. C. Watson. (Rural Science Series.) 7¼×4¾. 450+341 pp. The Macmillan Company. 5s. n. each.
A DICTIONARY OF ENGLISH AND WELSH SURNAMES, With American Instances. By C. W. Bardsley. 8½×7. 637 pp. Frowde. 21s. n.
[With a preface by his brother, the Bishop of Carlisle.]

PHILOSOPHY.

THE THERMAL MEASUREMENT OF ENERGY. By E. H. Griffiths. 7½×5. 135 pp. Cambridge University Press.

POETRY.

A BOOK OF VERSES. By Mr. J. G. Wilson. 7½×5¼. 76 pp. Stock. 2s. 6d.

POLITICAL.

AMERICAN DIPLOMATIC QUESTIONS. By J. B. Henderson, Junr. 9×6. 529 pp. The Macmillan Company. 14s. n.
RECONSTRUCTION IN MISSISSIPPI. By J. W. Garner. 8½×5½. 422 pp. The Macmillan Company. 12s. 6d. n.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

RAM WILDFIRE. By Helen Mathers. 7×5. 460 pp. Simpkin. 1s.
A HISTORY OF MODERN EUROPE. Third Ed. Vols. I. and II. By T. H. Dyer and A. Hassall. 7¾×9¼. 470+481 pp. Bell.

SCIENCE.

ORIGINAL PAPERS. By the late J. Hopkinson. Two vols. Ed. by B. Hopkinson. 9×6. 294+393 pp. Cambridge University Press. 21s. n.
[Technical and scientific papers chiefly on electrical subjects.]

THEOLOGY.

JUDGES AND RUTH. Handbooks to the Bible and Prayer-book. By Rev. G. H. S. Walpole. 7½×5. 200 pp. Rivingtons. 2s. 6d.
ROMANS. (The Century Bible.) Ed. by A. E. Garvie. 6½×4½. 322 pp. Edinburgh:

CHESS.

Address "Chess": Literature, Printing House

PROBLEM No. 211. by A. CORRIAS, Italy.

BLACK. 8 pieces

WHITE. 7 pieces.

White to play and mate in two moves.

PROBLE
OTMAR N

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to play an

GAME No. XCII.—A P – K B 4 game at A

White. W. Schwann.	Black. A. E. van Foreest.	White. W. Schwann.
1. P – K B 4	P – Q 4	15. Q – R 5 ch
2. P – K 3	P – K 3	16. Q – R 3
3. Kt – K B 3	Kt – K B 3	17. K P × P
4. P – Q B 3	P – Q B 4	18. Q × Kt P
5. B – Q 3	Kt – Q R 3	19. P × P
6. B – B 2	B – K 2	20. B – Q 2
7. P – Q 4	P – Q Kt 3	21. Q R – Q B sq
8. Castles	Kt – K 5	22. B – B 3
9. Q Kt – Q 2	P – K B 4	23. R – K 2
10. B – R 4	B – Q 2	24. Q – R 3
11. Kt × Kt	B P × Kt	25. R – K 3
12. B × Kt	P × Kt	26. B – Q 2
13. B × B	P × Kt P	27. Q – Kt 3
14. R – B 2	Q × B	White resigns.

GAME No. XCIII., played in the Monte C

SICILIAN DEFENCE.

White. Tschigorin.	Black. Mieses.	White. Tschigorin.
1. P – K 4	P – Q B 4	40. R – Q B sq
2. Q Kt – B 3	P – K 3	41. K – K 2
3. Kt – B 3	Q Kt – B 3	42. Kt – Kt sq
4. P – Q 4	P × P	43. Q – K 5 ch
5. Kt × P	K Kt – B 3	44. P × Q
6. K Kt – Kt 5	B – Kt 5	45. K – Kt sq
7. P – Q R 3	B × Kt ch	46. K – K 2
8. Kt × B	P – Q 4	47. Kt – Q 2
9. P × P	P × P	48. R – B 7
10. B – Q 3	B – Kt 5	49. R – B 6 ch
11. P – K B 3	B – R 4	50. P – Kt 3
12. Castles	Castles	51. R – B 6
13. R – K Kt 5!	Q – Kt 3 ch (a)	52. R – Kt 8 ch
14. K – R sq	Kt – K 2 (b)	53. Kt – B 4
15. R – K sq	Q – Q 3 (c)	54. K – K 2
16. Q – Q 2	B – Kt 3	55. P × P
17. Kt – Kt 5	Q – Q 2	56. Kt – Q 6
18. Kt – Q 4	Kt – B 3	57. R – Q R 8
19. B × Kt (d)	P × B	58. R – Q Kt 8
20. Kt – K 2	Kt – K 4	59. K – K 3
21. Kt – Kt 3	Kt × B	60. K – K 2
22. P × Kt	Q – Kt 4	61. Kt – P ch
23. Q R – Q sq	K R – K sq (e)	62. Kt – Q 6
24. R – K B sq	Q R – B sq	63. K – Q 2
25. P – B 4	P – B 4 (f)	64. K – B 3
26. R – Q B sq	Q – B 3	65. R – Kt 6
27. Kt – K 2 (g)	K R – Q B sq	66. K – Q 3
28. Kt – Q B 3	Q – Kt 5 (h)	67. Kt – K 8 ch
29. P – Q 4	P – Q Kt 4	68. Kt – Q 6 ch
30. Kt – K 2 (i)	R – B 7	69. Kt – K 4
31. Q – Kt 4	Q – K 6	70. K – Q 4
32. R × B	R × R	71. Kt – B 3
33. Kt – B 3	Q – Q 7	72. R – Kt 8 ch
34. R – K Kt sq	R × P	73. R – Kt 7 ch
35. Q – R 5	K – Kt 2	74. P – R 4
36. Q – R 7	Q × Q P	75. R – Kt 6
37. Kt × Q P !	R – Q 7 (j)	76. K – Q 3
38. Kt – B 3	P – Q B 3 (k)	77. K – Q 4
39. P – R 3	B – Q 6	78. R × P and White resigned on the 85th move (m) (

BLACK. MIESES

(a) This proves dare not take the (b) If 14 Q × P,
Q – Q 2, 16. Q – K
Q – Q sq, 18. R × P.
(c) Most careful stead 15. K R – K
R × R, 17. B × Kt,
(d) It is probab little better at this (e) After defend accuracy, Black ground lost by his
(f) An to his sup for pos
Black is bis to

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 200. SATURDAY, AUGUST 17, 1901.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

NOTES OF THE DAY 145, 146, 147

"LITERATURE" PORTRAITS.—XV. Henrik Ibsen 147

IBSEN IN ENGLAND—A "Personal View," by A. B. Walkley 155

SOME MOVEMENTS IN VICTORIAN POETRY, by Arthur Waugh. IV. The Poetry of Emotion 157

THE YOUTH WAGNER 159

CURRENT LITERATURE—

The Complete Works of John Gower, Vols. II. and III. 161

To the Mountains of the Moon 161

A Book of Brittany—Some Literary Landmarks for Pilgrims on Wheels—Ward, Lock's Guide Books—Glasgow in 1901—Bath; Malmesbury; Bradford-on-Avon—Bristol—The Coaching Man's Compendium—Wagner, Bayreuth, and the Festival Plays 162, 163

Bush-Whacking, and Other Sketches—Marna's Mutiny—Her Majesty's Minister—The Inheritors—Kitty's Victoria Cross—The Archbishop and the Lady—The Sea Hath Its Pearls—Franks: Duellist—The Wisdom of Esau—In Bad Company, and Other Stories—Told by the Taffrail—The Blue Diamond—The Dream Woman—Malicious Fortune 164, 165

LIBRARY NOTES 166

CORRESPONDENCE—The Etymology of "Germany" 166

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for... 167, 168

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS 168

NOTES OF THE DAY.

We publish on page 147 a special article on Ibsen and his work, with illustrations, followed by a "Personal View," entitled "Ibsen in England," by Mr. A. B. Walkley. On page 155 Mr. Arthur Waugh continues his series of articles on Victorian poetry with a paper on "The Poetry of Emotion." Next week we shall publish a special illustrated Ruskin number, with a reproduction of Mr. R. Bryden's wood-cut portrait of Ruskin, and Mr. Waugh will carry on his series with a paper on "The Poetry of Reaction and Artifice."

* * * *

Authors and artists alike are notoriously unbusinesslike people, and perhaps it is as well that the question of copyright has been taken up so diligently on their behalf by others. The International Congress on this subject which has been sitting at Vevey got through quite a lot of work on Monday. Among other things a resolution was voted for the repression of false signatures to works of literature and art—by which we understand that the Congress proposes to make the offence a matter of criminal instead of civil law. All non-authorized execution or reproduction of works by telephones, phonographs, or similar machines was declared to be illegal. A discussion was then held at Oxford the other day, in his course of lectures Extension students on "The Making of England." glad to notice that the lecturer put in a kindly word of t for the famous story of the cakes. The tale was apparently, within a century of Alfred's death; it i itself particularly improbable; it is told of no other history; and there is no apparent reason why it shou been invented. The spirit in which a story of this acceptest as possible because it is pretty and not al ineredible is none too common among historians, w generally only too apt to exert all their energies in ove ing some harmless legend. After all, it is these sto make history human, and that help to keep the more im facts fixed in the memory. Without the burnt cakes a children would remember much of Alfred's history.

* * * *

Books to read, recently published:—

"Two Moods of a Man." By Violet Fane. (Nimmo.)

"Bush-Whacking and Other Sketches." By Hugh C.M.G. (Blackwood.)

"A Book of Brittany." By S. Baring Gould. (Methu

"From Squire to Prince." By W. Phelps Dodge. (Un

* * * *

The proposal to carry a light railway up Yarrow likely to meet with vigorous opposition. Sir Walte "The Ettrick Shepherd," Wordsworth, "Christopher and others have in a sense hallowed its fairy-haunted Readers of "Marmion" are familiar with the countr vicinity of St. Mary's Loch and Newark Tower, and the "The Lay of the Last Minstrel" is also in the Yarrow Norman Macleod declared his highest idea of earthl ness to be a long summer's day spent with a few choice in Yarrow, and Wordsworth wrote—

> "Where'er I go,
> Thy genuine image, Yarrow,
> Will dwell with me—to heighten joy,
> And cheer my mind in sorrow."

* * * *

The Dramatic Artists' Association of France received a considerable windfall under rather stran cumstances. A ticket, carrying with it a prize of £1, lottery, could not be traced although its legitimate ow widely advertised for. At last it was discovered t missing ticket was included in a packet of some thou others which had been purchased by the banking firm of Rothschild and which had hitherto been unaccountab looked. On drawing the money, Messrs. Rothschild ge presented it to M. Coquelin on behalf of the associatio

Claretie has just published a curious letter from Bulwer Lytton proving that there was a time when Paul de Kock had a vogue even among men of letters. The document, which M. Claretie bought at one of Charavay's sales, dates from 1836, about the period of "Oliver Twist" and "Mr. Pickwick":—

> Dear Sir,—Allow me to express to you my sentiments for the honour you have done me by the letter handed me by my friend Comte d'Orsay. I am charmed to see that my opinion on the tendencies of your works is such as you would wish. Perhaps, and to speak frankly, might I regret that this tendency of a rich imagination should go beyond the bounds of morals and serve as a means of leading the vulgar into error, and that in particular your opinions on morality between the sexes should be utterly different from that which is generally accepted in this country—where it is the only morality current. I do not say this to you as a reproach, but it is because I have found it somewhat difficult to obtain a just appreciation of your merits. The most striking is that fine kindness of heart and the profound and often seductive philosophy that form the real essential of a comic vein which is more vigorous and more powerful than that of any author that I know. In the Edinburgh Review of January next I shall try to give body to my opinions on your talent, in a way agreeable to you. If there are any restrictions it will be the fault of my editor, not mine; but I hope that there will be no restrictions. Genius was given to man as a compensation for his inevitable misfortunes and torments—and your work regards life in so amiable and indulgent a way that I see well enough that it is the reflection of a joyous character and of a satisfied heart. Excuse me for writing this letter in English, but I do not know your language well enough to express to you in French my enthusiastic admiration and my profound respect. I am, dear Sir, your obliged and devoted, E. Lytton Bulwer.

M. Claretie recalls several mots of Paul de Kock. One day the novelist said to him:—"I am accused of being read only by the kitchen-maids. Mon Dieu, I should be enchanted to be read by the chimney-sweeps. That would prove that the chimney-sweeps know how to read." Bulwer Lytton was not a kitchen-maid nor a chimney-sweep. We find it a little difficult, perhaps, to understand to-day how the author of the Quo Vadis of his time could have felt for Paul de Kock so naïve an admiration.

* * * *

THE HAUNTED GARDEN.

Along the desolate terrace once arrayed
  In stateliest bloom, frail bramble-roses blow,
  Peering from vagrant sprays, forlornly low,
Through the grey ruins of the balustrade.
O'er the rank grasses of the laurel glade,
  Blithe trysting-place of lovers long ago,
  A bodeful sadness hovers, by the glow
Of sunset only the intenser made.
As twilight musters, with its shadows sere
  And awesome soundlessness, across the brain
There creeps a formless, indefinable fear,
  A sense of shapes phantasmal, fraught with bane,
Of furtive footfalls suddenly gliding near,
  And stifled murmurs that to meaning wane.

WILLIAM TOYNBEE.

* * * *

students, we are sure to find either lawless nothing effeminate namby-pamby weaklings."

* * *

Several interesting manuscripts of songs, the Scottish National Bard have been acquire of the Burns' Cottage and Museum and Monu Among these is the Gibson-Craig copy of "T which a sum of 210 guineas was paid in 1887. purchased by the trustees for £100. It is writt of a large folio double sheet, and bears two i ink of the Excise stamp. The other manuscrip of "Holy Willie's Prayer," for which the t £200. For the whole of the remaining MSS., s price paid was £100.

It is proposed to secure the erection of a to the late Robert Buchanan at Southend. Th sented to act as treasurer of the fund, and sub be forwarded to him.

Professor Baron von Nordenskjold, the w explorer and author, died on Monday evening. of Helsingfors, and was created Baron by the K his return from discovering the North-West pas

Owing to want of space at the Bodleian, are considering the question of ceasing to clai tions, such as tracts and Christmas cards, und Act. Last year the various items acquired nu

A Cromwell library of 114 volumes has b parish of Naseby.

A society has been organized in France of the "Arouetistes," for the purpose of holdi in honour of Voltaire.

Madame Durand and her staff on La Fr paper, are proposing to undertake a theatrical provinces of France.

Count Leo Tolstoy, who has now complete his recent illness, has just finished his new pamp question, which is called "The Only Way. hundred pages long.

A prize of £1,500 has been offered for on "What do we learn from the principles of the in reference to the internal political developme of States?" The essays must be written in reach Professor Haeckel, of Jena, by Dec. 1, 1

The name of the late Sir Walter Besant's to be published by Messrs. Chatto and Windus, to "No Other Way," the previous title " having been recently used by another novelist.

Messrs. George Newnes have issued a pr quarterly, the Ideal, which is to be issued, to at ten guineas a number, or at thirty-eight g will contain forty pages of text with illustra photogravure, and at least eight full page etc or other fine art reproductions.

Journalism in France.

In our insular fashion, we have been accustomed now for many years to regard the French newspapers as hardly worthy of serious comparison with even the lightest and most flippant of our English dailies. The few who make a practice of reading them are no doubt wiser, but the majority take their opinion from the scraps of abuse and absurdity which they see from time to time quoted in their own particular morning paper. To these we commend an article, in the current number of the Cornhill, on "The French Press," written by one who evidently knows his subject well, and has several illuminating comments to make on the nature and methods of Parisian journalism. Among other things, he points out that the licence, against which we are so fond of declaiming on this side of the Channel, is there possibly necessary to the welfare of the State. The community in France is, in fact, so highly organized; the machinery of Government so vast and complicated an affair, that an outspoken and disrespectful Press makes, perhaps, the best form of social safety-valve. Violent personalities and scandal-mongering have their use; as in the case of the famous Panama scandals they may sometimes be, in a community so organically centralized, the only means of calling attention to grave abuses threatening the welfare of the State. The trouble is, that the habit of reckless and forcible language, when once acquired, is by no means easy to throw off. This accounts very largely for the length and virulence of certain "campaigns" against this and other countries, arising often from quite trivial causes. The slightest initial impulse may set the pens going, and the wave of hostile sentiment once propagated does not readily die out. And the power of such organs of opinion as the Petit Journal, for example, from which the majority of the lower middle class take their political views ready made, is not easy to realize in this country. The French journalist is eminently persuasive. He is no mere purveyor of news, but a rhetorician, an artist, who cares as much for the arrangement of his thought as for the thought itself. Until quite recently, with readers and writers alike, it is not too much to say that form and style have been everything, while accuracy and freshness of information have been almost totally disregarded. A thing well said, an article well composed—these are what his audience still look for rather than laborious research for the truth, and these are what make the success of a writer or a journal. The majority of the Parisian papers are organs of a small set, with well-defined opinions, and the whole theory of their writers is to supply their clientèle daily with such matter as they have been accustomed to digest, arranged as wittily and forcibly as may be. But together with these exists a small band of more important journals, such as the Temps, the Matin, and one or two others, that display unmistakably the influence of broader-minded ideals. American and British methods of journalism—we may flatter ourselves—are at length finding imitators. There is now growing in France a sense of the need of obtaining accurate information, and the action of the Matin, in sending M. Stéphane Lauzanne to London, under a special arrangement with The Times, is a striking instance of this. The traditional qualities that used to make all French journals good reading are not dead, but a wholesome desire for obtaining accurate information has been grafted on to them. The French Press is still the most literary Press in the world, but it no longer aims solely at producing brilliant "copy." It has acquired, at all events in some instances, a healthy appetite for solid fact. And this revolution is not only making the French Press daily more worthy of its mission, but must tend in time to the establishment of more cordial and

Literature Portraits.—XV.

HENRIK IBSEN.

The Reformer and the Critics.

Mr. Gladstone vehemently protested against t Gladstonian, and if Dr. Ibsen has not actually claimed not an Ibsenite he has done the same sort of thing, to have laughed a good deal at those who have made of his works into an aeromatic cult. There have, ind times when he has had some cause to cry out a irresponsible enthusiasm of highly excited friends against the neglect of cultured persons. But when most original if not most brilliant, intellects of our t the drama as his medium, when a serious and powerf and stern reformer chooses, in our day, the stage as h hall and actors and actresses as his means of grace, anticipate that his appeal will primarily fall upon the somewhat feverish and emotional people. To read old controversies which raged about the productio play as, for example, Ghosts, in London, is to plun atmosphere of passion and venom such as our ne Press has rarely known. In the last ten years of the century his name was a war cry. As one looks over th of the early Ibsen plays given in London, one is shock the wise men of the dramatic world reduced to th philosophic utterances and vituperation such as are rather with the consideration of vestry politics criticism of art. When the play we have mentioned by the Independent Theatre, the exhibition of mode part of the Press, to any who had watched its va hundred interesting situations, was really remarkabl who had blessed a thousand and one nights of Gaiety blushed like a Worcestershire orchard before harvest the severe, educational, and powerful play of Gho strenuous exposure of false ideals and biting sta usually unwelcome truth must indeed have appear timid and unthinking as a peculiarly subversive a piece of work. Imagine the man who had sat through twenty years of first nights of the London play; th sentimentalism, the external patchwork, the artifi folly and vulgarity that made up the plays that came overlapped the Robertson period. Think of the nig Taylor, of Boucicault, of Byron, and a dozen of t Picture the vitiated, satiated critic; the bored, the the believer in a host of ready-made rules and convent practised conjurer with a bag-full of clichés; conceive one face to face for the first time with the intellec the reformer, and one can readily perceive that situation is created. The Mrs. Gummidges of the Pre the day before yesterday with passionate regret, the world beware of this Norwegian, who, they asserted dangerous and dull—an impossible combination. In most interesting monographs on this dramatist's wo Quintessence of Ibsenism," Mr. G. Bernard Shaw quot informatory collection of adverse criticisms from by Mr. Archer entitled "Ghosts and Gibberings," latter writer has also given in his introduction to edition of Ghosts. Although it is even more dam the reputation of those who attacked Ibsen now and in Scandinavia, as an utterly despicable writer, but time proves, as Disraeli once wrote, that worthless people are often merely people worth knowing.

An Indirect Influence.

Without any intention or wish to "sedulously ape" Ibsen many European playwrights, including our own, have been, perhaps unknowingly, influenced by his work. The most unlikely people in the world have been touched by his far-reaching genius. Just as, in a sense, Wagner was the direct descendant of Mozart, and Ibsen of Scribe, so from these reformers have sprung schools whose methods are totally different but whose spirit is traceable to the once abused qualities of now accepted masters. The life of art is like that: fastidious classicism begets the large and independent spirit of the reformer and the reformer passes on his work to a race who water down, polish, cut, re-set, exploit his principles, and make them possible for the service of an always conservative majority. One must remember that the advocate of new spiritual modes of life, who employs, as his method of regeneration, so conventional a form of art as that of the dramatist, is at a great disadvantage; the more so if, like Ibsen, he is obviously angry with the world at large and the ways of men, and unhesitatingly insults and belabours those whose best interests he has at heart. Darwin desired to popularize a theory which the vanity of humanity made very unwelcome, but he approached the world in so agreeable a spirit that converts to his creed were abundant. Ibsen, whose task has been infinitely avoided, and the world insists on advance desp warnings of the easily pleased. Although bu acknowledged a reform in playwriting has ta dramatists have drunken of the Ibsen fount deep; the result has been seen in many pl by some who once considered the master li an egoist and a bungler, a gloomy sort of cranky being, and even a "Norwegian pes whatever that may mean. Those who can in plays which, perhaps faintly, but still the broadening and invigorating influence been won to his side without being aware of the of the Norwegian dramatist has induced a gen ment of ideas and an impetus towards a consi hitherto foreign to our stage. As Mr. Shaw ha

From a Photograph presented to Mr. W. Heinemann.
[Reproduced in Mr. W. Archer's translation of Little Eyolf (Heinemann).]

> There can be no question as to the > produced on an individual by his conv > ordinary acceptance of current ideals as > conduct to the vigilant open-mindedness of > at once greatly deepen the sense of mor > Before conversion the individual anticipates > the way of examination at the judgment bar > than such questions as, Have you kept the > Have you obeyed the law? Have you > regularly; paid your rates and taxes to > tributed, in reason, to charitable institut > hard to do all these things; but still harde > as our ninety-nine moral cowards in the h
> . . . . Substitute for such a technical ex > which the whole point to be settled is, Guilty > one in which there is no more and no less res > than for incontinence, for subordination than > legality than for illegality, for piety than > short, for the standard virtues than for th > and immediately, instead of lowering the m > relaxing the tests of worth you raise it by > stringency to a point at which no mere Ph > cowardice can pass them. . . . What Ibsen insis > is no golden rule—that conduct must justify > upon happiness, and not by its conformity to > And since happiness consists in the fulfil > which is constantly growing, and cannot > under the conditions which secured its fult > he claims afresh the old Protestant right of > in questions of conduct as against all in > called Protestant Churches themselves inclu

What Meredith accomplished in fiction, what portraiture, Rodin for sculpture, Ibsen has drama. But it has come as rather a disap public of the 'nineties to find that the men who at last by them as regenerators, saviours of of art had been in their midst these many d epoch-making picture of Valparaiso Bay dat
"Richard Feverel" first appear in 1859, and already writing in 1850? Among workers in art these men are acknowledged masters, but the indirectly influenced, is not admittedly convinc as takes place is slow and in the meantime man be faced. Ibsen has been spoken of as a passi individual liberty who strives to arouse men hension of themselves (that, in itself, may be a s one who is an uncompromising moral reformer w

Done Into English.

The translations have not always given perfect satisfaction; in the early days the characters of the social dramas produced on the London stage appeared often to speak English with a foreign idiom and to express their, to the unaccustomed ear, far-reaching sentiments in halting and unconvincing words. Mr. Archer has tested the thousand difficulties of the translator in his admirable work of preparing so many of Ibsen's plays for English readers. For example, in one of the prefatory notes, he tells us that the Norwegian title of Ghosts is Gengangere, literally Again-goers, or, in French, Revenants, and what is true of this one word applies with equal weight to hundreds of others. The perplexities we mention are, however, removable like most other difficulties by the use of infinite care, as is demonstrated by a comparison of the first editions of Mr. Archer's translations with the later one recently issued. "Nothing would have been easier," the editor of the first edition of the plays wrote, "than to make the translation read smoothly by the simple process of ignoring difficulties."

> "Let me," he adds, "give a trifling instance of my meaning. A friend who has been good enough to read the proofs of Hedda Gabler objects to Miss Tesman's first speech in the last Act: 'Here you see me in the garb of woe,' asking 'Why not simply, Here you see me in mourning?' My reply is that in the original Miss Tesman uses a slightly stilted and formal, I might almost say romantic, phrase (Her kommer jeg i sorgens farver), and that, rightly or wrongly, I hold myself bound to indicate this. Very likely 'the garb of woe,' may not be the phrase best adapted for the purpose; but the mere word 'mourning' gives no hint of a verbal nicety which Ibsen certainly introduced with a deliberate intention as befitting the character of 'Tante Julle.'"

This remark strikes at a characteristic in many of Ibsen's plays—his use of highly "romantic" language at one moment and of absolutely "realistic" phraseology at another with a well considered effect. Mr. Archer, who has long spread the evangel of Ibsen's teaching far and wide, has said that so far as he knows Ibsen is the first writer of modern and (so-called) realistic plays whose works have been completely and faithfully rendered into English. Among the translators and editors of these are Mr. Gosse, Mr. Charles Archer, the late Mrs. Marx Aveling, Mr. L. N. Parker, Mr. Havelock Ellis, and others. But Mr. William Archer has borne the burden of the day and far out-run the rest in his attempt to make Ibsen widely known. In a preface to the plays he says:—

> My fellow workers and I have done all that lay in our power to represent, as literally as difference of idiom would allow, every finest shade of the poet's meaning. I dwell on the fact that this is the first enterprise of its kind in English, in order to remind any reader who may be dissatisfied with the result that we had no precedent to guide us, and that he has no standard with which to compare our efforts.

The compliment paid to Ibsen by this series of translations is as high as it is deserved and as valuable to society at large as to all those interested in the narrower world of stagecraft. The following plays have been translated into English and published here from time to time:—

Lady Inger of Ostraat.	Rosmersholm.
The Vikings at Helgeland.	Pillars of Society.
Love's Comedy.	Hedda Gabler.
The Pretenders.	The Wild Duck.
Brand.	The Master Builder.

St. John's Night, The Feast at Solhaug, and Olaf Lil his well-known dramas will have been named.

Poetry.

The poetic feeling of Henrik Ibsen is shown in al His dramas in verse have been greatly admired, but o suppose that the translations with which one is famil a poor idea of the originals. Those fragments of plays which Mr. Edmund Gosse has done into Englis Norwegian for Mr. Jaeger's volume do not give sense of beauty or the lyric spirit, but, on the other Gosse's translations which appeared in his collecti "On Viol and Flute," and published as long ago as no small interest, although, as the translator has said

> . . . verses lie like gems that hide
> In coffers sealed from English eyes.

As they are not very generally known at the pres quote from them here.

ILLE.

> Agnes, my exquisite butterfly
> I will catch you sporting and winging
> I am weaving a net with meshes small,
> And the meshes are my singing.

HEC.

> If I am a butterfly, tender and small,
> From the heather-bells do not snatch
> But since you are a boy, and are fond of a
> You may hunt, though you must not c

ILLE.

> Agnes, my exquisite butterfly,
> The meshes are all spun ready;
> It will help you nothing to flutter and flap
> You are caught in the net already.

HEC.

> That I am a butterfly, bright and young,
> A swinging butterfly, say you?
> Then, ah! if you catch me under your net
> Don't crush my wings, I pray you.

ILLE.

> No! I will dalntily lift you up,
> And shut you in my breast;
> There you may shelter the whole of your l
> Or play as you love best.

This song may have lost something of the l translation, but the second has a more unusual charm

> In the sunny orchard-closes,
> While the warblers sing and swing,
> Care not whether blustering Autumn
> Break the promises of Spring;
> Rose and white the apple-blossom
> Hides you from the sultry sky;
> Let it flutter, blown and scattered,
> On the meadows by and by.
>
> Will you ask about the fruitage
> In the season of the flowers?
> Will you murmur, will you question,
> Count the run of weary hours?
> Will you let the scarecrow clapping > Drown all happy sounds and words?

With my living, with my singing,
I will tear the hedges down !
Sweep the grass, and heap the blossom,
Let it shrivel, pale and brown !
Swing the wicket ! Sheep and cattle,
Let them graze among the best !
I broke off the flowers ; what matter
Who may revel with the rest !

Work then in patience, till you see
The confines of your Holy Land
That Palestine of poesy,
Where Agnes waits for you, and Pull on with strenuous arm and oar
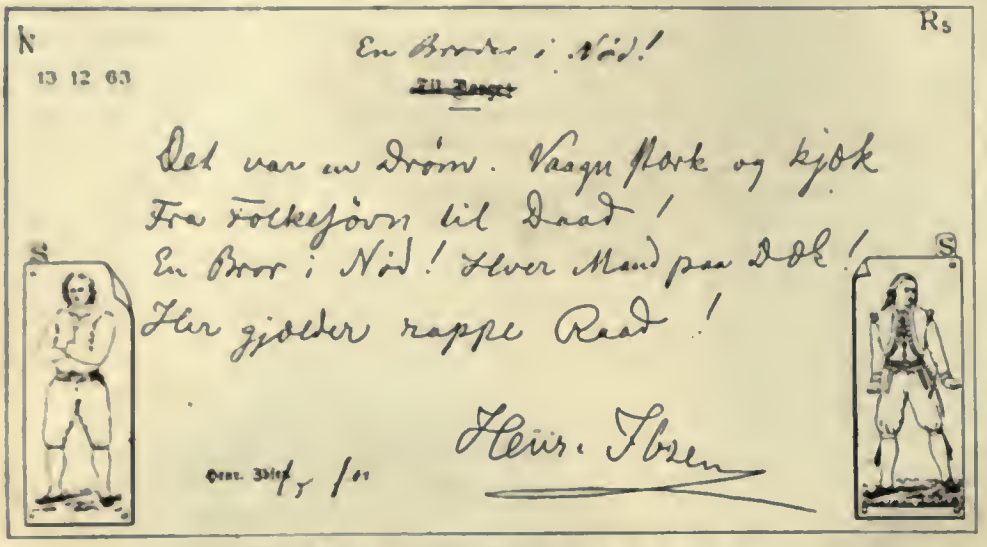
The sandy bar will soon be pas
And grassy odours from the shore
Proclaim you home at last !



SPECIMEN OF HANDWRITING AT THE AGE OF 35.
The Figures at the side are Sketches of Theatrical Costumes made by Ibsen when Manager of a Theatre.
[Reproduced from Julaftten, 1894.]

This was said nea ago, and Ibsen has l
Mr. Gosse's prognos confines of his Holy far distant.

Before Ibsen's written he had penn amount of verse—
German war, a ques him deeply, and in which he greatly bl
—and a poem to Hu out his long career turned from the wri the production of he tells us, found exercise refreshme increase of hope.

The Master T

If art be order, nious results, obtai powerful principles thought to be the e

Mr. Gosse, however, is in much better vein later in his book when he addresses the poet in Dresden. The stanzas are very pleasant which begin :—

And while I wait for your new song
To waft its fragrance o'er the sea,
I hold the memories that belong
To you, to Norway, and to me ;
I wander where the wild swan calls,
And where the dark lake lies and shines,
And watch sonorous waterfalls
Rush whitening, through the pines.

You in the city of sweet names,
Where Raffaelle and Correggio meet,—
I by the dismal-tided Thames,
In dreary square and sultry street,—
Both, by one magnet drawn, extend
Our thoughts across the northern deep,
Till both our beings mix and blend
Where jarls and vikings sleep.

And later on he expresses a desire which has been fulfilled to some extent when he sings :—

But oh ! to win my people's eyes
To stand with me—to gaze, admire,
To praise the statue's form and size,
That is the goal of my desire ;
But, friend, you dream not of the weight
Of insular phlegmatic pride,
The sturdy self-sufficient hate no doubt as to Ibsen being an artist. It is his to wake the soul by tender strokes of skill, but rather to arouse the intelligen clear light of his horrific but splendid an motive and the weight and strength of h life as it is. To do this he was b technician of the highest accomplishment ; ment of a strong case has been the death His plays show the all-pervading magic of in the school of great endeavour. Whe literary monument of the revolutionary fore was given to the world in 1850, and writt under the pseudonym of Brynjolf Bjarme, twenty-two years of age, and from that present day, when he is in his seventy- connexion with the stage has been of the The number of his plays is legion, but mainly of interest to English people are

Dette er min h skrift nu for tiden.
Kristiania, den 4 Septe
Henrik Ibs

remarkable exception to the general laws of development, to which all else in living nature and in the intellectual world is subject; but in fact these laws admit of no exception. One of these laws is that a faculty is developed by using, but is dormant or degenerates if it is left idle. This law is as inevitably true of dramatic inventiveness as of any other faculty. If it were put to the test, it is probably more true of this than of any other branch of literary work, since skill and technical practice are of greater moment in dramatic writing than in any other class of literary art. . . . The importance of the fact that Henrik Ibsen became intimately connected with the stage at an early age cannot be too much insisted on. But for this connexion he never would have acquired that mastery of dramatic technique which is so justly admired in his plays. He continued to direct various theatres in the North for ten years, and rehearsed above a hundred plays. He could have had no better school. Of course, they were a very various series of pieces with which he thus became practically acquainted; Shakespeare and Holberg, Oehlenschlæger and Heiberg, his own and Björnson's youthful plays were represented; but, above all, he was influenced by the constructive art of the French dramatic writers of the day, especially that of Scribe, though from the literary point of view Scribe's pieces did not greatly appeal to him. At the same time he did not particularly devote himself to study theoretical works on the drama. He read Heiberg's prose writings, especially the well-known essay on the Vaudeville; and during his tour abroad Herman Hettner's book Das Moderne Drama, then just published, fell in his way, but this was the whole extent of his theoretical reading." In Christiania he had had the opportunity of seeing a sound, though not very brilliant, school of acting. This was at the Danish theatre which was closely connected with the once flourishing period of the Danish stage, whose admirable qualities were no doubt advantageous to a young writer. But it was Ibsen's experiences, sometimes of a painful and disappointing character, as director of the Norwegian theatre at Christiania following upon his five years of apprenticeship at Bergen that, one apprehends, formed the sound basis of his dramatic skill and originality of presentation. In England, at least, whether rightly or wrongly, we are inclined to judge Ibsen only by his modern plays, and, viewed as a technician alone no doubt he will be ready to stand or fall by that series which has been translated into our language. The whole mass of his historical dramas and the romantic plays is, from the point of view of stagecraft, one long and highly interesting preparation for the plays of modern life with which we are familiar.

An Actor's Playwright.

In stageland, in the world the other side of the curtain, they have a way of saying that such and such a part is "actor-proof." Hamlet, it is pointed out, cannot be spoilt by any actor, it plays itself. When this can be said of any rôle it is a high compliment to the dramatist who has imagined the character, and, although it does not absolutely apply to the men and women of those of Ibsen's plays produced in London, it is true of them in a very remarkable degree. Here, new actors have made their early fame in his dramas, and men and women of long standing, sunken, as we thought, in convention and over-loaded with the artificiality of long experience, which is at once so effective and so intolerable, have redipped, as it were, in the fountains of artistic youth and astonished and held spellbound an audience of critics by their renewed vivacity and freshness, their sincerity and again grasped the opportunity of giving us a taste qualities in an Ibsen play. It is at present recognis the public does not desire to patronize such dramas as Duck or John Gabriel Borkman, but all the artists of who have seen a play or two by this author are found and willing to undertake one of his greatest rôles, and w have done so the result has often been a remarkable r of unsuspected talent. Without, we trust, being invid remembers in this connexion the remarkable performance Kate Phillips in The Wild Duck. Here was a lady reputation of long standing as a spirited soubrette conventional stage type who showed to wonderful adva a powerful character actress in a part written by Ibse Mr. James Welch as the hero of, say, In the Soup, and recall his Vilhelm Foldal in John Gabriel Borkman, is t the extraordinary skill of Ibsen and the possibilities and pathos that may lie hidden in a popular comedian last-named play (one, by the way, which was p prolific even for one of Ibsen's dramas in the developme talents of actors) Mrs. Beerbohm Tree was seen advantage as Mrs. Wilton, whose famous exit, "Oh, know what to do, I assure you," will be remembered, tha other part played by this gifted and versatile lady. T

CORNER OF IBSEN'S STUDY
When Living in Viktoria Terrasse, Christiania.
[From Julaften, 1894.]

might easily be extended. Mrs. Patrick Campbell was p play a comparatively small part in Little Eyolf, as well one, for all parts in Ibsen's plays are important; Mr. produced An Enemy of the People, and, as we ha all actors who have once seen one of Ibsen's dr desirous to play in them. This is not because Ibsen is a a revolutionist of art, a poet and speculative philosop because these ladies and gentlemen know at a glance t parts as Dr. Stockmann, Gina Ekdal, or Ulrik Bre wrought by a master hand, and, notwithstanding the pathetic attitude of the public towards the plays, unsympathetic attitude of their author towards the pu nobler ones is not very much sought after by the average playgoer. The plays of Dr. Ibsen have had therefore to be thrust before the public by a number of unusual contrivances. Mr. Grein's idea of the Independent Theatre has been a powerful agent, but the private enterprise of such artists as Mr. Vernon, Miss Achurch and Mr. Charrington, Miss Farr, Miss Elizabeth Robins and Miss Lea, has also done much to hand on the light. A Doll's House showed the public that a new power in the dramatic world had arisen, and Ghosts, which, in a certain way, completes and supplements the theory of the earlier play, showed that it was intended to use that power without mercy in the cause believed to be true. The old use of the playhouse as a place of entertainment was called in question; that the stage should be used as ground on which reforms might be suggested and a cure for life's malaise thought out or discovered, shocked the easy-going patrons of the drama who, on account of an unfortunate epigram of long ago, are supposed to have the right to give the drama's laws, and they considered this forcing of the realities of existence upon the stage an inexcusable piece of bad taste. By the time these two plays had done their work an Ibsen audience had been pronounced immoral, and a play by Ibsen, the protagonist of a new and stern morality, decreed anathema. Thus the undeserving, the trivial, and the partially endowed among playgoers were frightened away from the study of Ibsen, and it was not until Miss Robins' adventure at the Vaudeville Theatre with the careful and skilful production of Hedda Gabler that the world of English letters began to awake to the fact that the clouds of vituperation which at one time obscured the sun of the Norwegian dramatist were clearing off, and that now, at last, his work might have some chance of being judged without prejudice. The caste of Hedda was an excellent one, and all who valued the art of acting were satisfied on that score, and soon able to view even an Ibsen drama with some inclination to fairness.

For a while, indeed, his works were almost in vogue; one heard phrases quoted from his plays in general conversation, and even the newspapers knew something of his ideas, and could speak of "the law of change" and "the younger generation knocking at the doors," or at least owned that Ibsen could be "frightfully thrilling." All the plays (except, perhaps, Pillars of Society, when it appeared first at a Gaiety matinée), A Doll's House, Ghosts, Hedda Gabler, An Enemy of the People, The Lady from the Sea, Rosmersholm, The Wild Duck, The Master Builder, Little Eyolf, the fourth act of Brand, John Gabriel Borkman, and The League of Youth have been produced with great care, and although by no means widely popular, delighted those who were able, while still seeing faults in his work, to appreciate Ibsen's fine purpose and enjoy his technical skill.

His Present Position.

"As the originator of the analytical modern drama," says Mr. Jæger, "Ibsen has now a high position in literature of the nineteenth century throughout the world; and the great attention which his later works have attracted, not only in Germany but in England and America, sufficiently proves that his importance is becoming recognized on both sides of the Atlantic. Since Holberg no Scandinavian writer has filled such a place in Germany as Ibsen now does; his work is actually marking a turning-point in German literature, for a whole crowd of young writers and critics have uplifted it as a banner round which they are rallying against the old school of German dramatic poetry. But the multitude have not as yet fully

ery of the protagonist, and that is a voice peen misconception.

In Stockmann, the principal figure in A People, indeed, one is tempted to see Dr. Ibsen the Burgomaster is reasoning with him in re closures he intends to make, and warns him that, has no right to have any individual convicti fact of Ibsen's attitude towards life starts into with their easy-going morality and selfish views o Stockmann, he flashes out, "It's I that have the town at heart! I want to lay bare the evil later, must come to light." . . . That is th the author of An Enemy of the People, The Wi Hedda Gabler, and the rest of the dramas as known to the English stage and playgoing p fine and arresting a cry it is. If, as an entertai compare with the writers of a thousand co humourist there is much to long for, does n
"spiritual distinction" make amends, and is th a stage so catholic as ours for the reformer a merry-andrew, for a picture of the tragedy an the soul as well as of the comedy of bad manne play of stage-land people performing hono possible actions in an artificial atmosphere.
own, on looking back at the history of the En so determined and hard a reformer as Ibsen does chance of a welcome. We have seen a good work and, as has been said, our playwrights by many of the good qualities they possess.
public who are sufficiently interested in the que this Norwegian taking so much trouble to refor matter with the best of all possible worlds, an hurting Dr. Ibsen? "Damn the Reform Bill," mouth of Coningsby. "If the Duke had not Lord Grey on a coal committee, we should ne Reform Bill," and the public wonder what "c disagreement first caused the author of An
People to scarify society. This attitude is, no appropriate, and the causes of the bent of a always a fair and informing study. The "Life" quoted will do much to satisfy these inquirers, graphies, the mystery of the man is not made ap

Biographical.

Of recent years there have been severa authors published, but in 1888 when "Henrik Ib Et litercert Livsbillede," by Mr. Henrik Jæge was considered a remarkable honour for a writ among us and hale and hearty. This work Copenhagen on his sixtieth birthday, and is t biography which can claim to be authoritative himself supplied the author with a great number who would trace the working of his mind thro struggles and later victories cannot do better t volume which has been published here in an e tion by Miss Clara Bell.

Born in 1828, Dr. Ibsen's early life is now
The struggles to which his circumstances and te jected him until he had come to forty years colo thought and method of work. Pessimists may the unambitiously cheerful, but it is from such s develop. Ibsen's forefathers were Danish se

About this time Ibsen adventured upon the world and became an apothecary's apprentice at Grimstad, where he found himself in that hostile attitude to his neighbours which he has continued with tolerable consistency in a wider world ever since. Here he began the study which led to his writing of his early work, Catiline. When this drama was published there were not many interested people ready to buy the firstling of a promising brain. Later, when Ibsen was living with a devoted fellow-student in Christiania they sold to a huckster the whole stock of copies, "the remainder," as the booksellers say, for what supplied them with the necessaries of life for a few days. The necessaries of life were very few and hardly come by in these and for many days. Such trials Ibsen bore with stoicism, for his nature was naturally strong and slow and his health at this and all times of that wonderful and God given quality that never knows a day's illness or an hour of pain. While at Grimstad he was said to go about like a "seven-sealed mystery," and there can be no doubt that with his mind busy with the "wild horror" of his poetry, his political enthusiasms, his dramatic intentions, and his studies for the examination at the University of Christiania, he made but a distrait and unsympathetic member of the small local society. In 1850 he arrived at Christiania with the intention of getting into the University; he was coached by Heltberg and had among his fellow-students his, afterwards, fellow-dramatist, Björnstjerne Björnson. Ibsen profited by the teaching of his excellent coach, but owing to the short time at his disposal he did not matriculate, but subsequently took the degree of Doctor of Philology hon. causa. The early years in Christiania were full of exciting artistic and political labours, but Ibsen's private affairs did not flourish. The dramatist, lyric poet, political satirist, critic, and journalist had, however, attracted some attention, and when a new theatre was established at Bergen the post of stage manager, with some such offices as poet and theatrical instructor thrown in, for £67 a year for five years was offered to and accepted by him.

At the end of this period he returned to Christiania as director of the Norwegian theatre, but revisiting Bergen in 1858 to be married. From 1858 to 1861 was a time of storm; his position at the theatre was a difficult one and some of his own plays produced there were intensely unpopular, especially The Comedy of Love, which may be considered the forerunner of that series of social dramas with which English readers are familiar. This play was quoted against him when he asked for a State bounty, but later, after some highly characteristic unpleasantness, the State Council granted him a sufficient sum, and in 1864 he left Christiania for Berlin, for Trieste, and, finally, for Rome. After this time his work continued to gain in power, and by slow degrees those plays which have become of more than European interest came into being. In 1866 and 1867 the lyric dramas Brand and Peer Gynt appeared, in 1873 Emperor and Galilean, in 1877 Pillars of Society, A Doll's House in 1879, Ghosts, 1881; An Enemy of the People, 1882; The Wild Duck, 1884; Rosmersholm, 1886; The Lady from the Sea, 1888; Hedda Gabler, 1890; The Master Builder, 1892; Little Eyolf, 1894; John Gabriel Borkman, a little later; and When We Dead Awaken last year. This list is the story of Ibsen's later life and is far more important and of fuller interest than anything one can know of his private affairs. His home life, it has been hinted, but not by his authenticated biographer, was not altogether a happy one. Perhaps it is hardly to be expected that a philosopher, who is at work arranging the happiness

The father and son have been said not to enjoy ea society of late. Indeed, as far as one may judge from that surrounds a great man's name, Dr. Ibsen appear his own society to that of a circle of friends. One, at the enterprising journalists who have attempted to him gives a somewhat awful picture of his present from what Mr. Jæger has to tell us, this side of Ibse appears to have been exaggerated. At one time th journals and literary magazines were full of articles u his work, his message, and, above all, his meaning; have proved of somewhat ephemeral interest, and the chief value to the English student of his the translations already mentioned. "The Quinte Ibsenism," which is one of the most keenly treatises on the author and his series of epoch-making pl once, if one may incidentally adventure an opinion on Mr. Bernard Shaw's most valuable addition to litera articles on his plays by Mr. Archer and Mr. Walk

[Reproduced from the Frontispiece by Mr. Bernard Partridge to "Mr. Pu Ibsen," by permission of Mr. Heinemann.]

may be found in their collected criticisms; Mr. Henri "Life," which is especially valuable in regard to days and work of Ibsen; Dr. Brandes' essays on "Ibse volume published by Mr. Heinemann; a "Commenta expressed in the lines from Catiline translated by Mr. Gosse, which begin :—

> If but for one brief moment I could flame
> And blaze through space, and be a falling star :
> If only once, and by one glorious deed,
> I could but knit the name of Catiline
> With glory and with deathless high renown,—
> Then should I blithely, in the hour of conquest,
> Leave all, and hie me to an alien shore,
> Press the keen dagger gaily to my heart,
> And die ; for then I should have lived indeed, to make the poet attractive to the "general has done a good deal to explain Ibsen to t dramatist. "Had Ibsen died in 1867," he says, another great poet, would have gone to his grave ever rationally understood his own meaning.

year an intellectual expert—a commentator, as w gone to Ibsen and offered him the explanation he himself must have arrived at before he co and The Wild Duck, he would, perhaps, have re as much disgust as a maiden would feel if any enough to give her the physiological rationale meeting a fairy prince. It is only t to the creative artist with absolut receiving an answer to his 'What d mean ?' That is the very question own intellect, which had no part in t the poem, may be asking him. And the intellect—this restless life in it ates it from dead machinery, and wh lesser artists but little, is one of t greater sort." Thus Mr. Shaw defi his mind as to what Ibsen's plays me the plots of the plays to illustrate th real slavery of to-day is slavery to and at the same time shows that th
"discoverable and perfectly defini poet's work by no means depends on ness of his own intellectual consci
This ambiguity in some of Ibsen's subsidiary charm to many intellectual who have exercised their skill in meanings for occasionally obvious imposing ingenious theories upon statements. These commentators see Professor Ruhek (of When We Dead A
"sadly and earnestly"—"There is so behind everything you say," and t some pet idea of their own at the a Another class of writer has attem amusing on the subject of Dr. Ibsen.
that although the Norwegian poet ca to be a humorist, except of the bitter character, he has been the cause of amount of fun in others. English w duced some amusing travesties of h
Mr. Anstey, who as a playwright mi have learnt something of the art of di author of Little Eyolf, has given us a v collection entitled "Mr. Punch's Poe to be the condensed, revised, and slig edition of the master's best-known benefit of the earnest student. Rosme House, Hedda Gabler, The Wild Duck, effort to continue The Master Build his book, which is made funnier by of Mr. Partridge, who has himself, i rightly, played, very seriously, an
Mr. Anstey has said in his ironic wa
Ibsen" may well benefit the earnes
Norwegian dramatist.

The work of such a man as Ibsen for parody ; if we can laugh at some Theatre Royal, Haymarket.

Sole Lessee - - - Mr. H. BEERBOHM TREE.

SPECIAL MATINÉE

FOR THE FIRST TIME

December 7th, 1894,

AT 9 A.M.

LILLE EYOLF

SKUESPIL I TRE AKTER AF HENRIK IBSEN

PERSONERNE:

Alfred Allmers . . .	Mr. H. L. Brækstad.
Fru Rita Allmers . . .	Miss Elizabeth Robins.
Eyolf	Mr. Wm. Heinemann.
Froken Asta Allmers . .	Mrs. H. L. Brækstad.
Ingenior Borghejm . .	Mr. Edmund Gosse.
Rottejomfruen . . .	Miss Brækstad.

Handlingen foregaar paa Allmers's ejendom ude ved fjorden, et par mile fra byen.

Manager . . . . . Mr. Fred. Harrison.

ADMISSION—TWO GUINEAS.

PLAYBILL OF THE COPYRIGHT PERFORMANCE.
[Reproduced by permission of Mr. Heinemann.]

and sympathy, which only a small minority of the playgoing public at present possesses. To the rest the higher drama is as disagreeably perplexing as the game of chess is to a man who has barely enough capacity to understand skittles. Consequently, just as we have the chess club and the skittle alley prospering side by side, we shall have the theatre of Shakespeare, Molière, Goethe, and Ibsen prospering alongside that of Henry Arthur Jones and Gilbert, of Sardou, Grundy, and Pinero, of Buchanan and Ohnet, as naturally as these already prosper alongside that of Pettit and Sims, which again does no more harm to the music-halls than the music-halls do to the waxworks or even the ratpit, although this last is dropping into the limbo of discarded brutalities by the same progressive movement that has led the intellectual playgoer to discard Sardou and take to Ibsen.

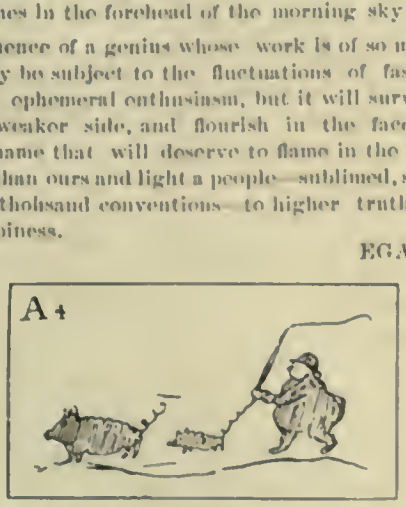
Here Mr. Shaw presents what he believed to be the position of the Ibsen play with unusual clearness, but by labelling it "intellectual" he has unintentionally helped the growth of that attitude of indifference which is at present shown towards Ibsen and his works. We may permit our neighbours without a sense of humour to call us many things, but to assert in so many words the intellectuality even of a tiny minority is to make that little knot of people blush and look the other way. Thus it happens that, while the spirit of Ibsenism has informed many of the more skilful and arresting plays during the last decade, the dramas of the master are rarely, far too rarely, seen on our stage.

But Ibsen will come again; his influence although widely felt is by no means universal, and if for a time he should suffer eclipse, we may be sure the law of change will work in his interest and that of society:—

> So sinks the day-star in the ocean bed,
> And yet anon repairs his drooping head,
> And tricks his beams, and with new-spangled ore
> Flames in the forehead of the morning sky:

The influence of a genius whose work is of so much value to humanity may be subject to the fluctuations of fashion and be the sport of ephemeral enthusiasm, but it will survive. It will outlive its weaker side, and flourish in the face of discord. Ibsen is a name that will deserve to flame in the forehead of a greater age than ours and light a people—sublimed, spiritualized, freed from a thousand conventions—to higher truths and more ethereal happiness.

EGAN MEW.



A Sketch by Ibsen of "Public Opinion under the Lash."
[From Julaften, 1894.]

Few tourists in the country would deny the invaluable assistance of the Ordnance map. The difficulty of obtaining them has often been remarked upon and the Government has been accused of lack of business capacity in that, having gone to great expense in providing a thoroughly good article, it has not taken any further trouble in putting it before the public. We

IBSEN IN ENGLAND.

A "Personal View"

By A. B. WALKLEY.

What is the history of Ibsen's influence in theatre? Is it another Decline and Fall? Or are a of it likely to survive as permanent additions to ou dramatic energy? One need not have been over-tim from speculations of this kind a few years ago. nineties the Ibsen quarrel was like the temper of gentleman in "Pickwick" who forbade his patient t —"worry fierce." It has calmed down now, and whether we are for or against, take Ibsen coolly. In ficially, it looks as though the question "What do y Ibsen?" might now be answered in the old Thacke "We don't think of him." How many Ibsen perform there been in London since the production of John Gabr in the summer of 1897? Is there a single theatre which includes a single Ibsen play in its repertory not Mr. William Archer recently had to admit th Society has been acted in Germany over twelve hu and in England exactly twice? Nevertheless, it is sign the admission is made in a new edition of Ibsen's Evidently Ibsen is still read. Nor is any serious dram in London that is not on all hands, overtly or tacitly reference to Ibsen's ideas and Ibsen's technique. do not see him "materialized" on the stage, his to be hovering in the air. He is like Napoleon in L' is absent in the flesh, but still, posthumously, trouble as the Napoleonic idea. In that sense, then, at any it is the most important sense—we may say, petit le encore.

He has certainly had an uphill game of it. anything surprising in that? The Ibsen drama, is imported drama. Just as Crummles was not so Ibsen—there is no getting away from the fac Englishman. Our ancient and inbred prejudice agains accompanies us to the playhouse, where we do not lea vestibule with our hats and coats. Dr. Johnson's frie that, so far as he could see, all foreigners were f intellectual ancestor of many a stalwart anti-Ibsenite a comparatively brief period in the last reign, our imported drama have made no very imposing show. after the Restoration we had plays of Molière. The imported to satisfy any popular demand. The Theatre was dependent on the Court or those wh tone from the Court, and the Court—we all know wh tone from France. At the outset of the last century a vogue—this time a popular vogue—for stage T Kotzebue "boomed." It was the time when the Mansfield-park rehearsed Lovers' Vows in Sir Thomas study, and Miss Fotheringay played Mrs. Haller in T

Scribe and Labiche and swallowed Sardou whole. But note that either there was nothing essentially "foreign" in the French plays we imported or we got rid of the foreign element in the process of adaptation. The serious French theatre of the period—the comedies of Augier and the thesis plays of Dumas fils, based on characteristically French notions of the family and of sexual relationship, regular or irregular—we left severely alone.

In other words, the foreign importations which the English playgoer has received without protest have been plays of amusement. You must, of course, understand amusement in its wider sense, including the "luxury of woe." And here you touch the differentia of Ibsen's case. Ibsen's plays (those, at any rate, which have been seen in this country) are not plays of amusement. They are plays of discipline and chastisement. Ibsen is a satirist. He "knocks" the orthodox conventions "endways." He "gives furiously to think," raises awkward questions, and spares nobody's ewe lamb. In a word, he makes you thoroughly uncomfortable. There is, I admit, a sense in which even this is "amusing." There is amusement of the keenest in seeing a piece of work thoroughly done; you have intellectual exhilaration and the pleasure of tasting irony of peculiar flavour and piquancy. But that is rather an esoteric form of amusement, the amusement of connoisseurs. In this sense the most austere work of art is amusing, an Œdipus Tyrannus or a Paradise Lost, and even works which are not of art when they are capable of being viewed æsthetically. Do not the surgeons talk of a lovely tumour and the mathematicians of an elegant demonstration? An excellent French critic, the late M. J. J. Weiss, remarked "C'est beau, un beau crime!" and before him De Quincey had discussed, not entirely in a vein of paradox, murder as one of the fine arts. If you are a true connoisseur you cannot help admiring the neatness and dexterity with which blows are delivered, though, as the recipient of them, you may be howling with pain. That is the case with Ibsen's blows. He hits us hard, but his "science" is delightful. "With such a being as man," however, "in such a world as the present," connoisseurship of this kind is not for the million. The average man is disinclined to receive with enthusiasm the candid friend who tells him plain truths for his good. Ibsen showed us the seamy side of our pleasant vices, the egoism of respectability, with many other ugly things in our inmost selves, and it was only natural for us not to like it.

In this respect the English opposition to Ibsen merely fell into line with the general opposition which he at first provoked in every theatre in Europe wherein his plays were performed. But obviously that is not the whole story. It will not account for the fact that Ibsen has been far less successful with us than with Continental playgoers; it will not account for Mr. Archer's typical instance of two English performances of Pillars of Society as against twelve hundred in Germany. If we have had our general human reasons for resisting Ibsen, we must also have had our special reasons for resisting him as True Born Englishmen. No doubt the opposition was largely factitious. Ibsen old ladies in country villages to ise another na to steal spoons. There is no need to cull e English Press, which by this time, I feel sure, h of its early blundering in the matter. Two A (America proving in this respect a little u England) will suffice. A leading lady in Wa according to the New York Critic (cited by Mr.

to allow an Ibsen reading in her house on th could lend no countenance to "that foul-mo recognizes no law, human or divine." And in can book, Mr. Ade's "Fables in Slang," I find Lady Bountiful who, detected, "said she we benevolent any more—so she joined an Ibsen course, is meant as a joke; it represents, vulgar notion that Ibsenism somehow covered a revolt, of being "agin the Government." found for this error in the untoward circumstan taken up by the "cranks," the half-baked, a After A Doll's House the Women's Righters, mi for a propagandist, were riotous Ibsenites, an certain brilliantly misleading opuscule by Mr.
fancy that for a moment the Socialists were delusion that they had found a new prophet.

The important fact remains that there
Ibsen peculiarly unpalatable to the English t
Mr. Leslie Stephen has put it, there is a "gr ness" in the average Englishman. Comprom way, and the policy of "muddling through s distrust of ideas and logic. Ibsen's people n popular phrase, to go the whole hog, to be ex
if not logical. "Women," writes Lord Ches his letters to his son, "are all so far Machia are never either good or bad by halves; thei strong, and their reason too weak, to do anyth tion." Whether this be generally true or true in regard to the conduct of many of Ibsen's that conduct proceeds rather from a passiona and idealism than from any weakness of reason.
is a poet as well as a satirist, and his poetry the form of symbolism. Now, if symbolism h little successes on the Continent it has had no
"drive at practice," stick to plain facts, and n Hilda Wangel's "harps in the air" and the "homes for happy human beings" and the and the allegorical Wild Duck. Then, again, people, more especially his womenkind, are und
We have no precise English analogues for them what at a loss to "place" them. Nora Hel easily enough and Hedda Gabler, but not Hi wants her kingdom on the table, or Mrs. Solnes dolls, or the child in the The Wild Duck, or When We Dead Awaken. These may be Norweg are certainly not English, and we feel dépaysés

lend ourselves to the process of "detachment" requisite for ignoring the queer, un-English side of Ibsen.

To sum up; while it is safe to assume that Ibsen will continue to be read, it is quite possible that there is no future for him as an acted dramatist in this country. But his indirect influence on our drama can hardly cease to be operative—until the next theatrical revolutionist appears. No one who has once become aware of Ibsen can ever again tolerate the pre-Ibsenian formulas. Our serious playwrights must, willy-nilly, go to him to learn their business. What one of them has already learnt from him will be plain to any playgoer who has seen The Notorious Mrs. Ebbsmith. Here Mr. Norman Hapgood, an able dramatic critic and author of a recent volume on "The Stage in America," hits the right nail on the head. "The neglect of the dress of beauty," he says, "is what makes some of Ibsen's plays rather technical experiments, instructive to playwrights, than forms precious to humanity." Just as there are poets' poets so there are dramatists' dramatists; and of these Ibsen is incontestably the greatest.

SOME MOVEMENTS IN VICTORIAN POETRY.

IV.—THE POETRY OF EMOTION.

The reader who has done me the compliment of following me so far will no doubt have been struck by one prevailing characteristic in which the poets we have been considering are related to one another—a characteristic which lies at the very root of their relation to their art itself. In their attitude to life and its problems they display wide differences of opinion and conviction, but in the method in which they apply their art to the consideration of life they are closely affiliated. And if we try to define this characteristic, we can perhaps best do so by saying that their object is to irradiate life by ideas, to test emotion by ideas, and in all distractions of mood and circumstance to let the idea measure the force of the instinctive sensation and stand as the final arbiter of its sincerity and value. Poetry, as we know, has been variously defined, and never quite satisfactorily; but it may perhaps be said without fear of grave contradiction that there are three principal aspects of poetry, in the right combination of which the highest form of poetic excellence will be found to consist; while their confusion results in partial and confined attainment, through the presentation of but one side of the poetic quality, or of the different sides insufficiently assimilated. Poetry may deal with three separate activities of the human mind; with ideas, with emotions, and with moods. When poetry is defined as "a criticism of life," the framer of the definition has in mind chiefly the poetry of ideas; when it is described as "emotion remembered in tranquillity," the description is directed chiefly to emotional poetry; and when we are told, as we often are nowadays, that the sincere reproduction of a moment's spiritual experience is the proper concern of the poetic art, this third and final definition applies almost exclusively to the poetry which seeks to reproduce the writer's mood without any reference to its truth or value.

Now, the highest order of poetry will be found, under analysis, to combine elements from each of these three classes, applicability to all human nature. For example, to moment to the poets whom we have already been Tennyson's "In Memoriam" and Browning's "Pra alike poems charged with acute personal emotion conformity of these emotions to a generalized ide universal applicability of their sentiment lift them out of purely emotional poetry into that of the poetry of give them a certain philosophical force of permanent i So long, we may say, as man regards with emotion, side, the death of a dear friend, and on the other, th of his own death, so long he will feel, under certai the idea, as these two poets have felt in these particu Here, therefore, the emotion is irradiated with the ide poetry is raised by it above the levels of circum occasion.

Emotion, then, is of the essence of poetry, bu necessary that the emotion should be, as it were, univ and for this process a certain remoteness from its influence is obligatory. The mind must be detache emotion before it can appreciate its significance; precisely what Wordsworth meant when he said tha "emotion remembered in tranquillity." The writ with a noble rage, smarting under wrong, ma poetry of great individual and historic interest, no immense topical influence, but he will scarcely g utterance to a permanent truth. Now, the poetry whi next to consider was poetry of this secondary order sort of reaction against academic calm and ev philosophic analysis. It was intensely human, si eager; and in its day it had a broad and humanizing infl it was not poetry of the highest ideal, because it was in a hurry, too keen to be proclaiming itself at on little remote from momentary sensation. Much never be read without a responding emotion in the very little of it has that high note of universal tru found only with the perfect co-operation of the transit with the permanent idea.

Of all the movements in Victorian poetry thi movement is the most clearly defined and tracea immediately referable to political and social cause strongly marked characteristics common to alm followers. It is therefore something of a paradox th considerable poet which it produced should stand rat the general movement, and should be distinguished by gifts of unusual breadth and vivacity. And yet consider the emotional poetry of the Victorian pe impossible to deny that it drew much of its eager chivalrous sympathy from the tender, womanly Elizabeth Barrett Browning. "Headlong" was th which her Italian master gave her in the schoolroom, long was the spirit of the movement of which she was conspicuous star. She had, indeed, an intellectual firmer and surer than any of her companions; but, the inspiration of the cave was upon her, she was and at times as incoherent, as ever the Delphic pries the example which she set in the neglect of form was far-reaching and insidious. Her character was so w attitude to life so sensitive and humane that thos naturally drawn to her were inevitably entangled in of her mannerism; and a worse model it would be choose. Her passion for fantastic and unnatural adje slipshod licence in the matter of false rhyme and ass phrase, "humanly acceptive" and stimulating. She was moved less by the immediate interests of the hour than some of her contemporaries in the movement; but, like Sydney Dobell, she was passionately zealous in the cause of Italian freedom, and she shared with James Thomson a yearning sympathy with the suffering and restriction of the working classes. To this enthusiasm we owe "The Cry of the Children"—one of the most vigorous occasional poems in the language.

> They look up with their pale and sunken faces,
> And their looks are sad to see,
> For the man's hoary anguish draws and presses
> Down the cheeks of infancy;
> "Your old earth," they say, "is very dreary";
> "Our young feet" they say, "are very weak;
> Few paces have we taken, yet are weary—
> Our grave-rest is very far to seek:
> Ask the aged why they weep, and not the children,
> For the outside earth is cold,
> And we young ones stand without, in our bewildering,
> And the graves are for the old."

The eager sincerity of the feeling rings out above the jarring assonances and jolting metre; and it is this patent sincerity that gives a haunting charm to almost everything she wrote.

> What do we give to our beloved?
> A little faith all undisproved,
> A little dust to overweep,
> And bitter memories to make
> The whole earth blasted for our sake:
> He giveth His beloved sleep.

This wells up from a pure heart fervently; and the fountain of her verse, troubled as it generally is upon the surface, is often lucid and fresh at its depth.

> Say never, ye loved once:
> God is too near above, the grave beneath,
> And all our moments breathe
> Too quick in mysteries of life and death,
> For such a word. The eternities avenge > Affections light of range.
> There comes no change to justify that change,
> Whatever comes—Loved once!

This is Mrs. Browning at her best, and here emotion is so nervously felt and expressed as almost to seem transferred into the region of pure ideas. But there is just a little too much protestation, just that rhetorical emphasis of the argument that dulls the edge of poetry. One is reminded of Coleridge's treatment of broken affection; and, setting the two passages over against one another, one feels in the earlier poet a certain wistful tenderness that rings more true than all Mrs. Browning's earnest eloquence.

> Alas! They had been friends in youth;
> But whispering tongues can poison truth;
> And constancy lives in realms above;
> And life is thorny; and youth is vain;
> And to be wroth with one we love
> Doth work like madness in the brain.

Perhaps the contrast which these two passages suggest indicates fairly justly the case against the poetry of emotion. Here, once again, "The lady doth protest too much"; and with a sincere over-emphasis which is nevertheless a violence to art.

This is, indeed, the differentiating characteristic of the emotional movement, which seems to sway with every phase of penetrating expression. But his very facility w an abundant vocabulary led him into excesses of his picture was apt to become a blurred mass of c

> O Love! I am unblest,
> With many doubts oppress
> I wander like a desert wind without a place of re
> Could I but win you for an hour from off that star
> The hunger of my soul were stilled, for Death ha
> Than the melancholy world doth know—things dee
> You could teach me, Barbara!

There is true emotion here, but the expre
And that was exactly the fault of so much of t kind. Some of its insufficiency was no doubt due to treat in poetry radically unpoetic subjects, attention to the necessary art required. Thus (B.V.), a poet of perfervid imagination, desired a to be an emotional realist, as his own poetical cre

> Singing is sweet, but be sure of this,
> Lips only sing when they cannot kiss.
> Statues and pictures and verse may be g
> But they are not the Life for which they

The result, however, of emotional realism in p couraging when it lands us in such barren pictures stead Heath.

> Here we will sit, my darling,
> And dream an hour away;
> The donkeys are hurried and worrie
> But we are not donkeys to-day.

> Through all the weary week, dear,
> We toil in the work down there,
> Tied to a desk and a counter,
> A patient, stupid pair.

And the two Chartist poets, the two Joneses, Erne become flatulent in political enthusiasm, and com affections. Here, for instance, is a Chartist mar

> Sharpen the sickle; how full the ears!
> Our children are crying for bread!
> And the field has been watered with orpha
> And enriched with their fathers' dead.
> And hopes that are buried, and hearts tha
> Lie deep in the treasuring sod;
> Then sweep down the grain with a thunde
> In the name of humanity's God!

And here is a poem of the domestic affections:—

> A pleasant sail, my child, my wife,
> O'er a pleasant sea, to many is life;
> The wind blows warm, and they dread n
> And wherever they go, kind friends are

> But wife and child, the love, the love,
> That lifteth us to the saints above,
> Could only have grown where storms ha
> The truth and strength of the heart to p

Of these the former is turgidly conventiona affectedly unimpressive, but they are perfectly fai poetry of the movement. For when, as in the case o the muse takes broader pinions, her flight is fitful. Dobell had illimitable ambitions; in " essayed the cause of Italian liberty, while i sought to follow a human soul in its journey fro

The effect sought here is clear enough to divine, but the effect is far from attainment. Here, as elsewhere, there is quite insufficient consideration of the method which must underlie all artistic representation.

Enough has, perhaps, been said to indicate the nature and restriction of this broad stream of emotional poetry which flowed so turbulently and overpoweringly through the middle of the Victorian period. It found reinforcement from half the immeasured enthusiasms of the hour, and, being essentially topical in its tone and sentiment, it enjoyed no inconsiderable popularity. To the student of poetry to-day it is chiefly interesting historically. For in a fashion it carries on the Byronic movement, and is itself a symptom of that growing democratization of literature which some of us believe to be a dangerous menace to the future preservation of the literary spirit in England. Fortunately it has not been allowed to pass unchallenged, and the movement which we shall next have to consider vindicated so thoroughly the claim of form in poetry as almost to have obliterated the influence of formlessness from the verse of the present hour. While the emotional movement was at its height, English poetry, despite the unbroken example of Tennyson, was perilously threatened by a wave of lawlessness which, had it spread more widely, must unquestionably have played havoc with the taste and judgment of the younger generation. But literature is generally justified of her children; and the reaction which followed, a reaction of much art and a little artifice, has restored the balance. Nowadays, whatever the danger of poetry may be, it is at least not likely soon to revert to flaccid metre or sentimental excess.

ARTHUR WAUGH.

THE YOUTH WAGNER.

Wagner was not a youthful prodigy in music. No angry parents discovered him playing at midnight in a pitch-dark garret on a forbidden piano in his nightshirt. Nor, when he did play, would his listeners request him, as Mozart is said to have been requested, to remove his ring lest there should be magic in it. His sister Rosalie might rehearse her songs in peace, without any fear that he would snatch the music from her and play it forthwith, without any practice.

This is the first point that must strike the reader of Mr. Ashton Ellis' excellent translation of the opening volume of Herr Glasenapp's standard "Life of Wagner" (Kegan Paul). In the account of Wagner's boyhood there is little definite forecast of his great musical genius. There is, however, enough evidence of the overflowing spirit and energy combined with the acute sensibility of his artistic temperament. "I never could be angry with him," said his sister Cäcilie in after years, "for he either had his mouth so full of childish jokes that I was forced to laugh against my will, or his eyes so full of tears that I myself must cry." The glimpses which Herr Glasenapp gives us into the intimate life of the brother and sister in their childhood are the more pleasant to linger upon as one hears so much from old musicians of the abruptness and arrogance of Wagner's character. The German artist, Kietz, painted more than one pretty little incident of those early days. One picture shows Wagner in the brotherly act of sharing his footgear with his sister.

> Impatient to welcome back their mother, Cile and her brother have rushed off to the landing-stage one afternoon; comes out strongly. In later life he insisted on the pr his dog in the orchestra, till one day it took the mov the low of the double bass as a personal attack and banished. So at the age of nine Wagner insisted on and kissing the tired horses that took him on his journey from Dresden to Eisleben. But a story that his school days seems to us to be most of all characteris man.
>
> One day . . . a holiday was proclaimed to th work in school. Wild with excitement at the rare ev rushed out into the street, shouting and throwing the the air. On the impulse of the moment Richard caug these, and flung it right up to the roof of the sch Among his admiring schoolfellows there was one wh cheer, however the one who had lost his cap. As never bear to see anybody in tears, with his usual sw resolve young Wagner ran off to recover the missi into the building, upstairs to the cock-loft, out t ventilator, he emerged on the roof. The youngst below huzzaed, but held their breath when they intrepid urchin scrambling down the steep incline on Some hurried off to fetch the porter. When the man they crowded after him as he edged his ladder up th stairway. Meanwhile the climber had secured h crawled back in safety, and managed to creep back the airhole into the pitch-dark garret.

This was Wagner all over. Figuratively speaking all his life flinging a cap over the housetops. S pinnacles of misunderstanding for the perilous, slippe his boyish adventure, and we have a prophetic allego Richard (cœur-de-lion) who was never to be thwarted the obstacle that stood between him and his end. It is the intrepid revolutionist in music, poetry, philoso politics.

But in which of these spheres was he to make h fame? Was he to be poet, musician, philosopher, or po At the age of thirteen he translated twelve books of the out of school, and at fourteen he wrote an enormous based on Hamlet and King Lear. The excessive number forced him to reintroduce most of the characters as order to keep the last act going. Such bagatelles, in ad elaborate sketches for dramas on the Greek model, and study of classic mythology, were scarcely compatible musical education. Meanwhile, there were, of course, s of a love for music in the boy. Der Freischütz made an overwhelming impression. As Weber passed by the house at Dresden, on the way to conduct the opera, would whisper to his sister, Cäcilie, "My! that's the man alive! How great he is, you haven't the weenlest But which attracted him the more, the legend or the Der Freischütz it would be difficult to say. It was not ti seventeen and first heard Beethoven's symphonies perf Leipzig that he decided to be a musician. "I knew n really was intended for (he afterwards wrote in the "Pi to Beethoven"; and the Pilgrim here undoubtedly s Wagner himself); I only remember that one evening symphony of Beethoven's for the first time, that it se fever, I fell ill, and on my recovery had become a m But even then he does not seem really to have made up h His biographer has yet to tell us how, at the age of e in the midst of the excitement of his life as a University at Leipzig, "his people had great trouble with him really be made. The music of the first period advances gradually into the second, and so forth. With Wagner it is quite different. There is little connexion between the composer of Rienzi and the composer of the Nibelungen Ring. But curiously enough a close examination of some of his quite early work, written before Rienzi, reveals a suggestion here and there of the composer of the Tannhäuser period. There is a remarkable passage, quoted in the life before us, from Das Liebesverbot, in which the composer anticipates a well-known theme—that of the pardon motif in Tannhäuser:—

[By permission of Messrs. Kegan Paul.]

[By permission of Messrs. Kegan Paul.]

It was not until the performance of Rienzi that he met with any real measure of success. It followed upon ten years of comparative failure, culminating in the bitterness and penury of his two years' sojourn in Paris. The history of these struggles is admirably told by Herr Glasenapp. With his unrivalled knowledge of all that concerns his hero, his account of Wagner as conductor at Würzburg, Königsburg, Magdeburg, and Riga—before his journey to Paris—presents an intimate picture of the conventional opera house of the 'thirties. Wagner does not—as his later life would lead one to expect—make much battle against these conventions. Rienzi is sufficient evidence that his Muse was actually Italianized for the time. And Wagner the critic was at times as much unlike his later self as Wagner the composer. His youthful admiration for French and Italian composers is almost laughable when contrasted with his final views. He is "uplifted" and "ennobled" by Méhul's "Joseph," and contrasts the broad melodies of Bellini with the stiffness of German music. The revolution that he afterwards wrought in music was equally a revolution in his own ideas.

It is not, after all, to be wondered at if it took Wagner some time to reveal himself in his true colours. The music-drama which he was to create is the most complex form of art conceivable. It required a poet as well as a musician and listening to Wagner's music we are carried beauty of sound from the elaborate conceptions dramatist at that moment we are not true carry out his design a long literary trainin necessary. His youthful vacillations between were to serve their turn when the two arts were poet-musician.

Whether Wagner really was a poet is a ve cycle once remarked that he was a greater poet
But of his importance in the history of literat no question. His "Ring"—as it is popularly the old German epic, the Nibelungenlied, and th before the eyes of the whole musical world.
imparted a new interest to the beautiful old leg of the swan. In Tristan und Isolde he brought to the German stage. Tannhäuser he discovere
It is through Wagner that the story has beco the world in general. He took characters that in the dust of old legends and made them hon is as if an English composer were to unearth Amoret from the neglected pages of our "Fac instil them with actuality. "Characters" is the term for many of Wagner's dramatis pers apply it to Tannhäuser, to Frederic and Ort even to Brunnhilde, when by reason of he

"WAHNFRIED"—WAGNER'S RESIDENCE AT BAYREUTH
[From "Wagner, Bayreuth, and The Festival Plays." (Jerrold.)] humanity she loses her divinity. Tristan intensely human; Hans Sachs and Beckmesse designed and contrasted characters. But th Wagner's largest work, the "Ring," is not, o genial to the display of character. The drama moves under the shadow of an inevi

essentially non-moral, a struggle for power, Greek gods. The various groups—the Giants

CURRENT LITERATURE.

JOHN GOWER.

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF JOHN GOWER. Edited from the MSS., with Introduction, Notes, and Glossaries, by G. C. MACAULAY, M.A., formerly Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. Vols. II. and III. (Oxford: Clarendon Press. 32s.)

The first volume of this work, containing Gower's French Works, was published in 1899; and we then drew attention to the fact that the principal poem in that volume entitled "Miroir de l'Omme," or Mirror of Man, was in fact the long-lost Anglo-French poem by Gower, usually known by the title "Speculum Meditantis." It was discovered by the editor of the present volume, and was edited by him for the first time, in a manner which left little to be desired, and augured well for the new edition of the "Confessio Amantis" which was to follow, and has now appeared. And once more it is a pleasing duty to say that the editor has done his best, and has produced an edition which may very well be accepted as the standard one for a century or two to come.

Perhaps there has been no book of which the student of Middle English has, of late years, been in so much need as a new and trustworthy edition of Gower. We have long been dependent upon the well-known three-volume edition by Dr. Reinhold Pauli, published as long ago as 1857, a date when Middle English phonology had received little or no attention, so that the editor had no particular principles for his guidance. The worst feature of the book was the total absence of any sort of table of contents or index, so that the unhappy student had to construct both for himself. The estimation in which the study of English was held at that date may be gathered from a glance at what was pleasantly termed "a Glossary," which was carefully designed with a view of affording the least possible assistance to the reader, and was therefore conspicuous for having all references rigidly suppressed; and we were jocosely referred for "further information respecting the etymologies to Dr. Richardson's English Dictionary." We might there, for example, find the information that abraide is from the "A.S. abredian, arripere, deripere, to snatch or tear away"; with a cross-reference to bray, which is from "the French brayer, or broyer." Fortunately, our studies have made some advance since that date, and it is to be hoped that any future editor who attempts to supply us with "a glossary" without references will be sharply reminded of his negligence. The present edition gives us three references for "abreide, startest"; one for "abreide, to upbraid"; and one for the substantive "abreid, a start"; a sufficient proof that the editor well understands his business. And oh! the difference to us!

We regret, in fact, that it would take too much space to show how great is our gain from this new edition. By a careful and searching examination of a large number of MSS., the editor has actually recovered for us the orthography of the author, so that we can now consult the text of Gower, as we consult that of the Ormulum or of the Ayenbite of Inwyt, for exact information as to the meaning of the symbols employed. The text, in fact, is much surer than that of Chaucer; and the views of such a scholar as Gower as to the spelling of his time must be held to be of great weight and service.

We read, at p. xciv. of the introduction, as follows:—"The of the "Confessio." In fact the MSS. exhibit t in no less than six stages viz., the first recession, an the same, in an intermediate stage; the same, revis second recension, in two forms; and lastly, the third r

(p. cxxxviii.). It was assumed by Paull that "there normal forms, one having a dedication to Richard I beginning and a form of conclusion in which mention is Chaucer, and the other with a dedication to Henry of I and a conclusion in which Chaucer is not mentioned.
this assumption many highly imaginative deductions h drawn, especially as to the relations between Chau Gower; and there has been a tendency, of late years, the date of the first edition further back, upon no whatever, for the sake of developing various theor these are now definitely ended by the discovery tha recensions succeeded each other rapidly, and that the the first recension bear the date 1390 (p. xxii.). This d affords a great relief, as it sweeps away the supposed re a quarrel having arisen between the poets, and exp reference to Chaucer's "dales olde." In 1390 Chau already fifty years old, an age deemed "old" at th as we learn from Hoccleve, who was "ripe for death" age of fifty-three (Dialogue, l. 246). It is now clear t of the statements as to the relations between Cha Gower must be revised.

Briefly, we have to thank the editor for a thorough and sound text, exhibited in an orthography which reason to believe is the poet's own; for an excellent tion, in which the manuscripts and phonology a considered; for a set of useful notes (the old edition ha and for a full glossary and index of names, enabling t any required passage with ease. By way of adding a the edifice, we take occasion to explain the word topseil

In Book VIII., 1,899, we read:—

> Thei hadden wynd at wille tho,
> With topseileole, and forth they go.

And again in Book V., 3,119:—

> Bot even topseileole it blew.

The note (Vol. II., p. 543) compares the Old French e
"a la cole" from Godefroy's Dictionary, the meaning has never been explained. The answer is that it is from the Spanish "a la cola, backwards, behind"; Cola (see Diez) is the Spanish spelling of the Latin c that a la cole is simply at the tail, or in the rear; w fits Godefroy's quotation about some ships whic captured, with the exception of one which was a la cole far in the rear to be got at. Hence we may explain to as in the rear of the topsails; i.e., the wind was exact and not so violent but that the topsails could be spre what the sailors would call "a wind at will," or w most desired. The equivalent English expressio be topsail-tail. Perhaps, in the former instance, "with" force of "towards."

WALTER W. S

IN CENTRAL AFRICA.

TO THE MOUNTAINS OF THE MOON. By J. E. S. MOORE, With Illustrations and Maps. (Hurst and Blackett.

pass. Little by little only are the myths clinging to its dark places being disentangled. It is true the Lunæ Montes of Ptolemy no longer stray, like a lost caterpillar, athwart the southern face of the continent. Speke's Mountains of the Moon have given place to Stanley's Ruwenzori. The latter, again, must not, in future, be referred to as a single summit, but as a group. Yet when, as late as 1852, Sir Roderick Murchison stated in his Presidential Address to the Royal Geographical Society that Africa was a continent "unique in the stability of its earth surface," he, in common with the rest of the world, spoke in ignorance that active volcanoes were even then smoking within a hundred miles of the Equator. Still later, Stuhlmann, descrying no glaciers within the compass of his vision on the western side of the Ruwenzori ridges, inferred their total absence from the range. Lastly, to multiply no further instances, Tanganyika was long held in question as a lake of uncertain parentage with no outlet; and when both Stanley and Cameron established its connexion with the Congo by the effluent Luakuga, they found the latter river, which to Thomson and Code Horn formerly presented itself as a great stream "whirling away to the west," sluggish to stagnation. Mr. Moore's experience agreed with the later conditions. We may note here a slip of the pen (p. 129) which associates Livingstone and Stanley in the search for this outlet in 1875. By that date Livingstone was in Westminster Abbey. Change, existent and progressive, is the keynote of Mr. Moore's observations on the physical features of the country. Upon each of the three regions—the lakes, the volcanoes, and the Mountains of the Moon—his work has added information of a very valuable and varied nature.

The primary object of the expedition, which owed its main inspiration to Professor Ray Lankester and a small committee of scientific men, was to ascertain the true significance of the presence of marine fauna in Lake Tanganyika, and to seek for any similar occurrence in the other great lakes to the south and north. The answer supplied is conclusive. Neither in Lakes Nyassa and Shirwa below, nor in Kivu, the Albert Edward, and the Albert Nyanzas above were there any marine fauna or traces of there ever having been such. In Tanganyika alone were found not only jelly-fish, but a whole series of mollusca, crabs, prawns, sponges, and smaller things, all distinctly marine in type. Two deductions follow:—These phenomena are not a peculiarity of the fresh waters of Africa in general; they must then be regarded, in the instance of Tanganyika, as relics of a departed sea, which sea the author assigns to the Jurassic period. It must be remembered that the present lake is 2,700ft. above sea and 600 miles from the coast. It appears, therefore, to have once been either a separate sea, or a basin communicating with the ocean by a channel through which its denizens could enter.

Having thus contributed to the settlement of this vexed question, Mr. Moore passed from "the serious pursuit of whelks," and with his companion, Mr. Fergusson, next proceeded to study the conformation of the ridge which, with interruptions, extends northward from Tanganyika to the Mountains of the Moon. Here, again, the impressions arrived at considerably modify the views hitherto entertained. The author's own words will best explain his idea:—

> Take a section of Africa, from east to west, we find that the continent assumes, roughly speaking, the form of an immense hog's back. On the top of the ridge, and running also approximately north and south, are two immensely long and relatively narrow cracks—formed by excessive and points by astronomical observations for the fir canoes of Mfumbiro came in sight. These n figured in the Anglo-German territorial agreeme up like a dam from the floor of the lake at its nity, and are the key to the water-sheds of Cen their formation the whole area of Kivu was Nile. They exhibit three main cones, the hi Karisimbi, is computed at 14,000ft. At the sec

Moore accomplished the ascent of the wester Cha Gungo, and by boiling-point observations o crater definitely fixed its altitude as 11,350ft., within a few feet the figures previously arriv Götzen.

Between the Albert Edward and the Alb Mountains of the Moon formed the concludi traveller's research. From a colgn of vant obtained an extended view of the whole range.

> It was of importance, as it at once dismiss > the last remnant of any idea that Ruwenz > sidered as a single mountain mass. Before us > range, which looked as vast and formidable, > as many different elemental peaks as does th > of the Italian plains of the south. From th > stood one could see some seventy-five miles o > in this length there were at least four group > individual snowy peaks.

With immense labour Mr. Moore climbed 14,900ft., and discovered for the first time t glaciers in this chain. Before him, in 1895, M made several ineffectual attempts in the sam did not reach the actual snow-line. Here, the field for individual exploration. For the pr holds the record as the pioneer in touching ridges. He describes the summits as being c rather than covered with snow.

We have dealt mainly with the problem solution by Mr. Moore's efforts. There are eliciting decided opinions, discussed in his b probable value to the Empire of what Mr. termed her "undeveloped estates," and the present, and future, of the native. But thes vince of debate and personal conviction. It mu present limits to indicate that Mr. Moore reg and the African as somewhat less promising th nations would fain have them to be. The vo deserves to be read attentively. It cannot category of those which treat in a general mann African types—"the lion, the locust, and the li

OTHER NEW BOO

Guide-Books.

A French writer, M. Alphonse Allais, c
Baring Gould points out in his preface to A Bo (Methuen, 6s.), that the English tourist in I characterized by an air of profound ennui. Fra him; he is interested in nothing, and never seem place save in order to go on immediately to anot Gould is of opinion that this unfortunate t counteracted by filling up the deficiencies of certainly do well to take this with them as a supplement to the ordinary guide-book. The chapter on "architecture" does not pretend to go deeply into the subject, but it should enable any one to acquire sufficient knowledge of the different styles to be able to discriminate between them.

It is possible to forgive a man much if he has as keen an appreciation of good literature as has Mr. F. W. Bockett, the author of the pretty little volume which he calls SOME LITERARY LANDMARKS FOR PILGRIMS ON WHEELS (Dent, 3s. 6d., n.). He has excellent sympathies; he is obviously a lover of old books; and on the whole he chats about his excursions quite pleasantly. Thomas Day and Cobbett; Moor Park, with its memories of the Temples, and Swift, and Stella; Jane Austen's house at Chawton and Gilbert White's at Selborne—they are all treated by Mr. Bockett with a wealth of apposite allusion and quotation. He is a man with a real love of books, and men of this stamp are so rarely found among writers in these days that we cannot but be grateful for what he has given us. And yet—since justice must be done—he has very nearly spoiled the flavour of what should have been an entirely charming book by the perpetual intrusion of a sort of false humour that we should not have expected from so scholarly a writer. The chapter devoted to Charles Kingsley is perhaps the most irritating in this respect. And Mr. Bockett does not keep himself and his personal affairs (including his bicycle) quite so much in the background as we could have wished, from the artistic point of view. Still, his little book makes very pleasant reading, in places; and it has a number of interesting sketches (some of which we reproduce here) by Mr. J. A. Symington. It makes as good a guide-book for Surrey and its neighbourhood as any traveller of literary inclinations could desire, and it has the additional merit of being small, compact, and easy to carry.

[From "Some Literary Landmarks for Pilgrims on Wheels," by permission of Messrs. Dent.]

Messrs. Ward, Lock, and Co. issue some well-arranged and illustrated guide-books in their series of Shilling Pictorial Guides. That on ABERYSTWYTH contains information for travellers over most of the Southern part of North Wales, including those who may wish to ascend Snowdon and Cader Idris. There are six maps and over sixty illustrations, with appendices for anglers, cyclists, and golfers. ALDEBURGH, in the same way, deals exhaustively with the Suffolk coast round Aldeburgh, Southwold, and Felixstowe, and pays a visit as far inland as Ipswich. FOLKESTONE takes in the coast line of South-East Kent from Pegwell Bay to that most interesting of places—Romney Marsh, and includes such seaside resorts as Sandgate, Hythe, Dover, Deal, Walmer, and Sandwich.

GLASGOW IN 1901 (2s. 6d. n.) is a more ambitious work, written by James Hamilton Muir, illustrated by Muirhead Bone, and published by Wm. Hodge and Co. of Glasgow and Edinburgh. It is well written, and does not confine itself by any Abbey Church of St. Peter, Bath, Malmesbury Abbe and the Church of St. Lawrence, at Bradford-on-Avon.

Bristol, the Cathedral and See, is another series, compiled by Mr. H. J. L. J. Masse, whi handled by the Rev. W. D. Sweeting. Both of these little handbooks give an exhaustive history and des the respective buildings, while Mr. Sweeting adds an the original monastery at Ely, which seems by the w been a "mixed community," containing religious both sexes. Both volumes are profusely illustrated.

[From "Some Literary Landmarks for Pilgrims on Wheels," by perm Messrs. Dent.]

The aim of THE COACHING MAN'S COMPENDIUM which is published at the offices of the Road, is to f the gap between the issuing of the Badminton book on and the present day. It is a curious medley of a bi prose, newspaper paragraphs, and lists of the L Provincial coaches for the last few years.

[From "Some Literary Landmarks for Pilgrims on Wheels," by perm Messrs. Dent.]

Wagner and Bayreuth.

FICTION.

Brown Humanity.

Some of Mr. Clifford's stories collected in BUSH-WHACKING, AND OTHER SKETCHES (Blackwood, 6s.) have appeared before in Blackwood's and Macmillan's magazines. They are all well worth reading, and some of them are very good indeed. The two best are certainly "Father Rouellot" and "In the Heart of Kalamantan"—which are as good a pair of short stories as you will find anywhere. The author of "In Court and Kampong" knows his corner of Asia thoroughly, and he brings before us with wonderful vividness his Malays, Dyaks, and the country in which they live. It is good for us to know something of these things, and of the men who do their work out there without much in the way of glory or reward, who have to carry through their own little wars in the midst of a heart-breaking jungle, with perhaps a single paragraph in The Times to note their failure or success. And we could not have a better guide to the Malay Peninsula than Mr. Hugh Clifford.

Sojourners in Japan.

Mrs. Hugh Fraser's new story MARNA'S MUTINY (Hutchinson, 6s.) is quite as entertaining as her "Little Grey Sheep" or "A Diplomatist's Wife in Japan." Major de Wesloff is a portly, good-looking, pleasure-loving member of the Scandinavian aristocracy who has accepted the post of Consul at one of the great Japanese ports. His daughter Marna has been educated in Europe and arrives in the Settlement at the age of eighteen with a remarkably strong belief in her own powers of putting the world in order. Her father is devoted to her—but to others also, especially to Mrs. Adair, who uses mauve powder and seems to all but the rather priggish Marna to be a wise and rather pleasant lady. But when a beautiful young girl of high spirit possesses a papa prodigue who is generous to a fault there is very likely to be a mutiny. Beneath the shadow of Fuji Mrs. Fraser makes her little play. Lord Kilmorack comes to the Port in his beautiful white yacht with a very agreeable and worldly party of friends. After some difficulties the heroine is given in marriage to Prince Charming, who turns out to be a peer with "a glory of love in his own eyes." But as Marna has "a big sun-true glance" they are well mated, and one is left envying these happy people and the happy author who is at once so clever and so simple, so polite in her description of life and so knowing about externals. The picture of Japan from the Foreign resident's point of view is well done, but Mrs. Fraser is not omniscient. Mr. Le Gallienne is the only writer we remember who believes, as does Mrs. Fraser, that the robin's egg is blue. It is, however, the manner of telling her story which makes her book so interesting. There is constant humour and happy phraseology. "Marna's Mutiny" will give an added pleasure to the siesta on such a yacht as the hero's Aurora as she lies at peace in the Cowes Roads, or in any other place where a holiday mood permits the reader such a mental refreshment.

Political Intrigue.

One has learnt by this time to look for a stirring story of political intrigue from Mr. Wm. Le Queux, and such we have in HER MAJESTY'S MINISTER (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.). He has made something of a "corner" in dangerous diplomacy, the present volume being very much on the lines of his "Of Royal Blood." Embassy balls and crushes where beautiful women rub shoulders with cunning diplomatists, moonlight walks in the course of which designing women spies seek to extract unsatisfactory than absurd. One learns the Fourth Dimension from the lady who comes is supposed to be exquisitely piquant in her cho is an inhabited plane—invisible to our eyes, b

The Dimensionists are a race "clear-sigh practical, horsible; with no ideals, prejudi with no feeling for art and no reverence for life ethical tradition; callous to pain, weakness death. . . ." Thus admirably accoutred to the Fourth Dimensionist comes, sees, and m ordinary personages of the story. We gather sionists that we are all sunken in beliefs, tr worm-eaten with altruism, solaced with crossl Inheritors will alter all this, and the way t is certainly world-compelling. No doubt the deeper meaning in their work than the casual to discover, but those who admire the novel will find the surface qualities of "The Inherit entertaining in themselves. The details of the and unfamiliar," and there are many excitin much vigorous character-drawing in this extren in certain parts highly interesting novel.

An Irish Story.

KITTY'S VICTORIA CROSS (Warne, 6s.) is a unlike many pretty stories it has also several Captain Peterson, Kitty herself, and her fr daughter, who represents a certain type—n
the most common type—of Girton girl.
hand, Kendrick, the American millionaire convincing. Mr. Robert Cromie writes pleasa affectation, and he has an eye for stirring e best things in his book are the description of Dan O'Mara and the mob of peasantry, and tha rear-guard action where he won for Kitty he
The episode of the mad scientist, in his haunt us as out of harmony with the rest of the b all round, "Kitty's Victoria Cross" is consid average.

Cosmopolitan Society.

Broken English, intermingled with a la French phrases, is the order of the day in Mrs. S shield's novel—THE ARCHBISHOP AND THE LA 6s.). Indeed, a truly cosmopolitan company round Madame Petrofsky's hospitable board in Bref when John Quentin makes his appearan takes the reader some little time to sort them feat that he has scarcely completed when the the master of the house scatters the guests like and renders his labour profitless. About this g Comte de St. Aubin, there hangs a cloud family regard him as an inventor, and it is a fac up parts of the property at intervals with chemi
The practised reader will note that explosion scale are not essential to the production of m is Bruno's hobby, and will be prepared for are a great many characters and much const the book. In the girl, Gartha, is an excell precocious French child. The title of the b little idea of the contents; indeed, we lose bishop and the lady among the crowd of chara be interesting to speculate upon the numb

little bay of Hérista, with its princely fisherman, the Dauphin, its old curé, Father Pasquion, and the guests from Paris who come and take part in their lives—all this is drawn with sympathy and discernment. But Conca, the pale siren with clear, ice-cold, passionless, yet strangely musical voice, the Spirit of the Sea embodying at once its cruelty and beauty, is a fantasy in the midst of real people, a something inexplicable intruding in the course of a pretty love-story. It says a good deal for Miss Blisset's imaginative power that Conca does not altogether outrage our sense of possibility. She is of the same family with Elsie Venner, and it is not every novelist who can handle such fantastic spirits with impunity. The novel is ingenious, with some prettily descriptive passages, and some characters that have originality and life.

A Reformed Rake.

The central idea of FRANKS: DUELLIST (Hutchinson, 6s.) is possibly taken from "Barry Lyndon," but Lord Caryl Franks, subsequently Lord Devenne and Earl of Sudmouth by his brother's death, ends as a reformed rake with a happy marriage, and has the good fortune also to render considerable services to his country. Mr. Ambrose Pratt has a fine carelessness of detail. He calmly brings the Great Commoner on the stage and dubs him Earl of Chatham. But these things do not matter to the story, which is brisk and sparkling. This sort of adventure-weaving is not literature; it will be dead in a few months' time, and the world will not mourn over its obsequies; but in the meanwhile it will have amused some hundreds of readers to whom a novel means nothing more than an hour's pleasant excitement. Indeed, as a purveyor of this kind of stuff Mr. Pratt should do well. Here we may find as much fighting and as much ardent love as any reader could safely put away in a summer's afternoon, and, in addition, we meet such heroes of the past as Pitt (even though he masquerades under his father's title), Napoleon, Fouché, Talleyrand, and a host of other celebrities, and you shall find less interesting heroines than Mademoiselle Clarisse. We concede to Mr. Pratt a certain eminence in his gay and careless trade.

Australia.

The injustice meted out to "selectors" of land in Australia in the sixties under the Gavan Duffy Land Act is the main motive of THE WISDOM OF ESAU, by R. L. Outhwaite and C. H. Chomley (Fisher Unwin, 6s.). Perhaps it would be more correct to say that this political or economic fact supplies the background throughout, for although the fact pervades the book this is by no means a didactic novel. The subject is treated artistically and firmly with a due sense of its subordination to the characters that lend the story its chief interest. "The Wisdom of Esau" comes very near to being a great book; a better equipment in a purely literary direction would have made it so. As it is the book is one that stands out from the ruck and will surely command a wide circle of readers. The authors have imported the very atmosphere of the uncleared bush, the solitude of the farmer's life devoted to coaxing an unwilling crop from difficult soil, the haunting misfortune that dogs his every effort to overcome the obstacles of nature and the injustices of man. Toland's character is drawn with great strength. He is the central figure, a man of immense energy and unbounded hope prevented from wresting a sustenance from the land by the sharp practice of squatters and their agents, and such a run of bad luck as it is to be hoped does not frequently pursue the settler. He is, moreover, somewhat of a social rebel whose have felt inclined to describe as sketches (chiefly graphical) rather than stories. Take the first, and which gives the book its name. Every now and Boldrewood remembers his fictitious personages and be in with a jerk. But for the most part it is palpably talking to the reader on a subject which he prob as much about as any one. The whole book impression of being the direct fruit of experience: an nothing more calculated to interest. Nobody could through without realizing a great deal of the Aust and feeling that if he were suddenly set down in a she it would be familiar ground to him. The style, howev it has the great merits of straightforwardness and al often terribly slipshod. The following will give an id its strength and its weakness.

> Years afterwards he performed similarly [" he horse with a trick of waving his head about], to the ast of a bushranger in Riverina, whose revolver was poin writer's head the while, less anxious indeed for his safety than that old Steamer—such was his appropria should march on, and, having a nervous running m the buggy.

There is a humorous and exciting situation in a sente what a sentence!

TOLD BY THE TAFFRAIL, by Sundowner (Chatto and 3s. 6d.), has a note at the beginning which says: stories have been thrown together during the course of run through the Austral Colonies, the Eastern and Pa and South and Central America. Many of them hav appeared in the Star and the Field." This leads us exactly what we get—a bright, shallow, amusing set tales, skimming human nature in its various shades, too ephemeral to have been quite worth reprinting times containing some happy idea that deserved long ment. "Sundowner" has a light touch. Nothing writes is tedious. The book is full of a rather facil and is all highly readable.

THE BLUE DIAMOND (Chatto and Windus, 6s.) i fluent pen of Mrs. L. T. Meade. It is a readable story just sufficiently deep in mystification not to be im transparent; but it would be much improved by con and the probabilities are more than once wrenched vi suit the situation. It is the tale of an innocent girl under the suspicion of stealing a valuable stone entrus by a friend. Mrs. Sarah Blossom, the kindly village and Peter Watson, the omnipresent and supernatur cockney lad, are the most "live" characters in the of course, contribute to vindicating the innocen heroine. Mrs. Meade has done more careful and mor work, but "The Blue Diamond" is bright enough t an hour or two.

THE DREAM WOMAN, by Kythe Wilwynne (Fishe 6s.), is an ingenious, but sometimes tedious, account of t who find that they have gone through previous in together, with many blood-curdling adventures. Su should make for the happiness of any married couple; events, reminiscences could never fail them. The the way, would object to our use of the expressio events." She calls it an "odious betting comparis names of her two characters are rather improbably al

LIBRARY NOTES.

As the outcome of Mr. Carnegie's gift of £100,000 the city of Glasgow is to be provided with no less than fourteen district free libraries and reading rooms. They are to be divided into five first-grade, six second-grade, and three third-grade libraries. The estimated annual expenditure on a first-grade library is £950, on a second-grade £800, and on a third-grade £650. This certainly does not err on the side of extravagance. A proposal of the Committee to impose a halfpenny rate is to be further considered.

Mr. Carnegie's latest promises of aid in the establishment of public libraries include £15,000 to Coatbridge, £3,000 to Annan, Dumfriesshire, and £3,000 to Kelso, all conditional upon the adoption of the Acts and the provision of suitable sites. It is a principle with the donor only to help those who are willing to help themselves. The Aberdeen University has been asked by the Carnegie Trustees to draw up a statement regarding the more pronounced wants of the library.

A novel and very practical idea has been carried out by the Mayor of Norwich. In inviting the citizens to a reception, he asked them to bring books to form the nucleus of a workhouse library. This resulted in the receipt of 2,000 volumes. It is conceivable, of course, that these may not all be suitable for the purpose intended.

At the annual meeting of the subscribers of the Paddington (Voluntary) Free Public Library it was resolved to offer the 4,000 volumes forming the collection to the Borough Council, asking them to maintain the library as a rate-supported institution. We hope that this proposal will commend itself to the authorities. They have already been intrusted with the possession and management of the Kensal-town Library, transferred from Chelsea.

The diocese of Southwark has recently become possessed of what should form the foundation of a fine cathedral library. The books consist of the Fathers of the Church in Greek and Latin, with many other erudite works. They form part of a collection made by the Rev. H. R. Bailey, formerly of St. John's College, Cambridge. A special room is being prepared at the Collegiate Church for their reception.

In an able comparison between American and English libraries in Public Libraries (Chicago) Mr. A. Keogh says that "an English library will do more work for the same money," and that "the American man cheerfully taxes himself for libraries, but does not use them. The Englishman uses his library more, and takes home books on history, technology, or literature."

The thirty-ninth annual report of the Birmingham Free Libraries is a wonderful record of growth and vitality. The city now possesses upwards of a quarter of a million books, and during the past year 1,260,000 volumes have been issued, an average of 3,435 a day. The Shakespeare memorial library comprises 10,974 volumes, all acquired since the destruction of the original collection by fire in 1879. The most notable event of the year was the bequest of the well-selected library of 7,000 volumes formed by the late Mr. H. Payton Badley, which will be kept separate and distinct.

With the humours of cataloguing and classification librarians are familiar. Library reports, too, sometimes have their lighter side. The following is extracted from the report of a certain public library :—

Sexes	Males	1,519	2,672
	Females	1,013
	Students	140

Correspondence.

THE ETYMOLOGY OF "GERM

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Our lexicographers are still very u regard to the origin of this all-important nam English Dictionary" says :—

> The name (Germani) does not appear > applied to these peoples by themselves or t > from Teut. sources. A view widely held is > name given by the Gauls to their neighbou > derivations suggested are from O. Irish gair, ne > and from Ir. gairm, battle-cry (Wachter, Grim

Now with all deference to Mr. Henry Br German writers whom he, in common with Dictionary," the veteran Canon Taylor ("N Histories"), and others, including Mr. Furne entirely fail to see how they can so gaily overrid explicit statement of Tacitus that the new nam gradually adopted by all the Teutonic tribes ( name) from the fear which it inspired when the fir crossed the Rhine, driving the Gauls before t themselves in a spirit of bravado :—

> Ceterum Germaniae vocabulum recens et > quoniam qui primi Rhenum transgressi Gallo > nunc Tungri tunc Germani vocati sint; ita nati > gentis, evaluisse paulatim, ut omnes pri > ob metum, mox etiam a se ipsis invento n > vocarentur. [Germania, II.]

It seems clear to me that the Celtic derivati the Celtophil Zeuss and others, including even which so captivated Littré, are anything but co apart from the question of their philological soun can surely be nothing more than the Latin pl of a Teutonic compound which would be rep
High German and Old Saxon by heri-man, in G
(acc. hari)-mannu = A.-Sax. here-mann, "warrior man" (cp. the German Christian name and surn
the Latin initial "g" standing for the very rong German aspirate, which was almost a guttural-sp the form of the name was doubtless influenced by "having the same parents."

We have the analogy of other Germanic nam
"h" was represented in Latin by a guttural-c e.g., "Hlodowig" (Mod. Ger. "Ludwig")
"Chlodovechus" or "Chlodovisus," whence
"Clovis"; "Hlodhild," Latinized as "Chlode French "Clotilde"; and "Hlodi," Latinized whence French "Clodion"; cp. "Catti" and for "Chatti," the well-known Latin renderin tribal name.

Even in our own language we find instances in names being gutturalized into the explosives Gaythorn = Haythorn (Hawthorn), Cawthorn = H thorpe = Cawthorpe = Hawthorpe; while in dial find such words as "gawk" for "hawk," vb.;
hreed hawks"; "gole" for "hole," &c.

Of course "German" has previously bee
"a warrior," "a brave," obviously on acco
"ob metum"; but those who hazarded this

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Dickens is not to have it all his own way this autumn. A new uniform edition of Thackeray's works, reprinted from the first editions, and containing—like the forthcoming Oxford Dickens—all the original illustrations is announced by Messrs. Macmillan. There will also be facsimiles of the original wrappers. The new edition will begin in October with "Vanity Fair." Messrs. Macmillan also have in the press an edition de luxe of the Life and Works of Charles Kingsley, to be completed in nineteen volumes, beginning next month with the first volume of the Life and appearing at the rate of one volume a month until "Water Babies" and "Heroes" complete the series in March, 1903. The Life will be reprinted from the original unabridged edition, and will contain a portrait engraved on steel by C. H. Jeens, a photogravure of the bust by Woolner, photogravures of a portrait painted by Mr. Lowes Dickinson and an etched portrait after the same artist.

An important omission was made in the recently published list of forthcoming additions to Messrs. Macmillan's "English Men of Letters" Series—a Life of Ruskin, by Mr. Frederic Harrison. The other volumes in preparation are: "Tennyson," by Sir Alfred Lyall; "George Eliot," by Mr. Leslie Stephen; "Crabbe," by Canon Ainger; "Hazlitt," by Mr. Augustine Birrell; "Matthew Arnold," by Mr. Herbert Paul; "Jane Austen," by the Rev. H. C. Beeching; "Richardson," by Mr. Austin Dobson.

The following biographical works are also announced by Messrs. Macmillan: "The Life of George Grove," by Mr. C. L. Graves; "The Letters of John Richard Green," edited by Mr. Leslie Stephen, and "The Life of the Right Hon. Sir William Molesworth," by Mrs. M. G. Fawcett." Three books of travel are included in the same list—"The Sherbro and its Hinterland," by Mr. T. J. Aldridge, District Commissioner at Sherbro, West Coast of Africa; "Glories of Spain," by the author of "Letters from Majorca," Mr. Charles W. Wood; and "The Island of Formosa: A Complete Account of Its Condition, Political and Industrial," by Mr. James W. Davidson, United States Consul at Formosa. The next volume of the "Highways and Byways" Series will be "The English Lakes," by Mr. A. G. Bradley, illustrated by Mr. Joseph Pennell. Another illustrated work will be a volume by Canon Capes entitled "Scenes of Rural Life in Hampshire among the Manors of Bramshott," and a new scientific work by Lord Avebury, entitled "The Scenery of England and the Causes to which it is due," will contain both maps and illustrations. The most important illustrated book in Messrs. Macmillan's new list, however, is the five-guinea collection of "Thirty Etchings illustrating the Work of Rudyard Kipling," by William Strang, including the portrait recently reproduced as a supplement in Literature. Mr. Kipling's "Kim," by the way, is to be published by Messrs. Macmillan both in the ordinary edition and in a limited édition de luxe, uniform with his other works. Another interesting announcement is that Mr. James Lane Allen's "A Kentucky Cardinal, and Aftermath" will appear in a new edition with illustrations by Mr. Hugh Thomson.

The same publishers announce a volume by Mr. Frederic Harrison entitled "George Washington, and other American Addresses." Among the more important of Messrs. Macmillan's other announcements are: "Philosophy: Its Scope and Method," a course of lectures by the late Professor Henry Sidgwick; "The Growth of Hegel's Logic," by J. B. Baillie; "Addresses on the Acts of the Apostles," by the late Archbishop Benson, with an Introduction by Adeline, Duchess of Bedford; "Notes on Clementine Recognitions," by the late Dr. Hort; Book VII. of the "Stromateis" of Clemens Alexandrinus, edited by the late Dr. Hort; "Handbook to the Textual Criticism of the New Testament," by Dr. F. G. Kenyon; "The Christian Ministry," by the late Dr. Lightfoot.

François de Fénelon, one of the most interesting personali-on the moon; and the commentary of Benvenuto da I the "Divina Commedia." Other books announced by Methuen are "Women and their Work," by the H

Lyttelton; "Sporting Memories" by a well-known M.
Otho Paget; and "English Villages," by F. H. Hitchcock

Messrs. Chatto and Windus will shortly publish trated book on "A Versailles Christmastide," the te by Mary Stuart Boyd and the illustrations by A. S. Bo and Mrs. Boyd collaborated successfully last year Stolen Summer," a volume on their roundabout tour to asia and America, published by Messrs. Blackwood.
Chatto's new list also announces "The Reign of Quee
by Mr. Justin McCarthy; "The Adventures of Monarch," by Robert Barr; "The Joy of Life," by the uniform edition of Zola's works edited by E Vizetelly; "Despair's Last Journey," by David Murray; "The Cat's-paw," by Mrs. Crocker; "The Cloud," by M. P. Shiel, the author of "The Yellow D
"The Wealth of Mallerstang," by Algernon Gissing Triumph of Hilary Blachland," by Bertram Mitford Blind Marriage, &c.," by George R. Sims; "The Cank Being Episodes of a Woman's Life," by George Manvil
"A Stumble by the Way," by Mrs. Meade; "A F Finish," by Florence Warden; "Three Men of M
Sarah Tytler; "Judah Pyecroft, Puritan: A Roman Restoration," by Harry Lindsay; and "As it was Writ
T. W. Speight—which will form the "Gentleman's Ann 1901.

Early in the autumn Messrs. Sonnenschein will "Descriptive Guide to the Best Fiction," by A. Baker, to the Midland Railway Institute, Derby. To judg preliminary inspection of the MSS. the compilation a be a most ambitious attempt to classify and summar English, Irish, Scottish, or American novel of any im ever produced. Even Continental novels are given wh have been translated into English. The books are according to the nationality of the authors, w characterizations, dates of first editions, and other in of the kind. An appendix includes a list of fiction every period of our history, and the references to othe deal with practically all the important questions or dep of life.

Next month the same publishers will publish a v
"Charity and the Poor Law," by S. D. Fuller, chairman of the Paddington Board of Guardians.
Sonnenschein also announce "Recent Object Lessons Science," by Mr. A. R. Whiteway, who deals, amo things, with the suggested "Moral Hospital for Patients," "The State versus the Criminal," "Law's
"Our Criminal Administration," and "The Prison Act Reports of prison authorities are included, with Another new book on Criminology—"The Science logy: the Defence of Society against Crime," by M Boies (Putnam), is coming from the United States, and work to be published by Messrs. Sonnenschein, is ex September. Mr. Boies has had much experience in th stration of penal laws in the United States—espec management of convicts in the prisons of Pennsylvania.

Among their educational books Messrs. Sonnenschei hand "A Parallel of Greek and Latin Syntax," Russell, M.A., assistant master at Clifton College. Th forms one of the Parallel Grammar Series edited by Sonnenschein, its object being to show the syntax language at a glance by means of parallel columns.

The Syndics of the Cambridge University Press publish in the autumn the first part of the "Index Ani the preparation of which was undertaken by Mr. t Sherborn in 1890. The British Association appointed committee to watch over this work, which is int supersede Agassiz and Scudder, and be to the student life what the "Index Kewensis" is to the botanist.

The Cambridge University Press has issued a prosp mistranslations will be made a feature of the Notes, care will be taken to avoid controversial opinions. The volumes will have as frontispieces photogravure reproductions of emblematic subjects mainly by the great English artists. The Bishop of Ripon will contribute an additional volume, forming an "Introduction to the Study of Scripture." It is also proposed to issue an experimental volume of the "Apocrypha," viz., "Ecclesiasticus." The first two volumes—"Genesis" by Dr. Sayce, Professor of Assyriology in Oxford, and "Exodus" by Dr. Kennedy, Professor of Hebrew and Semitic Languages at Oxford—will be issued in October.

Messrs. Seeley will publish in the early autumn a story by Miss Beatrice Marshall, entitled "Old Blackfriars in the Days of Van Dyck." It will be illustrated by four portraits of Van Dyck's and four views.

Books to look out for at once.

"Arts under Arms: An University Man in Khaki." By Maurice Fitz-Gibbon. Illustrated. Longmans.

"A Short History of the Hebrews to the Roman Period." By the Rev. R. L. Ottley. Cambridge University Press. 5s.

["An attempt to furnish teachers or students of the Old Testament with a sketch of the actual course of Hebrew history, somewhat more consistent with the present state of our knowledge than the text-books now in use." Maps.]

"Dawn of the Reformation." Vol. I. By H. B. Workman. Wesleyan Conference Office. 2s. 6d.

"Epsom, its History and Surroundings." By G. Home. Homeland Association. 6s. net.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

ART.

BOTTICELLI. (Monographs on Artists.) By E. STEINMANN. Translated by C. Dodgson. 10×7. 114 pp. Orevel. 4s. n.

[Contains about ninety illustrations, chiefly reproductions of Botticelli's own work.]

BIOGRAPHY.

FROM SQUIRE TO PRINCE. A History of the Rise of the House of Cirksena. By W. P. Doeble. 9×5¾. 157 pp. Unwin. 10s. 6d.

[The story of the gradual rise of the Chief of Gretsyl, or Cirksena, to the dignity of Count and Prince of East Friesland.]

IN MEMORIAM, HARRIETT MEURICOFFRE. By JOSEPHINE BUTLER. 8¼×5½. 208 pp. H. Marshall. 5s.

EDUCATIONAL.

EMARE. (Old and Middle English Texts.) Ed. by A. B. GOUGH. 7¾×5. 39 pp. Sampson Low. 2s. n.

FICTION.

AN EPISODE ON A DESERT ISLAND. By the author of "Miss Molly." 7½×5. 175 pp. Murray. 2s. 6d. n.

FOUR-LEAVED CLOVER. By MAXWELL GRAY. 7½×5. 224 pp. Heinemann. 6s.

[By a misprint the author of this novel was called "Gray Maxwell" in our "Books to Look out for" last week.]

WOMEN MUST WEEP. By SARAH TYTLER. 7¾×5¼. 312 pp. J. Long. 6s.

SOULS OF PASSAGE. AMELIA E. BARR. 7¾×5¼. 310 pp. Unwin. 6s.

HISTORY.

THE STORY OF KING ALFRED. By SIR WALTER BESANT. (Library of Useful Stories.) 6×3¾. 207 pp. Newnes. 1s.

MODERN GREECE. By SIR R. C. JEBB. 7½×5. 172 pp. Macmillan. 5s.

MODERN EUROPE. Period VIII., 1815-1850. By W. A. PHILLIPS. 7½×5. 575 pp. Rivington. 6s. n.

HISTORY OF FLORENCE. By PROF. P. VILLARI. 8½×5½. 576 pp. Unwin. 7s. 6d.

PHILOSOPHY.

THE ORIGIN OF THOUGHT. By the REV. D. NICKERSON. 7¾×5¼. 409 pp. Kegan Paul. 6s. n.

[Intended for young people of good ordinary education who have not read philosophy.]

POETRY.

PANSIES. By ELSIE MAY. 7×4½. 134 pp. Allen. 3s. 6d. n.

TRANSFIGURATION, and other Verses. By CATHERINE BLUNT and J. FIELDING. 6½×4. 87 pp. Allen. 3s. 6d. n.

PASSION SONNETS, and other Verses. By R. METCALFE. 5¾×4¼. 188 pp. Art and Book Company.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

MY FOURTH TOUR IN WESTERN AUSTRALIA. 2nd Ed. By A. F. CALVERT, F.R.G.S. 11½×9. 300 pp. Dean. 7s. 6d. n.

[A cheaper edition of Mr. Calvert's handsome and profusely illustrated work, first published in 1897.]

CHESS.

Address "Chess": LITERATURE, Printing House

PROBLEM No. 213, by KARL MUSIL, Bohemia. BLACK. 9 pieces.

WHITE. 10 pieces.
White to play and mate in three moves.

PROBLEM A. TROITZ. BLACK.

WHITE.
White to pl

PROBLEM No. 215, by C. H. Coster. Wh K at K 2; R at K Kt sq; Kt at K B 2; pawn Q B 6. Black (7 pieces)—K at K R 4; R at K R 7 pawns at K R 3, K Kt 3, Q R 3, Q Kt 3. Wh win. This is reprinted for comparison with foreg

PROBLEM No. 216, by Dr. Tarrasch.—Wh K at K 2; B at K Kt sq; Kt at Q B 6. Blac at K Kt 6; pawns at K R 6 and K B 5. Wh win.

SOLUTIONS.—Problem No. 200, Varain (3), followed by Kt–Q B 3 ch, &c. If 1. —, K×Kt &c. If 1. —, B–B 3; 2. Kt–Q 2, &c. No. White wins by P–Kt 7, followed by P–B 4 ch Troitzky, the author's idea is 1. Kt–B 6 ch, K &c., but there is no apparent win unless B removed. No. 203, White (2), Q–Q 3. No. 20 (3), key 1. Q–K sq, Kt×Q; 2. Kt–Kt 6 ch, & problem, but apparently cooked by 1. Kt–Kt 6 c B–B 8, &c. No. 205, Reichelm, key K–B 6.

Correct Solvers are A. C. W. (Bromley) 20 Tucker (Ilkley) 200 to 204; M. L. Brinkworth 201; L. G. Hunt (Liverpool), 199, 200, 203; Thoms, 198, 200, 203; Otto Würzburg (Grand Ra 193, 194; H. E. Settle (Temple), 190, 193.

NOTES AND NEWS.—The Hastings and St. Leonards C.C. have be tour through the West of England to Cork and Dublin. Wilts, Bath, South Wales, and Cork were all defeated by the visitors, who appear t received all round. This a good object lesson, and may bear fruit.

The Dutch have had a good meeting at Haarlem, Dr. A. G. Ollan in matches against Essex and others recently, taking first prize. visitors from London, Frankfort, and Budapest. Loman is anxious match between London and Holland. It may come about—after the

The Glasgow C.C. has engaged Teichmann (London) as instructo

Liverpool has beaten Edinburgh in a long drawn-out correspond the two games and announcing mate in 45 in the second of these. proved sufficient!

GAME No. XCIV.—Played at Christiania:—

FRENCH DEFENCE.

White. H. Jonsson	Black. T. Crain.	White. H. Jonsson.
1. P–K 4	P–K 3	17. P×Kt
2. P–Q 4	P–Q 4	18. B–Kt 2
3. Kt–Q B 3	Kt–K B 3	19. Kt–Q sq
4. P–K 5 (a)	K Kt–Q 2	20. Q–Kt 4 (e)
5. P–B 4 (b)	P–Q B 4	21. P×Kt
6. P×B P	Kt×B P (c)	22. R×B
7. P–Q R 3	P–Q R 3	23. Kt–B 2
8. P–Q Kt 4	K Kt–Q 2	24. Kt–B 3
9. B–Q 3	P–K Kt 3	25. Q–R 4
10. Kt–Q 2	B–K B 2 (d)	26. Q×R

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 201. SATURDAY, AUGUST 21, 1897.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

NOTES OF THE DAY 169, 170, 171

"LITERATURE" PORTRAITS.—XVI. John Ruskin 171

SOME RUSKINIANA.—A "Personal View," by E. T. Cook 180

JOHN RUSKIN AND HIS PUBLISHER 181

THE VALUE OF RARE RUSKINIANA 181

A RUSKIN BIBLIOGRAPHY 180

SOME MOVEMENTS IN VICTORIAN POETRY, by Arthur Waugh. V.—The Poetry of Reaction and Artifice..... 184

CURRENT LITERATURE—

Charles II. 186

Mr. Austin Dobson's Poems..... 186

Roman Art 187

Some Guide Books—

West Kent—Around London South Side—The Road to the North—Rail and River Guides—Cromer and Mundesley Expresses—Switzerland Great Britain—The Orient Line Guide 188

The Eternal City—Robert Aunys: Poor Priest—The Helmet of Navarre—A Forbidden Name—A Woman Alone—A Daring Spirit 188, 189

CORRESPONDENCE—Sir Walter Besant Wiltshire Words 191

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for... 191, 192

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS 192

NOTES OF THE DAY.

We publish this week a special Illustrated article on Ruskin's life and work, and Mr. E. T. Cook contributes to the number some interesting reminiscences of Ruskin. On page 189 will be found a Ruskin bibliography.

Next week we shall issue a Tolstoy number, with articles by Mr. Aylmer Maude, Mr. Brayley Hodgetts, Mr. G. Calderon, and Mr. Francis Gribble.

The Pan-Celtic Congress opened at Dublin on Wednesday. Next week we shall publish an account of its proceedings written by Mr. A. P. Graves.

* * * *

In our Carlyle number, on August 10, we printed a hitherto unpublished letter, written by Carlyle à propos of his work on Cromwell. The name of the recipient does not appear on the letter, but Mr. A. Edmund Spender, from whom we received it, now writes to inform us that Carlyle's correspondent, and the author of the History of Wages mentioned in the letter, was none other than Thomas Ballantyne.

to lose its position as the most literary of the dailies; h discovered a new critic who "shapes well" in the person Chesterton. Possibly he did let the paper lose some lightness of touch for which, thanks to writers like Mr. M'Carthy, Mr. Andrew Lang, and Mr. Whiteing, it h been noticeable; but that was probably due to the ex caution inspired by his own long connexion with a comic Mr. Lehmann is succeeded by Mr. Edwards, hithe manager of the paper.

* * * *

We have had a good many editorial changes of th during the last year or two. But here in England such cause but a mild sensation, everything happens decently order, and we are not permitted even a peep through the when the editorial dispute, if dispute there be, is takin Not so in America. The New York Times gives us a ve account of the state of affairs in the office of the C (Ohio) Press-Post, which is worth quoting. It reveals con "the like of which," says the New York Times, "we heard before," and throws a curious light on the poss of a yellow democratized Press.

The editor of the Press-Post begins by stating t had been "astonished and deeply pained" the day upon glancing through the news columns of his pa discover in them a "vicious and insulting article" a the City Board of Equalization, to "each worthy mem which body the editor tenders "an abject apology inexcusable publication of such an outrageous article then proceeds to say that investigation had revealed t offensive article was written by the Court House rep the paper and passed by its city editor, though both have known that it was not news matter, but an utterance of the most vicious kind. Then follows this revelation:—"Mr. Marshall, acting city editor, wa for an explanation, and he flatly disavowed responsibility it to the door of the Court House reporter, Mr. Weibl whom we, the Press-Post management, can have no co authority, owing to the regulations recently forced up the organization known as Newswriters' Union, No. being able to obtain any satisfaction whatever fr Marshall, our city editor, and preferring to have no cit at all rather than one so wholly incompetent, Mr. M was politely requested to resign. He refused point And there the episode closes, for the present at least conclusion the editor of the Press-Post says:—"W know how long we shall be obliged to suffer Mr. Ma damaging incumbency as acting city editor, but we s to accomplish his removal without much delay, and, me we humbly beg and pray for the charitable indulgenc long-suffering and patient readers."

Communist General Cluseret, might also be reckoned among men of letters in virtue of a volume of reminiscences.

* * * *

It seems to have become the literary fashion in America to attack Mr. Rudyard Kipling. "No swifter fall from favor has ever been known in literature," writes a contributor to the New York Journal. "Four years ago this was the most popular of living authors; to-day the sale of his books is merely nominal." The cause of this change of opinion is said to have been the publication of "The Absent-minded Beggar," which revealed the author as "casting about for further feats of national brigandage and shame that he might sing these with all his soul." An alternative explanation might be that certain Americans are angry with Mr. Kipling for urging them to take up the White Man's Burden, which turns out to be heavier than they thought. In any case the fact that the American advance orders for "Kim" amounted to 50,000 copies furnishes an interesting gloss on the remarks of the New York Journal.

* * * *

The rise of the journalistic flood may be gauged by a perusal of that useful publication the "Review of Reviews Index to Periodicals" (15s. n.). This work grows and grows. The new volume contains 246 pages, and indexes 192 publications. The preface notes that, in the year 1900, the number of monthlies that disappeared was 13, while 17 others came into existence to fill the vacant places. The current year promises to be more prolific, as there have already been 16 new births, of which the most notable are those of the Empire Review and the New Liberal Review. The editor further notes "a lull in the production of light illustrated miscellanies"—not before it was time. It appears that the most widely-circulated magazine is Munsey's, which sells about 650,000 copies a month.

The Alfred Millenary will take place on September 17, 18, 19, and 20. There will be addresses by Sir John Evans, Sir Henry Irving, and Mr. Frederic Harrison, and a sermon by the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Arrangements have been made with both American and German publishers for the issue of Signor Crispi's memoirs.

Among Signor Crispi's papers has been discovered the manuscript of an unpublished magazine article entitled "Pensando a Bismarck." The statesman's library of 30,000 volumes is to be presented to the city of Palermo.

The King of Sweden is at work on his autobiography, which will be published in two large volumes.

It is stated that Mr. Stephen Phillips is about to write a poetical play dealing with Joan of Arc for production in America.

We are sorry to hear of the death of Mr. Henry J. Lincoln, who was secretary to the Daily News when Dickens was editor, and succeeded Dickens' father-in-law, George Hogarth, as musical critic.

The edict of the Westminster Town Clerk directing the second-hand booksellers of Charing-cross-road to remove trays and shelves infringing on the pavement has aroused some indig-

Gabriele D'Annunzio's new tragedy, Fra will be produced experimentally at Settignano.

A monument to Madame Clairon, the ac
the principal parts in the principal plays of V unveiled at her birthplace, Condé-sur-Escaut.

A society called La Société des Aronets ha Châtenay to institute and maintain an annual of Voltaire.

"The Vanishing Gift—viz., Imagination," lecture which is to be delivered before the sophical Institution by Miss Corelli.

SONG.

Rise my love, bring in the dawn,
Ope thine eyes upon the night,
Smile the darkness into fawn,
Beam to rosy light.

Peer and glow until the day
Widens on a happy world,
And the thickly blossomed spray
Shimmers dewy-pearled.

Rise and peer and beam and s
Rise, for here thy lover waits,
Rise, for Joy spends weary wh
Chafing at the gates.

Stirring on his chilly bough
Now the thrush's sleep is done;
Beaded leaves are moving now
Restive for the sun.

Comes a fresh of things to be
When thy tender lids are furled;
Comes a silent call for thee
From the waiting world.

Rise and peer and beam and s
Rise, for here thy lover waits,
Rise, for Joy spends weary wh
Chafing at the gates.

Now the dark slow sighs of night
Die into the tingling morn;
Little hushings of delight
Hover incense-borne.

Throw thy leaded casement wide,
Let the rose-breaths soften in;
All the world and I abide;
Day yearns to begin.

Rise and peer and beam and s
Rise, for here thy lover waits
Rise, for Joy spends weary wh
Chafing at the gates!

ARTHUR

Attacks on literary agents are so frequent topical. Some journalists profess inability to un agency used to be a regular, and is still an occasional, branch of their own businesses. Long before literary agents were heard of English publishers used, for a stipulated commission, to arrange for the publication of the works of English authors in America, and the practice was never felt to be derogatory to the dignity of any party to the transaction. It served a convenient purpose under the conditions then prevailing. As the conditions became more complicated through the perception of the value of rights in Canada, India, Australia, and on the Continent of Europe, of second serial rights, and of the rights of translation, abridgment, and dramatization, a certain specialization of function inevitably ensued. There sprang up a special class of men to arrange for the administration of literary property, just as there was already a special class of men who arranged for the administration of landed property. Acting as intermediaries, they saved trouble to both parties to a bargain—a fact recognized by the publishers themselves as soon as they had got over the shock of surprise at the new departure. This is the history of the profession of literary agent, and its history contains its justification. The defence, on general grounds, of literary agents who conduct their business properly is now superfluous. Nevertheless, it remains a question whether literary agents are not becoming too great a power in the land, and the recipient of a confidence too blind and undiscriminating. While admitting the great services which they have rendered to many authors, it also seems worth while to point out to authors in general, and more particularly to beginners, some of the reasons why they should hesitate to regard the employment of a literary agent as a royal road to literary success. In the first place, though most literary agents are probably honest, there is nothing to hinder a dishonest man from setting up in business as a literary agent; and it is freely alleged that certain literary agents have taken advantage of their clients in two ways (1) by acting in collusion with dishonest publishers who bribe them to advise the acceptance of bad agreements; (2) by selling their clients' manuscripts at less than their market value in order to save themselves trouble and secure a larger and quicker turnover. It obviously is not worth while to pay a literary agent ten per cent. to do that for you, and it might take a young author a long time to find out that that was what he was doing. In the second place, even the most scrupulously honest literary agent can seldom do as much for the young author as the young author, if he keeps his eyes open, can do for himself. The literary agent differs from, say, the solicitor in that he is acting simultaneously for a number of clients whose interests continually conflict. In any given market—in the case, for instance, of a demand for a serial for a magazine—he can only push A at the expense of B; while the mere fact that he is B's representative prevents B from pushing himself. In the third place, the literary agent, having hundreds of clients on his books, can only, in a few instances, make such a study of a man's work that he will know the man's market as well as the man knows it himself. Finally the intervention of the agent prevents a man from getting to know his own market, and also largely suspends those personal associations between editors and contributors which are not only agree-

Literature Portraits.—XVI.

JOHN RUSKIN.

A biographer has said of John Ruskin that "his the uneventful one of a writer and a student." This i untrue of the period of his activity, with which we a concern ourselves, but largely true of that period of his 1819, when on February 8th he was born at 54, Hunt Brunswick-square, until, at the age of twenty-four, a "Oxford Graduate" published "Modern Painters." a fearless broadside at the whole navy of academic t

PORTRAIT OF RUSKIN IN 1858, BY GEORGE RICHMOND.
[By permission of Mr. George Allen.]

and henceforward his life was one long battle agai weakness and self-consequent conceit and lazy falseho best, lack of truth. It was an "Oxford movement" of far-reaching in its consequences.

"and my father was before me, a violent Tory of the old school—Walter Scott's school, that is to say, and Homer's. I name these two out of the numberless great Tory writers, because they were my own two masters. I had Walter Scott's novels and the 'Iliad' (Pope's translation) for constant reading, when I was a child, on week-days; on Sunday their effect was tempered by 'Robinson Crusoe' and the 'Pilgrim's Progress,' my mother having it deeply in her heart to make an evangelical clergyman of me. Fortunately, I had an aunt more evangelical than my mother; and my aunt gave me cold mutton for Sunday's dinner, which—as I much preferred it hot—greatly diminished the influence of the 'Pilgrim's Progress,' and the end of the matter was that I got all the noble imaginative teaching of Defoe and Bunyan, and yet—am not an evangelical clergyman.

"I had, however, still better teaching than theirs, and that compulsorily, and every day of the week.

"Walter Scott and Pope's 'Homer' were reading of my own election, and my mother forced me, by steady daily toil, to learn long chapters of the Bible by heart; as well as to read it every syllable through, aloud, hard names and all, from Genesis to the Apocalypse, about once a year; and to that discipline—patient, accurate, and resolute—I owe, not only a knowledge of the book, which I find occasionally serviceable, but much of my general power of taking pains, and the best part of my taste in literature. From Walter Scott's novels I might easily, as I grew older, have fallen to other people's novels; and Pope might, perhaps, have led me to take Johnson's English, or Gibbon's, as types of language; but, once knowing the 32nd of Deuteronomy, the 119th Psalm, the 15th of 1st Corinthians, the Sermon on the Mount, and most of the Apocalypse, every syllable by heart, and having always a way of thinking with myself what words meant, it was not possible for me, even in the foolishest times of youth, to write entirely superficial or formal English; and the affectation of trying to write like Hooker and George Herbert was the most innocent I could have fallen into."

The aunt who gave him cold mutton on Sundays was his father's sister; she lived at Bridge-end, in the town of Perth, and had a garden full of gooseberry-bushes, sloping down to the Tay, with a door opening to the water, which ran past it clear brown over the pebbles three or four feet deep; swift-eddying—an infinite thing for a child to look down into.

"My father," adds Mr. Ruskin, "began business as a wine-merchant, with no capital, and a considerable amount of debts bequeathed him by my grandfather. He accep and paid them all before he began to lay by anyt for which his best friends called him a fool, expressing any opinion as to his wisdom, which matters to be at least equal to mine, have writte slab over his grave that he was 'an entirely h
As days went on he was able to take a house Brunswick-square, No. 54 (the windows of it, me, commanded a view of a marvellous iron po
the water-carts were filled through beautiful by pipes like boa-constrictors; and I was ne templating that mystery and the delicious dripp and as years went on, and I came to be four or he could command a post-chaise and a pair for t summer, by help of which, with my mother and round of his country customers (who liked to se of the house his own traveller); so that, at a j through the panoramic opening of the four wi chaise, made more panoramic still to me becau a little bracket in front (for we used to h regularly for the two months out of Long Ac have it bracketed and pocketed as we liked), I roads, and most of the cross ones, of England great part of lowland Scotland, as far as Pert other year was spent the whole summer; and the 'Abbot' at Kinross, and the 'Monastery' in I confused with 'Glendearg,' and thought that had as certainly lived by the streamlet in t Ochils as the Queen of Scots in the island of Lo

"To my further great benefit, as I grew nearly all the noblemen's houses in England, healthy delight of uncovetous admiration pere as I could perceive any political truth at all, that much happier to live in a small house and have to be astonished at than to live in Warwick C nothing to be astonished at; but that, at all e not make Brunswick-square in the least u habitable to pull Warwick Castle down. A though I have kind invitations enough to visit not, even for a couple of months, live in a coun as to possess no castles.

"Nevertheless, having formed my notion of from the FitzJames of the 'Lady of the Lake,' from the Douglas there and the Douglas in 'Ma wonder soon arose in my chil castles should now be always en was there, but no Archibald of but no knight of Snowdoun. Th gardens of England were be but his Lordship and her Lady in town, said the housekeepers Deep yearning took hold of m
'Restoration,' which I began sl Charles the Second had not alte though I always wore a gilded piously in my button-hole on t
It seemed to me that Charle Restoration had been, as con Restoration I wanted, much as apple to a real apple. And as I desire for sweet pippins instead and Living Kings instead of dea to me rational as well as roman

Casa Farsetti. Central Pillars, Upper Arcade. From Original MSS. of "The Stones of Venice." [By permission of Mr. George Allen.]

Childhood.

"I lived until I was more than four years old in Hunter-street, Brunswick-square, the greater part of the year, for a few weeks in the summer breathing country air by taking lodgings in small cottages (real cottages, not villas, so-called) either about Hampstead or at Dulwich, at 'Mrs. Ridley's,' the last of a row in a lane which led out into the Dulwich fields on one side and was itself full of buttercups in spring and blackberries in autumn. But my chief remaining impressions of those days are attached to Hunter-street. My mother's general principles of first treatment were to guard me with steady watchfulness from all avoidable pain or danger; and, for the rest, to let me amuse myself as I liked, provided I was neither fretful nor troublesome. But the law was that I should find my own amusement. No toys of any kind were at first allowed, and the pity of my Croydon aunt for my monastic poverty in this respect was boundless. On one of my birthdays, thinking to overcome my mother's resolution by splendour of [illegible] saw in toy-shops a bunch of keys to [illegible] as long as I was capa[illegible] of pleasure in what [illegible] and jingles; as I gr[illegible] I had a cart and a la[illegible] when I was five or [illegible] old two boxes of [illegible] wooden bricks. Wi[illegible] neatest but, I still [illegible] entirely sufficient pa[illegible] and being always s[illegible] whipped if I cried, d[illegible] as I was bid, or tu[illegible] the stairs, I seem[illegible] serene and secure m[illegible] life and motion; a[illegible] pass my days contem[illegible] tracing the squares [illegible] paring the colours [illegible] carpet—examining t[illegible] in the wool of the [illegible] counting the bricks [illegible] opposite houses; w[illegible] turous intervals of ex[illegible] during the filling of t[illegible] cart, through its leath[illegible] from the dripping iro[illegible] the pavement edge; o[illegible] more admirable proce[illegible] the turncock when h[illegible] and turned till a [illegible] sprang up in the mid[illegible] street. But the car[illegible] what patterns I coul[illegible] bed-covers, dresses, [illegible] papers to be examine[illegible] my chief resources, and my attention to the particulars in t[illegible] soon so accurate that when at three-and-a-half I was take[illegible] my portrait painted by Mr. Northcote I had not been te[illegible] alone with him before I asked him why there were holes in hi[illegible] . . . My mother had, as she afterwards told me, solemnly [illegible] me to God' before I was born—in imitation of Hannah.

"Very good women are remarkably apt to make a[illegible] their children prematurely in this manner, the real [illegible] of the pious not being, that, as the sons of Zebedee are[illegible] at least they hope not), to sit on the right and left of C[illegible] His kingdom, their own sons may perhaps, they think, [illegible] be advanced to that respectable position in eter[illegible] especially if they ask Christ very humbly for it every d[illegible] they always forget in the most naive way that the pe[illegible] not His to give!

"'Devoting me to God' meant, as far as my moth[illegible] herself what she meant, that she would try to sen[illegible] college and make a clergyman of me; and I was acc[illegible] bred for 'the Church.' My father, who—rest be to h[illegible] had the excessingly bad habit of yielding to my mother [illegible] things and taking his own way in little ones, allowed me [illegible] saying a word, to be thus withdrawn from the sherry [illegible] an unclean thing; not without some pardonable partici[illegible] my mother's ultimate views for me. . . .

"When I was about four years old my father fo[illegible]

His Education.

"My present verdict, therefore, on the general tenor of my education at that time must be that it was at once too formal and too luxurious; leaving my character, at the most important moment for its construction, cramped indeed, but not disciplined; and only by protection innocent, instead of by practice virtuous. My mother saw this herself, and but too clearly, in later years; and whenever I did anything wrong, stupid, or hard-hearted—and I have done many things that were all three—always said, 'It is because you were too much indulged.'"

When he was seven years of age Ruskin had his first lesson in Latin, and when he was "eleven or going on for twelve" a Doctor Andrews initiated him in Greek. The doctor, it afterwards turned out, knew little more of Greek than the letters and declensions of nouns; but he wrote the letters prettily and had an accurate and sensitive ear for rhythm. "He began me with the odes of Anacreon, and made me scan both them and my Virgil thoroughly, sometimes, by way of interlude, reciting bits of

"It must have been in the spring of 1831 tha
step was taken of giving me a drawing master.

"I suppose a drawing master's business can o blished by his assertion of himself to the public of a style, and teaching in that only. Neverthel man's memory sustains disgrace in my mind in impulse nor even indulgence to the extraordina drawing delicately with the pen point. Any w was done thenceforward only to please myself.
gave me nothing but his own mannered and inef to copy, and greatly broke the force both of my

"Yet he taught much and suggested more.
perspective, at once accurately and simply—an teaching. He compelled me into a swiftness and which I found afterwards extremely useful, tho just called the 'force,' the strong accuracy lost. He cultivated in me—indeed, founded—t ing for the essential points in the things drawn,

MR. RUSKIN IN HIS STUDY, BRANTWOOD.

Shakespeare to me with force and propriety. The Anacreontic metre entirely pleased me, nor less the Anacreontic sentiment. I learnt half the odes by heart merely to please myself, and learned with certainty what in later study of Greek art it has proved extremely advantageous to me to know, that the Greeks liked doves, swallows, and roses just as well as I did.

"In the intervals of these unlaborious Greek lessons, I went them decisively, and he explained to me the mea ance of composition, though he himself could not

"On my thirteenth (?) birthday, Februa father's partner, Mr. Henry Telford, gave me R determined the main tenor of my life.

"At that time I had never heard of Turn well-remembered saying of Mr. Runciman's that doubt painful, love passage with Adèle Domecq, his father's partner's daughter, by a letter from Christ Church advising the elder Mr. Ruskin that there was room for his son's residence in the January term of 1837, and that he must come up to matriculate in October of the instant year, 1836.

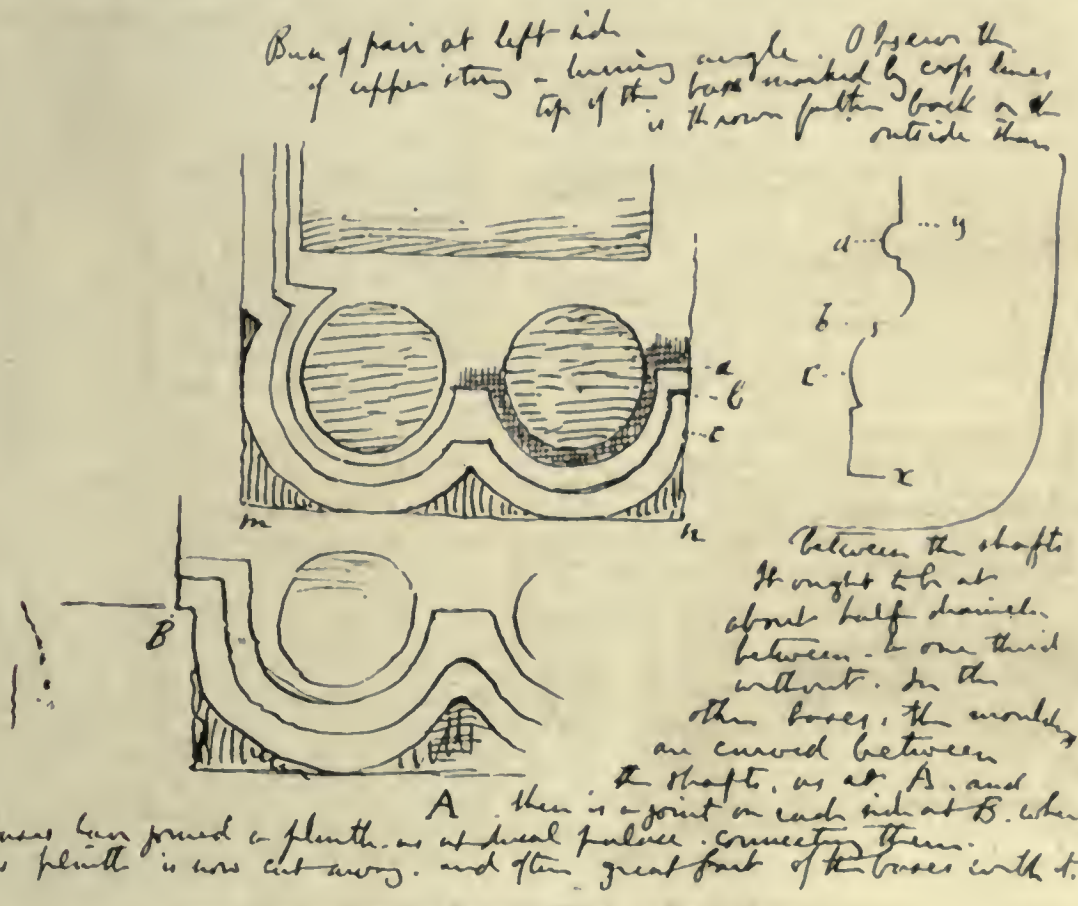
Oxford.

He was entered as a Gentleman-Commoner, and remembered long after, as if it were yesterday, the pride of first walking out of the Angel Hotel, and past University College, holding his father's arm, in his velvet cap and silk gown.

"That walk to the schools and the waiting outside the Divinity School, in comforting admiration of its door, my turn for matriculation, continue still for me, at pleasure. But I remember nothing more that year, nor anything of the first days of the next, until early in January we drove down to Oxford, only my mother and I, by the beautiful Henley-road, weary a little as we changed horses for the last stage from Dorchester; solemnized, in spite of velvet and silk, as we entered among the towers in the twilight, and after one more rest under the domestic roof of the Angel I found myself the next day at evening, alone, by the fireside, entered into command of my own life, in my own college room in Peckwater.

"Fortunately for me—beyond all words, fortunately—Henry Acland, by about a year and a half my senior, chose me, saw what helpless possibilities were in me, and took me an excellent college tutor, and, later on, for a privat entirely right-minded and accomplished scholar, Gordon."

Ruskin was chiefly distinguished among his Univ temporaries by his devotion to physical science, geology and mineralogy, and by his love of art, both th unusual at Oxford. After taking his degree in 1842, h on the Continent and gave himself to work in wat chiefly under Harding, Prout, and Copley Fielding. But life had been retired. He had taken little share in t ments of the place. He was more given to talking ov with Mr. Wyatt, the print-seller, than to such subject interest other "Gentlemen-Commoners" of Christ C one night a dozen of these and their friends det "draw" the genius. It was a habit of his to go to mindful of the precepts and the practice of Denmark II the invaders broke down his "oak" and rushed int He was there to receive them in his dressing-gown.



Details of the Casa Farsetti from the original MSS. of "The Stones of Venice."
[By permission of Mr. George Allen.]

men," he said, with a sweet smile and with his exqui "I am sorry I cannot now entertain you as I should my father, who is engaged in the sherry trade, has my power to invite you all to wine to-morrow evening. come?" The rioters were overcome.

It is not merely as an instance of Ruskin's influ men that we give this well-known anecdote, b

And Oxford owes him more than a mere return of the affection. For years Oxford knew the spell of his immediate utterance; for years he was, in a peculiar sense, an integral part of her working life. To Oxford he gave, which was good, her splendid collection of pictures; to Oxford he gave, what was better, the best fruits of his intellect at its best. In 1839 he gained the Newdigate Prize with a juvenile and eclectic poem upon the wholly unusual subject of "Salsette and Elephanta," and if his mind had been cast in other mould he might have fossilized into the pedagogue.

"Modern Painters."

Fortunately other forces were at work, other influences agitating the often turgid Oxford air, and the preface of the first edition of "Modern Painters," published in 1843, ascribes the origin of the book to "indignation at the shallow and false criticisms of the periodicals of the day on the works of the great living artist to whom it principally refers." Indignation—that was the impulsing force. Intended at first for a mere pamphlet, his work had grown in the author's hands into a treatise on art, to which he was forced, he said, "to give the more consistency and completeness because it advocated opinions which to the ordinary connoisseur he knew would sound heretical." His motive, he asserted, was not zeal for any individual reputation, but a sense of imperative duty, bidding him "come forward to declare and demonstrate, wherever they exist, the essence and the authority of the beautiful and the true." The opposition to the theories and doctrines set down without fear or hesitancy was great, but the popularity of the book was equally great; and when by 1846 he published a second and a third edition, he was able to announce that "heavier ships were following his leading vessel into action," and that his first published volume was little more than an introduction to the mass of evidence and illustration he had yet to bring forward, his object being nothing less than to set forth in full the relations of landscape art to the laws of nature—"to bring to light, as far as might be in his power, that faultless, ceaseless, inconceivable, inexhaustible loveliness which God has stamped upon all things, if man will only receive them as He gives them." Finally, it would be his endeavour, he said, to trace the operation of all this in men's hearts and minds, to exhibit the function and end of art, and to show how it should share our thoughts and influence our lives; "to attach to the artist the responsibility of a preacher, and to kindle in the general mind that regard which such an office must demand."

"I have been ordered to endeavour to make," said he, "our English youth care somewhat for the arts, and must put my uttermost strength into that business, for which end I must clear myself of all sense of responsibility for the material distress around me, by explaining to you, once for all, in the shortest English I can, what I know of its causes; by pointing out to you some of the methods by which it might be relieved; and by setting aside regularly some small percentage of my income to assist, as one of yourselves, in what, one and all, we shall have to do, each of us laying by something according to our means for the common service, and having among us, at last, be it ever so small, a national store, instead of a national debt—store which, once securely founded, will fast increase, provided only you take the pains to understand, and have perseverance to maintain, the elementary principles of human economy, which have of late not only been lost sight of, but wilfully and formally entombed under pyramids of falsehood."

' impression on the mind ' does not mean a piece
The way in which most artists proceed to ' inven
it, a picture is this—they choose their subject, fo well, with a sufficient quantity of towers, mo cottages, and other materials, to be generally int they fix on some subject for a principal light; b put a dark cloud, or, in front of it, a dark piece then they repeat this light somewhere else in a connect the two lights together by some interm they find any part of the foreground uninteres group of figures into it; if any part of the distance thing there from some other sketch, and proc detail in the same manner, taking care alway stones near black ones, and purple colours near y angular forms near round ones—all this being as of recipe and practice as cookery, like that, not thing easily done well, but still having no referen
' impressions on the mind.' "

It is quite remarkable that Ruskin, with th rooted in his mind, should not have perceived his idol, Turner, the Meyerbeer among artists, tr

But to proceed:—"The artist who has real i work in a totally different way. First, he rec pression from the place itself, and takes care that as his chief good; indeed, he needs no car for the distinction of his mind from that of other instantly receiving such sensations strongly and lose them; and then he sets himself, as far as po duce that impression on the mind of the s picture." He also said, and often, "Draw what y you know." The principle he lays down on fini soundest canons of art. By finish Ruskin means he means that a picture should tell what story it the greatest possible directness and the greatest But distinctly he does not mean that a compo weakened by insistence on a multitude of seconds

As Art Critic.

Speaking of him without reserve, Mr. wrote:—"Over and over again we find him so his desire to make a strong point of the ide moment was predominant in his mind that he a totally forgotten that he had laid the reverse another occasion." "Modern Painters" is a eloquence and enthusiasm, and in some por the chapter on cloud forms, really instructive i problem of the translation of the appearance painting. But the contradictions of principle i faced and preposterous as to nullify any value w supposed to have, and which the author evident to have as a didactic treatise on art.

When we come to consider Ruskin as a critic
the case is rather different. He has done more th to awaken in the public an interest in architect again, he is an entirely false guide, not so m sistency as from an inadequate grasp of the Stones of Venice" is, in its way, a wonderf splendid passages, full of suggestiveness; bu textbook or analysis of architecture in general architecture in particular, it is one tremendo beginning to end. The book on architecture which its place is "The Seven Lamps," not as a g truth on which Mr. Ruskin's mind had been concentrated for the moment.

His artistic sympathies had their limits. He was wedded to the Harding method, and never took to the "oily medium." He did not appreciate Constable, and his devotion to the early painters of Italy did not extend to those of the Dutch school; although he copied Rembrandt as a young man, he subsequently vehemently denounced him. Rossetti, indeed, said that his work was not criticism, but brilliant poetical rhapsody. It was admiration for Turner that originally prompted him to write, and Turner, with whom modesty was not a fault, was not wholly pleased with Ruskin's panegyrics. No painter in the world, or any other human being, ever reached the eminence attributed to Turner in such a sentence as this:—"He is above all criticism, beyond all animadversion, beyond all praise. His works are not to be received as in any way subjects or matters of opinion, but of faith."

We are beginning, some of us, to feel that the worship of Turner is overdone. The barber's son saw Nature with an extraordinary power of vision, but he very rarely painted it as other men see it. He, surely, painted what he knew rather than what he saw. It is the conflagration of art rather than the calm, deliberate, but withal tender and loving realization of Nature. Many of us, moreover, have come to reckon as no insult the "flinging of a paint-pot" in the face of the public by such an one as Whistler. Corot, Mauve, Millet, Maris, Troyon, Monticelli, and Daubigny may have had no existence for Ruskin, but their influence for good upon art will be ultimately greater than that of Turner—at any rate, of Turner the oil painter. Ruskin, in his unstinted admiration, may have unconsciously limited his estimate of his idol to his fascinating work in water colour. The real good his teaching did may be given in the words which Mr. Punch puts into the mouth of the despairing artist:—

I paints and I paints,
Hears no complaints,
And sells before I'm dry;
Till savage Ruskin Sticks his tusk in,
And nobody will buy.

What a mercy that there was a Ruskin to stick his tusk in!

As a Draughtsman.

The influence of his draughtsmanship was only second to his power of teaching by the written work, and against the impatient remark of Sir E. J. Poynter that the critic was "ignorant of the practical side of art," we have Mr. H. H. Statham, a good judge of architectural draughtsmanship, saying:—"It seems rather odd that so little has been made, either by Ruskin himself, or his admirers, of his own incontestable gifts as an artist. He might unquestionably have been a landscape-painter of no ordinary calibre had he chosen to devote himself to that art, and as an architectural draughtsman he was perhaps unequalled when at his best. It is one of the most curious among the many paradoxes connected with him that, while he once emphatically declared that a man can hardly draw anything without benefiting himself and others and can hardly write anything without doing mischief, he should nevertheless have chosen to comparatively neglect his artistic capabilities in order to become one of the most voluminous writers of his age." Mr. Statham appears to forget, however, that the means of reproducing the written words were, fifty years ago, much more

Protestantism; afterwards he could not reconci beliefs with the facts of life as he saw them, reconstruct his creed from the foundations. Until he he was a philanthropist, working heartily with o definite cause, and hoping for the amendment of wro a social upheaval. Even in the beginning of 1860, in hi before the House of Commons Select Committee Instruction, he was ready with plans for amusing and ing the labouring classes, and noting in them desire for improvement. But while his readiness personal sacrifice, in the way of social and ph experiment, and his interest in the question were inc became less and less sanguine about the value of suc the Working Men's College, and less and less ready to with others in their schemes. He began to see that n at social breakages was really worth while; that far u sive repairs were needed to make the old ship seawor

Much unendurling capital has been made by de Ruskin's change of front consequent upon a ready acc the teachings of Carlyle—whom he characteristically master." But the change is more apparent than one of direction than of intention. In reality both working for the same ideals, and Ruskin came to regar methods as the more direct and certain—and adopted was the act of a courageous and large-minded man ceived the greater truth as Carlyle perceived it, a something of the other's methods as soon as he co to be better than his own.

Road Making and Scavenging.

Ruskin was nothing if not minutely painst inquiringly practical. We see these qualities in his than in his practice. The minute accuracy of his draw him, singularly enough, into the closest fellowship who perpetrated one of the severest lampoons upon drawing of mosses and wild strawberries from the Ox tion which we reproduce might have been done by Sandys—the pictorial parodist of "Sir Isumbras at the well-known caricature with "J. R." brandsd up near hind-quarter. "Half of my power of ascertaini any kind connected with the arts is in my stern hal the thing with my own hands till I know its difficul so, before he led his band of undergraduates to ma road at Hincksey, he "sat with an iron-masked st on his heap to break stones beside the London-road, Iffley Hill," till he "knew how to advise my te pupils to effect their purposes in that matter, inste ing the heads of their hammers off (a serious item i expenses)." Similarly, before he set his gang of s scavengers to keep the gutters between the British M Seven Dials clean, "I learned" said he, "from an I crossing sweeper what he could teach me of swe again and again I swept bits of St. Giles's foot showing my corps of subordinates how to finish into of the gutter." "What greatness any among us is c he says, "will be attained by beginning in all qu hopefulness to use whatever powers we may posses sent the things around us as we see and feel them; the close of life to give the perfect crown to the co labours, and knowing assuredly that the determina degree in which watchfulness is to be exalted int rests with a higher will than our own."

the book from the author to the reader. He had met in 1854, in his drawing class at Great Ormond-street, a student, George Allen by name. For three years from 1857, Mr. Allen was learning under Mr. Ruskin's guidance engraving and etching from Le Keux and mezzotint from Thomas Lupton. Then the publishing business ("planted in the middle of a country field" in 1871) started operations and was very soon a pronounced success.

"Fors Clavigera" was the first book issued, and of this Mr. Ruskin says:—"It cost me £10 to print 1,000, and £5 more to give a picture, and a penny off my sevenpence to send you the book; a thousand sixpences are £25; when you have bought a thousand 'Fors' of me, I shall therefore have £5 for my trouble, and my single shopman, Mr. Allen, £5 for his; we won't work for less, either of us. And I mean to sell all my large books, henceforward, in the same way, well printed, well bound and at a fixed price; and the trade may charge a proper and acknowledged profit for their trouble in retailing the book. Then the public will know what they are about, and so will the tradesmen. I, the first producer, answer to the best of my power for the quality of the book—paper, binding, elegance and all; the retail dealer

His Politics.

Where Ruskin failed to convince in his son Ethics, he failed in good company—in the com diverse as Gladstone, Cobden, Newman, and M However monstrous in the eyes of those who take the mainspring of human action is Ruskin's pol teaching, it is throughout disinterested and elev ness in the eyes of its assailants is that it is base a view of character, of the claims of public d possibilities of citizenship. His efforts produ Guild or Company of St. George, an association tion of good and honest work, "plain living and Its object and the vow of its companions are purely tian, assuming the goodness of God and the dignity as postulates, and inculcating honour, honesty, ind gentleness, and obedience to authority and law.
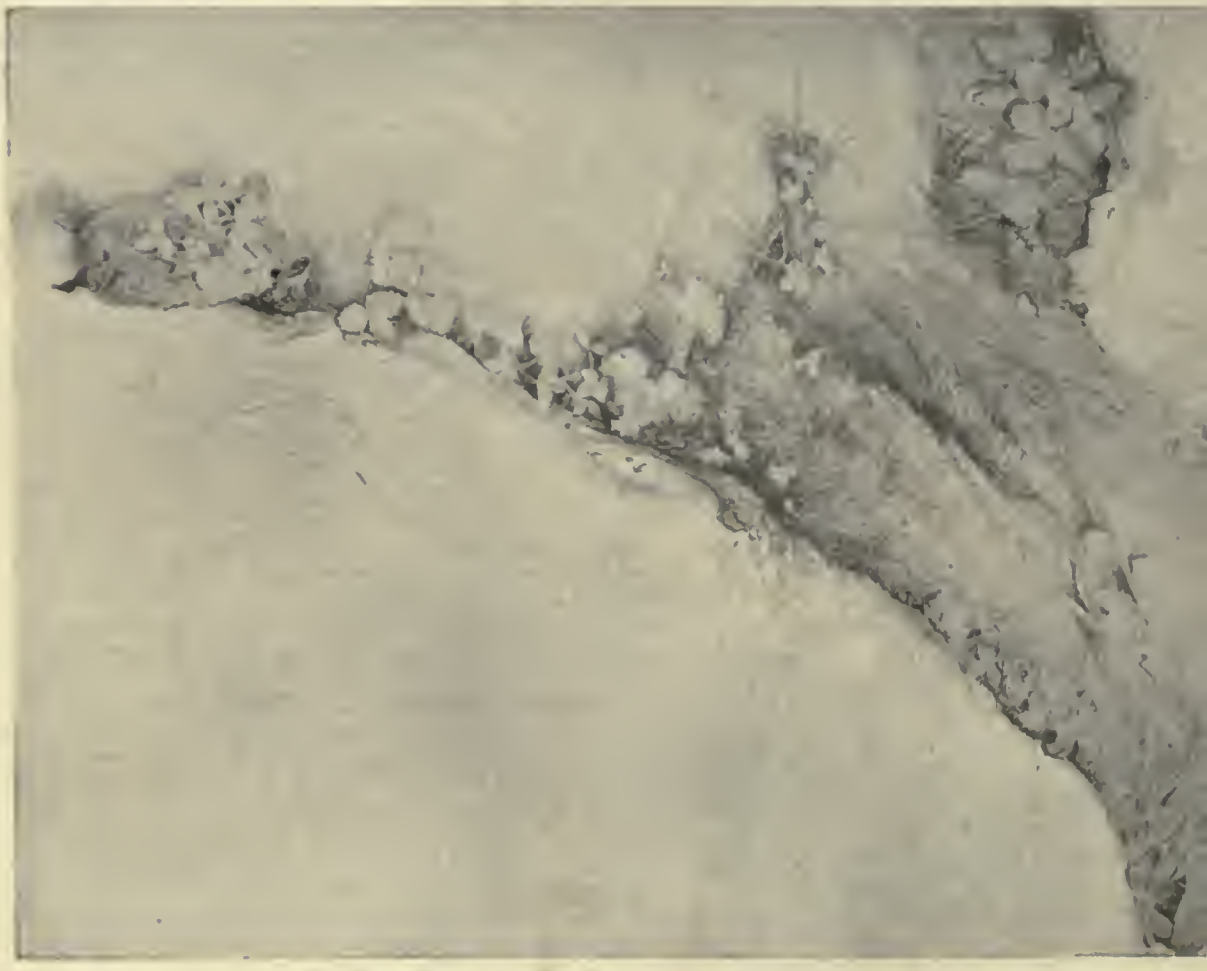
so old, and yet, as a national concern, so imperfe



MOSS AND WILD STRAWBERRY.

A Pencil Drawing by Ruskin in the University Galleries, Oxford. (By permission of Mr. Alexander Macdonal

His Teaching.

The corner-stones of his teaching were standard of all excellence, and nature the inspir and great art; that the finish which forwards slide; that brilliancy and effort at invention, a was best in spiritual democracy. Of what may be called his democracy in a more exact sense I have confessed that I have nothing to say. In spite of some weighty testimony, I cannot regard it as even a very strong influence from him on his time; it seems to me rather the vivid expression of a strong influence upon him from others. But it sprang from that central core of his teaching, his belief in beauty as a Divine Sacrament. For this belief involves the conviction that this table of the Lord must be open to all. From that feast none must be shut out. And the discovery that whole classes are shut out, that the bulk of the world's workers cannot see the beauty of a tree or a flower, because sordid cares and physical wretchedness weave an opaque veil before their eyes—this discovery made Ruskin a Socialist. Why, he seemed always saying, should a message, in its nature universal, be silenced by luxury on the one hand as much as by penury on the other? The feverish hunt for wealth curtains off the influence of Nature almost as much as the desperate struggle with poverty, while the commercial development which creates a few millionaires and a mass of overdriven workers (so he reasoned) creates also a hideous world. He longed to spread the truly human life. He hated the phase of civilization which cut off, as he thought, from whole classes of men the power to drink in the message of Nature and of Art with incomplete sympathies." "Mr. Ruskin," says another thoughtful critic, "unites uncommon intensity of feeling with great logical acuteness, singular command of illustration, rare eloquence of style, and a power of concentrating all those on the matter immediately in hand which raises whatever excellence he may be commending into exclusive importance for the moment, and makes the fault or evil tendency he may be condemning for the time being the very head and front of all offending. This penetrative and illustrative faculty, exerted, as it is wont to be, on one thing at a time, throws a light on the object under investigation so intense that for the moment nothing else is visible."

As Philanthropist and Writer.

That he practised what he preached in things other than stone-breaking and scavenging was obvious. His charities and gifts in aid of all he thought worthy of help were unstinted, and, having inherited a hundred and seventy thousand pounds, he died worth comparatively little, even if we include the value of the art treasures he left behind him. He spent himself, his fortune, and finally his mental health in what seemed at the time a vain struggle, as many a saint and prophet has spent himself before. He was one of the Dii majores of the Victorian age. Authoritative voices have done justice to the immortal services that have been rendered by this incomparable art critic, to the originality of his views, the splendour of his style, and, above all, his fascinating personality. He was a preacher of righteousness and truth in all things, who, penetrated as he was with the spirit of Holy Scripture, taught with enthusiasm, eloquence, and wisdom that the personal relation of God to man was the source of all virtue. His mind was critical, polemical, and investigatory, but, unlike his master, Carlyle, his nature was gentle almost to womanliness. He was ever a humble and earnest student of nature and a fearless lover of truth. What better can be said? Nor is the style less formed and less distinctive than the doctrine. We find in full finish the rhythmical and richly-coloured language, the use of alliteration and climax, the fervid glow, the ready rise into dithyramb or denunciation, and the power of word-painting, carried often to a pitch of colour and a passion of rapture or disgust which to some less enthusiastic to refuse it without reviling." But there are some cannot refuse without reviling.

Personal Influence.

Much of Ruskin's influence lay in his extraordin fascination. Seldom was any man so sympathetic, so uniformly and invariably courteous; rarely w unfailingly and miraculously eloquent. He was the times, and to all men. I have seen him describe in person, careless in dress, and nervous in manner." he was an old, almost broken, man when I first Oxford, this is not my memory of him. I may have unconsciously, his stature by the estimate which with whom I met him, set upon his intellectual His figure was spare, as became the ethereal lifel but the face, rough at the first glance, changed, i guised joy of meeting one who in his way fought a noble and the good, to an expression of great kind there was sensitiveness, if you like, but no nervous the thin mouth and in the clear, deep eyes. He what I had expected to see, most unlike and yet so li

BRANTWOOD.
[From a Drawing by Charles Whymper.]

whose personality was early and often impressed upo of the late Canon Liddon. There was little of the about him then, but he had many of the personal which I had been taught to associate with the gian days, that marvellous band of men in the Oxford Has there ever been an intellectual movement like it married when he was twenty-nine and she nineteen, and who, after causing Ruskin the seven most miserable years of his life, dissolved the marriage tie to become the wife of John Everett Millais, there is little to say except that she died, as also did Millais, before Ruskin. Mr. Ruskin himself considered it too private a matter to tell the world about. The later years of his life at Brantwood were sweetened and his waning strength husbanded by the never-tiring, never-complaining affection of his cousin, born Miss Joan Agnew, but best known as Mrs. Arthur Severn, who together with her husband and her children made common home with him and shared the sheltered simplicity of his life.

Very little remains to be said, and no man can foretell the length or breadth of the influence of this ethereal-minded thinker. His message to his friends in 1891 is his message to us to-day, and it is in this wise :—" Say to my friends in the Oxford Museum from me, may God bless the reverent and earnest study of nature and of man, to His glory, to the better teaching of the future, to the benefit of our country, and to the good of all mankind."

A prophet in very truth ! And as on that winter's afternoon at Brantwood a little more than a year ago the restless, powerful spirit left him silent amongst the level mists that hung motionless and grey over the long lawns by the lake shore, when the silence of lawn and wood was completed, and all his thoughts were of those whom he was to meet no more, the words of Carlyle come back to us—that John Ruskin was the only man in England who was carrying out his ideas. And from Ruskin, in his turn, the saying that Tolstoy stood for the movement for which he himself had worked helps us to the belief that, where the labour is, there will the labourer be found also. Ruskin died, as he had lived, in that sure and certain hope of a Resurrection which revealed itself throughout his life and his work. Who shall grudge such a one a few purely human foibles ?

WALLACE L. CROWDY.

Next Saturday a new Ruskin Museum is to be opened at Coniston, including many interesting articles contributed by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Severn and Mr. W. G. Collingwood. To Mr. Collingwood was largely due the organization of the Ruskin Exhibition held at Coniston last summer, and to this Exhibition may be traced the institution of a permanent

SOME RUSKINIAN
A "Personal View"

By E. T. COOK.

The time during which I enjoyed the privileg correspondence and conversation with Mr. Ruski his second appointment to the Slade Professorship his final withdrawal into seclusion at Brantwood i It was a time of broken health with him and of inte Any one who compares the first course of lectures professorship), on " The Art of England," with " The Pleasures of England," will see, as it we gathering. I was commissioned to report these l Pall Mall Gazette, and it was not always easy latter series in a coherent form. I was amused, but surprised, when my editor received a letter from professor of that day suggesting that there were being delivered at that seat of learning perhaps ex getting into the newspapers. It must be confessed shadowy sketch of English history—or, rather, of sn in national feeling and character, which he entitled " of England "—is among his least admirable works was suddenly broken off, and he delivered in remainder two or three others on disconnected was on " Birds and How to Paint Them " ; anoth scape." These (which have not been published of Ruskin's old power and charm. The contrast It was in the return to nature that he found stren The last chapter written by Ruskin for publi epilogue of 1888 to " Modern Painters." He wrote describes, " beneath the cloudless peace of Chamonni, what must be the really final words of their beauty inspired and their strength guided."

It was a happy thought on Professor Norto then state of Ruskin's health, to suggest to his should write his autobiography. Among the thoughts " of his childhood, youth, and earlier m recovered equanimity, and the pleasure which tenacious memory gave him expressed itself in p ful grace and felicity. It is remarkable, too, t called " word-painting "—a phrase, by the way, detested in its application to his work—" Pret book, shows full command of his powers. Wher examples of his skill in description of landscap Matthew Arnold, in his " Essays in Criticism," illustration of the supreme power of prose in thi from the third volume of " Modern Painters," Swiss meadows. Dr. Waldstein, in his study of R this purpose to a description in the first volu history during one day as viewed from the Alp quoted perhaps than any other passage is the " Seven Lamps," of the pastures of Champagnol Sir Mountstuart Grant Duff, as appears from he said, to be mainly descriptions and memories of places that he loved—" The Rainbows of Glessalach," for instance. " I feel," he said, " that I can still write as well as ever I could." But, alas! the clouds descended before he was able to give any contents to the titles. It is probable, however—if we may judge from the samples of Ruskin's letters to his parents given in the new edition of Mr. Collingwood's Life—that the presently forthcoming volumes of his letters will in some sort be a continuation of " Praeterita."

Of his books on art Ruskin preferred his Oxford lectures, and especially the introductory course (1870). This book expressed his most mature views, in the most carefully considered words, and he used to speak of his disappointment that it was not more often referred to by his critics. In the preparation of his earlier Oxford lectures he took the greatest pains. They cost him more labour in the composition, he once said, than any of his other books. This, I think, is interesting, for the effect ultimately produced in the best of the lectures is one of great ease. Their style is simpler, less elaborate, less self-conscious than that of his earlier and better-known writings. Professor Norton, in one of his prefaces to Ruskin (too little known in this country), well says of what we may call Ruskin's Oxford style, that it is " not a style of purple patches, but its whole substance is crimsoned with the passionate feeling that courses through the eager and animated words. . . . It makes no such direct claim to the reader's attention; it does not divert his regard too often, as of old, from the matter to the form of the expression. A good knowledge of English is needed, and a trained ear for the finer rhythms of prose, to understand and appreciate its excellence." But of all his writings Ruskin himself considered that " Unto this Last " was in point of style the most successful, as in substance the most important. I remember hearing him on one occasion read out the passage from " Seven Lamps " above referred to. He bade us note the obviousness of the art, and especially the forcing of the alliteration—as, for instance, in the sentence, " Those ever-springing flowers and ever-flowing streams had been dyed by the deep colours of human endurance, valour, and virtue." Then by way of contrast he read out, with the perfect emphasis of which he was a master, the concluding passage of " Unto this Last." The art, he said, was hidden there. All sense of strain was absent. The appearance was of each inevitably right word being in its inevitably right place. But the inevitable was only found after careful search. Ruskin wrote out the whole of " Unto this Last " three times.

It was also the book which contained, as he believed, his most vital teaching, and hence he used to say that if any of his work were destined to survive it would be " Unto this Last." " I am dissatisfied with my books," he once said to me, " more than most authors. But in the case of ' Unto this Last ' I am convinced that its central teaching is entirely true. The world will not hear me yet; but it will live to discover some day that nations cannot live on gunpowder and iron, but only on corn; and that the only way to deal with this sort of thing "—and here he went to the window and looked out upon the unemployed demonstrating in Trafalgar-square—" is not by mere giving or

We changed the conversation, for in those da distribes were recognized as danger signals. He k the National Gallery, and he was good enough to interest in the handbook I was preparing to the colle beautiful collection it now is," he said; " the new ro hanging quite a beautiful piece of work. I don't like l
the Ansidei Madonna is certainly lovely—the lovelie in the world. The Madonna di San Sisto is dark and b it." Ruskin's appreciation of the picture agreed interesting to note, with that of Pater, who selected t as " the embodied formula of Raphael's genius," in prefe
" Transfiguration " or the " Sistine Madonna " or eve donna del Gran Duca." I had quoted in my National G some lines out of " Ionica " as illustrating Pater's co Botticelli's Madonnas. Ruskin argued a good deal agai theory, but was much taken up with the lines I had quote sing a similar feeling. " Ionica " was new to him, and he send him the whole poem. It was " Minnermus in Chur ning :—

> You promise heavens free from strife,
> Pure truth and perfect change of will;
> But sweet, sweet is this human life,
> So sweet I fain would breathe it still.
> You chilly stars I can forgo;
> This warm, kind world is all I know.

Ruskin was delighted with the poem—" so true," he s also," and wanted to know more of its author. I passed message to Mr. Cory. He was a devout reader of Ruskin and " it is now rather touching," he wrote, " to find been interested in my very lowly rimaillerie." Mr. Cor how the original booklet had been " thrown aside scorn Saturday Review with the first booklet of a lady, Mrs. We I think, has since had her revenge." By this time " I long been out of print, and was difficult and expensiv
A few years later Mr. Cory reissued it with Ruskin's p

Ruskin had promised to write a preface to m Gallery Handbook. But there were difficulties in " The whole modern system of exhibition," he said at
" is partly ludicrous, partly dreadful to me; what I about the best pictures would not be of the least us Londoners. What I feel about the worst it would pe me crazy again with anger to put into any words." I to the Gallery modified his feelings (as noticed als preface was forthcoming; and he read many pages of of the catalogue itself. But he returned unread the with Turner. For two reasons, he told me. One was t pain and grief it caused him to find how much of Tu in oil was going to wrack and ruin. The other was h the treatment of the Turner water-colours—so ma still unexhibited, and all consigned to those gloomy c
the ground floor which he described as " a rascally r accursed catacomb." Let us hope that when the nex of the Gallery is effected the Turner drawings which its principal treasures will be better shown.

In conversations or correspondence with Ruskin years with which I am dealing there was much tha pathetic. He was indeed often full of brightness a

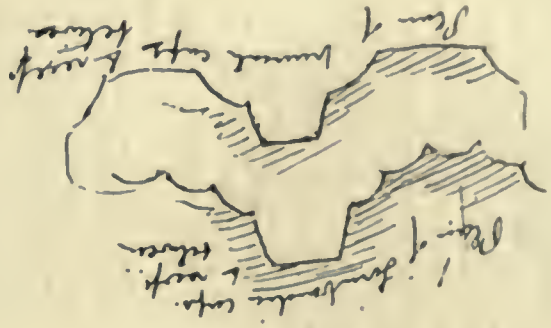
BYZANTINE PALACES.

Ca Tarsetti. upper story



Height of base. (x y in figure below)	9	"	8.
—— of shaft.	9	"	4.
—— of capital. from point	1	"	1.
—— of arch (Vp)	2	"	5.
~~Span of arch~~ (circa)	3	"	9.
Circumference of small shafts at base	1	"	5½ or 1" 6
—— six feet up	1	"	4.
Diameter of pilaster.	1	"	1 3/4
Interval between pair & pair of shafts	4	"	1
Interval of between shafts in pairs. (circa)	0	"	3
Width of Mouring on abacus. (circa)	1	"	5 3/4

JOHN RUSKIN AND HIS PUBLISHER.

Mr. George Allen's association with Ruskin dates back almost half a century. In the fifties Ruskin had a drawing-class at the Working Men's College, Great Ormond-street, and for long he devoted two or three evenings a week to this practical form of art teaching. Onward from 1854 Ruskin became interested in one of his pupils, George Allen; and three years later Mr. Allen began to study engraving, with a view to executing illustrations for the master's works. It is unnecessary to enter into details of how, as a trade journal expressed it, "Mr. Ruskin . . . transferred his publishing to the middle of a country field," in other words, to Sunnyside, on the slopes of one of the beautiful vales of Kent. The new method of issuing books is described in the passage quoted on page 178 from "Fors Clavigera," as to which Ruskin said on a later page:—"The price of these Letters to friends of mine, as supplied by me, the original inditer, to all and sundry, through my only shopman, Mr. Allen, is sevenpence per epistle, and not fivepence halfpenny; and that the trade profit on the sale of them is intended to be, and must eventually be, as I intend, a quite honestly confessed profit, charged to the customer, not compressed out of the author; which object may be easily achieved by the retail bookseller, if he will resolvedly charge the symmetrical sum of tenpence per epistle over his counter, as it is my purpose he should." Prior to the appearance of "Fors," Mr. Allen had executed many engravings for Ruskin, made numerous geological studies with him in the Swiss mountains, and roamed in leisurely fashion through Central Italy with the enthusiastic appreciator of certain aspects, at any rate, of the beautiful. It is of interest to recall that for some time Ruskin was in doubt whether to himself or to Allen was attributable a pen-and-ink sketch, reproduced in "Modern Painters." For the rest, the following beautiful letter, dated Brantwood, April 15, 1878—some seven years prior to the artist-critic's final visit to Orpington—calls for quotation:—"Dear Allen,—How good and kind you are, and have always been. I trust, whatever happens to me, that your position, with the copyright of my books, if anybody cares for them, and with the friends gained by your honesty and industry, is secure on your little piece of Kentish home territory. I write this letter to release you from all debt to me of any kind, and to leave you, with my solemn thanks for all the energy and faith of your life, given to me so loyally, in all that I have ever tried to do for good, to do now what is best for your family and yourself. As I look back on my life in this closing time, I find myself in debt to every friend that loved me, for what a score of lives could not repay, and would fain say to them all, as to you, words of humiliation, which I check only because they are so vain. Ever (nay, in such a time as this, what 'ever' is there except 'to-day'—once more—) your thankful and sorrowful friend—Master no more—J. Ruskin."

An idea has been prevalent, appears even to have gained ground recently, that John Ruskin profited relatively little from his literary works. This is a grave misapprehension. We have it on excellent authority that Ruskin's profits as an author yield an average during the past fifteen years of £4,000 per annum. However highly we may account his work, whether as art critic, social reformer, or prose-poet, a money-recompense of all but £11 a day for something over 5,000 days can hardly be regarded as inadequate. Few authors who do not set out to be [illegible]

Venice," in which all the illustrations are drawn by t[illegible] 10,000 of the three-volume edition, dated 1886—the [illegible] the first three years amounting to about £3,070—and [illegible] of the traveller's edition, issued 1879-81. "Unto t[illegible] holds a second place, to judge by sales, in the esteem [illegible] readers. Few recall that the essays reprinted in t[illegible] originally appeared in the Cornhill Magazine, August-[illegible] 1860, when it was under Thackeray's editorship. [illegible] was the opposition they raised that Thackeray is sa[illegible] been anxious for their discontinuance. The author [illegible] believed them "to be the best, that is to say, [illegible] rightest-worded, and most serviceable things I have eve[illegible] and the last of them ('Ad Valorem'), having had esp[illegible] spent on it, is probably the best I shall ever write." [illegible] only was changed by Ruskin in the Smith, Elder reprin[illegible] this on page 85, where "seventeen ounces" is subst[illegible] "thirteen ounces," as found in the Cornhill. Some 77, [illegible] of "Unto this Last" have been sold by Mr. Allen.

THE VALUE OF RARE RUSKINIA[illegible]

Like his dissimilar contemporary, Robert [illegible] Ruskin's first adventure in the world of letters w[illegible] volume of poems. Again, as with "Pauline," so [illegible] volume—which cannot be characterized as an "a[illegible] poetry always dramatic in principle"—was print[illegible] expense of a relative, no other than Ruskin the e[illegible] far and away the rarest piece associated with him. Al[illegible] one poems contained in the volume were written betwe[illegible] of fourteen and twenty-six, at the head of each being t[illegible] age at the time. It is a post 8vo. containing pp. IV.+[illegible] in cloth boards, green or purple, the cover letterd[illegible] back "Poems, J.R." Within the past few weeks, [illegible] reason to know, a particularly interesting example h[illegible] hands privately at £50; and a similar value was set [illegible] a couple of years ago in a bookseller's catalogue. A[illegible] it has fetched considerable sums, although in 1886 [illegible] copies made no more than £22 and £21 10s. respecti[illegible] T. J. Wise, whose Ruskin bibliography is an obje[illegible] its kind, possesses the volume uncut, measuring 7[illegible] As all bibliophiles are aware, Mr. Wise also h[illegible] the most interesting copies extant of "Pauline," the [illegible] full of notes by the author, the title-page bearing th[illegible] tion, "To Catherine, from her affectionate Edward F[illegible] Before the 1888 re-issue of "Modern Painters," the or[illegible] volume edition—not uniform in size, inasmuch as Vol. I [illegible] crown 8vo., while the others are imperial 8vos.—was v[illegible] £50, as against an aggregate issue price of £8 8s. [illegible] dropped considerably, until now about £30 would purch[illegible] A similar shrinkage has occurred in the case of the editi[illegible] of "The Stones of Venice," since republished in [illegible] then the first edition of 1851-3, issued at 4gns., was v[illegible] thing like £30, at least privately; in 1900 a copy [illegible] brought £13 10s. "The Seven Lamps of Architec[illegible] published in 1849 at one guinea; in April, half a cen[illegible] a presentation copy in original cloth "To Dante Gabri[illegible] with affectionate and respectful regards, John Rus[illegible] 1855," fetched £20. As we know from "Præterita," [illegible] of the Golden River" was written in 1841, at the r[illegible] little girl, without any idea of publication; but at the [illegible] of a friend, and with the passive assent of the aut[illegible]

Ruskin. He was whole-hearted in his admiration of these etchings:—"If you happen to meet with two volumes of 'Grimm's German Stories,' which were illustrated by him (Cruikshank) long ago," we read in "Elements of Drawing," "pounce upon them instantly; the etchings in them are the finest things, next to Rembrandts, that, as far as I know, have been done since etching was invented." As is evident, Ruskin copied them almost as soon as he could use the pencil. Fortunately in one way, unfortunately in another, instead of being sold at auction, and so revealing the market value of this unique piece of early Ruskinlana, it was bought privately by Mrs. Severn prior to the sale. Of the many Ruskin drawings which have changed hands recently, allusion may be made to three sold at Christie's on January 29—the "Head of a Lady," 20in. by 12½in., the "Head of a Girl," 12½in. by 9½in., and a study of a sea-shell, 8½in. by 5½in., which realized respectively 55, 45, and 20gns., and to the well-known water-colour of Ambloise, executed at Lymington in the autumn of 1841, which was lent to the Ruskin Exhibition by Mr. R. E. Cunliffe of Ambleside. This "highly laboured drawing" is frankly an imitation of Turner—the sunset light, the moon rising behind it, the steps and balustrades of the castle going down to the river, which are not there in reality, "with the fret-work of St. Hubert's Chapel done very carefully in my own way, I thought perhaps a little better than Turner." The drawing and the poem of the "Broken Chain," which it aimed to illustrate, were "salutary exercises; proving to me that in those directions of imagination I was even a worse blockhead than Agassiz himself." The drawing in question realized not long ago 100gns.

SOME MOVEMENTS IN VICTORIAN POETRY.

V.—THE POETRY OF REACTION AND ARTIFICE.

An outburst of emotion is invariably followed by reaction, and the course of Victorian poetry did not fail to follow in the common way. It was, indeed, inevitable that it should do so; for, by the time the sentimental movement had spent its force, its own risks and penalties were clearly enough revealed. Even Tennyson had not altogether escaped its influence. The period which educed from him "Enoch Arden," "Sea Dreams," and those other gently emotional stories of domestic life was certainly the least poetically fruitful in his career, and the homely sentimentality of their tone is directly referable to the literary influences of the time. Poetry was for the moment at an ebb; workmanship and melody had declined, and an attempt to lend vitality to secondary art by concentrating it upon "actual" and popular subjects had resulted in an almost inevitable loss of dignity and beauty. The democratizing spirit was threatening literature, and poetry in particular appeared to be in grave danger. Suddenly the change came, and with it a complete reaction in almost every branch of art. The Pre-Raphaelite movement, with all its subsequent developments and side-issues, was the salvation of English art. It did a great deal also to save and re-vivify English poetry.

We have seen that the emotional movement had left the field dull and exhausted. There is, no doubt, room for plentiful humanity in what Mr. Swinburne called "idylls of the farm and the mills; idylls of the dining-room and the deanery; and idylls of the gutter and the gibbet," but only a consummate huge, formless representation of a familiar scene profusely detailed and accurate, but absolutely tion or feeling. The decoration of the ordina accorded no less with this blunted sense beauty. Wax-flowers and wool-work; heavy funereal curtains—all sweetness and light were the living rooms of the people by these u suggestions of an artificial, tortured life. The struck with one blow at all these false gods brain and eye alike were to be filled with freshness and clean beauty. The Pre-Raphaelit the lamp of taste in every simple home.

Such were the ideals of the movement o early in the fifties began at Oxford, where so mu and beautiful has always begun, and soon exten into the whole field of English art. And it many considerations that, though the moveme directed against artificiality, its methods were of a modified and re-directed artifice. Art, i the logical framer of definitions may say to t can never be separated from artifice. The emo had itself been designed to controvert what it artificial; it sought to return to primary hum to appeal to the heart of the people through direct channels of popular sentiment. But, wh test, sentiment, without the artifice by which can be refined, failed it; and poetry was once out its hands vaguely towards the evasive light clutching the inviolable shade." Actuality claims of the present hour had landed it indecision. "Turn away from these things the Pre-Raphaelites," and lift up your eyes Beauty is not in the present, but it has been in t learn the lesson of the past, and return to primi

Forget six counties overhung with smoke,
Forget the snorting steam and piston-strok
Forget the spreading of the hideous town
Think rather of the pack-horse on the dow
And dream of London, small, and white, a
The clear Thames bordered by its gardens
Think that below bridge the green lapping
Smite some few keels that bear Levantine
Cut from the yew wood on the burnt-up hi
And pointed jars that Greek hands toiled
And treasured scanty spice from some far Florence gold cloth, and Ypres napery,
And cloth of Bruges, and hogsheads of Gu
While nigh the thronged wharf Geoffrey C
Moves over bills of lading—mid such times
Shall dwell the hollow puppets of my rhym

The heart of the movement beats in these
And so Morris leads his readers out, under a ca of applehlossom, where knights in armour, boun quest, move over turf jewelled with flowe harmony of virginals. It is a pagan paradise, b out manly adventures. The heroes have sava they quit them like men, and over their lif draws a misty, transparent veil, through which figures in a tapestry, harmoniously melting int bowers which surround them. So too Rossett in colour with the brush, sees the heavens o mounting up to God like thin flames, and the of the happy.

"We two," she said, "will seek the Beauty of the form, beauty of the suggestion, and above all beauty of the word—these are the prevailing occupations of the poet. He lingers, with a sort of loving reluctance to be gone, over the "five sweet symphonies" of the names; and, if an exquisite picture can be painted on the mind's eye, it matters but little to the poet that the impression left proves, on reflection, vague and shadowy.

> Shall I not one day remember thy bower,
> One day when all days are one day to me?
> Thinking, "I stirred not, and yet had the power!"
> Yearning, "Oh God, if again it might be!"
> Peace, peace! such a small lamp illumes, on this highway,
> So dimly so few steps in front of my feet,—
> Yet shows me that her way is parted from my way. . . .
> Out of sight, beyond light, at what goal may we meet?

The truth is that this poetry, surcharged as it is with emotion, and trembling under the surface with ideas half-realized, is really neither the poetry of ideas, nor of emotion, but of mood. The poetry of ideas had seemed, from recent experience, to land the thinker in a philosophy too consciously moral to be altogether artistic; the poetry of emotion had wasted itself in sentimentality over uninspiring objects. And so the reaction is from both the idea and the emotion to the mood; the poet's desire is to evoke in his reader a certain mood or tone of mind which is neither active thought nor active emotion, but quiescent, sympathetic resignation to a sense of beauty remote but permeating. In such a mood we neither argue nor ask, but are content to resign ourselves to an effect which is no less compelling in that it seems to evade analysis.

So much, in brief, for the spiritual tone of the Pre-Raphaelite movement; it remains to say something of what has been by far its most searching influence—namely, its effect upon poetical technique. Mood, tone—the essential qualities of a poet—are not easily assimilated by his followers; but metrical innovations are common and easy property, and they at once find those who can adapt and imitate them. And it is really difficult to estimate how much modern prosody owes to the reaction from the lax and jog-trot melodies of the emotionalists: because at first sight Mr. Swinburne appears to have actually revolutionized English metre. That, perhaps, he did not quite do; but it is no less than true that we owe it principally to him that the technical finish of even the poorest verse nowadays is far in advance of much of the approved poetry of forty or fifty years ago. Since Mr. Swinburne opened the gates of English song to measures which appear to be actually quantitative rather than accentual, the metrical resources of the language have assumed an entirely new complexion. And there is scarcely a living English poet in whose work one may not find traces of the influence of this illuminating liberty upon the breadth and diversity of current harmonies.

Mr. Swinburne has been called "a poet of revolt"; and, since a good phrase always sticks, the expression has gained a currency rather out of proportion with its accuracy. For, though his individuality is more compelling and his tone more insistent that those of the two poets we have just been discussing, he is really no more of a revolutionist than his Pre-Raphaelite friends; his movement is entirely reactionary. To be a poet of revolt a man must have some definite goal, some propaganda, some "programme" (to use an ugly but convenient term); but Mr Swinburne has none of these. "I have simplified my politics," said Byron, "into an utter detestation of all existing Governments," and this deliciously-sweeping indignation is very illusion, but it has left us a mass of poetry unexampl English language for fertility of music or intensity fervour. "The lisp of the leaves and the ripple receive onomatopoeic expression in his lilting and in harmonies; the melody rises and falls with the mood, most formal of measures, the heroic couplet itself, grow with waves of emotion. No such riot of melody exists in English poetry, and its influence upon prosody certainly be permanent and far-reaching.

We know, indeed, that historically it was immed inspiriting. It was not only that he inspired delib skilful disciples, such as Arthur O'Shaughnessy and Myers, but that his metrical discoveries prompted ind and fruitful research. The publication of "Poems and set all young poets in rivalry to find for themselves matching these revivals of the quantitative glories of chorus; and it happened that, at the same moment without collusion, a body of poets of the younger g were turning their attention to French forms of essaying to fit our less pliable syllables into the dainty rhymes of the rondeau, the villanelle, and the balla movement of the early seventies, which included M Dobson, Mr. Edmund Gosse, Mr. Andrew Lang, and dissimilar a writer as Mr. W. E. Henley, is extremely in not only for its relation to the general effort towards lyrical resource, but for its own sake and its own ments. Mr. Lang has written Ballades, whose praise anthologies; Mr. Edmund Gosse was the first to use the difficult and rolling metre of the Chant Royal, an with singular success; while Mr. Dobson has employe the old French forms with inimitable felicity; and, as as the present spring, has written a rondeau of an intensity which lifts it altogether above the interests metrical or artificial exercise.

And, apart from technical questions altogether, pany of poets, together with other of their contemp whom something remains to be said in the concludin this series, are distinguished as part of the reactionary which began in their boyhood, by a certain remoteness temporary interests and by a return to the pursuit of periods separated from their own. Mr. Lang's allegian the classics, Mr. Gosse's note is of the renaissance, Dobson has revived for us the eighteenth century meated its associations with a poetry which criticism times denied to that period of prose. Finally, it is significant that the most conscious and elaborate poeti our day, Mr. Robert Bridges, is almost exclusively tone and inspiration, modelling himself upon the Milton and the severely "grand style." But of Mr. Bridges be more to say when we attempt a final glance at th state of poetry and its promises for the future.

It is impossible, however, to part from the poetic which we have just been considering without a gratefu ledgment of its beneficent influence upon the general contemporary poetry. It is a movement of divagatio has not been without its excesses. But it restored the and, through means which may at times have seemed it did great and lasting service to art. We are contin by the critics of the Press that the general level much higher now than it was, for example, in the old "Keepsakes," the "Amulets," and the "Friendsh

CURRENT LITERATURE.

CHARLES II.

CHARLES II. By OSMUND AIRY, M.A., LL.D. (Goupil. £3 3s.)

Dedicated to Dr. S. R. Gardiner and written in the style, pictorial without affectation, of that eminent historian's monograph on Cromwell, Dr. Osmund Airy's new book will receive as warm a welcome as the earlier volume. As a character-study it is inferior to none of its predecessors in Messrs. Goupil's series. The life of Charles II. has never been before so exhaustively and so pitilessly analysed. The result is a picture really remarkable in its vividness. And it is a picture which bears the stamp of truth. Secured by no suppressions, but based on a thorough, intimate, and original investigation, the portrait of Charles is one which will take its place among the best studies that we have of our Kings, as a work of discriminating insight and accuracy.

There is no elimination of unpleasant scandals. We are spared offensive details, of course, but there is no lack of information about any of the sordid intrigues which formed the staple of Charles' life. Pictures stand out from Dr. Airy's pages that will not readily be forgotten; and they are all pictures of shame and dishonour. The desertion of the noble Montrose, the night of the triumphal return to London, the betrayal of honesty and honour in the days of the Popish plot, the debauch that was enjoyed when the Dutch fleet sailed up the Thames, come like horrible nightmares to haunt the memory. It is, indeed, a black picture which Dr. Airy draws of the times and of the man. In the main we do not doubt that it is a just one, though it is certainly more dark than that of the judicial von Ranke. We have little, indeed, to say by way of arrest of judgment; and, indeed, nothing in the case of the King.

"He left his people in anxiety, not in grief," are the last words of Dr. Airy's book, penned on the day when the country learned with deep distress the loss of a noble example of what a Sovereign might be to a nation.

> His people were not multitudes of men and women whose aspirations, whose views of right and wrong, whose whole modes of thought might be ennobled by regal example; his Ministers were not taught that loyal service to their country and loyal service to their Sovereign were all one; his court was not a place to enter which virtue at least must be stamped upon the passport. His guide was not duty; it was not even ambition; but his guide was self; it was ease, and amusement, and lust. The cup of pleasure was filled deep for him, and he grasped it with both hands. But pleasure is not happiness. There is no happiness for him who lives and dies without beliefs, without enthusiasms, and without love.

What Dr. Gardiner has been gradually showing us of the cynical treachery of Charles' early years, of the profligacy which began almost in his childhood, is emphasized in the pages in which Dr. Airy sketches the period before the Restoration. And the picture becomes darker as the days go on. It is terrible to read; a portrait which would not shame the power of Tacitus or Juvenal.

While we can enter no defence for Charles II., though we allow the defects of his training and the heritage from Henri Quatre, we find Dr. Airy occasionally harsh beyond his text in

However, this is in such a book little mor
The whole study is informed and informing.
written, and its constant use of contemporary la a flavour of especial richness. The anecdotes, to old, are well told and appropriate. Historicall very little holes to pick in the work. Dr. Airy been successful in his historical writing, but his his skill in the use of it are constantly inc present venture will meet with little adverse are inclined to object to his picture of Willi
p. 172, which seems to ignore his grave mor same kind as those of his uncles Charles and Ja that the importance of Colonel Wildman is when he is grouped with "many old Commonwe fancy that the account which makes the Lords in at Oxford meet in the Divinity School, not, as the Geometry School, is the correct one. But little points, of course, do not affect the gener Airy has written an excellent and a most readab hardly one which young ladies should be invited

The illustrations, we need hardly say, are of Perhaps the most charming are the reproduction by Samuel Cooper. The frontispiece, a reprodu of a miniature of the Oaks at Goodwood, is esp
The later portrait shows unmistakably the deg character. The portrait of Charles as a boy, wh Welbeck, is a fine example of Vandyke, but it is especially interesting. The two pictures of M other hand, are charming, and so is the huntres Court, who was long believed to be the Princess very striking portrait is that of Hobbes, now Portrait Gallery. The Hampton Court beau somewhat sparingly drawn upon, probably bec well known; but there are portraits of the mond, the Duchess of Portsmouth, and the land, and, of course, Nell Gwyn (not a very different sources. Among interesting subj Jansen's Ball given to Charles II. at The Ha the Restoration, from Windsor; the Capture of in 1667, by Pieters, from Amsterdam; and the F Lieven Verschuur, from Budapest. Those wh with the pictures of the period will, however find that no use has been made of the magnif portraits of Clarendon and his contemporar Castle, belonging to the Earl of Home. Remem ing child's letter of Charles Edward, we were find a facsimile of an equally characteristic lette as a boy, on the interesting subject of taking m

Whether historically, in a literary aspect, production, Dr. Osmond Airy's "Charles II." a book to be bought, and read, and kept.

MR. AUSTIN DOBSON'S VE

CARMINA VOTIVA AND OTHER OCCASIONAL VE
DOBSON. (Printed for private circul

The slighter pieces of such an accompli verses as Mr. Dobson have a charm in thei
Some of the little poems in this volume are only in it may well dispense with a didactic purpose. Mr. Dobson, indeed, has in this volume a happy epigram "On Didactics in Poetry":—

> Parnassus' peaks still catch the sun;
> But why—O lyric brother!—
> Why build a Pulpit on the one,
> A Platform on the other?

The motto prefixed to the collection, taken from a convenient Old Play—"Enter a Song, singing," serves as an appropriate gentleman-usher to introduce the company that follows.

"The sixty pieces here collected," the Preface tells us, "belong to many periods of the author's life. But they are alike in this that, none of them are to be found in any of his published volumes. Some of them are reprinted from ephemeral sources, others have never appeared before, one or two have been restored from the earliest issues of his poems." The pieces bear dates from 1868 to the present year. One accompanied a floral wreath on the occasion of the death of Queen Victoria; one celebrates the "Rank and File"—the "undistinguished dead"—who have fallen in the South African war; many are lines addressed to personal friends of the writer—the late Lord de Tabley, the late Frederick Locker, Mr. G. H. Boughton, Mr. Stedman, Mr. Gosse, and others; and among these personal friends we ought almost to reckon—so intimate is the regard expressed for each whether seriously or smilingly—Oliver Goldsmith and old Izaac, who gave directions how to catch and dress "your Chub or Chavender." Mr. Dobson's poetical maledictions are reserved for the street singer, who murders "the magic that music brings," and for the hard who presses onward waving a huge MS. and holds the victim with his glittering eye; and neither of these is likely to be seriously hurt by maledictions in the forms of trivial exotic verse. "July" is exultant with the joy of escape from town to the sea and the sky; it rings its little joy-bells through some six and forty lines on two rhyming-sounds, and this without any ostentatious parading of the feat. "Notes of the Honeymoon" may be described as a domestic drama in eight acts, but each act is no longer than the following.—Act V, the young bride at a bookstall having discovered an interesting announcement in The Times:—

> "Here it is in The Times,—
> Dear Charlie,—how funny!
> 'Twixt a 'Smith' and a 'Symes,'—
> Here it is!—in The Times."
> "And it's not with the 'crimes!'"
> "You must pay. I've no money!
> Here it is in The Times,—
> Dear Charlie,—how funny!"

To have actually seen it in The Times must add an emphasis to the dear of the last line which differentiates it from the second.

But Mr. Dobson can be grave and dignified. The two sonnets "Regrets" after Joachim du Bellay are admirable in the delicacy of their sentiment of nostalgia; the "Ballad of Bitter Fruit" after Théodore de Banville—the bitter fruit being poor folk stark and sped swinging from the forest trees, "King Lewis his orchard ground"—has in it a grim romance worthy of Villon. And in the poem "To Monsieur de la Mothe le Vayer, upon the death of his son. After Molière" Mr. Dobson has added to English poetry a lofty sonnet of that consolation

> No grief alas! can now bring back again
> The son too dear, by Death untimely ta'en
> Yet, not the less, his loss is hard to bear.
> Graced as he was by all the world reverence,
> Large heart, keen wit, a lofty soul and rare
> Surely these claim humiliable tears.

The little volume is dedicated to Mr. Andrew L 125 copies have been printed, and perhaps it is a k make 125 persons happy—we may not all succeed much. But Mr. Dobson is too good a poet to be a those whom Pater styled "the elect and peculi sentiment," and we trust that not a few of these reappear in future editions of the author's collected

THE ORIGINALITY OF ROMAN A

ROMAN ART: SOME OF ITS PRINCIPLES AND THEIR A TO CHRISTIAN PAINTING. By FRANZ WICKHO lated by Mrs. S. ARTHUR STRONG, LL.D. Fou and numerous Text Illustrations. (Heinemann.

Mrs. Strong is the apostle in England of the r the too austere devotion to archaic Greek art. As M Sellers she conferred a real benefit on such students familiar with German by translating Furtwängler and ingenious "Masterpieces of Greek Sculpture, among other points, the incalculable services of R in the preservation of Greek art were warmly and vindicated. The old dilettanti, who had long suffere obloquy for their admiration of what the purists Roman copies," suddenly found themselves reha their self-respect by an acknowledged master of plast Once more it became possible to speak enthusias "mere Roman" statue, without blushing for one's since these Roman favourites of bygone amateurs t be priceless witnesses to lost masterpieces of the periods. So far, however, Roman art was defended altruistic virtues. Now, Mrs. Strong comes forw most interesting study of the merits of Roman art p

> The Art of Rome [she says] has suffered not actual neglect, at any rate under the imputat nothing but the last chapter of the long history of —in fact, a sort of decadent anti-climax. And yet Roman art can, no more than Greek and Roman li treated as episodes of unequal value in one a development. Entirely independent in their origi and mingled for a time in what Professor Wickho named the "Augustan style"—a style plentifully by busts and by numberless reliefs, hitherto classed as Hellenistic. Fortunately for the development of the art, the stronger Roman elem fused and tempered by the union, was to predomina Greek, which at that time had long been enfee fact was on the point of exhaustion. Professor Wi how entirely Roman in its native strength is Imperial art of which the finest examples are reliefs from the Arches of Titus and of Trajan. interpenetrated every artistic product of the t itself felt right down into the beginnings of Ch and, though obscured and weakened, maintained prejudiced eyes of those who have been trained in the contemplation of the latter, is nevertheless a noble and virile art to which the Trecentists probably owed something of their inspiration. The work is a translation of the essay contributed by Professor Wickhoff to the description of the famous Vienna illuminated MS. of the Book of Genesis, well-known from the engravings of Lambecius and Kollar, which presents a series of the oldest illustrations to the Bible that have been preserved. This essay, together with Härtel's account of the Greek text, first appeared in 1895 as a supplement to the Jahrbuch der Kunstsammlungen des Allerhöchsten Kaiserhauses, and aims at formulating a theory of the history of Roman style, both in painting and in sculpture, from the age of Augustus to that of Constantine. Professor Wickhoff's examination of the new motives introduced in Roman style, the school of illusionist portraiture, the study of nature, albeit a dry naturalism, and the development of an extremely clever—speaking technically—treatment of freely grouped flowers in a decorative method that recalls Japanese ornament, will be appreciated by all careful students, even when they are not disposed to accept his sometimes rather fine-drawn analyses. The book sometimes gives one the impression of special pleading, as if the author had made up his mind to press his brief for Roman originality for all it was worth; but the impartial reader will find much to admire in the admirable technical criticism and the wide grasp of detail shown in Professor Wickhoff's elaborate discussions of the principles of style as exhibited in the art he has undertaken to champion. The illustrations alone will recommend this beautiful volume to all lovers of fine prints, though we must regret that the Genesis pictures are reproduced from Lambecius' incorrect engravings. The plates of the Vatican Head of the young Augustus, the reliefs from the Ara Pacis, and the numerous decorative examples are finely rendered, and will be a revelation to those who have not so far turned their attention to a peculiarly interesting and dignified period of art. Mrs. Strong's translation, we need not add, is worthy of her scholarly reputation.

Some Guide-books.

WEST KENT is the latest of Messrs. A. and C. Black's new guide books, and Mr. A. R. Hope Moncrieff well keeps up the practical and complete character of the series. We have also received a new (ninth) edition of Black's SOUTH WALES (3s. 6d.).

AROUND LONDON: SOUTH SIDE (Black, 6d.) is the title of a guide, also by Mr. Hope Moncrieff, dealing in this author's happy manner with the district within "a part circle roughly drawn from Gravesend to Guildford, traversed by roads leading out through the transpontine suburbs." Cyclists and pedestrians will find it very useful.

Mr. Frank J. Nash, of 51, Vincent-square, Westminster, is the publisher as well as the author of THE ROAD TO THE NORTH (2s. 6d. n.). It is a guide to the district served by the North-Eastern Railway system, and brims over with instructive remarks. Though the style is unattractive, the perusal of it will repay the tourist.

A useful tourists' guide is that to the West Highland Railway, published by F. W. Wilson, of Glasgow, in his series of RAIL AND RIVER GUIDES. It contains a good map of the district, and notes on the fishing resorts and golf courses, with plenty of photographic reproductions of loch and mountain scenery.

Most of the big railway companies now issue time-tables that are almost as full of information and illustration as the ordinary guide book. A good example is the Great Eastern's annotated time-table for the CROMER AND MUNDESLEY EXPRESSES, which is well arranged and prettily illustrated.

The rapid extension of electric railways necessitates frequent new editions of Swiss guides. This season brings a

FICTION.

The Eternal City.

Mr. Hall Caine has often been hardly tr viewers. Not always, it is true. Sometimes hi lauded to the skies, and sometimes it has attacked. Something in his style of writing, it s to a sane and temperate criticism; perhaps annoyed at the flourish of trumpets that prec from his pen, and at the success commanded by methods. On the title-page of THE ETERNA mann, 6s.) we read, for example, that a hundred have been printed of the first edition. It is prod only to read the book to see how remarkable a fa a long book—it contains more than six hund considering the average quality of the modern s it is not to be considered dear at the price. Bu of uncommon excellence. It is very far from bein
It has, from the purely literary point of view, ever. There is not a single phrase in the book t sense of distinction; there are no subtle tou tion or of humour; there is nothing that app eated intellect. Worse still, Mr. Hall Caine single character that we can clothe with flesh as we may, Rossi remains a melancholy puppet, pathetic heroine of melodrama, while Bonelli is th carefully-dressed Drury Lane villain of high lit stage, where he has been acting unscrupulous fo for the last twenty years. As for the Pope, th and other powers and principalities, they need considered. The author has chosen to make an the Supreme Pontiff, an idiotic and timoron monarch, and we do not suppose that his errors an undue strain upon our diplomatic relations country. After all, the introduction of these personages was probably necessary to the suc from a selling point of view. Mr. Caine's publ to learn the secrets of the Vatican and the novelist who has actually spent some months City imbibing local colour. And they like a of melodrama, both in its incidents and in and familiar insistence on Christianity untran Churches.

Let us turn, a more grateful task, to Mr.
For he has very considerable merits, although dazzled by that first edition of a hundred thousa to forget them in his anxiety to deplore the publ out some power, so remarkable a success in the (taking the pecuniary results) would be impos Caine has a good eye for a dramatic situation, an that invaluable lesson—that it is almost impos public too much of what it likes. The public li sacrificing heroine dying sweetly in the limeligh fades away happily in her husband's arms, and t his apparatus from above for all he is worth.
sensibility will be shed over this moving and pat
"The Eternal City," one cannot but think, excellent drama on a big stage. The note is forced; in a printed book this is sometimes Drury Lane it would be only just and proper, a author cannot quite breathe life into his char

Historical Novels.

In ROBERT ANNYS: POOR PRIEST (Macmillan, 6s.) Annie Nathan Meyer has given a fine picture of an unfamiliar period of English history and an intuitive study of a man's soul in which are mirrored the warring forces of his day. Robert Annys is a disciple of Wycliff, a lover of the song of Piers Plowman, passionate in his sympathy with the oppressed common people to whom he preaches. He is, however, sensitive to the beauty of that dominant Church which he opposes; and Thomas Goldynge, the princely Bishop of Ely, strives to win him to do his work within the hierarchy as Archdeacon of Ely. There is a crucial scene in the great Cathedral in which Annys is played upon by personal ambition, the sense of power, and a recognition of the majestic significance of the service, and is only released from his self-questionings by the distant song of John Ball's followers which comes to him like a sign from Heaven. Thenceforth he devotes himself to his perilous task of preparing the minds of men for the revolt against feudal tyranny and the unscriptural assumptions of the priesthood. He decides, for example's sake, to marry Matilda Westel, his devoted helper; but another woman, sensuous, ambitious, the illegitimate daughter of a great noble, crosses his life, and he hides from temptation in a cloister. When he leaves the peaceful scriptorium, at the call of his people, it is too late to check the lawlessness in which the great uprising ends miserably. He is left taking up his frustrate work with Matilda at his side. The pageant of mediæval life, splendid and grotesquely pitiful, is admirably suggested, forming a symbolic setting to the spiritual struggles. The story is fitly located in the wide and wistful fen country which the author depicts well.

If Mr. Stanley Weyman had never written, we might have found THE HELMET OF NAVARRE (Macmillan, 6s.) enthralling reading; but then in that case we should not have had it to read. Miss Bertha Runkle, however, weaves her plots deftly and has produced an exciting story out of familiar material, while readers in quest of adventure will not quarrel with the number of hairbreadth escapes and wildly improbable coincidences. There is the inevitable happy ending, brought about largely by the intervention of the innocent country lad, the narrator, who naturally walks straight into the secret councils of princes. The sense of peril and intrigue which brooded about Paris just before the "conversion" of Henry IV. is well given, but the justification of Miss Runkle's title is to seek. Henry of Navarre appears, it is true, in the last chapter to bless the lovers, but it is in no martial guise; we do not follow him to his battle-fields, and we catch no glimpse of him as that "clair astre de feu" which his soldiers loved.

A FORBIDDEN NAME, by Fred Whishaw (Chatto and Windus, 6s.), is a good, lively tale of adventure. Its principal scenes are laid at the Court of Catherine the Great. The "forbidden name" is the name of the rightful heir to the throne, a semi-fictitious being who is buried in a dungeon, and rescued by the heroine, a truly spirited young woman, and the "I" of the story. It is long, but not too long. The occasional fighting is well done, the duel between chair and sword in Chapter XX. being almost brutally realistic.

Mrs. W. K. Clifford.

There are three stories in A WOMAN ALONE (Methuen, 3s. 6d.) and of these three two are more or less closely connected together. Mrs. Clifford cannot be accused, in this instance at any rate, of collecting work that has done duty ratio of tragedy rather higher than is necessary. Mrs stories are pleasantly written, with occasional flashes adroit touches of description. They are considerably usual level of mediocrity; but they will not rouse enthusiasm.

A DARING SCHEME, by Mrs. Bagot Harte (Digby, I is a pleasant novel, but not a remarkable one. There maid in it of a type that ceased to represent anythi before most of us were born—the preposterous "stro woman" of fiction, with her huge bonnet and gloves a diatribe on the superiority of her "sect." Apart fro characters are human and natural enough.

A RUSKIN BIBLIOGRAPHY.

For the complete bibliography the student must l to Wise and Smart's "Bibliography of the of John Ruskin," edited by Mr. Thomas J. W exhaustive work, published for subscribers only in 18 between 200 and 300 pages; but Ruskin's chief book earliest writings, are included in the following ch list:—

1834.—Three papers in Loudon's "Magazine o
History"; "Enquiries on the Causes of the Col
Water of the Rhine"; "Facts and Considerati Strata of Mont Blanc"; and "Note on the Perfo Leaden Pipe by Rats." Ruskin's first publishe reprinted in "On the Old Road" (George Allen).

1835-1837.—"Saltzburg," "Fragments from a Journal," "The Months," "The Last Smile," an a Legend of Italy." Ruskin's first verse-wri published in "Friendship's Offering" (Smith, Co.), and reprinted in "The Poems of John Rusk (George Allen).

1837-38.—"Poetry of Architecture"—a series of a Loudon's "Architectural Magazine." Reprinte
Allen) 1892.

1839.—"Salsette and Elephanta" (Newdigate Pri Published at Oxford (J. Vincent) 1839; Reprint 1879.

1843.—"Modern Painters," Vol. I. (Smith, Elder).

1846.—"Modern Painters," Vol. II. (Smith, Elder).

1849.—"The Seven Lamps of Architecture"; two (Smith, Elder); subsequent issues (George Allen edition; small complete edition, 31st Thousand.

1850.—"Poems" (51), mainly from "Friendship's and the "London Monthly Miscellany"; pri private circulation.

1851.—"King of the Golden River," seven editio Elder); subsequent editions (Allen). [24th Thous
" "The Stones of Venice," Vol. I. Two edition Elder); subsequent editions (Allen).
" "Notes on the Construction of Sheepfolds"; tw (Smith, Elder); subsequent issues (Allen); also in "On the Old Road."
" "Pre-Raphaelitism," two editions (Smith, El printed in "On the Old Road."

1853.—"The Stones of Venice," Vols. II. and III., two of each (Smith, Elder); also published in a thre edition (Smith, Elder), 1873-74, which was reprint 1886. Also published in small complete editi Thousand), and in Travellers' Edition, abridg Thousand) (Allen), 1879; reprinted at the Kelmsco 1892 (Allen).

1856.—" Modern Painters," Vols. III. and IV., two editions of each (Smith, Elder), and reprinted in their " Autograph " edition, 1873. Subsequent issues (Allen).

1856.—" The Harbours of England," two editions (Gambart and Co.) ; 3rd edition (Day and Son) ; 4th (T. J. Allman) ; 5th (Smith, Elder) ; reprinted (Allen) with preface by T. J. Wise, 1895.

1857.—" Notes on the Turner Gallery at Marlborough House," five editions (Smith, Elder).

,, " The Elements of Drawing " (Smith, Elder) [8th Thousand ; new edition (Allen) 1892, 14th Thousand.

,, " The Political Economy of Art," three editions (Smith, Elder) ; reprinted (Allen) in " A Joy for Ever."

1859.—" The Two Paths " (Smith, Elder) ; second edition (Allen). Small complete edition. [14th Thousand.

,, " The Elements of Perspective " (Smith, Elder).

1860.—" Modern Painters," Vol. V. (Smith, Elder). The complete work was published in the " Autograph Edition " in five vols. (Smith, Elder) in 1873 ; reprinted with additions in 1888, and again in 1892 (Allen).

,, " Unto This Last " ; four papers in the " Cornhill Magazine " ; reprinted (Smith, Elder) 1862 ; subsequent issues (Allen). [35th Thousand.

1862.—" Essays in Political Economy," published in " Fraser's Magazine." Reprinted as " Munera Pulveris " ; subsequent issues (Allen). [Small edition, 8th Thousand.

1865.—" Sesame and Lilies," four editions (Smith, Elder), and numerous re-issues in original form (Allen). Subsequently published in revised and enlarged edition (Allen). [6th edition ; small complete edition, 48th Thousand ; popular edition, 52nd Thousand.

1866.—" The Ethics of the Dust" (Smith, Elder) ; subsequent reprints (Allen). [21st Thousand.

,, " The Crown of Wild Olive," three editions (Smith, Elder) ; subsequent issues (Allen). [Small edition, 33rd Thousand.

1867.—" Time and Tide, by Weare and Tyne," letters originally published in Manchester Examiner and Leeds Mercury ; two editions (Smith, Elder) ; subsequent editions (Allen). [Small edition, 14th Thousand.

1869.—" The Queen of the Air," two editions (Smith, Elder) ; subsequent editions (Allen). [Small edition, 15th Thousand.

1870.—" Lectures on Art," three editions (Clarendon Press) ; revised small edition, with new preface (Allen). [13th Thousand.

1871-84.—" Fors Clavigera," letters published monthly from 1871 to 1877, and at intervals from 1878 to 1884 ; afterwards collected in two editions of eight and four volumes each respectively. [3rd edition.

1872.—" Aratra Pentelici " (Allen). [2nd edition ; small complete edition, 6th Thousand.

,, " The Relation between Michael Angelo and Tintoret." (Allen.) [3rd edition.

,, " The Eagle's Nest " (Allen). [2nd edition ; small edition, 12th Thousand.

1873.—" Love's Meinie," published in three parts separately. Complete volume (Allen) 1882 ; also small edition.

,, " Ariadne Florentina," six lectures issued separately ; subsequently as one volume (Allen) ; also small edition.

1874.—" Val d'Arno," ten lectures issued separately ; subsequently as one volume (Allen). [2nd edition ; also small edition, 6th thousand.

1875-77.—" Mornings in Florence," six parts issued separately (Allen) ; also a new complete edition. [12th Thousand.

1875-86.—" Proserpina " (Allen), Vol. I. contains first six parts ; Parts VII., VIII., IX., and X. issued separately.

1875-83.—" Deucalion " (Allen). Vol. I. contains first six parts ; Parts VII. and VIII. issued separately.

1877-81.—" St. Mark's Rest," published separately in three parts, with supplement and appendix (Allen) ; also in complete edition. [2nd edition.

1877-78.—" The Laws of Fesole," in four parts (Allen) ; collected in one volume 1879. [2nd edition 1882.

1884.—" The Storm Cloud of the Ninete originally issued in two parts ; afterwa (Allen).

1884-85.—" The Pleasures of England " ; fo separately (Allen). [Small complete edit and Pleasures of England," in one volume.

1885.—" A Knight's Faith," Vol. IV. of " torum." (Allen.)

,, " Roadside Songs of Tuscany "—preface a Alexander's translations (Allen).

1885-89.—" Praeterita " ; three volumes (All

1886-87.—" Dilecta " ; correspondence, diar tracts from books illustrating " Praeteri (Allen).

1887-89.—" Christ's Folk in the Appennine Alexander, edited by Ruskin, in six parts

SELECTIONS.

1885.—" On the Old Road " ; a Selection pamphlets, articles, and essays (1834-84) volumes.

1889.—" The Rights of Labour according arranged by T. Barclay. W. Reeves. [3

1893.—" Selections from Ruskin," two volume series being based upon the " Selectio Smith, Elder in 1861 ; the second seri from Ruskin's works published after 1860.

1894.—" Ruskin on Music," edited by Mis (Allen).

1898.—" The Bible References of Ruski arranged in alphabetical order by Mar (Allen).

1900.—" Thoughts from Ruskin," selected Professor Attwell. (Allen.) [6th Thous

,, " Turner and Ruskin," with descripti the writings of Ruskin, edited, with a bi Turner, by Frederick Wedmore (Allen).

The late Mr. Parnell was not a bibliop pected to find any very valuable items in his sold at Avondale last week. Yet there were books, and in a few cases, notably one or two were evidently used by the late Irish leader obtained. Evidently his predecessors had f teresting collection. As a rule, however, th Among the lots were the following :—Beckfor (£2 15s.) ; Byron's " Doge of Venice and Pr first edition (12s.) ; Inigo Jones' " Palladio's A (£2) ; Campbell's " Vitruvius Britannicus," 3 Markham's " Hunger's Prevention, or the W ing," 1621, Ascham's " Schole of Shooting," of Angling," 1740 (£2 15s.) ; " Galerie du edited by Filhol, 10 vols., 1810-15 (£5) ; An Fencing," 1765 (£2 10s.) ; " General System by the Duke of Newcastle, 1743, 2 vols. in 1 (tary Costume of Europe," 2 vols., 1812 (£18 Travaux de Mars," 1685 (36s.) ; Lucar's Colloquies Concerning the Art of Shooting (35s.) ; Gourry's " Traité de Venerie et de Chaucer's Works, black letter, 1561 (£4 5s.) ; nia's Pastorals," 1613, Cowley's Poems, 16 Jonson's Works, 2 vols., 1640 (£4) ; Holl cles," imperfect, 1577-86 (£2) ; and the Fou speare, with name cut from top of title, and t imperfect, being badly frayed, size 13¾ by 9 fetched the largest figure of any book sold, b to Colonel Tottenham for £35. Not a sing

Correspondence.

BESANT AND RICE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In the Life of Coligny by the late Sir Walter Besant there is a passage containing a statement so utterly at variance with another on the same topic in "The Golden Butterfly" that the two call for consideration. I quote them.

From the tenth chapter of "Gaspard de Coligny," by Walter Besant, M.A. :—

> The Duke of Guise, wiping the blood from the dead man's face with his handkerchief, looked upon the well-known features of his enemy. "I know him," he cried joyfully, "it is he." He kicked the dead body with his foot, and left it there, calling on his companions to go on with the good work in the name of the King. Sixteen years later, the corpse of this same Henry, Duke of Guise, was lying before another murderer, Henry the Third, who, as Guise had treated the dead body of Coligny, so treated the dead body of Guise, with a brutal kick.

From the Prologue to "The Golden Butterfly," by Walter Besant and James Rice :—

> When Henri Balafré, Duc de Guise, saw Coligny lying dead at his feet, he is said—only it is a wicked lie—to have kicked the body of his murdered father's enemy. When Henry III. of France, ten years later, saw Balafré dead at his feet, he did kick the lifeless body, with a wretched joke. That King was a cur.

Himself or his colleague has therefore, it would appear, given the lie to the gifted and lamented writer of Coligny's biography.

Yours faithfully,

ALGERNON WARREN.

17, Wellbeck-mansions, Inglewood-road,
West Hampstead, N.W.

WILTSHIRE WORDS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I am lately joined in Wedlock to a young Woman whose Humour is, whenever I have a Mind to read her a Discourse out of your Paper, to vow that she will not be mahometed to. I desire to know what this Word means. Melissa is a Lady that lives in our Parish; but, if I offer her the least Civility, my Wife declares that I am as deep as Garrick, and that Melissa and I, forsooth, are as thick as Incleucauers. It was but last Night that, the Supper not being to madam's liking, she found the Mutton as sour as a wig, and the Potatoes as hard as Brazil; and she told me afterwards that she should never endure the Cook-maid, though the Wench had been as fess as Cox's pig to enter her service. Pray, tell me, Sir, how I may interpret this metaphorical sort of a Dialect, and oblige

Your humble servant,

PHILOLOGUS.

P.S.—You must know she was bred near the Devizes.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Up to the present the autumn lists of the publishers [illegible]

Caine have already given the season a popular [illegible] about ten days' time Mr. Crockett's volume of "Lo[illegible] is expected from Mr. Murray uniform with "A[illegible] woman's Love Letters"—while his new novel, "The F[illegible] is coming through Messrs. Macmillan. Another nov[illegible] Barrie is also expected during the autumn, and Mr. [illegible] will publish a new book by Mr. Gilbert Parker, entit[illegible] Right of Way." Among the novels in Mr. Fisher Unw[illegible] "The Disciple," by Paul Bourget; "The Lion's W[illegible] Amelia E. Barr; "The Yellow Fiend," by Mrs. A[illegible] "The Saving Child," by Mrs. Fraser; "The Insane [illegible] Mrs. Campbell Praed; "The Mating of a Dove," [illegible] E. Mann; and two books by Mr. Louis Becke—"[illegible] Black Sheep," and "Yorke the Adventurer, and oth[illegible] Other novels for the autumn are :—

- "Kim." By Rudyard Kipling. (Macmillan.)
- "A Maid of Venice." By F. Marion Crawford. (Ma[illegible]
- "The Benefactress." By the authoress of "Elizabe[illegible] German Garden." (Macmillan.)
- "The Secret Orchard." By Egerton Castle. (Macm[illegible]
- "Royal Georgie." By S. Baring Gould. (Methuen.)
- "Sir Richard Calmady." By Lucas Malet. (Methue[illegible]
- "Tales of Dunstable Weir." By Zack. (Methuen.)
- "Clementina." By A. E. W. Mason. (Methuen.)
- "The Embarrassing Orphan." By W. E. Norris. (M[illegible]
- "The Prophet of Berkeley Square." By Robert [illegible] (Methuen.)
- "Fancy Free." By Eden Phillpotts. (Methuen.)

Mr. Elliot Stock announces a new volume of essa[illegible] Augustine Birrell uniform with the first edition o[illegible] Dicta." It will contain, among others, articles on Jo[illegible] The Ideal University, and The Reformation.

To Mr. Henry J. Drane's "Bijou Biographies [illegible] added, in the course of a few days, a life of Miss Mar[illegible] illustrated with special photographs.

Miss Constance Fletcher, who, under the pse[illegible] "George Fleming," has published a considerable [illegible] novels, is preparing for stage purposes a dramatic [illegible] Balzac's well-known story, "La Duchesse de Langeai[illegible]

Messrs. Methuen have a new series of children's [illegible] preparation, under the editorship of E. V. Lucas, enti[illegible] Little Blue Books for Children," containing stories al[illegible] children, the moral of which is implied rather than [illegible] E. V. Lucas has also written (for Messrs. Methuen) a [illegible] book of verse entitled "The Visit to London," wit[illegible] pictures.

An American selection of "Representative [illegible] Comedies," in five volumes, will be published soon [illegible] Macmillan, as well as an Édition de luxe of Mr. Fishe[illegible] "Mermaid Series" in twenty-five volumes. Messrs. [illegible] also announce "What is Shakespeare: An Introduct[illegible] Great Plays," by Professor Sherman, of Nebraska; "[illegible] Napoleon I.," by the Hon. Thomas E. Watson, autho[illegible] Story of France"; "George Washington," by Nor[illegible] good; "Select Documents of English History," by [illegible] George Burton Adams and H. Morse Stephens; and [illegible] three series of a work to be issued under the general [illegible] of the President of the University of Chicago, W[illegible] Harper. The first series will be "Ancient Records of [illegible] and Assyria," edited by Professor R. F. Harper of [illegible] six volumes; the second series will be "Ancient [illegible] Egypt," edited by J. H. Breasted, in six volumes [illegible] third series will be "Ancient Records of Palestine."

The novel with a purpose apparently knows no limit. [illegible] development is to be an anti-vaccination novel by L[illegible] General Arthur Phelps, President of the Anti-V[illegible]

Prince of Siam. It will be published by Mr. Fisher Unwin, who has a number of other historical works, including "The Barbarian Invasion of Italy," by Professor Villari; and two additions to "The Story of the Nations" Series—"Wales," by Professor Edwards, and "Mediæval Rome: 1073-1600," by William Miller. "John Oliver Hobbes" has two items in the same list—a new Haymarket play, as yet without a title, and a volume entitled "Three Stories and a Play," the three stories being named respectively "Prince Toto," "'Tis an Ill Flight without Wings," and "The Worm that God Prepared," and the play—which concerns a Carlist rising—A Repentance. Another piece of dramatic literature announced by Mr. Unwin is a three-act play in blank verse entitled Alfred the Great, by Edmund L. Hill. The same publisher will issue Mr. Harry Furniss' and Mr. Albert Chevalier's autobiographies, which we have already mentioned, and he has one scientific book—"A Study in Heredity," by Dr. Archdall Reid, Lecturer on Heredity in the University of Edinburgh. The author deals mainly with alcoholism.

Books to look out for at once.

"Blue Shirt and Khaki: A Comparison." By J. F. Archibald. Gay and Bird. 6s. n.
[A comparison between American and British campaigning.]

"The Growth of the Empire." By A. W. Jose. J. Murray. 6s.
[Historical review of the development of Greater Britain.]

"The Snares of the World." By Hamilton Aide. J. Murray. 6s.

"The Million." By Dorothea Gerard. Methuen. 6s.

"When the Land was Young." By L. McLaws. Constable. 6s.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

FICTION.

SIR HECTOR. By ROBERT MACHRAY. 7¾×5¼. 374 pp. Constable. 6s.

THE DEVASTATORS. By ADA CAMBRIDGE. 7½×5. 310 pp. Methuen. 6s.

THE SKIPPER OF BARNCRAIG. By G. SETOUN. 7½×5. 348 pp. Constable. 6s.

SPORTING SORROWS. By FOX RUSSELL. 6½×4. 192 pp. Arrowsmith. 1s.

MISCELLANEOUS.

FIRST SUPPLEMENTARY CATALOGUE OF THE LIBRARY OF THE ROYAL COLONIAL INSTITUTE. By J. R. BOSSE. 10¾×7¼. 763 pp. Royal Colonial Institute.

CONCISE DICTIONARY OF THE FRENCH AND ENGLISH LANGUAGES. By F. A. E. Gasc. 6½×4¾. 941 pp. Bell.
[A handy abridgment of the author's larger work, published in 1897. Intended for middle forms in schools.]

SONGS OF EXILE. By HEBREW POETS. Trans. by NINA DAVIS. 6¼×4¾. 146 pp. Macmillan. 2s. 6d. n.
[Published for the Jewish Historical Society. Twelve of the songs are by Jehudah Halevi, some others from unknown sources.]

WAS ALFRED KING OF ENGLAND? A Political View. By A. SAXON. 8¾×5¾. 100 pp. Harrison.
[Endeavours to prove that Alfred was a Roman nominee of the Pope, sent to fight against the Saxons under Guthrum, who in 878 was "King of all England."]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

THE HISTORICAL NEW TESTAMENT. By J. MOFFATT, B.D. 2nd Ed. revised. 9×5¾. 724 pp. T. and T. Clark. 16s.
[We reviewed this very valuable book when it was first published on February 23. The changes in this edition are very slight.]

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF MIGUEL DE CERVANTES SAAVEDRA. Vol. III. Don Quixote, Vol. I. Ed. by J. FITZMAURICE-KELLY. 7×4½. 184 pp. Glasgow. Gowans and Gray. 1s. n.
[This begins the Cervantes in 12 volumes which is to form part of Messrs. Gowans and Gray's "Complete Library," and is uniform with the "Keats" already published. Ormsby's well known translation has been selected. Mr. Fitzmaurice-Kelly's full introduction and brief scholarly notes give it a value which a book so cheap and handy seldom possesses.]

THE CHRONICLES OF COUNT ANTONIO. By ANTHONY HOPE. (The Novelist Series.) 9×6. 128 pp. Methuen. 6d.

THEOLOGY.

JUSTIFICATION BY FAITH, and other Sacred Trusts. Harmony and Correlation. By H. W. HOLDEN. 7½×5. 101 pp. Skeffington. 2s. 6d.

A KEY TO UNLOCK THE BIBLE. By J. A. BEET, D.D. 7×4½. 160 pp. Religious Tract Society. 1s. 6d.
[A brief introduction to the study of the Bible in the light of modern criticism.]

CHESS.

Address "Chess": LITERATURE, Printing House

PROBLEM No. 217, by O. KUNETITZKY, Prague.
BLACK 6 pieces.

WHITE. 12 pieces.
White to play and mate in two moves.

PROBLEM
R. G. THOM
BLACK.

WHITE.
White to play and

PROBLEM No. 219, by A. Troitzky, R pieces)—K at K B 2; Q at Q Kt 8; Kt at Q Black (6 pieces)—K at K B 5; Q at Q B 3 pawns at Q 5, Q B 4, Q R 4. White to play and

PROBLEM No. 220, by Count Schaffgotsch. —K at Q Kt 3; Q at K B 4; Kt at K 5. Bl at Q 8; Q at Q R 4. White to play and win.

MORPHY AND PROFESSIONALISM.—In view vast changes have been wrought during recent in the practical extinction of professionalism as ing by Mr. C. A. Buck, of Toronto, Kansas, wi He writes:—"It was while in Paris, durin December, 1858, that Morphy's so-called a began to manifest itself, and his feelings in became so aggravated in later years as to cr belief that he grew to positively dislike the mistake. His experience in European chess revelation to him. It should be remembered t inspired by the ardour, enthusiasm, and high and, loving chess as he did, he was shocked and sordid conventionalities of chess practice that w taint of professionalism was repellent to him, a how the game was made a business of, his di forsake the haunts of chess. Morphy's idea morals of chess is not suggested for the purpo invidious comparisons, but simply to establish was not chess that he grew to dislike but the those who would make a living by it. As Mor be in a way an involuntary victim of his fame his ideas in this respect are important as expl phase of his character.

"Morphy returned to America in May, 1850 with all the enthusiasm due to a conquering her of a vast assemblage in the chapel of the U York, he was presented with a testimonial i magnificent set of gold and silver chess m match, the most costly, perhaps, that was ove festivities of this occasion were unhappily marr episode that showed Morphy's growing sens 'profession of chess.' Colonel Charles D. M the American Chess Association, was chairman committee which greeted Morphy, and in his addr made an allusion to chess as a profession, and re as its most brilliant exponent. Morphy took e characterized as a professional player, even by he resented it in such a way as to overwhelm C confusion. Such was his mortification at this that Colonel Mead withdrew from further part

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 202. SATURDAY, AUGUST 31, 1901.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

NOTES OF THE DAY 193, 194, 195

"LITERATURE" PORTRAITS.—XVII.

COUNT TOLSTOY, by Francis Gribble 195

TOLSTOY'S NOVELS, by George Calderon 197

RECENT LETTER FROM TOLSTOY TO MR. AYLMER MAUDE 202

TOLSTOY'S TEACHING, by Aylmer Maude 202

COUNT LEO TOLSTOY.—A "Personal View," by E. A. Brayley Hodgetts 204

SOME MOVEMENTS IN VICTORIAN POETRY, by Arthur Waugh. VI.—Retrospect and Prospect 209

THE PAN-CELTIC CONGRESS, by A. P. Graves 211

CURRENT LITERATURE—

The Close of the Middle Ages, 1273-1494 213

Mr. Gladstone: A Study—Modern Cremation 213, 214

A Great Lady—My Lady's Diamonds—The Domine's Garden—The Skirts of Happy Chance—The Mother of Emeralds—A Woman's Burden—Pacifico—Nineteen Thousand Pounds—Tyler Tatlock—Corban—Deacon Brodie—Another Woman's Territory 214, 215

LIBRARY NOTES 215

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for ... 215, 216

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS 216

NOTES OF THE DAY.

We publish this week special illustrated articles upon Tolstoy and his work by Mr. Francis Gribble, Mr. George Calderon, Mr. Aylmer Maude, and Mr. Brayley Hodgetts.

On page 211 will be found an article on the Pan-Celtic Congress by Mr. A. P. Graves, and on page 209 Mr. Arthur Waugh's concluding article on Victorian poetry.

Next week we shall issue a specially illustrated Walt Whitman number, with a reproduction of Mr. R. Bryden's portrait of Whitman.

* * * *

The Queen of Rumania has sent copies of her works to Count Tolstoy. Even if the author has no time to read them the thought that they are lying on his table will, she says, be a comfort to her. Count Tolstoy replied :—"I know the heart and the genius of the Queen who gives life by her talent to the songs of her people, and unites in the same affection the palace and the cottage. On the throne or in the midst of the people a woman's heart always has the same emotions, the same poetry, though this unhappily is not the case with men."

follows, in a letter of November 30, 1900 :—"Better l both for knowledge of the two languages and for p into the very meaning of the matter translated, e invented."

* * * *

Books to read, just published :—

"The Octopus." By Frank Norris. (Grant Richard
"The Death of the Gods." By Dmitri Merejkowski. (

* * * *

Readers who happen to be reading this paper l on their way to Switzerland may be glad to be told o buy and read, whether in the train or the hotel, when reached their destination. Let them try the new Sw "Etrennes Helvétiques," of which the first number c way in the course of a recent Swiss journey of our own vival of an old annual that used to be brought out in the century by the Doyen Bridel, who was a friend of G Lausanne, and subsequently a pastor at Montreux. T publisher, M. Auguste Bridel, is a collateral descend

* * * *

What the Doyen Bridel principally did was to events worth remembering in Swiss history. He w
"sources," and republished things with comments.
them when they were clothed in the obscurity language. He translated, for instance, Conrad Gesne of his ascent of Pilatus in the sixteenth century. T policy is similar. In the number before us are many art ling fresh light upon matters of interest. Madame Ber for example, has been through some unpublished letters Necker, preserved in the Geneva public library, i see that great lady embarrassed by the exigent dema relations. One of them wants to come and stay with how," she asks, "am I to introduce her as my relative full of people of all classes, where, to be decently d must spend at least a thousand French crowns a y to mention her breeding, her language, and a th trifles which, without negativing her merits, would g bad impression in a country where people judge by

* * * *

In another article M. Louis Wuarin illustrates life
350 years ago by means of quotations from the regi
Genevan Council. It will not be waste of space to transl his extracts. For example :—

1540.—Calvin is requested to remain here for c given a new suit of clothes.

1546.—A box of sweetmeats is given to F Bonivard, who is working at the Chronicles, and who works under him is given a pair of shoes.

Our Correspondent in Paris writes:—The telegraph brought us suddenly last week from Brittany the news of the capsizing off the Breton coast of a boat containing the members of two well-known French families which are widely known in literary circles all over Europe. Nearly all the passengers were drowned. The two families were those of Professor Marillier, of the Ecole des Hautes Etudes, and of M. Anatole Le Braz, who is to-day certainly the most eminent interpreter of the inner life of the Breton and one of the most distinguished names in French letters. By this terrible disaster M. Anatole Le Braz has lost his father and mother, his two sisters, and his sister-in-law; while Professor Marillier, his brother-in-law, although saved from the sea, is still lingering between life and death, as a consequence of exposure during an entire night on a rock lashed by the waves. It is significant that M. Le Braz's writings should have been so much inspired by the sea. The eaux traitresses of the old Breton canticle of Pol and Gildas will have henceforth a meaning for M. Anatole Le Braz which they had not even when he wrote that admirable and powerful book, "Le Sang de La Sirène."

* * * *

In a number in which we publish a sympathetic account of the proceedings at the Pan-Celtic Congress we cannot resist the temptation to quote some remarks on the same subject contributed to the St. James's Gazette by Mr. A. D. Godley:—

Erin aboo! though the desolate ocean
  Sever the steps of the exile from thee,
Why do I cry in a voice of emotion,
  "Slainte, mavourneen acushla machree"?

Lo! 'tis the National Spirit is on me,
  All in the Strand as I peaceably go,
Thinking of wrongs that the Saxon has done me,
  Dreaming afar of the county Mayo.

How shall the voice of the patriot utter
  All that his feelings must yearn to express?
Robed by a Sassenach tailor and cutter,
  Bring me, O bring me the National Dress!

Doomed by the alien his fashions to follow,
  Long at the feet of his modes have I sat:
Now for a coat with the tails of a swallow—
  Stick a dudeen in the brim of my hat.

* * * *

Mr. William Andrews writes from the Royal Institution, Hull:—

Not a few pilgrims come to see the pew where Dr. Johnson sat in St. Clement Danes. When, however, they learn that a shilling is charged to see it their interest in the Doctor is at an end. This charge has been made since 1898 when the fabric was restored, and it was expected that sufficient money would soon be raised to place immediately behind the pew a stained-glass window to the memory of Dr. Johnson. So far a very small sum has been obtained. About £140 is all that is required, and surely there should not be any difficulty in raising that amount. Could not the Johnson Club move in this matter? It seems to us a laudable object to place a memorial in the church where the great man worshipped, and nothing could be more fitting than a really good stained-glass window.

* * * *

Few readers probably know that there are the Mohawk nation living to-day than in th American Revolution. That this is the case is Mr. F. W. Halsey's "The Old New York Fron published by Scribners, a copy of which has be the Mohawks, who now mostly live on a reservati by the British Government at the close of th Ontario, Canada, north of Lake Erie.

* * *

The Mechitarist Fathers of the Armenian me Lazaro, Venice, will celebrate on September 8 a tenary of the founding of their convent and nead research and industry the learned world owes ed Armenian texts of Eusebius' Chronicon, of Phil commentary on the Diatestaron, and of several books. They have also issued magnificent le language, and made other valuable contributio letters.

A dramatized version of "Vanity Fair,"
Sharp, was produced at the Prince of Wales's Thea

Further subscriptions are needed so as to en Millenary Committee to pay for the memorial undertaken, and may be sent to the chairman, of London, the Mansion-house, London; to the Avebury, care of Messrs. Robarts, Lubbock, an bard-street, London; or to the honorary secret of Winchester, the Abbey House, Winchester.

Mr. Hall Caine has copyrighted a dramatic Eternal City."

The Institute of Journalists held its ann week at Leeds. Mr. à Beckett presided, an address on "The Purpose of the Press."

Last Sunday was Mr. Bret Harte's sixty-sec

We regret to hear of the death of Dr. Ja
Professor of Church History and Pastoral T
United Free Church College, Aberdeen.

Mr. Heinemann has written out his opin agents for publication in the next number of th will not appear until October.

The Earl of Rosebery will unveil Mr. Thorny statue at the Alfred Millenary.

Mr. Carnegie has given Dalkeith £4,000 for Richard Baxter's pulpit, at Alcester, is fo consent of the Charity Commissioners.

We read in the Gaulois that the tomb of Pe has been discovered near Rhesi.

It has been decided that Les Burgraves shall b
Théâtre Français on the occasion of the Victor H

From inquiries made by a London News sentative it appears that the booksellers of Ch have decided to take no notice of the order Westminster City Council requesting them

The Vice of Reading.

People read too much. The habit grows upon them like dram-drinking or the cocaine habit till excessive indulgence in reading matter stupefies brains that might otherwise be bright and active. Such is the thesis propounded by Mr. Howells in Harper's Magazine; and though it contradicts the generally accepted view of reading, we are disposed to give it a qualified support from the evidence of our experience as well as of our observations. We read to live, and our reading is necessarily miscellaneous; and we are familiar with a very unsatisfactory sensation which overtakes us with some regularity after a heavy day with "other new books"—good though many of them may have been—or after a heavy Saturday afternoon consecrated to the many excellent articles on all sorts of subjects that appear in the weekly papers. It is a sensation of having scattered energies which might have produced some good result if they had been concentrated; of having dallied with many ideas and retained none for permanent guidance; of having temporarily incapacitated ourselves for sustained attention or properly directed thought—incapacited ourselves, indeed, for any thought at all that is not stimulated by an impertinent preface or a piquant paragraph. And this, Mr. Howells would have us think, is the permanent mental state of thousands of our fellow-countrymen—and more particularly our fellow-countrywomen—who do not read to live but live to read; and there really seems good reason to believe that a good many of them are so afflicted. Most of us are acquainted with ladies who are "fond of reading," in the sense that they go every morning to the circulating library for novels and spend the rest of the day reading them on the sofa, to the neglect of any domestic duties that they may have. Most of us have also observed that such ladies do not, as the result of their reading, develop literary taste or acquire a more intelligent attitude towards life. Their reading does not make them think, but only makes them feel. They do not remember what they read; they do not distinguish between good books and bad books, but only between books with happy and books with unhappy endings. The same conventional situations and the same conventional characters satisfy them day after day. They have simply acquired a habit which they allow to grow on them the more readily because they think it is rather a good habit. But it is a bad habit—a stupefying, soul-destroying habit—and if Mr. Howells can shake them out of it, he will deserve the thanks of the community. His advice to them is to stop reading and talk, since "talking is really the only way to thinking"; but we question whether this remedy would in practice lead to very valuable results. For there are different kinds of talking; and when a number of stupid people get together and converse, the amount of thinking generated by the conversation may be inconsiderable. What the stupid people who have ruined their intellects by reading bad novels in large quantities really need is, of course, to be admitted to take part in the colloquies of the intelligent. But such meetings are not much more easy to arrange as a regular feature of social life than social evenings in which duchesses should take tea with washerwomen. The stupid people are apt to bore the intelligent people by telling them long stories about nothing in particular with many irrelevant digressions. Consequently, the intelligent people avoid the stupid people as much as possible. Moreover, in order to do the stupid people any lasting good, the intelligent people would have to begin by being rude to them—which is what the stupid people would not like. Whence it seems to follow that Mr. Howells' solution of the problem which he has

Literature Portraits.—XV

COUNT TOLSTOY.

Other writers deal, in this number, with Co literary genius, and with his philosophical attitude
The purpose of this paper is less ambitious—to rel recall the impressions of some few of the countless have visited the illustrious Russian man of letters.

Almost alone among the Russian writers wh cosmopolitan renown Count Tolstoy is of ancien lineage. On his mother's side he is a direct desce Michael, Prince of Tchernigof, who was martyred gols in 1246 and afterwards canonized by the Russi on his father's side from Count Peter Andréivitc known statesman of the times of Peter and Catharine collateral ancestors held high positions in the ar Civil Service. One of them was Count Osterman-T commanded an army against Napoleon, and won t Kulm in 1812. His father, Nicolas Iltich, was a tenant-colonel; but his uncle, Feodor Andreiev Senator and Privy Councillor, and his cousin, C Petrovitch, was Vice-President and Professor in t of Fine Arts. To what extent these family glories an have influenced his development and his career is question; but it seems not quite unreasonable to con it is partly because he is a nobleman that Count been able to give an appearance of distinction to e at which the world would have been inclined to case of a man of genius of humbler origin. For, as Sergyeenko enthusiastically says, "Whatever he do he runs a race with the young people, or sews sho himself on a bicycle, he never in any situation is ridi

Count Tolstoy was born at Yasnaya Polyana in mother died in 1830, and he was brought up by tw Countess Osten Sacken and Madame Yushkoff. The lady, if we may judge from Tolstoy's "Confess singular ideas as to the training of the young. S said to me that she wished nothing so much for me into relations with a married woman; rien ne for homme comme une liaison avec une femme comme il f
the later Tolstoy further writes of the earlier Tols the converted Bunyan wrote of the unregenerated Be

> I cannot remember these years without horr > and pain of heart. I used to kill people in war;
> them to duels in order to kill them; I used to lo > cards; I ate up the labour of the peasants a > them; I led an immoral life; gave myself up to > deception, lying, theft, pleasure of all kinds, d > violence, murder—there was no crime that I did no

One does not, of course, take all this quite litera written under the influence of powerful religious e in full enjoyment of the novel luxury of self-abasem is at least clear that Tolstoy in his youth made no ap tensions and had no expectation of ever making any.

He was very young, however, and the facts sh did not remain exclusively devoted to his pleasur long. In 1851 he entered the army as a Junker—a which he did a private soldier's duty, but associat terms with officers—and being stationed in the Ca already a serious literary man, and in the intervals of fighting he found time to write three sketches of Sevastopol. These were read at the Palace, and so impressed Emperor Nicholas that he sent an order to the effect that "the life of that young man must be looked after," with the result that the general in command transferred the novelist to a safe place on the line of communications.

When the war was over Tolstoy left the army and went to St. Petersburg, where he was welcomed with enthusiasm by the literary set. His views at that period—he was twenty-six—of the functions of men of letters are recorded in the "Confessions":—

> Our vocation was to instruct people. What was our instruction there was no need of inquiring; for it was admitted in theory that artists and poets instructed unconsciously. I considered myself a remarkable artist and poet, and therefore very naturally accepted this theory. I, an artist and poet, wrote and taught, not knowing what. I had excellent eating, lodging, and society. I was famous. . . . We were all then convinced that it was necessary for us to speak and write and print as quickly as possible and as much as possible, and that all that was necessary for the good of humanity.

"We" includes Turgenev, who had "discovered" Tolstoy before he met him, and expressed the opinion that "he will astonish all of us, for he is a talent of the first rank." The relations between the two writers form one of the interesting chapters of literary history. For a while they were like brothers, though the tone of the elder man was a little disposed to be patronizing. "If you do not go off on byways you will go far," he wrote. And again:—"When this young wine has gone through the process of fermentation it will be a drink fit for the gods." Then, in 1861, came a furious quarrel arising out of a cynical remark made by Tolstoy when he heard that Turgenev had engaged an English governess to teach his natural daughter. Turgenev challenged him, and though Tolstoy avoided a duel by apologizing they did not meet again till 1878. Then they were reconciled and once again became as brothers. The last letter that Turgenev ever wrote was to Tolstoy—a letter of great pathos, beginning:—

> Dear and Beloved Leo Nikolaievitch,
>
> I have not written to you for a long time for I lay and lie, in two words, on my deathbed. I cannot get well, that is not to be thought of. But I write in order to tell you how glad I am to have been your contemporary and to make my last earnest request. My friend, return to literary work. This talent of yours has come down from whence all else comes. Oh! how happy would I be could I believe that my prayer would be answered.

For between the first friendship and the second both "War and Peace" and "Anna Karenina" had been written; and, by one of the strangest paradoxes in literary history, the author of these masterpieces had come to profess a great contempt for literature. More than that. He had come to profess that he always, or nearly always, had professed it. In 1862 he had married and settled down at Yasnaya Polyana and devoted most of his time to the education of the peasant children, whom he instructed, not very successfully, from Russian translations of the Manuals of Peter Parley. Disgusted at his failure, he "threw up everything and went off into the steppes among the Bashkus." But when he came back he wrote again. This is what he says when he looks back upon the period:—

The retrospect is doubtless coloured by the later epoch. Yet it is reasonable to suppose th fifteen years, the way was being silently p subsequent spiritual revolution. Whether t was really a change for the better, and wheth doctrine resulting from it is more correctly descri or as friperie philosophique, are questions whic debated here. Those who accept it accept a very table of commandments, prohibiting tobacco, and non-resistance of evil, celibacy, and vegetarianis a creed to the effect that the sacraments are exa and that a church is an improper place in which The most wonderful thing is that the period up of this strange assortment of dogmas, should with the period in which Count Tolstoy's reput teacher spread all over the world. At first, ind admirers imagined that the phase was on "Judging from the part," wrote Eugene Sch "there has never seemed to me any reason to be present phase of mystical religious enthusiasm, Count Tolstoy is now passing, would last for th life." A Russian visitor of about the same date opinion that Count Tolstoy was "only preparing and great artistic productions." But these pre erroneous. Count Tolstoy did, indeed, go on wri it would seem, is no less a necessity of h breathing. He had definitely ceased to be definitely become a Pope. His publications mi form, but in essence they were Encyclicals.

And Count Tolstoy has been accepted as Encyclicals have been accepted as Encyclic Orthodox Church seemed afraid of him until, th Procurator of the Holy Synod took his courage and put his foot down, fulminating excommu French have, indeed, lately begun to denounce th impelled apparently by the fear lest the Russian be imperilled if they neglected to do so. "A co Maurice Talmeyr, the other day in the Gaulois, greater scourge than a Tolstoy"; and he went Tolstoys of France, whoever they may be, "Ministers like M. Monis, rags like our elector recollections like that of Panama." But his wa and not very intelligent voice crying in the w general attitude towards Count Tolstoy, whe country or outside of it, has been one of reveren adoration. Grave critics have likened him to the kind. Visitors of every sort and condition have n to his farm as to a shrine. Half-hours with To a feature of the magazines. The world knows t and bathes, and plays lawn tennis; that he tal Chronicle; that the Countess Tolstoy copies his makes his clothes; that he made a pair of disgusted to hear that an admirer kept them i that he lost his temper with a lady who, propos test for his gospel of Renunciation, asked for a t and threatened to blow her brains out if she did

One could fill a column with the names of pilgrims of this later Tolstoy period. To menti W. T. Stead, Professor Lombroso, and M. suffices to show what diverse persons are at fascinating personality. Perhaps M. Déroulède and the French are brethren, but that between them stands the German, who prevents them from embracing each other, and therefore Déroulède proposed that Prokofiy should lend a hand to squeeze the fat out of the German.

Prokofiy listened attentively, reflected, and said :

"No, master, let it rather be in this way. Do you French work, and we Russians will also work, and after our toil is over we will go to the publichouse, and we will take the German with us."

This combination did not satisfy Déroulède.

Not only visitors but correspondents pay their homage to Count Tolstoy. According to Mr. Sergyeenko, "young Russians and Frenchmen, Americans, Dutchmen, Poles, Englishmen, Baroness Bertha Suttner, and a devout Brahmin from India, the dying Turgeneev, and the highwayman Tchurkin" have all been in the habit of communicating with him regularly.

FRANCIS GRIBBLE.

TOLSTOY'S NOVELS.

I.

In order to be admitted to the immortals a novelist must do more than record the things which might have been. We look to the man of genius for a picture of the world coloured by his personality, "nature seen through a temperament." As the world is an unsatisfactory affair from almost every point of view, the great novelists have all agreed in being discontented with the greater part of it ; and the thing in common between them all is satire—discontentment barbed with wit. Tolstoy has been more dissatisfied and therefore more satirical than any.

Until he had passed middle age he was contented to be discontented, and spent his talent in laughing solemnly at the vanities of human life, in "War and Peace," "Anna Karenina," and many shorter stories. But in the seventies he grew impatient, and satire gave way to philosophy. As a malcontent, satire gave too small a return for the investment of his talent ; he betook himself to "speculation"—to theology and social science. It must be plain to every student of his works, that his point of view suffered little alteration ; he still busied himself in crying out against the iniquities of social life. But he endeavoured from that time to embody the negations of his satire into an affirmative philosophy. The merits and demerits of that philosophy do not fall within the scope of this article. I will only point out to those who disapprove of his philosophy that they need not let that disapproval spread so far as to hinder their enjoyment of his novels. Whatever they may think of his creed as a creed, there is no doubt that, regarded merely as part of his equipment as a satirist, it is a whip that cracks very merrily through the long course of his stories. For a false philosophy of life is not only better than none in a satirist, but it is almost better than a good one, if its falsity arise from exaggeration. A passionate and excessive disgust with real life adds a zest to satire, which mere reasonable disapproval can never impart. Only in the white heat of Tolstoy-Christian hatred for his kind could Tolstoy have struck off that monumental farce, "The Fruits of Enlightenment." In spite of all the aberrations of his philosophy, his art is safeguarded by that Balaam-safeguard which he himself so well explains in his article on Maupassant, where he speaks of the contradiction between the moral truth of Maupassant's stories and the depravity of the man himself.

Lermontov, Dostoyevski, Goncharov, and Turgeneev shambles one half-attractive, half-repulsive figure, as he sees himself. In the course of his [illegible] has developed on this side and on that, he has changed changing times ; but in two things he is constant. He is always dissatisfied with the world, and always with himself. "Video meliora proboque" has constant motto, and "deteriora sequor" his almost practice. In the novels of the twenties he was [illegible] unamiably selfish ; he sought relief in disobeying commandments ; he broke ladies' hearts without hav for the fragments of them ; he shot his friends at eve ate his breakfast with unimpaired appetite. In generation the hero's dissatisfaction took the form he would have liked to marry, but he couldn't be make love ; he would have liked to have a great had not the energy to put on his boots in order to seek it. Tolstoy put new life into the novel-hero, of him, married him, and knocked the nonsense

COUNT LYOV TOLSTOY

[From "Prophets of the Nineteenth Century," by permission of Messrs

He crops up in Tolstoy's novels in different mask different names, as Dmitry Olenin, as Pierre Constantine Levin, and as Prince Nechlindov. Tw that every man was a Hamlet or a Don Quixote ; found that the typical Russian embodied in himself alternation of impulse and irresolution. His discover the incompatibility of his Quixote creed and practice.

To this generation Prince Nechlindov is the phase of the hero as he appears in Tolstoy's adventures as a juryman and as a doctrinaire "Resurrection" are still fresh in the public mind not generally known that many years have passed the Memoirs of Prince Nechlindov," it is evident that Prince Nechlindov, who is little more than a point of observation, is no other than Tolstoy himself.

Nechlindov has been made the vehicle for Tolstoy's later theories of life; but Pierre Bezuchi and Constantine Levin are just as truly autobiographical—or, rather, more truly, for, like Tolstoy, they achieve final peace in a happy and suitable marriage. Nechlindov represents Tolstoy's theory; Levin his practice.

It is generally believed that every man writes best about what he has himself experienced. But, if the critic may express his own individual taste, even when it is at variance with a commonly received opinion, I should say that Tolstoy's greatness does not lie in the delineation of his heroes. Each hero is a necessary centre for the panorama in which he figures; but in every case, as it seems to me, the heroes are the least successful characters in his tales. Olenin, Bezuchi, Levin, and Nechlindov, with their ceaseless introspection, must be to some readers actually repulsive. If not, they are at any rate tedious. They write long, dull diaries, they think long, dull thoughts; in their moments of illumination the great truths which they realize are truisms, realized or unrealized, for those who are not passing through the same crisis or enjoying the same illumination; their manners are abominable; and they repel sympathy by their glowing hatred of their fellow-men. Nechlindov, in "Resurrection," positively wallows, glorying, in his hatred of everybody except the criminal classes. These men are too intimately realised by their creator, they are too much the embodiment of his own theories, too "subjective," they "smell too much of the lamp," to be of universal interest.

Tolstoy is happier in presenting his minor characters, characters which he has seen only from the outside. His intuition of what he does not know is far finer than his understanding of what he does know. There are few pieces of psychology in his works so probable as the description of the last moments of the man who is killed by a shell in "Sevastopol," or "The Death of Ivan Ilich." Stiva Oblonski, Anna's brother, in "Anna Karenina"—a man of whose nature Tolstoy knows nothing by inward experience—is a splendid creation, far finer than the carefully laboured figure of Levin, in everything but morals. Anna Karenina and all his women are delicately and strongly drawn; Natasha Rostov and Kittie Sheherbatski are as bright and full of life as portraits of busy smiling women by Reynolds. Tolstoy's women are uniformly splendid, until he begins to see them from inside too, reads his dismal doctrines into them, as in "Resurrection," and fills them with his own arrogant and repellent creed, that all other men and women are swayed only by the will of the flesh. The conscious modesty of Maria Pavlovna in "Resurrection," who "shrinks from the idea of animal love," is abominable; the unconscious immodesty of libertines like Stiva Oblonski is entertaining; for, though modesty is more expedient than immodesty, the consciousness of either is equally repulsive.

The chief value of Tolstoy's novels lies in the presentation of the world at large, of the many spheres through which his central figures move, in the contrast of the opinions and habits of large masses of men, in the satirizing of thousands in the person of typical instances. His pictures depend chiefly on their background for their excellence.

III.

In the "Cossacks" the interest of the tale is not in Olenin, the hero, who is an average dull fellow, but in the

Not only was Tolstoy a full-grown artist at the four, but he had, at the same time, a broad unde which is very rare in writers of twice his age.

The story opens in a Moscow restauran starting to join his line regiment in the Caucas friends are taking a parting supper with him.
outside. This scene of farewell serves to show Moscow "civilization," which it is the purpose contrast with the primeval simplicity of the C which the rest of the story is laid. It is a taste of t ing life of young men about town—a life which at twenty-four almost as much as he does now, come, in the remote simplicity of his country l the standard of European civilization. As Ole along the high roads to the Caucasus the meme gradually drowned in the anticipations of th ahead, like the cries of Wagner's Venusberg solemn strains of the Pilgrim-Chorus. At las in the Terek Province, to find himself a Russians. The old Cossack breed of stalwart "Old-Believers," living a life of Arcadian petty warfare against the native hillmen, loo intruding Muscovites, with their pattern-unifor discipline, their puny stature, their effem chattering with girls, and their godless habit o

For Olenin, romantic, but still modest, the two worlds takes the form of an idyll. He i Cossack Ensign's cottage, and duly falls in love daughter, the Titanic, handsome, Mariana, who him in her heart, though the strangeness of her for a while to think that she could Young Cossack Luke, brave, disdainful, slo surrounded with a glory of slain hillmen and st rival. Olenin is strong and brave, as Musco received a medal for distinguished service in hi the forces; but when it comes to fighting th hand-to-hand work, prepared with savage e himself quietly put on one side. He can hard out of the Cossacks as they ride out to do battl

"You had better go home," says Luke, "
This is not in your line."

But, in his love affair with Mariana, Olenin of success. Luke had been neglectful, and promised to marry Olenin. But when La Mariana's real feelings admit of no mistake in h

Get out, you brute! she cried, stampi approaching him with a threatening air.
expression of such repulsion, hatred, and con that Olenin suddenly realized that he had no former belief in her inapproachability was Without another word he ran out of the shed.

His only friend in the stanitsa is the rollic who has found him an interested listener a supplier of good wine. But when Olenin's depa from his audience and his wine he takes no f him. The last words of the story show how trace the young Muscovite leaves the Cossac forgotten before he is out of sight.

Olenin looked round. Uncle Eroshka Mariana, evidently about his own affairs. Ne nor the girl looked at him.

In "Domestic Happiness" written seven is another Avatar of Tolstoy himself. Tolstoy had decided at that time to retire to the tranquil pleasures of the country, far from the hum of towns; so Sergei Michailovich, his hero, longs only for peace and sunshine, flowers, philanthropy, and a wife.

> A quiet solitary life in the depths of the country, he declares as his ideal; with the opportunity of doing good to others. Then work . . then rest, nature, a book, music, and love.

During two or three years there is a breach between husband and wife, because She is tormented by the feeling of a something lacking, and seeks distraction in social success; and He too little understands her nature to teach her wisdom otherwise than by humouring her. It is the period of transition from love to mild friendship. As far as the wife is concerned, the moral is something the same as that of Balzac's "Une Fille d'Ève":—

> The perfect happiness which the first woman tasted in her earthly paradise filled her with that disgust which comes of too much sweetness. She longed to find some wolf in the fold. This, since the beginning, seems to be the meaning of the emblematical serpent to which Eve turned—probably from ennui.

That is Balzac's summary of the story of his heroine. But it sums up equally well the story of Tolstoy's heroine. Only Balzac sees what is hidden from Tolstoy; that the vain thing is not the hope of continued love, but the belief that "a wolf in the fold" will appease the discontentment which arises from a flaw in the woman's own nature, and not from any fault in love itself.

The gallantries of a foreign Marquis at a watering-place disgust Tolstoy's heroine with social success, and she and her husband kiss again with tears, in friendly jealousy over their youngest born.

Marriage seems to have worked no change in Tolstoy's ideas of marriage. He was married three years after the appearance of "Domestic Happiness," and in "War and Peace," published six years later still, we find the same order of romantic girlhood and absorbed maternity reproduced in the lamentable instance of Natasha, who from a naughty and delightful girl becomes, as Pierre's wife, a slatternly matron with no thought beyond her children. It is the idea which culminated, years later, in his Address to Women in "What must we do?" with its relentless religion of abounding maternity:—

> If you are true mothers you will not say after two children, nor after twenty children, that you have brought forth enough. . . . The more you have of bearing them and suckling them the fuller and happier will your life be.

"Domestic Happiness" is so charmingly told that the reader is almost tempted, against his better sense, to accept the philosophy which lies at the bottom of it as universally true; whereas it is true only of the characters in the story.

IV.

Until he was thirty-five Tolstoy had attempted nothing on the grand scale of the works which have made him famous; but from 1864 to 1869 he was busy on that stupendous monument "Peace and War," which was the foundation of his European reputation. The novel began to appear as a serial in 1868, and carried the critics by storm.

"Peace and War" is, in the main, mere narrative without arrière pensée. There is, in its best parts, no conscious inculfor the man; after awhile he has convinced hi—lf that is nothing but a vulgar upstart; he sees no genius in tary dispositions; he lets his own mind incline more to that belief in Fate which lies at the bottom of every nature. For my own part, I feel convinced that had it for his hatred of Napoleon—bred by continual contact own limited view of the man—he would never have his conception of Fate as the ruler of wars—a conceptio to most of his other theories of life, a conception whic more than an assertion of the feebleness of reason in th of historical problems. Tolstoy is, above all things, a g He wants to lower Napoleon, his chosen enemy, in th the world. The ascription of his successes and failure is a splendid humiliation; there is such a crushing m about it.

Napoleon is pictured as a little strutting creature, only in his imbecile belief in his own infallibility. strategy and tactics, the things—so far as Napoleon is c —are impossible; dispositions on the field of battle ar At Borodino

> They were either fulfilled before he had made else they never could be and never were fulfilled.

The Russians, we gather from the narrative, are n tight in hand by Destiny as the French; for thoug often told that the successes of the Russians were as result of Fate as the disasters of the French, yet w given to understand that Fate would have been in a p she had not had Kutuzov to discover and interpret he To restrain his troops from attacking, to deceive Nap fatal delay, to let him "stew in his own juice"—as t went—was as much the work of a military genius as t ing of centre and wings into the attack on the battlefie

The mere distribution of praise and blame to the strategists and commanders by the novelist himself a he does not really believe in the omnipotence of Fa battlefield; for, if each army but dress a predestin what praise or blame can be awarded to the commander no power to help or hurt? At times, even, the reader Tolstoy has such a masterly understanding of the design that had he himself been in command instead of Napole might have turned out differently.

General Dragomirov's criticism on the military "War and Peace" is very instructive. After To denied the existence of the art of war, there is a certai in the famous general devoting twenty pages to arguin military questions raised by the novel. In answer to question:—"How can one man's ambition fling a wh across Europe to the attack?" Dragomirov aptly dist the force of patriotism which moved the French from power of Napoleon, who checked and urged and dir comparing France to an engine, and Napoleon to it He shows that Tolstoy would not have had such Napoleon's belief in his ability to direct an army if he h what Napoleon's view of the functions of a general r Tolstoy makes Prince Andrei Bolkonski say of Kutuzo will listen to everything, and remember everything, w no good move and permit no bad one." "It is impossib General Dragomirov, "better to define the functions mander; the sentence put into Prince Bolkonski's almost word for word a repetition of Napoleon's opinion upon the same subject."

failure; it was put down with a severe hand by Nicholas I., and instead of a Constitution there came twenty of the worst years of Russian autocracy; dark years in which all that was unhealthy in the bureaucracy and tyranny flourished exceedingly, until the disasters of the Crimean War showed the Russians how rotten the whole country had become; Nicholas died of a broken heart, and a new and happier era came in with Alexander II. Tolstoy pictured his Decembrists restored to their reviving country in the fifties. His novel seems to have been projected both as a paean to the new hopes of social regeneration in Russia and a breezy satire on the wordy and academic incompetence of the Russians to realize them. But, after working at the opening of his story awhile, Tolstoy got out of conceit with his subject. He turned back in history to the very beginning of Russia's new life, to the great War of Liberation in 1812, which had broken up the pestilential influence of France in Russia, and had put an end to the pompous follies introduced by Catharine "the Great." So, by way of a national epic, he wrote "War and Peace" instead of the "Decembrists," regarding Nicholas I.'s reign as a mere episode in the general trend of Russian progress. The main purpose of "War and Peace," therefore, seems to be to picture the beginning of the new national life, to show how it rose bright and fresh, in a burst of growing national consciousness, while the mincing shadows of the old French life vanished into disrepute.

The opening of the novel seems entirely designed to picture to us the old un-national life of St. Petersburg. There is even a touch of the local rivalry between sturdy, national Moscow and frivolous Petersburg with its air of the West. Anna Scherer's drawing-room, in which the story begins, is tuned to the old foreign traditions. Pierre, with his blundering hot head, and Prince Andrei Bolkonski, with his hunger for useful activity, are out of place in that china-shop. It is a fit atmosphere for elegant rakishness and worldly scheming. The French Abbé and the French Vicomte are set in a suitable setting. The Vicomte's remark to Hippolyte, as they drive away together, is typical of the society.

> "Hein, mon cher! your little Princess"—Bolkonski's wife—"is very sweet! Very sweet!" He kissed his finger-tips. "And quite a Frenchwoman."

The old-fashioned world which throve under Catharine the Great's social system is chiefly represented in the novel by the Kuragins and the Drubetskois. Boris Drubetskoi is a classical type of the carrièrist, the man who succeeds by manners; he is a perfect gentleman, in all but essentials. His devoted mother, who does nothing for herself, but has no conscience when her darling's interests are at stake, has taught him the way of success. As a boy he shows repugnance at the deceits necessary to achieving greatness; but it is in his blood, and he soon learns the art. When Hippolyte Kuragin, after great effort, lets off a foolish joke,

> Boris smiled cautiously, so that his smile might be referred to derision or to approval, according to how the company received the sally.

Such smiles as these, backed by a graceful carriage, lead him to the very pinnacle of success; he attains high rank, and marries a stupendously rich woman, whom he hates.

The Kuragin family, father, sons, and daughter, represent the libertine side of society, in delicate gradations. When Tolstoy wrote "War and Peace," he was still able to contemplate with a cheerful air. It was plain that he co being silent with the same tranquillity fo seemed to say:—"If any one objects to th talk; it's all the same to me." Besides tha of women he had that air which above curiosity, fear, and even love in them—an a consciousness of his own superiority. His to say:—"I know your ways; you're no about. Ah! wouldn't you like it!" He actually think this when he met a woman than likely that he did not, for he was little at all—but that was what his manner and ap

The bride that he had come to look at pro
he and the governess understood one another

It was not to be expected that a pretty no definite position in the world should spen days reading to the old man and making Marie. Mlle. Bourien had long waited Prince who should see at a glance her super young Russian Princesses, should fall in carry her off; and behold, here he was.
worked out a suitable ending to a story whi told her, and she loved to repeat it to h story of a maiden led astray, at whose appeared, so pauvre mère, and reproache maidenly behaviour. Mlle. Bourien was oft as, in imagination, she repeated the story to with herself for heroine. And now he had co away with her; then ma pauvre mère wo would marry her.

The healthy side of Russian society, t rise from its obscurity and work out the represented mainly by the Rostovs and th utterly different types, the spontaneous and but both alike in their love for their country, for all that is strained and artificial. Neither is represented as perfect; old Bolkonski is the Rostovs are thoughtless children of natu
the two types nearest to the ideal.

Tolstoy is one of the few artists who whole family on a single canvas, with all the of character, so that not a figure could be ta position without marring the whole. In th resembles Jane Austen. The Kuragins, th Rostovs are perfect family groups. The pictu in their racketing hospitable house, is on a gi hosts of accessory figures to complete the com

Between the two main groups of Russian s ing link is Pierre Bezuchi, the hero. A young tendencies both to vice and to virtue, he is arrival from abroad, chiefly into contact with society. Marriage with Hélène Kuragin—a Dumbello—creates in him a disgust for w realized to be his lower self. Suffering and of the French, make a break in his life, from at last, trained to join the better, the rejuve Russian world, into which he duly marries on t wife. Natasha, his second wife, though she ru in the end, will always be one of the most of fiction. She is most charmingly describe childhood.

Natasha blushed and laughed. "How can you, Mamma! Why should you! What is there so very extraordinary?"

V.

Were it not for a certain indignation at Tolstoy's long disquisitions on the philosophy of war in "War and Peace," few readers, I think, would be disposed to allow that "Anna Karenina" stands on the same level with it. "War and Peace" deals with a much brighter period of Russian life, the buoyant awakening of the nation to its own greatness; when "Anna Karenina" was written, the disillusionment which followed on the Liberation of the Serfs had begun to work its dismal effect on Russian society. People found that the old vices and abuses still continued, for all the great hopes which the new liberal era had awakened. Moreover, there was a change in Tolstoy himself, the great change. That terrible sex problem was becoming an obsession with him; not yet in the great proportions which it assumed in later years, but enough to colour all his book.

In the main "Anna Karenina" is a contrast between the ideal and the un-ideal relations of man and woman. Immorality is already becoming identified in Tolstoy's mind with the civilization of the towns and governing classes. Young men from Petersburg are empty rakish fops; the ladies of the Petersburg drawing rooms are no better than Rahab. Those who are not immoral in this way are vain pedants and frivolers. Statesmen, metaphysicians, social philosophers, and scientists, all come in for a terrible lashing; they are parrots and machines, turning over traditional phrases. The plain man from the country is worth a roomful of them, whatever the subject under discussion. So it is with the doctors, who are only famous, like Napoleon, by chance. They have all learned the same erudite follies from the same books, and take a delight in examining young women with their clothes off. So it is with statesmen, who decide grave questions of policy for their own advancement, on the basis of statistics invented by ambitious underlings.

But though the satire of society at large is all forced and strained, to suit the author's own morbid distaste for everything but hay-cutting and snipe-shooting, yet it is all amusing. Also it is wholesome; for it throws upon civilization the onus of proving what is too commonly taken for granted—namely, the necessity of all those institutions which bring so much profit to their upholders. No doubt the novel has set many people thinking in a way that a wiser book would not have done.

In its satire upon individual types "Anna Karenina" perhaps excels "War and Peace." Karenin, Anna's husband, and Stephen Oblonsky, her brother, are characters which can never die, unless stifled by the bulk of the rest of the novel. What satire could be more light and charming than that of Tolstoy's description of the genial gourmet Oblonski's little dinner with Levin at the Café Anglais. Both Oblonski and Levin are so unconscious of the gulf which lies between them.

On the way Oblonski was planning the menu.

"You like turbot?" he asked Levin.

"Eh, what?" answers Levin, who is thinking only of Kittie. "Turbot? I adore it."

The fatherly Tartar waiter comes to look after them.

"There's some fresh oysters come in, Sir." Oblonski grew thoughtful.

"What if we alter our plans, Levin?" he asked, with his finger on the bill of fare. His face took on an earnest expression. "What if we begin with oysters and then alter face, "that I don't appreciate your discriminatio enjoy a good dinner."

"I should think so!"

Whole tragedies could not so well describe character and relation to his wife so well as the litt of the telegram after the Zemstvo election:—

Oblonski, who was in high spirits, sent his wife saying:—"Nevelovski elected majority twenty tions tell others." "It'll cheer them up, poor t said. When his wife got the telegram she sighe wasted rouble, and guessed that he had been di knew that he had a weakness faire jouer le litig dinner.

Admirable also is Karenin with his big ears (w revelation to his wife when she first notices them), wit eyes and sickly smile, with his facetious way of tal wife, and his improving way of talking to his son, "as a little boy in a story-book."

There is little of the romantic in "Anna Kare

TOLSTOY DURING THE WORKING SEASON IN THE COU

what there is is splendidly probable. Levin's roman in his student days:—

He was often at the Sheherbatski's house; and love with the house. Strange as it may seem, with t with the family, especially with the female side of the

Then he fell in love with the daughters one by one, of age, until all were married but Kittie.

The secret of contentment came to him as he lay a night in the hayfield. He had an illuminating vision of t simplicity of happiness. As he stood on the road by th dawn a travelling carriage rolled by, and behold, Kittie

Radiant and thoughtful, full of a delicate and within. The satire is too gross to win credence. Take as an instance this arrogant satire upon a whole school of kindly, conscientious, and learned men. Nechlindov wished to study the question of the treatment of criminals.

> He bought the works of Lombroso, Garofalo, Ferri, Liszt, Mansel (who is Mansel?), and Tarde, and read them carefully. But the farther he read, the greater was his disenchantment. He found what all people find who turn to science not in order to play a rôle in it, not to write, argue, and instruct, but to find the answer to simple vital questions. Science gave him the answer to thousands of deep and subtle questions relating to the criminal law, but never to the one for which he sought a solution. He asked a very simple question—Why and by what right do people imprison, torture, exile, beat, and kill other people, when they themselves are no better than those whom they torture, beat, and kill? And they answered him with disquisitions as to whether man has a free will or not? Whether one can decide the criminality of a man by the measurement of his skull? What part heredity plays in crime? Whether there is such a thing as congenital depravity? What is morality? What is lunacy? What is degeneration? What is society? What is duty? &c. &c.

All of which, one would think, are very pertinent questions, seeing that the partial solution of them has done much to revolutionize the world's punishment systems, while Tolstoy's complete solution of his own social conundrums never has done and never will do anything. And if Nechlindov was not satisfied with the answers he found in Lombroso and the rest, he might have found his own question set out in so many words and answered in a decisive way by Jeremy Bentham, whose works were translated into Russian rather more than a century ago.

If we put aside Tolstoy's taunts at civilization—of which he knows nearly nothing—"Resurrection" might pass as a lurid description of Russia seen from within; but Tolstoy claims to be accepted as a critic of the world at large, and even Russia's enemies can hardly believe that his picture is a true one.

VII.

Tolstoy's versatility as a writer is extraordinary; besides writing novels and tales, he has put himself in the first rank of critics by "What is Art" and his article on Maupassant. He has written tales and poems for children, a spelling-book, a reading-book, a temperance pantomime, a tragedy, and a comedy.

The tragedy, The Power of Darkness, was acted first in Paris, and had a success. Its success in Russia did not come nearly up to the expectations which it had aroused. After being denied access to the stage under Alexander III. it was produced by Nicholas II.'s express desire, simultaneously at two theatres in St. Petersburg, at Moscow, and in all the provinces. But the moral of the tragedy was obscure; nobody understood it aright, even when Tolstoy explained in a letter to the papers; and the peasant audiences were all on the side of the villain. The Fruits of Enlightenment is a better play from every point of view. It is a bustling farce, written in an interval of his theological studies, and it represents the vanities of town life in a most amusing form.

In one line of literature Tolstoy stands almost alone; in the writing of peasant stories, half realism, half fable. "Ivan the Fool," "The Candle," "The two Pilgrims," "Does a man need much land?" are perfection in their own kind. And that kind is one which demands unusual powers; for the stories with which the writer of a narrative like "Ivan the

RECENT LETTER FROM TOLS
MR. AYLMER MAUDE.

The following extract from a letter from ' in England just a fortnight ago, giving his vi Ruskin, which formed the subject of our sp week, is of special interest. The letter is Aylmer Maude, who kindly allows us to quote f

> "About Ruskin. . . . I have lately book, 'Ruskin et la Bible.' I think it is by l chief limitation was that he could never from the Church-Christian outlook upon life. commenced his work on social questions, wher this Last,' he freed himself from the dogma a cloudy Church-Christian understanding of life—which made it possible for him to esthetical ideals—remained with him to the e his message. It was also weakened by the consequent obscurity, of his poetic style. Do I deny the work of this great man, who has q called a prophet. I am always charmed and but I point out spots which exist even o specially good when a wise writer, in accord extracts from him, as is done in 'Ruskin et read), but to read all Ruskin consecutively, weakens his effect."

TOLSTOY'S TEACHING

From his boyhood upwards, both when l still, small voice within, and when he observe himself, Tolstoy felt, though not always with that life has a meaning and that man has p towards what is good. The intervals of dou through which he passed served to clarify certainty that morality is in the nature of th with his earliest stories, and through all his wr may notice how Tolstoy's strenuous observation him, and especially of what went on in his ow led him towards an understanding of life diffe people whose creed is a matter of geography, worked at it themselves. He could not be second-hand belief prepared and expressed for h expounders.

In trying to give a brief outline of his will be convenient to confine the survey to wo "Anna Karenina" was finished—say since 1878. explained that the purpose of this article is defend Tolstoy's positions, nor even to attempt tion of them, but merely to mention the chie written about, and to give a rough sketch of clusions he has reached, as well as of his reasons f

In "My Confession" (1879)* Tolstoy tells grasp the meaning of his life, and how unsatis the conventional answers. A law of his bein approve and disapprove of things: to discrimin and evil, and to follow after that which is go Goodness? Where can help or guidance for our The results reached in "My Confession" we led on to what followed. Tolstoy could not brush of the Church without consideration; still les and harmful, but that they are fraudulent, and that the original purpose of the fraud can be detected. The dogmas bolster up the Church; and "the Church," when we come to practical business, means "power in the hands of certain people." By inducing people to surrender their reason, and to believe what is untrue, rulers and officials of the Churches obtained for themselves advantages and authority. When the Church, in the time of Constantine, allied itself with the State (which uses violence, and causes men to be killed) it abandoned the religion Christ believed in, and substituted Churchianity for Christianity.

He next proceeded to a strenuous examination of the Gospels. If the claims of the Church needed consideration before they could be honestly accepted or rejected, equally was this the case with the collection of Hebrew and Greek literature called the Bible.

The best of the books of the Old Testament appear to Tolstoy to rank with the greatest works of Chinese, Indian, or Greek philosophy or religion. The Epistles of St. Paul do not rank so high in his esteem, but the four little booklets called the Gospels he has found more helpful and convincing than anything else in literature. The understanding of life they have helped him to reach is explained in "The Four Gospels Harmonised and Translated" (1880-82); "The Gospel in Brief" (1882); "My Religion (or What I Believe)" (1884); and "The Christian Teaching" (written later, and not published till 1898).

Briefly (and by no means completely) summarized, the conclusions arrived at in these books were these:—

We have reason and conscience ("the light which lighteth every man") to guide us forward, and we did not originate these for ourselves, but owe them to some Source outside ourselves. The clue to the perplexities of life is, that life is not our own to do as we like with, but we owe allegiance to what

PORTRAIT BY REPIN (1827).

The practical application of Christ's teachin found given with special clearness in five precepts the Sermon on the Mount:

(1) Do not be angry.
(2) Do not lust.
(3) Do not bind yourself by oaths.
(4) "Resist not him that is evil."
(5) Be good to the just and the unjust.

In a leaflet, "How to read the Gospels" (1896), us:

A great teacher is great just because he is ab the truth so that it can neither be hidden n but is as plain as daylight.

"And truth is who will Gospels w wish to kn without p above all, posing tha contain sort of wh human rea

The C known to studied t far from h sions of I are the numerable hands, an errors. T Gospels case, be production Ghost, as assert. W God woul vealed th He is said vealed th ments on I or he woul mitted th look to Mormans the case Holy Scrip we know works w and collec they wer and trans therefore we not acc infallible but we respect tr the errors we find in them. Read them, putti foregone conclusions; read them with the sole desi stand what is said there. But, just because the Gosp Gospels, which have passed through a multiplicity of compilations, translations and transcriptions, and were composed, eighteen centuries ago, by men who were not highly educated, and were superstitious.

Very likely in selecting what is, from what is not, fully comprehensible, people will not all choose the same passages. What is comprehensible to one may seem obscure to another. But all will certainly agree in what is most important, and these are things which will be found quite intelligible to every one. It is just this—just what is fully comprehensible to all men—that constitutes the essence of Christ's teaching.

In reading the Bible, or listening to the claims of the Churches, one must discriminate between faith and credulity. We must not accept the schoolboy's definition that "Faith is believing what you know to be untrue." Credulity is believing things you have no sufficient reason to suppose true; it is not a virtue but a fault; faith is holding faithfully to what our reason and conscience enable us to perceive of the reality of things. We must not fear to trust our own judgment. The justification for thinking with our own heads is that we have no one else's to think with.

Tolstoy's acceptance of the advice:—"Ye have heard that it was said, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth; but I say unto you, Resist not him that is evil: but whosoever smiteth thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also" is explained in the works above mentioned and yet more fully in "The Kingdom of God is Within You" (1893). It means that the use of violence among men is bad; that we should influence one another, not by physical force (nor even by unkindly compulsion stopping short of violence), but by appeals to man's higher nature: his sympathy, affection, and reason. It has been said in reply to this that even if the text bears such a meaning, and even if the advice accords with the main drift of Christ's teaching and example, yet the advice is nevertheless unsound, for experience has shown that the use of violence is beneficial. And Tolstoy would admit that if the arrangements of society—Governments based on violence, wars, executions, protection of property by force, &c.—are satisfactory to man's highest aspirations, then the precept quoted is a foolish one. His position may be elucidated by taking a parallel case:

We are advised to shun lies and to be truthful. This, he would say, is a valid precept, and needful because it is sometimes difficult to know how to speak, and we all need guidance for our conduct. Yet cases arise in which a man may not see his way to speak the truth. A feeble old man asks me about his daughter's conduct. If I tell him how she has behaved it may bring his grey hairs with sorrow to the grave. Am I not justified in telling a lie? And does not it follow that truth is not better than falsehood? And that we can have no principle to guide us in choosing between veracity and mendacity? In regard to all such sophistries Tolstoy replies that our reason and conscience, faithfully used, are sufficient to enable us to discern principles for the guidance of our conduct; though we, and the society in which we live, may be far from living up to the principles so discerned. Truth, for instance, is better than falsehood. And the two being opposites, you cannot cultivate your character towards both sincerity and duplicity at the same time. Circumstances may arise in which it seems to you better to lie. But we never really foreknow the ultimate consequences of any action, and in such a case it is not wise to say "I did right to lie," but rather "Owing to my limitations I did not see a way to escape lying." (Truth remains desirable need a general principle which will serve u perplexed.

It is, however, time to pass on to o
With the economic problem Tolstoy deals in must we Do?" (1884-85), a trenchant sequel to Slavery of our Times," appeared last year. He "charity organization," money collecting activ belief that expenditure (including charitable entertainments, bazaars, balls, &c.) can supply th poor. People are fed, clothed, and sheltered by labour. Economically speaking, what a man proc service he renders to others, goes to his cres consumes (were it but a crust of dry bread) goes
The more a man takes for himself, and the less he others, the more of a burden he is to society.
that what he consumes was left him by his father
by a friend does not alter the case.

Examining the fact that now, as in former age are able to consume much while they produce lit while producing much can hardly keep for necessities of life, Tolstoy came to investigate money, and arrived at the conclusion that the or justification of violence in the hands of certai
"Government"—who, by the use of force, mai the private ownership of land and property, an system—have reproduced in the modern world th of ancient slavery. In both cases the many lab natural, healthy, and free conditions, but un imposed by those who own the slaves, control th or have the money, the land, or the property.

"Life" (1891) reminds us that besides wha objectively (i.e., all that can be known by the s also a subjective consciousness of the moral law must distinguish between our lower nature as an higher nature which leads a Socrates to sac existence for the sake of goodness. This is religion. Within our animal personality the sp the chicken grows within the shell. To trans from the lower to the higher nature is to be " lay hold of "eternal" life. The things which at most real, are evidently perishable: they d deceive us. But death and physical destruction to a Socrates, nor do they threaten that wh important. We should shift our centre of gravity which is temporary to that which is permanent.
save his life shall lose it." Tolstoy makes n personal future life, nor even of the transmi (which seems so plausible). For we should be very criminate between conjectures and knowledge. We matter, as in mathematics, confine ourselves stric
"necessary and sufficient"; and the "necessary is the recognition that though we live, as animals and elusive world in which no permanent succe yet we also have a spiritual nature dealing wit there is no reason to suppose that goodness disap the Divine spark within us which responds to i than goodness itself. Life is always in the present we must find out whether it is the material or th to our perception is the more permanent and real

The same year (1891) saw the publicati misunderstood "Kreutzer Sonata." "What,
Do?" had ended with an appeal to mothers

The "Kreutzer Sonata" should be read with the "Afterword" which explains its intention. By putting his views into the mouth of a man who had murdered his wife out of jealousy, and had been acquitted on the ground of insanity, Tolstoy was enabled to express his view with extreme force and trenchancy. The side he wished to express being the one usually burked, he preferred to put it in this aggressive fashion. Though, of course, he had not ceased to know that sexual relations (like war and commerce) have played, and are playing, their part in the education of mankind, he felt no need to restate the side which has been put forward in the literature of all ages and countries, and even in some of his own previous writings. On the contrary, he felt that a desire which is already far too strong is being continually strengthened by works of art, and he set himself strenuously, and even fiercely, to evoke those deep instincts of our nature which, whether in Buddhist monk, in bring you to grief to almost. You must not be so growing too rapidly, or of defeating the ends of food by perfect too soon! "They that are whole need not

If you are entirely satisfied with the life you are living ask for no guidance. Philosophy and religion are req for people whose lives are not already perfe fundamental feeling the task seeks to conve sexual relations however inevitable and natural they man's animal self), from the moment a reasonable liberately seeks them as a means of pleasure, become to our higher nature. They are instinctively carr secret, and we cannot even imagine to ourselves the li of a Christ.

"The Kingdom of God is Within You" (1893) ha been referred to as dealing specially with "non-re and war. The most resolute upholder of himself as a — Никита! крикнулъ онъ.

Никита долго не откликался. Василій Андреевичъ вслѣдъ за нимъ велѣвъ скрипящій задокъ, сталъ будить его.
— Никита, иль замерзъ? — Никита пробурчалъ что-то. — А я хочу верхомъ ѣхать.
— Напрасно, Василій Андреевичъ проговорилъ Никита, не из-мѣняя своего положенія. — А-ха, съ усиліемъ выговорилъ Никита Слушай васъ, дураковъ. Что-жъ, пропадать такъ, ни за что! — и Василій Андреевичъ подошелъ къ лошади и сталъ отвязывать ее.
Отвязавъ лошадь, онъ перекинулъ поводья на шею и хотѣлъ вскочить на нее, но сорвался. Тогда онъ всталъ на сани и хотѣлъ съ саней сѣсть. Но сани покачнулись подъ его тяжестью и онъ опять оборвался. Наконецъ въ третій разъ онъ опять подвинулъ лошадь къ саняхъ, сталъ на край ихъ и сдѣлавъ усиліе вскочилъ такъ, что легъ брюхомъ поперекъ спины лошади. Полежавъ такъ, онъ посунулся впередъ разъ два и наконецъ перекинулъ ногу черезъ спину лошади. Справившись онъ потянулъ за одинъ поводъ, лошадь пошла отъ саней.
Никита съ тѣхъ поръ, какъ сѣлъ покрывшись дерюжкой за задкомъ саней, сидѣлъ неподвижно. Мысль о томъ, что онъ можетъ и даже по всѣмъ вѣроятіямъ долженъ умереть въ эту ночь, пришла ему въ то время, когда онъ усаживался за санями. Хотя ему еще было тепло, потому что онъ много двигался, лазилъ по сугробамъ, но онъ зналъ, что тепла этого хватитъ не на долго, а что согрѣваться движеніемъ онъ уже будетъ не въ силахъ, потому что чувствовалъ себя сильно усталымъ. Кромѣ того, одна нога его въ прорванномъ сапогѣ остыла и онъ уже не чуялъ на ней большого пальца, и онъ чувствовалъ сонливость, которая онъ зналъ была признакомъ замерзанія.

Facsimile of corrected proof from "Master and Man"

Catholic nun, or in Puritan censure of worldly art, have never ceased to protest against the belief that sexual pleasure is morally good.

The fundamental thought of the "Kreutzer Sonata" is this: Mankind need guidance in their sexual relations as on all other matters of human conduct. The definite regula-of non-resistant principles you ever met may have turned another man out of his house by the scruff o

But the truth of a principle is not invalidated by hun tions. A straight line may be desirable and conceivat no man ever drew one. It is well to know whether the have to draw is meant to be straight, whether your

of "beauty" precise enough to enable us to use that word profitably in defining art. We must base our definition of art on something itself clearly definable. Art deals with the transmission of feelings; science deals with the transmission of thoughts. The form of art has nothing to do with morality, and may transmit feeling helpful or harmful to mankind. But in appraising the "subject-matter" of art—i.e., the feelings made current by art—our view of life inevitably causes us to approve or disapprove. Tolstoy affirms that the true and potent "religious perception" of our time is that of brotherhood; "the well-being of men lies in their loving union with one another." He would have science show us how to apply this conception to practical life: in so far as they neglect to do this scientists neglect their duty. Art is best in form when it most completely does its work of uniting men in the feeling expressed. The further it carries—the more people it can influence—the better. In subject-matter it is good when, by touching our common nature, it unites us in feelings not harmful: it is excellent when it unites us in feelings better than we shared before; but it seems to us bad when it makes current feelings that run counter to our "religious perception." The connexion between art and non-resistance is this:—

> Through the influence of real art, aided by science, guided by religion, that peaceful co-operation of man which is now obtained by external means—by our law courts, police, charitable institutions, factory inspection, &c.—should be obtained by man's free and joyous activity. Art should cause violence to be set aside.

Following this came "Resurrection" (1899), the only long work of fiction written by Tolstoy during the last twenty years, and one faithfully reflecting his mature opinions on all the great problems of life. That conveying, as it does, feelings (on such subjects as army service, legal proceedings, church services, marriage, &c.) which run counter to those which have grown up and become general in connexion with our established order of society this book should, nevertheless, have had a great success in many lands is an instance of the power with which literary art can sway the hearts of men.

Space forbids that I do more than allude to Tolstoy's many articles and essays dealing with the use of stimulants, with vegetarianism, patriotism, manual labour, the famine, the Doukhobors, and many other subjects. All of them show his profound conviction that the primary guidance for our life lies, not in what is outside us and reaches us through our senses (as is generally implicitly or explicitly affirmed among materialists, church people, worldly people, and spiritualists), but that the essential thing is to "know thyself," or, as George Fox said, to hearken to the "inward voice."

Those who wish to get at the spirit of Tolstoy's teaching should read his works in the way he says all books should be read. "One must first choose out the parts that are quite clear, dividing them from what is obscure or confused. And from what is clear we must form our idea of the drift and spirit of the whole work." And the clearness to be looked for is, he would add, the clearness which comes from correspondence with the best that the reader is himself able to feel and to perceive.

Tolstoy does not claim to set an example of right living. Man's reason can always reach beyond his present attainment. The Pharisee may be satisfied with himself, but the sincere and

COUNT LEO TOLSTO

A "Personal Vie

By E. A. BRAYLEY HODGETT

In all times and in all countries great have exercised two separate and distinct influe result of their work, the other that of their often find that these are unequal; that in personal influence predominates, whilst in othe alone that tells. In other words, there is a dua mind, two separate things which yet together intellect and the character. In English litera has perhaps been nowhere more forcibly dem the cases of Oliver Goldsmith and Dr. Sam Oliver Goldsmith it might be said that, w character at all, the work of his brain will surv Dr. Johnson, on the other hand, is principally picturesque and typically English figure, wh force appeals to us far more than his ponderous

Count Leo Tolstoy combines a strong pe immortal genius; but what is curious is th public are concerned, the development of his in that of his character. Some twenty years ago Tolstoy meant to the Russian people simpl "Anna Karenina," "War and Peace," &c., but t of that name conjures up to the Russian m figure of a great literary magician, but also personality. Count Leo Tolstoy, from being a l become a national force. We shall presently se of that force lies in his nationalism. Every Tolstoy in Russia, who knows his "activity," f is before all things a Russian. It is as a appeals to Russia. His religious opinions, his even his curiously Socratic attitude toward political and social questions—all these things selves have little influence were they not typically national a form. Tolstoy is a Russia and an artist afterwards. In his dual character artist he resembles Ruskin, and to me, wh privilege of knowing personally both these g always seemed curious that they should resembled each other, and yet have been so both in their work and their appearance. observer on first beholding Tolstoy would start, this is Ruskin!" Here are the same marvellous beautiful and thoughtful expression—an expre not seem to be of this world, but has someth ethereal about it, a spirituality which, while so to be almost palpable, is nevertheless subdued, veiled, to protect it from the coarse and vulga head, the picturesque tangled hair, the el reminiscent of the Greek philosophers—all t ugliness which only accentuates the beautiful mind, the priceless gem in which it is rudely set. In manner also Tolstoy suggests Ruskin—there is the same air of absoluteness about him, an intense sincerity which rejects all temporizing, and a majesty of demeanour wholly unconscious and involuntary, but very real to mortals of mere ordinary human clay, who feel that the atmosphere of those giants is different from that which they breathe themselves, more rarefied, purer. But what always struck me most about Ruskin and Tolstoy was a peculiarity common to them, and possessed also by Mr. Gladstone—a sort of gentle fierceness, if I may be allowed the expression, a visible leonine courage, a steel-like flashing of the eye, combined with a softness and kindliness of disposition almost childlike. You felt that the wisdom of the serpent and the harmlessness of the dove had met, and yet you felt that you could not be so very sure of the harmlessness. Was it not Burke who said that admiration was akin to fear? In one particular, however, Tolstoy stands head and shoulders above anybody I have ever met, it is in his great simplicity: there is positively no "side" of any kind about Tolstoy. His humility is real and unaffected, in every word and movement you feel the man is genuine, is never thinking of the impression he is making on you, but only occupied with the things and ideas he is discussing.

It is beautiful to see Tolstoy surrounded by his family, to see how he is treasured by them, but nevertheless treated not like the genius, whose fame has literally filled the world, but like the good old papa that he is, whose whims have to be wisely humoured, but who must not be over-indulged. He is simply worshipped by his wife, who by the way is a lady of a very remarkable force of character and beauty of face. In the family life of Tolstoy there is an absence of the theatrical element; the dominant note is human. But Tolstoy's family life requires no description from me; it is familiar to the English reader.

When I was a boy in Moscow Tolstoy was a name only, he had not yet become a personality, but already people were beginning to place him before Turguenev. It is a platitude of criticism to say that foreign readers are very much in the position of posterity and form a truer estimate of the value of literary work than contemporaries of the same country. There is just enough truth in this to make it dangerously plausible. Merit and popularity are not always interchangeable. Neither Shelley nor Browning, for instance, could afford to base their claims to greatness on their popularity; yet to deny them greatness would be so obviously absurd that no discussion of these claims is needed. Turguenev was an international writer; Tolstoy purely Russian. Perhaps comparisons of this kind are odious, but in the Russian mind the two geniuses are as Platonic affection. The framework of Schiller's th mental horizon—was identical with the geographical his country. Turguenev was international. He m unpopular in Russia by refusing to be a partisan.

Olympian heights, he laughed, like the gods in Orpheus, at the absurd frailties of the poor little his own country who were distraught by polemics wit had no sympathy. Work and study seemed to him these mortals chiefly needed before they ventured to settle the vexed questions which had perplexed hum time immemorial. But Russia is a young nation resented this severe attitude. Turguenev laugh Nihilists and her Panslavists, and refused to take them
Russia revenged herself by branding him as a reno Turguenev was sincerely patriotic. He foresaw th into which his country was blindly plunging, and warned her against them. His country did not und parables and disowned him. Tolstoy never experie trials. He always has been essentially and typicall although even he is not in sympathy with the polit of the various parties into which his country is div nevertheless purely national, and sees all questions,

SPECIMEN OF COUNT TOLSTOY'S MANUSCRIPT.

social, from the point of view of his own country Tolstoy's later phase, his religious period, is an outcome of this intense nationalism. To understan sonality of Tolstoy we must know Russia; we must what is the main idea underlying all the Nihilis Panslavism, all the peculiar manifestations of the natio

That idea the student of Russian literature and th have no difficulty in discovering; it is intimately asso the recent rebirth of the country. If we take a bird's of the social history of Russia, we shall be struck by central fact, and that is that the modern history of Ru history of the Russian peasant. And it must be s pause for one minute to consider what Russia is, country of a hundred millions or so of people of whos majority are peasants. These peasants, by their work the vital forces thanks to which Russia lives. T

Europeanizing tendencies was to make Russians ashamed of their origin. They wanted to be Europeans, hence the peasant was despised as a barbarian. This attitude was unnatural. All Russia's great men rebelled against it. Two centuries elapsed, and European ideas got such a hold of Russia that the peasant was emancipated from serfdom. This very act of emancipation, which sprung from European liberalism, brought about, illogically enough perhaps, a national reaction. The peasant was a man and a brother, but he was also a Russian. He became the object of worship. Russia had tired of European masquerading, she was longing to be herself again, a sort of nostalgie de la boue came over her, and in her admiration of the peasant she divided herself into two camps—the Nihilists and the Panslavists, the Radicals and the Jingoes.

At this crisis of her national life there burst upon the Russian firmament a meteor in the shape of a great personality. It was Tolstoy. Like all great geniuses, he was unconscious. He does not even to-day know his own national significance, but he had only to appear for all Russia to recognize him.

As I was saying, when I was a boy in Moscow Tolstoy was purely a literary artist, a romancer, but his national significance had already been recognized although it had scarcely been articulated. Here was a man with Russian ideals, who described Russia with an obvious love for his country. In every line he wrote he betrayed his contempt for foreign forms. They were exotic, and sat uneasily upon those who adopted them. His characters showed this. His honest people, his sincere men and women, were Russians, the others vainly strove to hide their heartlessness and frivolity under a veneer of foreign culture. There was nothing morbid about all this; it was strong, healthy, sound, and clean.

Let us remember that Tolstoy comes of one of the oldest Russian noble families, that he has spent his life in what is called good society, which, as Mme. Sarah Grand lately said, is not the same as smart society. Let us remember that his wife is a typical Russian lady, that they belonged to that very high layer of the Russian social strata where English is spoken in preference to French, and we shall understand what Tolstoy meant to his public. Here was a count, a man of title and of ancient lineage, moving in that mysterious and small set which we absurdly call the world, a man who did not write like a Scribe and a Pharisee, but from actual knowledge, a man who had served his country in the Crimean War, a "swell" in short, to put it vulgarly, who was actually in sympathy with the national aspirations of his time, and this not merely sentimentally but practically, for this was a man who understood his peasant as thoroughly as he did his gentleman. Naturally such a man was received with open arms. He had no political views, no theories; he was simply an honest Russian gentleman, who loved Russia, and Russia loved him.

Let me pause one moment to explain a peculiar feature of Russian letters. Owing to the existence of a very strict censorship, politics, as such, are not possible of discussion in the Russian Press. Therefore, the political pamphleteer must politician. Tolstoy is a man, and one of th Russia to-day, but he hates all "isms."
sympathy with the Nihilist as he has with th hunter. But, what is more, Tolstoy loves loves it so blindly that he does not see its defect works the reader will search in vain for any sp of the Russian people, the Russian Gover society, or of Russian officials. What he says is Governments, all society, all officials. Conc loose in England. Would he not scourge u again? In his latest work we find that all th animated by a sincere desire to do their duty ception of their duty that is wrong. This is the Russian public has forgiven Tolstoy f religion." The reading public of Russia are given to the discussion of religious topics.
orthodox religion in Russia, just as there is Government. There is consequently no sco differences. Hence so many Russian men of int irreligious. People who make much professio suspected of ulterior aims. Thus when Gog humorist, took to religion, and renounced his his sincerity was doubted, and his contem kicked him off his pedestal.

But Tolstoy has not lost caste by becomin the contrary, he has grown enormously in p consequence. But this is entirely due to tw one being that his religious views were the di nationalism, they were but the spiritual expres put it, of that remarkable attitude towards the taken by most educated Russians. Withou Tolstoy has done an enormous service to th movement, by unconsciously giving it the religi it previously lacked, and without faith it is impo mountains. Tolstoy, even in his religion, rem Moreover, he suddenly developed a personality.
public into his confidence and confessed his re them, he was only a great artist; to-day he is great and interesting personality. We in Eng be able to understand what splendid courage w make that confession of faith. Tolstoy ran th persecuted by the orthodox and tabooed and Liberals. At first it seemed as though this was fate. But his personality has saved him. H courage of his opinions, and in a country where is shut down, and people are sharply divided i camps, Tolstoy has fearlessly spoken and, pleadi for the peasant, whom all Russians, of whatever s pity, he has dauntlessly braved the frowns officials, as well as the flouts and sneers of t people. Moreover, he has shown that it is religious convictions without being a place-hunt server. He has thus slowly won for himself admiration of all classes, from the Emperor down

Nevertheless, when the name of Tolstoy is mentioned in Russia to-day it does not bring to the mind so much the author of great and lasting works, as the man, the active philanthropist, the whole-minded, sincere Russian worker, who has endeavoured under very unfavourable conditions to carry out in his own life the tenets of his religion. Whether people sympathize with these views or not, they cannot help admiring the noble spirit of the man who holds them. But, more than this, his practical philanthropy has endeared him to the Russian people. Nobody has forgotten his splendid unselfishness in the year of famine of 1891-92, and his non-political championship of the cause of the oppressed ever since. In the present popularity of Tolstoy we see the triumph of a great personality over adverse circumstances that might well have proved too strong for a less vigorous character.

SOME MOVEMENTS IN VICTORIAN POETRY.

VI.—RETROSPECT AND PROSPECT.

The Pre-Raphaelite movement, with its rich and varied train of neo-romantic experiment and association, was the last clearly-defined development in Victorian poetry. Thereafter there was much poetical activity both strenuous and fruitful, culminating perhaps in Tennyson's remarkable volume of "Ballads" in which, at the ripe age of seventy-one, the leader of the singing band revealed himself as ready, like his own Ulysses, to essay new achievements in the very twilight of natural energy. There were not wanting, moreover, certain organized efforts towards literary departures and revivals, which seemed at times likely to mature into definite and prevailing fashions, but passed away without realizing their own expectations. All these changes are interesting and symptomatic, but their influence was too restricted and their development too early checked for them to take rank with the wide and representative movements which were responsible for the very character and course of Victorian literature.

Looking back, then, for a moment at the changeful field we have been traversing, we see that these representative movements are closely allied, not only with the development of national thought and character, but also with each other; rolling up, as it were, like waves, and following, not as direct results one of another, but as simultaneous and related consequences of powers and energies underlying and transcending themselves. For, though it has been necessary to treat them in sequence, it must be remembered that all these movements overlap one another, and interact contemporaneously, so that there is an unbroken chain of interest and activity. Doubt and faith exist side by side, presenting the same problem for solution.

> Stern law of every mortal lot!
> Which man, proud man, finds hard to bear,
> And builds himself I know not what
> Of second life I know not where.

Then to the vain hedonism which so often springs from a tired agnosticism, the poet of a stronger faith replies:

> Fool! All that is at all
> Lasts ever past recall;
> Earth changes, but thy soul and God stand sure;
> What entered into thee,

different spirit from the poets of the eighteenth centur having this essential characteristic in common with t its interest is human rather than philosophical. It however, in a time of alternating emotions, it soon los hold. The movement, which sprang from sincere enthu poignant sympathy, dissipates itself in a complete method and purpose, and Art again takes up its parabl

> Beauty is Truth: Truth beauty,—that is all > Ye know on earth, and all ye need to know.

Poetry again calls its followers away from all questions, away from the contemplation of suffering and again, as so often in the recurring history of art, exquisiteness of form and fervour of mood as the only an the sick unrest "which men miscall delight." The Victorian Poetry is the history of all art; the same ele underlie it. On the one side the spirit of beauty, on the spirit of humanity; on the one side Æsthetics, on Ethics. By whatever names the two spirits, conte allied, may be called, their hold upon poetry and the of their claims in the evolution of art are as old as hu and the secret of all literary movements, viewed m ally, is found to lie in their relation to this perpetual

But while the one main problem—the relation of ar —runs, like an undercurrent, beneath all poetical ac surface of the art presents from time to time a kal panorama of change and diversity. Nor has the devel poetry been in any sense arrested since the re-asser old truth by the Pre-Raphaelites; on the contrary, the the last twenty years has presented many interesti and suggested many expectations for the future. There in the first place, many off-shoots of the new romantic little revival of the Celtic spirit in poetry, of which rather too much has been made by current criticism, is unconscious, development of the Pre-Raphaelite broth shares with the earlier movement the pictorial qu imagery, and derives from it, no less certainly, that te vagueness and mysticism which is not always free from of becoming inarticulate. Of the poets of the younger few have a truer sense of beauty than Mr. W. B. none have served poetry better, by example, in keepi of contaminating influences. Still, it is possible to the absorbed pursuit of beauty, that art, followed excl the sake of art, is apt to revenge itself by lapses into ov and some of the recent attempts towards an English symbolism have seemed to lack the sincerity without living art has ever subsisted. This was always the ri æsthetic movement, and it has become clearer in s subsequent developments. Just as the emotional tend ran itself into hysteria, so the purely æsthetic grown, in certain directions, too deliberately artifi directly the artifice is apparent, the work fails in its ship. The perfection of art lies in the harmony of su treatment, where beauty is so beautifully expressed tha and expression seem inseparable.

Poetry, of course, can never be the popular form expression; it is, in its essence, an aristocratic art, a well to set up its bulwarks against the advance of de For whenever poetry has been given over to the ser purely popular movement it has always failed to pr dignity. It is inevitably influenced by main currents o but it never espouses the feverish causes of the multitud loss to itself. But that a certain aristocratic aloofnes workman, so delicate and elaborate in finish, as almost to seem amongst the self-conscious artificers of poetry. But familiarity with his work will assure the reader of its quintessential artistry. He has almost no affectations; his choice of the exquisite epithet is sure and unforced; he is absolutely free from rhetorical effort or showy effect; his work is at once simple and subtle, undemonstrative and of growing charm. He appeals exclusively to the trained lover of poetry, and this has kept him from anything like popular acceptation, but he has sustained the classical spirit in a period essentially unsympathetic to classical simplicity, and his example has been highly healthful and beneficent. It is a good sign that he is now, after long and honourable activity, beginning to find followers of his own; for Mr. Laurence Binyon, for example, promises to preserve the tradition with no uncertain note. And it is highly important for the future of poetry that the classical tradition—the tradition of dignity and beauty without pose or affectation—should be preserved, for without it poetry has considerable dangers to encounter.

The characteristic tendency of the last twenty years has been, it need scarcely be said, towards the democratization of literature. The spread of education has evolved an entirely new public, for whom literary interest of some sort or other has to be provided; a public gathered from the class that has hitherto read nothing, for the simple reason that it had not learnt how to read. The temptation is naturally great for literature to direct her appeal towards this vast and noisy multitude; material success, fame, and popularity are, to a great extent, in its hands and ready to its bestowal. We do not say that there is not still as large and as select a body of admirers of pure literature as there ever was; but it is indisputable that the sudden rise of this infinitely larger and infinitely more insistent public has almost completely silenced the voices of literary taste and judgment, and the advantages of the wider appeal are naturally appreciated by the artist. The question is, Will poetry be affected by the popularization of literature? And, if so, what course will it take? Poetry, it is true, is not really to the public taste but might not, perhaps, some compromise be effected with the austerer forms of art, and by its means a kind of poetry be evolved, which should indeed have its relation to true poetic principles and yet be at the same time popular in tone and topic?

Some such compromise seems already to have been achieved. When Mr. Rudyard Kipling's vigorous, tuneful, and vivacious "Barrack-room Ballads" took us all by storm ten years ago, it is doubtful whether there was a single critic in England who was not more or less carried away by them. Criticism, however conscientious, is always inclined to enthusiasm over something new; and here was novelty and to spare, breathless, virile, full of high spirits, and essentially British. There was humour, there was real power, there was not even lacking a broken fugitive sense of beauty, as in "Mandalay," which showed that this surprising new genius was not entirely a spirit of fire. But what was really the most characteristic and suggestive quality of the work was its singular adroitness in weaving into the fabric of verse words, expressions, and phrases of the very scum and off-scouring of the language, so that what is rather clumsily called "actuality" seemed wedded to art in a swinging melody which every ear could catch, embodying a sentiment with which every man could sympathise.

"'E rushes at the smoke when we let drive,
An', before we know, 'e's 'ackin' at our 'ead;

No one can be insensible to the verve of such its thoroughgoing vitality, its force, its sense virility. No one can question Mr. Kiplin individuality, his stake in contemporary perhaps, after ten years, it will not be reckone for past pleasure if we begin to appreciate tha influence, if it were extended indefinitely, altogether salutary to the progress of poetry.
elementary; his melodies jingle and jangl hesitate (if we may apply a popular phrase to a play down" to the lowest of human qualities. S popularly accepted, could not be sound either intellectually. Indeed, it starves all the hig expense of virtues mainly superficial and animal

It would not be accurate to say that Mr.
much influence as yet upon current poetry, alth denied that there are signs that his example under the surface. Of the purely imitative verse such large quantities every year, an astonishin tion is inspired by the Kipling tradition a limping travesty of the Kipling manner. Ma music-hall songs—to a vast public the only "po are modelled on the same fashion; and, so fa possible to verse, the author of "The Absent-is unquestionably the popular poet of the time were now to be democratized, it would certainl example.

It is highly improbable, however, that change is affecting the most aristocratic form a reference to the history of poetical enthusiasm not encourage one to think that an influence o very lasting or very penetrating. It is the p that, though its phases are poignantly affected it recovers very quickly from purely temporar that there is never wanting a reaction agai in a perilous direction. What is called the politics may be, and doubtless is, the political future; but it is not a movement that appeals to the service of art, and it cannot be said to with poetic enthusiasm. And the reason t recently undergone any marked poetic moveme this: the ideals and interests of the last twent so increasingly material that poetry has turne into contemplation and self concern. Upon th little to add to the achievements of the past; indecision and vacillating experiment has prevention of progress. Typical of the of the time, for example, is a poet of the W. E. Henley, who, possessed of a strenuous personal force, is yet at one time revealed as a realist, at another as an almost sentimental i while he has moods which declare him a moder reserves his most constant loyalty for the id period and the adventurous life of the swashbuc Stephen Phillips, a poet whose work is marked and not a little power, ranges indecisively thro and touches at one moment the unrest of moder at the next to a class of poetic drama which, vidual traits, is both in ideal and interest wid contemporary influence.

Under the circumstances of the present ti to revert from topical themes can scarcely venture into the dangerous thickets of prophecy, where criticism is always likely to lose her way. Sufficient unto the day is the evidence thereof!

Victorian poetry, we said at the outset, has been neither gay nor buoyant; but, as a nation grows to maturity, there are more fitting qualities for her literature than light-heartedness and childish vigour. And the poetry we have thus briefly considered should leave us with associations very sincere and very intimate, since it was the expression of natures which felt deeply and saw far. As life grows more complex in a crowded community, its expression becomes naturally more nervous and intricate; and, of the many moods to which a modern man is subject, there is perhaps none which he will fail to find reflected in some quiet corner of the poetry of his time. To say this is to say of poetry all that contemporary criticism could demand; and for that "final judgment" which the future is to pronounce, we must leave the last word to those who will be further removed from it in sympathy, and so better able to judge it dispassionately. And yet it is fairly safe to surmise that the last word will never be said!

ARTHUR WAUGH.

THE PAN-CELTIC CONGRESS.

This gathering of the five Celtic-speaking peoples—the Irish, Highland Scots, Welsh, Manx, and Bretons, which, but for the Boer war, would have taken place a year ago in Dublin, was held last week in the Irish capital under the presidency of Lord Castletown, of Upper Ossory, its original projector. But for the tactful initiative of this popular Irish leader and the ardent energy of Mr. E. E. Fournier D'Albe, whose linguistic studies in the five languages have constituted him the Pan-Celtic go-between, one could hardly have conceived of such a Congress being brought off at all. But, thanks in the main to the efforts of these two men, it has met in large numbers and with striking success.

Now, what common bond has thus united the Presbyterian Scot and the Welsh and Manx Nonconformist, the Breton Catholic Loyalist and the Irish Catholic Nationalist? What has made them agree to differ on the religious and political questions which are such burning ones at home and meet for common counsel at "The Ancient Concert Rooms," surely a name of good omen for a Congress of the representatives of the most ancient tongues still spoken in Europe? The true cause is not far to seek. These smaller races have been all and almost simultaneously engaged in a struggle for the preservation of their languages and, therefore, of their native literatures.

Wales with the least ground for immediate fear of such a loss has been first in the field in its resistance, now happily successful, to the threatened Anglicizing of its younger generation through the refusal of a so-called British Government to allow the old British tongue to be the main language of the schools in the Welsh-speaking district. We say "happily successful" because the event has proved that the bilingual method of teaching in these schools is largely responsible for the increasing intelligence of the scholars. Gaelic Ireland and Scotland are engaged in a similar struggle, and whether they emerge from it successfully or not will largely depend upon the leverage of such popular organizations as Wales and Brittany have established. [illegible] remains the idealist, the poet, the minstrel, the v[illegible] nature. The old world virtues, as the old world spe[illegible] folk tunes and folk lore, are his, and whatever [illegible] religion is destined for his shores—Methodist, Calvi[illegible] Catholic—it finds him receptive of its influence.

The public Press has made the different Celtic Nat[illegible] cognisant of the linguistic and economic struggles ge[illegible] Celtdom, and to these now may be added the recent a[illegible] what remarkable literary and musical revivals which ha[illegible] especially in Ireland and Brittany, for the Eisteddfod [illegible] a successful institution in Wales for years past, and ha[illegible] suggested much to the Bretons and Irish in the organi[illegible] their own renascences. Lord Castletown was, therefore, [illegible] in welcoming the other Celtic nations in these words [illegible] hour has struck when the Celts must meet. We are all s[illegible] upwards; the mere fact of unity gives strength. I k[illegible] those who are not with us to-day yet feel we have give[illegible] and power to the Celtic cause. Let us, then, stand [illegible] to shoulder, helping each other to keep alive the lo[illegible] that is beautiful, simple, natural, unaffected, life-giving [illegible] songs and music that owe nothing to the music-halls [illegible] history without political rancour, and preserving lege[illegible] speak of old days and a dress that marks us out [illegible] many."

But to deal more particularly with Lord Castletown's [illegible] While in no sense claiming the position of one of the l[illegible] the Celtic movement, he admitted that the idea of [illegible] Celtic Congress was his own. The movement was not n[illegible] intellectual one. We must not in precise knowl[illegible] antiquarian research, in the re-establishment of our [illegible] and our literature, lose sight of our spiritual well-bein[illegible] this I mean the better higher part of our nature must [illegible] vated, not the mind only, not the head, not the heart [illegible] spirit, and I say this because in this I believe we shal[illegible] greatest beauty of our Celtic inheritance. Not to the [illegible] Celt is it given to live his life easily; the joie de vivre i[illegible] in spite of the reputed gladsomeness of the race. Out aw[illegible] West one rarely hears a laugh. The Celts are a stran[illegible] people, as you of Brittany know, and you men of the Sc[illegible] Welsh hills. To reflect, to muse, to know oneself an[illegible] wisdom of the ages, this is power; to idealize, to learn [illegible] the old in the midst of the modern, to love the spirits o[illegible] that breathe only to the few, this is to stand a bulwark [illegible] the paralysing commonplace of these latter days."

Lord Castletown then called attention to the undou[illegible] that the Celtic races stand out pre-eminent in religious the[illegible] of one type of Christian teaching, but of all types. It [illegible] objected against the Celtic movement that it has n[illegible] literature to feed it. This Lord Castletown stoutly di[illegible] by reference to the writings of the great Irish scholars [illegible] of letters of the past, as well as to the modern Celtic au[illegible] and it may be here stated incidentally that there is [illegible] through Irish, English, and Continental libraries Iris[illegible] literary material enough to fill from fourteen to sixteen [illegible] volumes with poetry, history, and romance. No doubt [illegible] it is crude in form and bombastic in expression, but [illegible] incomparable accumulation of material for minting into [illegible] artistic form.

Ireland has no current literature to speak of, thou[illegible] are signs of this development of the Irish literary rev[illegible] the Anglo-Irish writers of the day have not only fall[illegible] the Celtic charm, but have introduced Irish methods [illegible]

from about 100 to 200, and there are many villages, in which little but the newspapers had been read, where a serious study of Irish has sprung up. Coincident as this Irish movement is with the literary and linguistic movements in Wales, Brittany, and Scotland, and even in the little Isle of Man—Lord Castletown sees, in the immediate future, a revival of Celtic learning and language. "I must not," he went on, "allow myself to dwell upon the prospect—the conquered older races conquering the conquerors, the old spirits of the Celtic wanderers coming again from the blest land where they have slept so long, the people of the green forest releasing the long imprisoned, long enchanted rulers of old from a thraldom so light, yet so insistent, and the scattered people united again for the good of the countries they live in. Fairy hosts enshrouded in the Island's story in days gone by—Will they desert us in the latter days, or will they guard us still if they see us not unmindful of the days of old? It is the murmur of the river, the scent of the glorious heather, the wind among the birches, the changing of the cloud and sun over the summer-clad hills that tell me of that long gone fairy host, of the purity of the Celtic thought, of the religious teaching of nature, and of that belief in immortality which led so easily to Christianity. All this crescendo of original soul knowledge belongs to our race. It is for us to strengthen it, and to give it to the world. Let us all strive to know our history in the past in order that from the faults of the past we may flee, and that from the strength, the endurance, the poetry, and the patriotism of our ancestors we may each in our various countries help to build up a commonwealth of Celtia as her worthy citizens, whilst on the horizon of our minds there ever appears and disappears the fitful vision of the Isles of the Blest, where one day there will be a grand reunion of the faithful hearts of all the sea-divided Gaels."

This point of view will no doubt be received with an incredulous smile by the general reader, unacquainted with what Celtic literature and art have done in the past and are doing in the present; and it may provoke some resentment, perhaps, from the ten thousand cultivated folk, qualified to form an opinion on art and letters, according to Mr. Yeats, who regard both as Anglo-Saxon, not having been at the pains to inquire how much of the Celtic spirit Anglo-Saxondom has absorbed or is absorbing. And no doubt the Pan-Celts have pushed this point of view a little rudely, but they do not speak without authority. In the matter of art, Mr. Thomas, the Welsh art-critic, in an interesting paper showed that until recent years it was not admitted in this country that such a thing as Celtic art existed—so-called Celtic art in this country being really derived from the Roman and Byzantine schools. This prejudice has been set aside chiefly through French excavation and investigation, and now there is a fairly clear succession recognized in Celtic ornament, whether inscribed on stone or metal or parchment or moulded in sculpture, jewelry, or weapons. Professor Geddes, after pointing out that two of the latest British art influences were Celtic, or at any rate due to Celts, William Morris and Edward Burne-Jones, explained the plan upon which a modern Celtic school of design is being fostered in Scotland, largely under Mr. Duncan's guidance.

But the most remarkable pronouncement of the Congress related to the general question of the present condition of Celtic studies and came from a German, Professor Kuno Meyer. According to him Celtic studies have never been in a more flourishing condition. The number of students, native and devoted to the subject, "La Revue Celtique. States Celtic studies are beginning to take Professor Henneberry was engaged upon Columbkille and early Irish Sagas and collected and published. The Professor sou Scotch for not being as active as even the Ma an utterance somewhat resented by Mr. S doubt in face of the fact of the recent p Alexander Carmichael's scholarly and alt "Carmina Gadelica" and his own rec journal "An Bard." Of modern Celtic influencing English literature under Gaeli Yeats, Mr. Douglas Hyde, Mrs. Tynan Hinkson as well as Dr. Sigerson and Fiona McLeod, known, nor should the two Standish O'Grady Dr. Todhunter or Miss Eleanor Hull. The speak, of Celtic literature, said Professor only quicken the interest in the Celtic li benefit those nations themselves. All that w overcome ignorance and indifference. He nev man or woman who was not proud of their na men and women, who did not think them, ought, the best and noblest and fairest in the love would spring the wider and greater Irel and faction. He did not despair that even would be a contented citizen of that greater the time would come when he and men like hi of that precious inheritance of their nation noble literature, which was the envy of other would form the basis of a union for all Irishme or creed. It had been said in Scotland that and Burns and the much-abused Macpherson, the Highlands and the ballads of the Lowla love of their native land, had been more poten reunion of hearts and hands than the he machinery of party politics. To such a confidently look forward for Ireland, and the that proud and honoured place among the na which was hers by right, and which a unreasoning fate had so long deprived her of German Celticist, Professor Zimmer, added might be got out daily and yet little would them to the general student unless a biblio literature were published.

In the matter of music, the Breton dele Jaffrennon, Vallée, and others detailed what t their folk songs, no less than 900 of which hav parties of musicians and men of letters who w the country collecting, singing, and playing the that within a few years some 500 airs had bee Fels Ceoil, the Irish Musical Festival, from the and fiddle playing of country folk, or through phonograph. The Manx have collected 250 t island, and fifty of these have been harmonized are now being freely sung about Man, whe of the old airs had been confined to the ver are also being collected and arranged and Mod, the Highland Music and Literary Fe held.

The resolutions passed at the plenary me the Congress were practical and sentimental that a committee should be selected from

CURRENT LITERATURE.

MEDIÆVAL EUROPE.

THE CLOSE OF THE MIDDLE AGES, 1273-1494. By R. LODGE, M.A., Professor of History at the University of Edinburgh. (Periods of European History, III.) (Rivington. 6s. n.)

In attempting to compress the history of Europe in this period into a volume of moderate size Professor Lodge has undertaken what he justly terms a task "of almost superhuman difficulty." It was essentially a period of transition, during which the nations of the modern world were in the making; while the two great unifying centres of earlier days—the Papacy and the Empire—had lost much of their power for good or for evil. The author does not claim to have solved the difficulty to his own satisfaction; but we think that he has achieved such success as is really attainable. The conciseness which is indispensable in a work of this kind never disturbs the flow of a lucid and orderly narrative. Sometimes his brevity may be tantalizing to those who wish to know more on particular subjects, but for the benefit of such readers he has appended a bibliographical note, which is a useful guide for more advanced study. The chief disadvantages of his method of allotting separate chapters at different epochs to each of the States (or rather geographical divisions) with which he has to deal are that it entails considerable repetition, and that the mind's eye is continually being drawn away from one field of view to another. We are far from saying that this is a defect which could have been avoided. Yet perhaps, by the device of longer chapters, some subjects, as the condition of the Empire after the death of Charles IV. and the history of Italy in the fifteenth century, might have been presented in a more compact form; while the domestic development of the Italian Republics within the period might have been treated in a single chapter. We may presume that the history of Great Britain is by the plan of the series deliberately excluded, except so far as it touches that of the Continental States; and yet a chapter on the general, and the commercial, relations of England with the Continent would have increased the usefulness of the book.

Professor Lodge is especially well equipped for writing German history; and his chapters on the reign of Charles IV. and on the rule of the Teutonic knights in Prussia do something to fill a gap in our literature. His eulogy of the Emperor Charles strikes us as rather overstrained, for, in the words of Gregorovius, though "a powerful prince and an excellent ruler in his kingdom of Bohemia, Charles IV. made himself contemptible in Italy." It is true that the days of the Empire as an effective force in Italy were numbered; and Professor Lodge makes it the peculiar merit of Charles that he recognized and accepted the fact. But he did not confine himself to the northern side of the Alps; he intervened constantly, though feebly, in Italian affairs; and we must not forget that the chaotic state of the peninsula was largely due to the circumstance that the Imperial authority was neither vigorously exercised nor wholly withdrawn. Unlike his predecessors, Charles seemed anxious that the Pope should assert himself in Italy, and he did much to promote the return of Urban V. from Avignon. But he did not, as Professor Lodge says, "personally escort the Pope to the Eternal City" in 1367. He promised to do so, but characteristically arrived in Rome more than a year after Urban had peculiarly involved the narrative is always clear and follow. A most valuable feature of the book is the genealogical tables at the close, and there are four maps. It is impossible within our limits to do full this work. Perhaps a defect in it, which some may merit, is the large proportion of space allotted to central Europe, with the result that the outlying receive much less attention. Poland, for instance, exactly ignored, but there is no reference to her history; while Russia is entirely omitted, and yet her ing to national life under Ivan III. falls within this on the main lines of his subject Professor Lodge is home. The chapters on the Italian States, on the Papa on the Hanseatic League, on the fall of the Eastern Em on the Renaissance in Italy are models of luminous and writing, and if all the subsequent volumes of this are as well executed as the present in many respects difficult of all—the series should fully attain the editor, which is "to present a comprehensive and account of the general development of European history.

Mr. Gladstone's Finance.

"There have been since the Revolution" says Mr.
Buxton in MR. GLADSTONE—A STUDY (Murray, 5s. n. great Finance Ministers—Walpole, Pitt, Peel, and Gla
His book confines itself to this single aspect of Mr. Gla career and character, which can very well be apart from his career as a whole. Mr. Buxton has high opinion of the subject of his study as a Chancello Exchequer. "He was," he writes, "a financial Hammer, which, with equal facility and equal revolutionize a Tariff or modify the duty on Dice." remarked that a Finance Minister who is incapable of detail as well as of occasionally taking a broad view of singularly little use to the country. What Gladstone doubt, accomplish was to make his Budgets intelligible interesting; he made Finance a subject of which the large could appreciate the importance. Mr. Buxton's in substance the same as two articles from his appeared recently in the Fortnightly Review.

An Advocate of Cremation.

Sir Henry Thompson deserves to be highly congr upon the appearance of a fourth and considerably edition of his MODERN CREMATION (Smith, Elder, 2s.), his advocacy of the practice of cremation has alwa linked with the most earnest endeavours to secure an ment of the law of death-registration. And the work now a wholly satisfactory monograph, well arranged, trated, and well indexed. Passing over the earlier cremation—its universality among the Indo-European with scarcely a reference to the "bronze age," or, inde display of the learning which he is usually supposed to Henry deals most exhaustively and impartially with the of opinion as to cremation which has taken place in teenth century. This change is largely traceable to Ital of science. At the great exhibition at Vienna, in 1873, P Brunetti, of Padua, exhibited those results of his which brought to a practical conclusion theories
Henry Thompson had long shared, and in the Contem
Review for January, 1874, the public identification great English surgeon with the cause of cremation

the cause began to advance. Cameron's Bill for regulating cremation was defeated, but in 1885 the society took the matter into its own hands, and the practice became more frequent. One of the advantages of cremation as performed at Woking is that care is taken to verify the fact and the causes of death; two certificates from medical men are required, and the society takes care to deal with those gentlemen directly.

Nothing need be clearer or more reasonable than Sir Henry's recapitulation of the arguments in favour of cremation. "Out of sight, out of mind," is terribly true in general of the sources of much of the unhealthiness of cities. It might serve for family motto to the evil influences of graveyards; whereas, if all the negroes in Jamaica were cremated to-morrow, and all the resulting ashes arranged in ventilating glass cases in the local museum, they would not affect the health or offend the senses of one visitor to that institution.

FICTION.

Miss Adeline Sergeant.

The circulating library demands such writers as Miss Adeline Sergeant. Her work requires no careful reading. She finds an adequate story and sets it forth with considerable skill. There is, as a rule, little concealment of design; the tiro can see what is coming afar off, and need not worry herself about remembering dark hints that may have been dropped in the earlier chapters. Her books, in fact, make excellent reading for the indolent on a summer's day. Of the two now before us A GREAT LADY (Methuen, 6s.) is considerably the better. It is a short novel—not quite three hundred pages of big type—and although the pathos is insisted upon rather unnecessarily, it is a pleasant and complete little love-story. Miss Sergeant likes to take her characters from the aristocracy. We have a duke and duchess in "A Great Lady," but we descend to Sir James and Lady Rockingham in MY LADY'S DIAMONDS (Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.), which may possibly account also for the diminution in price, for the latter is the longer book of the two. To tell the truth, "My Lady's Diamonds," though easy enough to read, is not profoundly interesting; it is a detective story of the ordinary type, and Miss Sergeant's objection to mystery-making is not altogether the best equipment for this kind of work. During a "heat wave," when the intellect is more than commonly drowsy, it might serve its turn. In this book there is no pretence at character-drawing; in the other Isbel and Erminia, and perhaps even Anthony Scholes, the music-master, are differentiated from the rest with some attempt at rudimentary psychology. Both books are fair examples of current fiction; in the race for oblivion we imagine that "My Lady's Diamonds" will win by a short head.

A Dutch Interior.

It is always refreshing to come across a novel dealing with some time and some country not too often handled before, provided that the novelist can persuade the reader that he, or she, is a competent guide into the undiscovered region. THE DOMINIE'S GARDEN, by Imogen Clark (Murray, 6s.), takes us to New York not long after it ceased to be New Amsterdam, when the Dutch element was still strong enough to have its own churches and its own schools, and when there were many still who looked upon the use of the English language as a mournful

An Unreformed Rake.

The invention of a single character through a series of short stories (each c often very useful to the modern novelist. D employed this method with great success, not Holmes, but with Brigadier Gerard; and M Captain Kettle has become a household wor of Francis, second son of the late Marquis related by Mr. Marriott Watson in THE CHANCE (Methuen, 6s.), will not be so popula are very agreeably, pleasantly, and diverting touch of the "Dolly Dialogues" about Mr. and there is less of that affectation of style t his work. It is a pity that he could not Francis Charmian's social experiences wit his volume. As it stands, it is padded length with a short story having no connex The nine little love affairs of Lord Fran reading to make us wish for more. It is a p illustrated.

Mystery and Crime.

Mr. Fergus Hume has long since master veying "thrills," and he succeeds in doing t OF EMERALDS (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.). H on mystery—a search for a missing man who hands of the subjugated Incas of Peru, wher score of other white men, he is compelled to captors in their magnificent buried city, ha mountain," which is really a volcano. The Rider Haggard in the portrayed splendo civilization, in the contrast between the im the Indians and the "twentieth century-ness" who fall into their hands, as well as in the m superstitions of the citizens are played upo clearly been at great pains to master the stitions of the Incas, and has used his ferti tion with great success. The volcanic erup the hero from his terrible but beautiful pris described, with its tumbling mountains and A proper "love interest" is deftly interwo impressive story of adventure.

From the same author we have A (Jarrold and Sons, 6s.), a melodramatic story plot and plenty of sensational incidents. Th figure in it largely, especially a couple o gaol-birds who might have stepped out of the Mr. Hume is not strong in portraying femin his heroine, who is dragged down to poverty a worthless brother, does not move us. But the book marks a distinct improvement on so earlier work.

In spite of a melodramatic style, and a chapters on an effective "situation" as managing the curtain at a theatre, Mr. John us in his story PACIFICO (Smith, Elder, 6s.) a in its genre. The action not only never fl but it is maintained at a stout gallop from sta Captain Charlton once arrives at the littl Santa Celestina—and not much time is was there—he finds himself entangled in a we grows more and more complicated up to the

are two persons done to death in the first fifty pages, so that one is inclined to wonder how the characters will hold out if such a death-rate is going to prevail throughout. However, the author is less lavish of murders later, though not of thrills and tortures, in the contrivance of which he displays a terrible ingenuity. The book is exceptionally clever of its kind, and though written in an execrable "snappy" American style ("he was full to the brim of excelsior") compels the reader to "see it through." Without its picture the cover would have been attractive.

THE ADVENTURES OF TYLER TATLOCK, by Dick Donovan (Chatto and Windus, 3s. 6d.), is "the very pine-apple" of illiterate gullelessness. Mr. Tyler Tatlock is represented on the cover in white boots, gazing piercingly at two birds and a large cloud, seeking what he may "detect." He is the usual infallible clean-shaven individual with a "smooth, dulcet voice," which gives vent to the usual oracular utterances. "A man has a much better chance of getting at the bottom of an apparent mystery if no one suspects that he is prowling about" is the sort of thing with which he impresses his clients, his eyes, the while, being "seemingly hidden by a frown." His victims, when handcuffed, remark "Remove these signs of infamy!"

CORMAN, by Constance Smith (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.), like its author's other novels, is a well-built, well-written story of decided interest, if no particular inspiration. The Curé of St. Quentin is a sympathetic figure and his ardent young brother a picturesque one. The idea of evidence in a murder case that cannot be used because it has been heard under seal of confession is not new, but always helps a dramatic effect. The old servant, Jeanne Marie, is prettily drawn, but she is not without a touch of the conventional "family retainer."

In DEACON BRODIE (Chatto and Windus, 3s. 6d.) Mr. Dick Donovan presents us with a string of villainies. It relates to one Deacon William Brodie, an eighteenth-century town councillor of Edinburgh. But there is little eighteenth-century atmosphere in the book. One virtue, however, Mr. Donovan reveals—he has not attempted to make a hero of this specious Deacon, who finally ended his life on an Edinburgh scaffold. The book is not quite the romance of crime it might have been; the pigments are so strongly put on that the whole is almost one lurid glare.

In Maori Land.

"Alien's" new novel, ANOTHER WOMAN'S TERRITORY (Constable, 6s.), is not, as one might suppose from the title, concerned with one woman's dealings with another's husband. In fact, the meaning of the title is rather difficult to understand. The book is a sort of ghost of Anstey's "Giant's Robe." It is well written, though it does not tell us much that is new of Antipodean matters. Still one could have easily done with less of the long-winded talks of "Sawyer Thomas." Howard Grey, a clever off-cast of genius, despairing and partially soured at his being so, goes roaming discontentedly in Maoriland. There he meets Caroline and Frank Osmond—brother and sister isolated from the world because the former has served a period of imprisonment for forgery. These two are well-drawn characters, Frank especially.

LIBRARY NOTES.

The Library Association began its annual conference on be taken. The collection might form a nucleus of a historical associations in which the neighbourhood is rich

The sister institution to the public library the museum is always in need of popularizing and we welco appearance of the Museums' Journal. The new perio conducted by experts intimately acquainted with museu their work, and those to whom museum and mausole interchangeable terms may learn much from it.

The Aberdeen University library committee des acquire books and pamphlets written or edited by gradu alumni. They have addressed an appeal to former stud present to the library copies of such works. An attempt to be made towards forming a collection of literature rela or printed in the northern counties of Scotland.

The reference department of the public library at stead will commence its work in the autumn better eq than the majority of its neighbours. Ten thousand v selected from a larger collection have been purchased, an include many works on local and Kentish history. In ad the library has received a gift of a large number of maps, and pamphlets relating to the county.

The Brighton library committee, after a tour in sear system, have issued a recommendation that the fiction se the lending department shall be worked by the ind while borrowers shall be allowed access to all other cl literature in the new library buildings. This attempt to two opposed systems will be watched with interest. Th mittee state that they wish to encourage the reading o other than fiction, while not condemning the intelligent novels.

It is proposed to establish, as memorials of the late Victoria, public libraries at Batley, Yorks, and for the p of Neston and Parkgate, Cheshire.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

The more important of the sixty odd volumes incl Messrs. Longmans' autumn list have already been announ us separately, the most notable addition being "The Re tions of Sir Edward Blount, 1815-1901," jotted down and ar by Mr. Stuart J. Reid. Sir Edward was British Consul the closing weeks of the siege of Paris. Among other b Messrs. Longmans' list may be mentioned "The Oriental Cl Hanover Square," by Alexander F. Baillie, with illustra "Roman Africa: An Outline of the History of the Occupation of North Africa," by Alexander G F.S.A., with maps and illustrations by the author; "S Essays" by Dr. Richard Copley Christie, ex-Chancellor Diocese of Manchester, edited with a memoir by Dr. Shaw; "Selections from the Writings of James A Froude," edited by P. S. Allen (new volume of the Silver Li "Henry Schomberg Kerr: Sailor and Jesuit," by th Mrs. Maxwell-Scott, of Abbotsford; "The Catholic from Within," by Lady Lovat, with a preface by the C Archbishop of Westminster; "The Great Deserts and of North America," by Paul Fountain, with a preface by Hudson; "The Book of the Rifle," by the Hon. Fremantle; "The Traitor's Way: a Story," by S. Yeats; "The Failure of Success," by Lady Mabel H and Mr. Lang's Annual for 1901, the "Violet Fairy Book.

Warwick," by Mary E. Palgrave; to the Master Musicians Series, "Mendelssohn," by Stephen S. Stratton; to the Mediæval Towns Series, "London," by H. B. Wheatley, "Siena," by R. Langton Douglas, and "Cairo," by S. Lane-Poole; to the Haddon Hall Library "Shooting," by A. Innes Shand; to the Miranda Library "Shakespeare's Heroines," by Mr. Jameson, illustrated; and to the Temple Cyclopædic Primers, "A Primer of Physiology," by Dr. A. Hill; "Northern Hero Legends," by Dr. Otto Luitpold Jiriczek; "Northern Mythology," by Professor Kaufmann; and "Greek Antiquities," by Professor Malsch.

While the authorized edition of "Hymns Ancient and Modern" is undergoing revision, Messrs. Sonnenschein are preparing a collection of "Alternative Hymn Tunes," together with others in constant request. It has been edited by the Rev. C. W. A. Brooke, under the supervision of Dr. William Crosse, Organist and Composer to the Chapels Royal, and Dr. E. W. Naylor, the organist of Emanuel College. Next month the same publishers will issue a volume on "Paganism in the Christian Church," by the Rev. W. J. Wilkins, who has written several works on "Hindu Mythology," "Modern Hinduism," and similar subjects. He aims at pointing out a resemblance between the Hindu and Roman Catholic religions. Next month Messrs. Sonnenschein will publish the new volume of their Social England Series—"Chivalry," by F. W. Cornish, Vice-Provost of Eton; "The Ethical Philosophy of Sidgwick," by F. H. Hayward, M.A., Lecturer in the University of Cambridge Day Training College; "Selections from the Works of C. Fourier," translated by Professor Julia Franklin, with an introduction by Charles Gide; Clara Tschudi's new biography, "The Empress Elizabeth of Austria," translated by E. M. Cope; and "Psychology: Normal and Morbid," by Dr. C. A. Mercier, Lecturer on Insanity at the Westminster Hospital Medical School, and the author of "The Nervous System and the Mind," "Sanity and Insanity," &c. Sir Mountstuart Grant Duff's "Victorian Anthology," already announced in Literature, will probably be ready in October. The remaining works in Messrs. Sonnenschein's autumn list include a translation of R. de Maulde la Clavière's "L'Art de la Vie," by G. H. Ely; the concluding volume of Mr. Meakin's trilogy on Morocco; "Schools at Home and Abroad," by R. E. Hughes, H.M. Inspector of Schools; and a new edition of the glossary which forms the tenth volume of Dyce's "Shakespeare." The glossary has been edited by Professor Littledale, of the University College of South Wales.

Reprints.—Among the autumn books for the Temple Classics announced by Messrs. Dent are:—Goldsmith's Poems and Plays, edited by Mr. Austin Dobson; Reade's "Peg Woffington"; and Dante's "Purgatorio" (Italian and English). Another series, "The Cloister Library," is announced by the same publishers—under the editorship of Mr. A. R. Waller, who has edited several of the volumes in the Temple Classics—beginning with Sir Arthur Helps' "In the Cloister and the Crowd, and Companions of my Solitude," with photogravure frontispiece. Other probable volumes for the new series are:—Thoreau's "Walden"; "Thoughts of Pascal"; Petrarch's "Conflict of my Passions"; Digby's "Broad Stone of Honour"; Coleridge's "Aids to Reflections"; "Confessions of an Enquiring Spirit." Other reprints to come from Messrs. Dent—apart from "The Temple Bible," the illustrated edition of Thackeray, edited in thirty volumes by Walter Jerrold, the new Hazlitt, and the new edition of Boswell's Johnson, which have already been announced—are the "Love Letters of Napoleon and Josephine," with notes by H. F. Hall, showing the events which were taking place as the letters were written; a selection of Petrarch's "Familiar Letters"; the "Temple Brontë," uniform with the "Temple Austen," in twelve volumes; and Lane's version of the "Arabian Nights," in six volumes, with a selection of the popular stories from Dr. Scott's version, and a hundred photogravure illustrations by S. L. Wood.

Messrs. Methuen announce the following reprints in their "Little Library":—Thackeray's "Christmas Books," and "Esmond," both edited by S. Gwynn; Dickens' "Christmas Ward," edited by Ernest Fletcher, a feature number of hitherto unpublished conversations

Messrs. Macmillan, whose new editions Kingsley have already been referred to in Lit two additions to their "Library of English Works of Oliver Goldsmith, containing 'The Vi the Plays, and the Poems,' edited by A. W. P Christmas Rose, and other Poems," by the Rev. —and the following volumes for the "Ge series:—"Marcus Aurelius Antoninus to Hi by Dr. Rendall, Head Master of Charterh House of Atreus: being the Agamemnon, Libe Furies of Æschylus," translated into English Morshead, M.A.

Books to look out for at onc

"Mary Queen of Scots, and who wrote the Cask Cowan. 2 vols. Low. 28s. n.

"A Yeoman's Letters." By P. T. Ross. Simpkin.

"From Cyprus to Zanzibar." By E. Vizetelly. P

"The Romance of Religion." By O. and H. Vivian.

"The Earliest Inhabitants of Abydos." By D. R University Press. 10s. 6d. n.

"A Coming Revolution." By Captain Petaval, R.E.

"Love Idylls." By S. R. Crockett. Murray. 5s.

"The Year One." By J. Bloundelle-Burton. Methu

"Royal Georgie." By S. Baring-Gould. Methuen.

"Cardigan." A novel. By R. W. Chambers. Const

"Stephen Calinari." By Julian Sturgis. Constable.

"Strange Disappearance of Lady Delia." By Louis T

"The Darlingtons." By E. E. Peake. Heinemann.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND RE

BIOGRAPHY.

ANSELM AND HIS WORK. (The World's Epoch Makers.) 251 pp. T. and T. Clark. 3s.

A PERFECT PRINCE. The Story of England's Thousand Years 7¾×5¼. 132 pp. Stock. 3s. 6d. n.

FICTION.

A SPIDER'S WEB. By Mrs. A. Goudiso. 7½×5. 254 pp. R

CASH IS KING. By W. A. Reid. 7¾×5½. 338 pp. Drane. 6

GYDA, THE GOTH. A Story of Constantinople. By E. W Burleigh. 3s. 6d. [1066 A.D.]

CHRIST AND ANTI-CHRIST. No. 1—The Death of Merejkowski. Trans. by H. French. 7½×5. 263 pp. Con

HISTORY.

L'EMPIRE LIBERAL: Études, Récits, Souvenirs. Vol. VI. 4¾×7¼. 647 pp. Paris: Garnier Frères. Fr. 3 50.

[This is the sixth volume of the great work on the Napoleon III. a famous Minister has been writing now fo volume deals with Poland, the Elections of 1863, and the work of modern history is more eloquent than this; but more critical precautions.]

THE STALL PLATES OF THE KNIGHTS OF THE ORDE 1348-1485. Part IV. By W. H. St. John Hope. Constable.

MILITARY.

THE MILITARY MAXIMS OF NAPOLEON. Trans. by D'Aguilar, C.B. 5¾×3¾. 190 pp. Freemantle. 2s. 6d. n.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A REGISTER OF THE MEMBERS OF ST MARY MAGDALE New Series. Vol. III. Fellows, 1575-1648. By W. D. Macr Fruude. 7s. 6d. n.

[Carries us to the time of the expulsion of the Royalist m

NATURAL HISTORY.

SHELL LIFE. (The Library of Natural History Romance.) By 414 pp. Warne. 6s.

[A popular book for the uninitiated, describing 650 specie

POLITICAL.

THE POVERTY OF INDIA. By Dadabhai Naoroji. 8 schein. 10s. 6d.

[Contends that the present system of government is destr suicidal to Britain.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITI

ALFRED THE GREAT. By T. Hughes. 7½×5. 316 pp. Ma

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 251. SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 7, 1901.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

NOTES OF THE DAY 217, 218, 219
"LITERATURE" PORTRAITS.—XVIII.—Walt Whitman 219
ROME IN RECENT FICTION.—A "Personal View," by Dora Greenwell McChesney 227
INNS AND BOOKS, by Edward Thomas 228
THE DRAMA, by A. B. Walkley 229
CURRENT LITERATURE—
Armenia: Travels and Studies 231
Louis Claude de Saint-Martin 232
From Cyprus to Zanzibar—The Story of King Alfred—Alfred the Great—Sea and Coast Fishing—His Majesty King Edward VII.—Miss Marie Corelli—More Mistakes We Make—Works of Lord Byron—Cassell's Illustrated History of the Boer War—Manual of Medicine—A Century of Law Reform—In Memoriam Harriet Menrecoffre—Robert Browning as a Religious Teacher—Everybody's Paris—The "Chicot" Papers—Two Norfolk Villages—The Parish Churches of Northamptonshire 233, 234
The Supreme Crime—Sawdust—Sir Hector—Trewern: A Tale of the Thirties—Tales from Natal—The Fate of Endilloe—The Burden of an Honour—In the Shadow of Guilt—A Sore Temptation—The Nana's Talisman—The Broad Road that Stretches—The Presumption of Stanley Hay, M.P.—Nobler Than Revenge—The Great Noodleshire Election 234, 235
AMONG THE REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES 236
THE LIBRARY ASSOCIATION 237
CORRESPONDENCE.—Literary Agents—Knights of St. John—Wiltshire Words—King James II.—Deacon Brodie—The Forthcoming Edition of Hazlitt 237, 238, 239
AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for 239
LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS 240

NOTES OF THE DAY.

In next week's issue we shall publish a special portrait of William Morris, with an account of his life and work.

* * * *

Books to read, just published:—

"Mary, Queen of Scots." By S. Cowan. Sampson Low.

"The Romance of Religion." By Olive and Herbert Vivian. Pearson.

"The Snares of the World." By Hamilton Aidé. Murray.

"The Octopus." By Frank Norris. Grant Richards.

* * * *

Fifteen hundred books which formerly belonged to the Compiègne Library, and are now at the Bibliothèque Nationale, are to be taken back to Compiègne for the use of the Tsar during his visit. His Imperial Majesty is also to be entertained with stage plays; and in this connexion it is interesting to recall the dramatic history of Compiègne.

* * * *

A theatre was planned in the original design of Louis XV.'s architect, in 1738, but none was built; and it was Louis Philippe who had the tennis court altered into a theatre, capable of holding an audience of 700, on the occasion of his daughter's

The dramatic preferences of the Imperial couple elevated as they might have been. The Emperor di care for anything but farce, and the Empress did care for anything but melodrama. They preferred quite minor theatres, like the Porte Saint Mart Variétés to stimulate their tears and laughter. had to drop hints that it was necessary for their pop they should at least simulate an interest in the liter So they sent, from time to time, for the players of th Française; and the saddest stories are told of the ch tion accorded to this company. Flaubert's fri Bouilhet, was particularly distressed because, Conjuration d'Amboise was produced at Compiègne, most distinguished audience, including Prosper Mér Sandeau, Sainte-Beuve, Octave Feuillet, and Théophi a Chamberlain came behind and required the pre whole of the third and half of the fourth act to b because the Emperor was bored. His equanimity partially restored when the Emperor, after yawning t curtailed performance, sent Camille Doucet to say th enjoyed the piece immensely, and that the author made an officer of the Legion of Honour.

* * * *

In the National Review Mr. Leslie Stephen reco reputation of Anthony Trollope. The originality of lies in questioning the verisimilitude of the novels as of the society of the author's period.

> Archdeacon Grantly is certainly an excellent a person; an honourable, narrow-minded English gent just the necessary tinge of ecclesiastical dignity. S hypothetical descendants asked us, Were English A like that? we should be a little puzzled. If Miss Y be called as a witness to character, she would demonstrate. Archdeacons, she would say, in her Church Archdeacons at least, were generally saints. be spiritual guides; they had listened to Newma misled by Essays and Reviews; but had, at le interested in the religious movements of the day. Archdeacon is as indifferent to all such matters as were reviled dignitaries of an older generation. He is s do his official duties, and he carefully says, "Good H where a layman would use another phrase: but he a the slightest indication of having any religious view beyond a dislike to dissenters.

Similarly with Trollope's girls:

> Vulgar satire in those days was denouncing the the period"—the young lady who was chafing established conventions of all kinds. The young Barchester seem to have been entirely innocent extravagance. Trollope's heroines are as domestic

THE EBB TIDE.

By this moon-witched light
Nought is common or unclean:
The lamps along the shore are white
As stars, and as serene.

The half-moon rides low
And casts on sea and river
White pools and flakes of moving snow
That waver, swirl, and quiver.

The busy whirling mill
Has furled its sails, and cool Sleeps its red window in the still,
Deep, murky, mirroring pool.

The tide is at its ebb:
Far over the misty sand
It murmurs, caught in a moony web,
Spell-bound 'twixt sea and land.

EVAN T. KEANE.

* * * *

The Gaulois has been drawing attention to the cases of some eminent men of letters who are also in the hotel and restaurant business in Switzerland. The most interesting case is that of Herr Zahn, the Swiss novelist, who "manipulates the soup ladle with dignity and dexterity" at the Goschenen buffet. His father did so before him, and very likely the occupation furnishes a more permanent source of income than the composition of works of fiction.

* * * *

Optimistic American publishers have lately been predicting that America will soon lead the world in literature and set the canons of literary taste. It is interesting to compare the pessimistic utterance of a writer in the Atlantic Monthly who declares that literature is being ruined by American publishers, who "exercise the functions of the popular showman in an itinerant exhibition" and impose their views of literary method upon authors:—

> The best work of the rising generation bears indelible marks of the editorial pencil, which is mainly responsible for its glaring defects. . . . Many a modern novel reads, and is perhaps meant to read, as if it had been cabled across the Atlantic by an incompetent operator. The tendency is invading other departments of literature. There are ominous indications that the philosopher and the historian may also become little better than literary acrobats performing a regular round of circus tricks.

Only in America, we trust; though we agree with the writer that the "cultured millionaire" might do worse than "subsidize a group of publishers and editors, who may be able to look to other matters besides circulation."

* * * *

The American view of Rudyard Kipling which we quoted the other day is not shared in France, and M. Baret, the Professor of English at the Lycée Henri IV., has discovered in the author of "The Jungle Books" a second La Fontaine. This formed the text of the recent address which he delivered at the annual prize-giving. That his eulogy of an English author was not due to a love of England may be gathered from endowed with those qualities natural to his energy, on the other, the same qualities—a pictur a "naiveté souligné de malice," the use of the the right moment, and the habit of leaving the d moral of the fable to his readers.

We regret to hear, at the moment of going death of Mr. Evelyn Abbott, the well-known Ox known outside the University as the editor of " co-editor with Mr. Lewis Campbell of Professor and Letters, and the author of a history of Gree the death of the Rev. E. L. Cutts, of whose work some account next week.

The extremely valuable collection of MSS.
Lancashire, containing a wonderful collection of all ages and languages, and mediæval Western them in bindings of the greatest beauty and rar from the possession of the Earl of Crawford in Rylands, the founder of the John Rylands Library

The house at 43, Gerrard-street, where plays and died, is to be pulled down as dangerous

We regret to record the death of Mr. Sam of the "Library Shakespeare."

Sir Harry Johnston is at work on a long book on Uganda, which will be published next ye

It is stated that Mr. John Lane will now pri page of "The Aristocrats" the name of the Gertrude Atherton.

Mr. John Buchan, the historian of Brasen the author of several novels, has been app secretary to Lord Milner.

The library of Lambeth Palace has recentl
by the addition of several works relating to Lond

A new version of Dickens' "Christmas Car be produced at the Vaudeville.

Mr. Carnegie has offered £7,500 for a Rutherglen, Lanarkshire.

M. and Madame Zola will visit Perthshire t of September.

Mr. Fisher Unwin has bought the English Illus

Mr. J. M. Barrie has written a new play called

The rebuilding of the Sorbonne is now comp expected that the ceremony of inauguration, fo has yet been officially fixed, will take place on day being the 700th anniversary of the birth Robert de Sorbon.

An international theatre is about to be esta by M. Léon Carvalho, who has obtained a co purpose. The building will be erected in the

This is the middle of the holiday season; a literary interest is happening, and as we cannot first question that hard task-master Necessity may sometimes dictate an answer; and for the rest the answer must depend partly on the weather and partly on the temperament of the individual. One is tempted to say that, as even the man who writes must sometimes think, the holidays, when not devoted to sport and the slaughter of birds or to the unwearied investigation of railway time-tables and hotel advertisements, should be set aside for thinking; but this is by no means the universal practice or even the universal theory. James Payn, for instance, placed it on record that, in his opinion, an occasional week-end, enlivened by "frivolous conversation," was the only holiday the man of letters needed. To let the brain lie fallow, he held, was laziness, and did the brain no good. The soil was always arable, and would support an unceasing rotation of crops. With other writers composition is like a fever or a debauch; and they are obliged, after each excess, to treat themselves like invalids. Good work has been done by both methods, and so has bad work. It is impossible to say that the one method belongs to talent and the other to genius, or to lay down any general rule. Nor is the second question any easier to answer by reference to authority, for the evidence is very conflicting. Not only equally good work, but very similar work, has been produced under both conditions. There are few writers whose work has more points of resemblance than has the work of Balzac and Flaubert. But Balzac worked in a Paris garret and Flaubert in a Norman château. In the case of Dickens, again, we find a conflict of evidence in the experiences of a single man. Dickens was always going away to write—presumably because he thought it was a good, as well as an agreeable, course to adopt. He did large blocks of work at Broadstairs, at Boulogne, at Genoa, at Lausanne. But, every now and again, he found that he could not work in the country at all, and actually had to come back to London to finish an instalment of a story for the printers. The roar of the traffic was more inspiring than the songs of birds; the little excitements of social intercourse were more helpful than the sea-breezes and the stars. Clearly there is nothing here to enable us to give a final answer to our question. Every writer longs for many of the sources of inspiration that can only be found in the country, but not all writers are self-sufficient in the sense of liking to deprive themselves, for any length of time, of the stimulus of intercourse with their intellectual equals. In the country it is possible that they may be thrown into the society of people who seem to them, especially if they are in the first Locksley Hall period, stupid without being humble, whose stupidity is not even original or amusing, who ask silly questions, and require to have everything explained to them. Consequently they get a longing for London which almost amounts to homesickness. They want to get back to the people who know what they know, have read what they have read, speak the same language as themselves, and take the same things for granted. An artist knows where to find these advantages even in very remote parts of the country. The little colonies of such artists at such places as Newlyn or Rye supply the want. Some are disposed to sigh for a similar colony of literary men—a place that the writer could settle in for a few months' work with the assurance that he will meet other men similarly engaged, and be able to talk about the things that he talked about in town to people who have something to say about them, instead of finding that the only alternative to solitude is to take part in the colloquies of the aborigines. It is a view held by many, but we are not inclined wholly to agree with it. There is life to be seen and studied outside London, even if its brain moves more

Literature Portraits.—XV

WALT WHITMAN.

It is good for the critic, employing himself in th exercise of estimating the reputations of the great m the foot-rule of his preconceived opinions, to come against a writer to whom none of the customary measurement can be applied. That is to say, it is critic if he knows how to take the blow properly courage to lay aside for the moment the old ca recognize that, in certain cases, culture, a sense other purely literary qualities may become matters tant as not to be worth mentioning. No doubt it is faith with most of us that the thought is the chie manner in which it is expressed of less vital mome all that, when we come to criticize a passage, it rather the style than the matter to which we pay o The literary graces, the subtle turns of phrase, the scholarly allusions—it is undeniable that these add to our intellectual enjoyment of an author's wo accustomed to regard some attempt at these as o surprising that we should lose our temper for the moment and say hard things of a writer who does not appear to have learned even the rudiments of his art. The greater part of "Leaves of Grass" seems at first sight intolerable rant, unredeemed by any graces of expression, and containing (as if by accident) one or two fine passages. It must be read more than once or twice before we begin to realize that there are more fine passages in the book, and less rant, than we had supposed. When it has been studied carefully, it may dawn upon us at last that this is no case for the literary critic at all. Whitman must be met on the common ground of our humanity; if, with Robert Louis Stevenson, we choose to picture him as a large shaggy dog, "just unchained, scouring the beaches of the world and baying at the moon," we may secure an apt phrase, but go grievously wrong in our estimate of the man's work. Rather let us call him a natural man, unashamed of his own attributes and appetites, who strove with remarkable success to divest poetry of its "feudal" tone and multitudinous ornamental accretions, and in their place to preach with direct simplicity an ideal democracy founded upon universal brotherly love.

Whitman Explains Himself.

This is one aspect of Walt Whitman's work, but it is by no means everything. He was not one of those men who sit down with a definite purpose and concentrate themselves in the effort to carry it to a logical conclusion. His books, whether in prose or verse (and there is often enough little difference between the form of the two) are one long series of hints and partial explanations, not generally satisfactory to the anxious reader. Whitman was always trying to explain himself, but his genius did not lie in that direction, and towards the end of his life he grew to regard himself as an enigma, and left the business of solving it in the more capable hands of his many admirers. To Dr. Richard Maurice Bucke, afterwards one of his literary executors, he surrendered, with a child-like faith, his explanatory prerogative. This gentleman published in 1883 an authorized biography of the poet, and thenceforward Whitman accepted him as his official "expresser and explanator." But before the poet wrote, of "Good-bye my Fancy—concluding Annex to "Leaves of Grass"—that "it will have to be ciphered and ciphered out long and is probably in some respects the most curious part of its author's baffling works," he had at all events attempted to tell the world what was his object in writing, and perpetually adding to, that expression of his own personality. The main idea present to his mind was that democracy needed a new poet.

There is a passage in the "Song of the Exposition"—probably one of the best-known passages in the whole of "Leaves of Grass"—in which the poet summons the Muse to her new home from the old and narrow domains of the past. It is an eminently characteristic passage, containing as it does one real gem of pure and dignified eloquence—a veritable oasis for the much-enduring literary critic—sandwiched between two of the wettest of wet blankets. Here is the exordium, not couched in particularly poetical language:—

> Come, Muse, migrate from Greece and Ionia,
> Cross out please those immensely overpaid accounts,
> That matter of Troy and Achilles' wrath, and Aeneas', > Odysseus' wanderings,
> Placard "Removed" and "To Let" on the rocks of your snowy Parnassus.
> Repeat at Jerusalem, place the notice high on Jaffa's gate and on Mount Moriah.

is almost forced to think it unconscious. The seco in the first line of the following excerpt:—

> Ended, deceas'd through time, her voice > fountain,
> Silent the broken-lipp'd Sphynx in Egypt, s > century-baffling tombs, > Ended for aye the epics of Asia's, Euro > warriors, ended the primitive call of t > Calliope's call forever closed, Clio, Melpo > dead,
> Ended the stately rhythmus of Una and Oria > quest of the holy Graal,
> Jerusalem a handful of ashes blown by the w
> The Crusaders' streams of shadowy midnig > with the sunrise,
> Amadis, Tancred, utterly gone, Charlema
> Oliver gone,
> Palmerin, ogre, departed, vanish'd the tu > from its waters reflected,
> Arthur vanish'd with all his knights, Merlin > and Galahad, all gone, dissolv'd n > exhalation;
> Pass'd! pass'd! for us, forever pass'd, that > world, now void, inanimate, phantom > Embroider'd, dazzling, foreign world, with a > legends, myths,
> Its kings and castles proud, its priests an
> and courtly dames, > Pass'd to its charnel vault, coffin'd with cr > on,
> Blazon'd with Shakspere's purple page,
> And dirged by Tennyson's sweet sad rhyme

This passage is one of the few in Walt Whitm at first sight, and compel even the unsympath acknowledge him a true poet. It is, almost thro dignified, eloquent, musical. "If only the ma

write like that !" murmurs the half-convinced critic. Alas! the poet had been swept away for the moment by the flood of past literary memories ; at the next line he regains his American and democratic feet :—

> I say I see, my friends, if you do not, the illustrious emigré (having it is true in her day, although the same, changed, journey'd considerable),
> Making directly for this rendezvous, vigorously clearing a path for herself, striding through the confusion,
> By thud of machinery and shrill steam-whistle undismay'd, > Bluff'd not a bit by drain-pipe, gasometers, artificial fertilizers,
> Smiling and pleas'd with palpable intent to stay,
> She's here, install'd amid the kitchen ware !

Is it not almost sacrilege, the juxtaposition of two such passages ? And yet, on reflection, must there not be something great in a poet who can dare so ludicrous a sequence to emphasize what he has to say ? Or rather, who could write the latter passage without perceiving any fundamental incongruity with the preceding portion ? Walt Whitman was essentially simple-minded ; he was of Quaker parentage ; and he did not possess that quick sense of the incongruous which lies at the root of humour. Even if he had possessed it, it is probable that he would have allowed the passage to stand. For it was his cue to get rid of these bygone trappings, to herald a new poetry — the poetry of democracy, of "these States," and of the age of steam.

"What finally and only is to make of our western world a nationality superior to any hither known, and out-topping the past," he asserts in the peculiar language of his "Democratic Vistas," "must be vigorous, yet unsuspected literatures, perfect personalities and sociologies, original, transcendental, and expressing (what, in highest sense, are not yet express'd at all), democracy and the modern." It must be confessed that Whitman's prose, particularly when he is anxious to explain himself, is not always perfectly lucid. But he pursues the same theme at considerable length, and contrives by degrees to make his meaning sufficiently clear. Democracy, in effect, will never be recognized as a living force, until it founds its own forms of art, letters, and theology, displacing the obsolete and "feudal" forms. A great original literature—this was to become the justification and reliance of American democracy. To this subject he returns again and again. He was not without the power of appreciating the work of other American writers, living or dead, but he could discern in them nothing national. The States expanded—Texas, California, Alaska were added ; the body grew more and more vast, wealthy, and powerful, but it seemed as though it were without a soul.

and thoughts, colored hardly at all with any cod other faiths, other authors, other identities, or time of songs had been sung—beautiful, matchless songs—other lands than these—other days, another spirit a evolution ; but I would sing, and leave out or pa with reference to America and myself and to-day."
he maintained, could not possibly have emerged fro era than the latter half of the nineteenth century, n other land than America. And more than this wa to their conception—his own home life and upbri hospital experiences in the war, and even the ultim of the Northern Union arms. Indeed, it seemed (as more than once in various places) as if a poetry wit like cosmic features had never been possible before.
that vast congeries of some "thirty-eight or for soldered in one," necessitated for her poetry en standards of measurement.

The Preparatory Life: Parentage.

For an account of Whitman's "Preparatory L termed it—his life from the age of sixteen to thirt the poet's own recommendation to turn to Dr. Bu From that writer's monograph, accordingly, we tak account of Whitman's biography. He was born on Ma at West Hills, Long Island, New York State, the s

WALT WHITMAN'S BIRTHPLACE, West Hills, near Huntington, Long Island
(By permission of G. P. Putnam's Sons.)

family of nine children, of whom seven were boys. " mans," says Dr. Bucke, "were, and are still, a strong-framed, long-lived race of men, moderate friendly, fond of their land and of horses and cattle, their passions, but fearful when once started." T father, Walter Whitman (his own name was origina and the copyright of the first edition of "Leaves was registered in that name), was "a large, quiet, s very kind to children and animals, and a good citizen.

for a lifetime in what he has called 'carrying out his own ideal.'" Indeed, he was wont to say that all the members of his father's family were noted for their obstinacy, and that nothing could turn them from a course they had once positively decided upon. His magnificent physique he derived equally from both parents. Until he lost it (from too long a course of hospital nursing among the wounded) he was a striking figure of a man. Here is a picture from an eye-witness, taken between 1854 and 1860:—

> Walt's appearance used to attract great attention from the passengers when he came on board the boat. He was quite six feet in height, with the frame of a gladiator, a flowing gray beard mingled with the hairs on his broad, slightly-bared chest. In his well-laundried checked shirt-sleeves, with trousers frequently pushed into his boot-legs, his fine head covered with an immense slouched black or light felt hat, he would walk about with a naturally majestic stride, a massive model of ease and independence. I hardly think his style of dress in those days was meant to be eccentric; he was very antagonistic to all show or sham, and I fancy he merely attired himself in what was handy, clean, economical, and comfortable. His marked appearance, however, obtained for him a variety of callings in the minds of passengers who did not know him. "Is he a retired sea captain?" some would ask: "an actor? a military officer? a clergyman? Had he been a smuggler, or in the slave trade?" To amuse Walt I frequently repeated these odd speculations upon him.

Other Influences.

Besides inherited qualities, and the influence of parental example, another main element to be taken into account in the formation of Whitman's character is that he was brought up on Long Island, or, as he prefers to call it from the old Indian name, Paumanok. This is a peculiar and picturesque region, over a hundred miles long, "shaped like a fish, plenty of sea-shore, the horizon boundless, the air fresh and healthy, the numerous bays and creeks swarming with aquatic birds, the south-side meadows covered with salt hay, the soil generally tough, but affording numberless springs of the sweetest water in the world." When Walt Whitman was still a child his parents moved to Brooklyn, but for long afterwards he used to pay frequent and long visits to his birthplace and wander through all the neighbouring country. He attended the common schools at Brooklyn until he was thirteen, and then went into a printing office and learned to set type. About three years later he began to write; at nineteen or twenty he was publishing and editing the Long Islander, a weekly newspaper at Huntington. Then he came to New York City to live, and during years seems to have been employed chiefly in pr

a compositor, and occasionally as a contributor and magazines. These years gave him his educat tion from which his poems were to spring—" p comprehensive equipment ever attained by a huma many things that the schools prescribe were Whitman's own words, his book "arose out of my and New York from 1838 to 1853, absorbing a mi fifteen years, with an intimacy, an eagerness probably never equalled—land and water." It go on equal terms with all people, and he bec acquainted with the shops, houses, ferries, fac and all that they contained. To quote from Dr.

> He was first the absorber of the sunlight,
> the open streets, and then of interiors. He kne > poorhouses, prisons, and their inmates. He > and about those parts of the city which are i > worst characters; he knew all their people, an > knew him; he learned to tolerate their sq > ignorance; he saw the good (often much mo > righteous think) and the bad that was in them, > was to excuse and justify their lives. It is > people, even the worst of them, while entire st > Whitman, quite invariably received him with > and treated him well. . . . Many of th > characters became singularly attached to him > was sociable with the man that sold peanuts at > the old woman that dispensed coffee in the > not patronize them, they were to him as goo > good as he, only temporarily dimmed and obsc

This was probably the happiest time of Walt
He found pleasure in everything; he speaks of > Wandering, amazed at my own lightness a

One of his special enjoyments in New York wa down Broadway on an omnibus, sitting in front a crowds and the traffic, or crossing the East Ri boats, watching the sights and sounds of the rive not play much part in his education—he pr direct from the life rather than from the impress but his aim was to absorb humanity and modern could help him towards this end he would not them.

The Books That He Read.

No man ever took so much pains to acquaint every particular of his own development as did W and again, in his prose jottings—in "Specimen where—he reverts to the congenial subject of th his own poetic field, the ploughing, planting, an ground. Already, he says, in his sixteenth obtained possession of a stout volume of some containing the whole of Walter Scott's poetry, a for many years "an inexhaustible mine and te study (especially the endless forests and jungles Walter's metrical romances may seem curious the poet of democracy, but so it was. For the him speak for himself:—

> Later, at intervals, I used to go off, s > week at a stretch, down in the country or > sea-shores—there, in the presence of outdoor i wondered since why I was not overwhelmed by those mighty masters. Likely because I read them, as described, in the full presence of nature, under the sun, with the far-spreading landscape and vistas, or the sea rolling in.

Of Edgar Allan Poe's poems Whitman was not an admirer, but he professed himself repaid in the prose by the idea that, at any rate in modern times, there can be no such thing as a long poem. Yet the "Song of Myself" occupies some forty octavo pages of fairly small print. His passion for keeping in touch with all sorts and conditions of men led him, no doubt, to read largely also in the newspapers and magazines; and he made at this time enormous scrap-books, containing articles on various subjects, most of them underlined in places and copiously annotated. One of these books contained an abstract of the poem of the "Cid" and of the "Nibelungen Lied," and accounts of Dante and his "Commedia." Later on, when at Camden, after the breakdown of his health, he began once more to read voraciously. His method of treating books was not exactly that of the bibliophile. "I get some old edition," he writes, "of no pecuniary value, and then take portions in my pocket. In this way I have dislocated the principal American writers of my time—Emerson, Longfellow, Whittier, and the rest—with translations of the French Madame Dudevant (always good to me), the German metaphysician Hegel, and nearly all the current foreign poets." The "Arabian Nights," again, he had known from boyhood. The novels of George Sand as well as of Scott were among his favourites. Rousseau's "Confessions" and the sayings of Epictetus were in his possession. And at the beginning of the war he came upon Felton's "Ancient and Modern Greece," which he read so many times that he came at length almost to know it by heart. It is not a bad list of authors, and there are many others with whom he had something more than a superficial acquaintance who are left unspecified here.

Music and the Drama.

Not books only, but "certain actors and singers had a good deal to do with the business" of preparing the poetic field. In "Specimen Days," once more, Whitman recounts how he frequented, while in New York, the old Park, the Bowery, Broadway, and Chatham-square theatres, and the Italian operas at Chambers-street, Astor-place, or the Battery. For many seasons, owing to his connexion with the papers, he was on the free list. The theatrical passion preceded the musical. In the drama, he saw, among others, the younger Kean, Macready, Sheridan Knowles in his own Virginius, Fanny Kemble as Lady Townley in The Provoked Husband, as Bianca in Fazio, and as Marianna in The Wife:—

> Nothing finer did ever stage exhibit—the veterans of all nations said so, and my boyish heart and head felt it in every minute cell. The lady was just matured, strong, better than merely beautiful, born from the footlights, had had three years' practice in London and through the British towns, and then she came to give America that young maturity and roseate power in all their noon, or rather forenoon, flush. It was my good luck to see her nearly every night she play'd at the old Park—certainly in all her principal characters.

In opera he was scarcely less fortunate; he heard all the Italian and other operas then in vogue, and well rendered. Alboni he heard every time she sang, in New York and the vicinity—also Grisi, Mario, and "the baritone Badiali, the finest in the world." Afterwards at Castle Garden, Battery, he heard Jenny Lind sing.

States and down the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. Liv in New Orleans, and work'd there on the editorial sta Crescent newspaper. After a time plodded back nort the Mississippi, and around to, and by way of lakes. . . finally returning through central New down the Hudson"—a trip altogether of some 8,0
He was a year at New Orleans, on the Daily Crescent return he took up house-building for a time, but d when he began to find himself making money.

The book was but a thin volume when it first ap small quarto of ninety-four pages containing twelve p was a gradual growth, and to the end of his life Whi always adding to and enlarging it. The title, as it st includes all his published poetical works; fresh ma absorbed from time to time; as he says, since its fir
"the book has had some eight hitches or growths,
"annexes" were added to these before he died.
volume contains more than 400 pages. The poem little or no attention at first; they were ignored o with contempt. Some 200 copies were placed fo the bookshops, but not a single copy was sold. Several out for review, and several more to eminent men of le the few notices received were certainly not enc
Emerson was the first to perceive that a new poet h
Nevertheless, before the war broke out, in 1861, a thir had been published.

The Wound Dresser.

Early in 1862 the news was brought that hi
George, a rising officer in the 51st New York Volunt been wounded at Fredericksburg, and Whitman starte army camp on the Rappahannock. His brother w danger when he arrived, but Whitman remained on th war, and as something in his Quaker antecedents forba fight, he engaged as a volunteer in the hospital service. In this here mained until the end of the war, and to this employment he voluntarily sacrificed his healthy constitution. The letters to his mother, reprinted in "The Wound-Dresser," give a vivid picture of the work he unflinchingly set himself to do. "Drum-Taps" (subsequently incorporated in "Leaves of Grass") is full of the details of his ministry, as well as of the martial pomp of war :—

Bearing the bandages, water and sponge,
Straight and swift to my wounded I go,
Where they lie on the ground after the battle brought in,
Where their priceless blood reddens the grass, the ground,
On to the rows of the hospital tent, or under the roof'd hospital,
To the long rows of cots up and down each side I return,
To each and all one after another I draw near, not one do I miss,
An attendant follows holding a tray, he carries a refuse pail,
Soon to be filled with clotted rags and blood, emptied, and fill'd again.

I onward go, I stop,
With hinged knees and steady hand to dress wounds,
I am firm with each, the pangs are sharp yet unavoidable,
One turns to me his appealing eyes—poor boy ! I never knew you,
Yet I think I could not refuse this moment to die for you, if that would save you.

Walt Whitman seemed to possess an exhaustless fund of personal magnetism. His mere presence in the wards went far to cheer and invigorate the patients. He was connected with no society, but went on his own individual account, as a sort of self-appointed missionary, and, after a time, benefactors known and unknown provided him with considerable sums of money for distribution in various forms. "When Whitman appeared, in passing along," wrote an eye-witness in the New York Herald some years later, "there was a smile of affection and welcome on every face, however wan . . . . From cot to cot they called him, often in tremulous tones or in whispers ; they embraced him, they touched his hand, they gazed at him. To one he gave a few words of cheer, for another he wrote a letter home, to others he gave an orange, a few comfits, a cigar, a pipe and tobacco, a sheet of paper, or a postage stamp, all of which, and many other things, were in his capacious haversack. . . . He did the things for them which no nurse or doctor could do, and he seemed to leave a benediction at every cot as he passed along." It was his own cheerful presence that buoyed up the sick and wounded—

I seize the descending man and raise him with resistless will,
O despairer, here is my neck,
By God, you shall not go down ! hang your whole weight upon me.
I dilate you with tremendous breath, I buoy you up,
Every room in the house do I fill with an arm'd force,
Lovers of me, baffiers of graves.

And in one of his letters home he writes :—"In my visits to the hospitals I found it was in the simple matter of personal presence, and emanating ordinary cheer and magnetism, that I succeeded and help'd more than by medical nursing, or deticacies, or gifts of money, or anything else. During the war Walt Whitman was reported as having made hundred visits or tours, tended a hundred thous distributed many thousands of dollars. But t gift that he brought to the wounded was undoub own invigorating personality.

From his experiences in the hospitals a Whitman learned much that was of infinite valu extended his already wide knowledge of life measureless sympathy with all forms of su deepened his faith in the heroism and fortitude of eracy had proved itself capable of patriotism, a sacrifices for an ideal purpose. But, while his s gained, his physical vitality had suffered a ser which, indeed, it never completely recovered. the constant emotional strain began to tell upon year after he had an attack of malaria and bloo first illness he had ever known. In 1870 ca paralysis, and from that time forward he suf from recurring spells of illness. He remov Camden, New Jersey, where he resided until went to Camden to die, but, whenever able lived out of doors in the open country, "bathed lived with the birds and squirrels, and played i the fishes." "Sands at Seventy" one of the " poems—gives evidence of an inward serenity illness and neglect were alike powerless.

Thanks in old age—thanks ere I go,
For health, the midday sun, the impalpa mere life,
For precious ever-lingering memories (o dear—you, father—you, brothers, s
For all my days—not those of peace al war the same,
For gentle words, caresses, gifts from fore
For shelter, wine and meat—for sweet app
(You distant, dim unknown—or young o unspecified, readers below'd,
We never met, and ne'er shall meet— embrace, long, close and long) ;

Or again this from "Good-Bye My Fancy" :—

After surmounting three-score and ten,
With all their chances, changes, losses, s
My parents' deaths, the vagaries of tearing passions of me, the war of
As some old broken soldier, after a lon march, or haply after battle,
To-day at twilight, hobbling, answerin call, Here, with vital voice, Reporting yet, saluting yet the Officer ov

Recognition.

Whitman had to wait long for recogniti country, from any but a few faithful adheren time, just after his paralytic stroke in 1873 Camden, sick and lonely and, as it seemed, world. In "Calamus : Letters to Peter D always does his best to put a good face on affair he sometimes felt neglected and dispirited. It that he first received sympathy and assista England that "Leaves of Grass" had first atta like a circulation. "I had a visit," he writes to number of purchasers of "Leaves of Grass," and brought the poet many new disciples. John Addington Symonds wrote to him frequently, with all the ardour of a convert; Tennyson corresponded with him; Swinburne wrote his poem "To Walt Whitman in America"; Ernest Rhys and Roden Noel, among others, became his champions on this side of the Atlantic. William Rossetti was one of the first—if not the very first—to secure a copy of the poems, when in 1865 some copies were sold by a book pedlar in Sunderland, and he also did his best, in speech and print, to give a helping hand to the democratic poet. "Walt Whitman's 'Leaves of Grass' is the largest thing done in our time," he said. In America Emerson had been one of the earliest to recognize him; John Burroughs wrote warmly of the man and his work; Thoreau, Alcott, Bryant were among his friends in the New York days; afterwards Joaquin Miller, J. C. Harris, Mark Twain, Bret Harte, and the rest of the Western writers came to regard him as their leader. When he died, in 1892, the Press of his own country had become, if not enthusiastic, at any rate more lenient in its judgment.

Even to the last the American magazines displayed no marked anxiety to print Whitman's poetry. One of several "personal notes" on his relations with periodical literature

WALT WHITMAN AND PETER DOYLE.
Drawn by H. D. Young from a photograph taken in 1869.
(By permission of G. P. Putnam's Sons.)

may be cited here in illustration. The poet writes in "Good-Bye My Fancy":—

> All along, from 1860 to '91, many of the pieces in L. of G., and its annexes, were first sent to publishers or magazine editors before being printed in the L., and were peremptorily rejected by them, and sent back to their author. The "Eidôlons" was sent back by Dr. H., of Scribner's Monthly, with a lengthy, very insulting, and contemptuous letter.

Whitman's Prose Works.

Walt Whitman's prose writings are of two kinds—different kinds. The personal note and perpetual shre of observation to be found in "Specimen Days" and ally elsewhere are thoroughly delightful. He was at h far as mere writing is concerned) when he had no the pound, no laboured explanation to make. He was observer of the sights and sounds of open-air life a and he brought to the study of natural phenome original and less academic mind. He was always record his impressions briefly and without regard to accepted conventions of the professional author. He j his notes, each under its separate heading, and had of working up his detached paragraphs into any more form. But in the longer and more serious essays (calle cratic Vistas" in the English edition, printed unde "Collect" in the American) the writer suffers sadly reader even more severely—from his failure to expres with any degree of lucidity. He was for ever saying and verse alike, "It is time to explain myself"—s egregiously to do so. We need not quarrel with hi trifling matters as split infinitives or strange and unw locutions, but the reader may justifiably deplore th literary workmanship which converts many of his sent inextricable mazes and jungles of words. Parenthese on parentheses, in a vain effort to strike the key-n matter, and additional explanations (making confusi confounded) straggle in foot-notes at the bottom of The fact is Whitman saw too much—or, rather, was of leaving out anything that he saw. The long catalog poetry are another example of this tendency. In writ at once his chief merit and his chief fault that he ha scheme, no theory of procedure:—

> Walt, you contain enough, why don't you let it ou is his battle-cry in the "Song of Myself." Method wa to him. Personality was everything.

"Leaves of Grass."

In his poems this lack of method is not so im matter. We are not to regard them as a literary per and the structure of the verse, loose and irregular as at all events the effect of keeping the numerous par additions under some sort of control. "Leaves of G the author is never tired of reiterating, is the expres own personality—an honest attempt to put an authen being "freely, fully, and truly on record" in the p printed book. Perhaps the completest expression of t of his poems lies in this quotation from the 1867 edi printed in "Sands at Seventy" of the last issue:—

> Small the theme of my Chant, yet the greatest > One's Self—a simple, separate person. T
> the use of the New World, I sing.
> Man's physiology complete, from top to toe,
> Not physiognomy alone, nor brain alone, is w > the Muse;—I say the Form complete is > far. The Female equally with the Male, I > Nor cease at the theme of One's Self. I speak > of the modern, the word En-Masse.

Rhymes and rhymers pass away, poems distill'd from poems pass away,
The swarms of reflectors and the polite pass, and leave ashes,
Admirers, importers, obedient persons, make but the soil of literature.
America justifies itself, give it time, no disguise can deceive it or conceal from it, it is impassive enough.
Only toward the likes of itself will it advance to meet them,
If its poets appear it will in due time advance to meet them, there is no fear of mistake.
(The proof of a poet shall be sternly deferr'd till his country absorbs him as affectionately as he has absorb'd it.)

"The trick of literary style," said Whitman on one occasion—"I almost wonder if it is not chiefly having no style at all." This happens to be one of those sentences which, containing a kernel of solid truth, are very apt to mislead the speaker. It is true enough that a conscious mannerism is the worst of all styles; it is a sham and a pretence, and can never have any real value in the eyes of thinking men. But, in the first place, literary style is not a trick at all; the best style of writing is simply the best way of expressing a given thought in language harmonious, dignified, and, above all, clear and easily comprehensible. Whitman himself was not insensible to the harmony of words; he wrote passages of the finest and most sustained eloquence; but he was for ever "rewarding resolution" by a sudden drop into colloquialism or the language of the stump orator. It was his mode of showing his contempt of convention—of the smooth and sugary poetry furnished by the ordinary craftsman—and the effect is that the critic who is anxious to admire Whitman's undoubted genius finds many obstacles in his path. Not only isolated words and expressions offend him, but that absolute lack of restraint which so often makes the poet continue and carry on an idea beyond the verge of the ridiculous. Even a suspicion of a sense of humour might have saved us so many unhappy expressions:—

I find I incorporate gneiss, coal, long-threaded moss, fruits, grains, esculent roots,
And am stucco'd with quadrupeds and birds all over —a passage that irresistibly conveys the impression of a Walt Whitman in Palissy ware. Or, again, when he sings:—

Earth! you seem to look for something at my hands,
Say, old top-knot, what do you want?

We are inclined, at a first reading, to rub our eyes in blank astonishment. Indeed, the reader is often at a loss, like the poet's friend, Peter Doyle, to make out "what he was getting at." In his passion for identifying himself with the universe he could not stop to consider the comic effect of a passage.

Retreating, triumphantly twittering, the kingbird, from piercing the crow with its bill for

I pull the wicker-pots up slantingly, t lobsters are desperate with thei them out, I insert wooden pegs their pincers,
I go to all the places one after anoth back to the shore.
There in a huge kettle of boiling water t be boil'd till their color becomes s

Touches of this sort have undeniably aspect. You read them the first time and lau perusal of the book, meeting them once me smile; a third time, and behold! you have yourself that these trifling blots are essential t personality of a man whom you have begun to ad
You would not have them away; these inconside part of a poet's handiwork; they make him p human and the more lovable. Walt Whitman upon the student. We may read him a hun find still new and unsuspected beauties, tru thoughts:—

Smile O voluptuous cool-breath'd earth!
Earth of the slumbering and liquid trees Earth of departed sunset—earth of the topt!
Earth of the vitreous pour of the full with blue!
Earth of shine and dark mottling the tide
Earth of the limpid gray of clouds bri for my sake!
Far-swooping elbow'd earth—rich apple-Smile, for your lover comes.

Passages of this kind seem to detach them text after a time and come upon us sudden surprise. They grow slowly into our con infect the blood; and in a moment we become aw languorous, melody which is yet so wonderfully Thus are disciples made—sealed of the tri would fain continue quoting their discover literary of critics may be converted in th he does not throw the volume into a cor reading, and refuse to pick it up again. S might have taken up a far different atti persevered.

E. H. LAC

ROME IN RECENT FICTION.

A "Personal View."

Tradition avers that Rome's seven high Gods stood forth in martial array to repel the Carthaginian invader, and that St. Peter in person awed the tameless spirit of Attila. There is, however, a latter-day invasion of the Barbarians which has proved too strong for deities and saints in alliance—the novelist with a purpose has taken possession of the Eternal City.

The spectacle has an interest all its own, a pathetic, dramatic, and—shall it be confessed?—a distinctly humorous aspect. For the modern writer of romances, roused to zeal by the enthroned evil of the Seven Hills, has not tarried in his righteous indignation until that evil has actually flashed upon him in all its searing magnificence. He has not, like the great Protestant Reformer, been turned back on the Sacred Stair by an authentic and irresistible voice. Things are better managed in these labour-saving days, and no time is wasted in vague groping through Rome's tremendous alternations of gloom and splendour in search of a fugitive divinity and a vanishing faith. Our literary Crusader of to-day goes to the World-City with a note-book open indeed for "local colour," but with his opinions already settled, packed comfortably in his portmanteau. Under such circumstances, the local colour is obliging enough never to interfere with the opinion.

It cannot, however, be an easy undertaking to write six hundred pages about Rome and to keep out Rome's subtly pervasive atmosphere as completely as Mr. Hall Caine has done in "The Eternal City." When Monsieur Zola brought his visionary young priest to the tribunal of the Vatican, he saw not the Vatican only, not alone the Leonine city where the carven Papal escutcheons still guard the mouldering, massive reaches of wall enclosing so many memories. The French novelist flung Rome bodily on his canvas, with a confusion of conflicting aspects, a painful oppressiveness and complexity not uncharacteristic of the city which he paints. The reader may sigh under the elaborate descriptions, the historic reminiscences, the social analyses which weight Monsieur Zola's pages, but he cannot but confess that that is one method of conveying the sense of the place. For Rome itself leaves on some beholders the same impression of painful and bewildering magnitude, of an intricacy of ever-receding horizons. Rome past and present, Imperial and Papal; bygone conflicts, heroic across idealizing distances, and their legacy of present problems, tragically devoid of the nobler elements of tragedy; all the immensity of greatness and decay is heaped together unsparingly. "The blood of Augustus," that passion for Imperial, external dominance which has tinged with its purple the dreams of all succeeding generations, is there shown, still moving the latest-born Roman citizens to futile imitation of earlier achievements. And there, too, is revealed the later sterility of that soil which, though moved by its ancient impulse to bring forth greatness, now, in the eyes of background or almost wholly ignored. In "Eleano the city for the most part from a distance, as the ch the book might have looked towards it from their hills. And thus depicted, like the splendid sunsets along the western sky, the sense of Rome and its sign perhaps as well given as by a closer and more detail Indeed, throughout her Italian romance Mrs. Humph somewhat dogmatic and laborious pen has acqui reticence and a distinction most delightful. In the a very different artist, Dr. Barry, has, in his "Arden carried his Socialistic hero out of the actual arena of away to the mediæval fastness in the Volscians, better mediæval drama of love, revenge, and the Evil Eye. Y part, find in Father Barry's book one passage which sw the imagination a strange momentary pageant of pas and guilt. It is where the young Italian noble and friend watch the ensanguined sunset from the Jani

Don Gaetano rhapsodizes on the motto of his house, S
Sangue, and its terrible aptness to the city of blood b
The outburst might seem the merest rhetoric utte other spot, but a pomp of expression appears natural which has called forth in so many divers writers processional pomp of language. That temptation evi not assail Mr. Bagot, though in his "Casting of takes his readers into Roman palaces and describes in its hour of triumphal ceremonial. His temperate its faintly cynical edge, the dry and definite light i regards objects so long haloed by mystic veneration book somewhat of a relief to overstrained nerves. Th tion of the place he has not rendered, but then wh unwise enough to look for the secret of that fascinati the social bickerings in the salons of the Blacks an
Mr. Bagot knows his world, though perhaps he descri something of a parti pris, and if that world strikes us scribed the very defect may be taken as a proof of the faithfulness. The historic Rome is absent from his pag those of Monsieur Bourget's "Cosmopolis," with study of a thoroughly mondaine society.

Only one book has lately appeared which, to on least, reveals something of another, truer Rome, the is eternal indeed, since it is builded in the dreams, the memories of men. Beside Zola's study of the ac in its slow crumbling and its feverish upbuilding, I wo strange contrast a study of Rome mirrored in an soul: Edward Hutton's "Frederic Uvedale." The Ro spiritual knight errant, that seeker after the perfect w and cannot be the material city. His is that Eternal C for centuries ruled the imagination of the world, as earlier centuries the embattled city of the legionaries its subject nations. The phantom Rome has not bee potent. "What is the Papacy," wrote Hobbes in a n phrase, "but the ghost of the Roman Empire, sitting upon the grave thereof?" and what was the Holy Roma

the faith of a pilgrim, the ardours of a dedicated knight of the Church. What he finds and loses; how far he reconciles the city of scheming prelates with that other city of his quest; all the vibrations of a sensitive nature as finely realized as that of his spiritual progenitor, "John Inglesant," must be left to the readers of the book itself.

I was chiefly concerned with the fact that Mr. Hutton indulged in few descriptions and that the atmosphere of Rome somehow disengaged itself from its pages. His is the method of suggestion which, after all, is the more convincing, the more inevitable. It is by that method that d'Annunzio in a few words sweeps over us the sense of the Campagna, inert, sterile, infinitely remote and majestic, before he turns away to vivisect those characters of his which are only fit, in Tourneur's words, to be "put into the earth to be made clean." It was by that method that Hawthorne made a grey shattered column by Trajan's Forum reveal the very mystery of the past. No, Mr. Hutton does not describe much, but he has felt the Campagna "littered with the monsters of old forgotten religions, full of the dead things of Paganism and Christianity, the bones of Saints, the mighty trunks of forgotten Gods," and there, across its solitudes, has watched the unsubstantial dome: "a ship asail on the Campagna, the only living thing in all that distance, and even then alive but so half-heartedly." And he has not failed amid the dust to perceive the perfume, to hint that sensuous side of Rome which is needed to complete the spell. Those green, still gardens where the cypresses lift above the ruins, those terraces where statues of the old Gods dream in a sunny silence above grass jewelled with cyclamen—I am not quite clear as to how "Frederic Uvedale" conveys the sense of them, environing the spiritual seeker with half ironic sweetness.

The book sets lovers of Rome to wandering in their own garden of memories, from which I return to a realization of duty and a pile of late fiction. Has not Rome through all her unending ages set us to demanding the impossible? I find myself looking for a Roman book as yet, I fear, unwritten; one which should give us, perhaps, less of the Blacks and Whites and more of those glimpses, those fugitive impressions through which, as through that magical keyhole of Santa Maria in Aventina, all Rome is for an instant seen or divined. It is not in the great pageant, the extended view, that the truest revelation is always given. The stain of a scarlet poppy on the desolate roads of the Aventine, a branch of laurel or a heavy-headed rose gathered in passing in the Palace of Tiberius may tell more than much eloquence of what the spot has witnessed. All the past may be struck to life by the sight of the time-worn "Opus Alexandrinum" pavement in a restored church—how much more by one of the broken reliefs in the Via Appia, netted in bramble or convolvulus. In search of these stray half-revealings, I open Vernon Lee's "Seeker of Pagan Perfection" in her volume of "Renaissance Studies and Fancies." It is a very slight study, but one which the author of "Marius the Epicurean" might have been content to claim. Its interpretation of the effect of silently the city walls, solemn with their to endless as it seemed, and enclosing, one felt vag distant, invisible city." For surely we all, m be novelists with a theory, go dimly seeking som city within the Walls of Aurelian.

DORA GREENWELL

INNS AND BOOKS.*

With senses not averse from the savoursome the house, I looked patient as I waited for dinner. I to sit still, I went to the shelf of books. Every and of the eighteenth century. I sat down agai steak was audibly squealing in the pan; and I of the window without interest in the sunset, sh took down from the shelf Beveridge's "Private years I had known the volume in dull bookstal foolish hope that I should be amused, when

——like a pleasant thought
When such are wanted—

I broke the wax that had united two blank leav a good hand and spelling that was none the wor the names and histories of the old owner's favou Turk and Basto, Sylvia and Mirth—in that poo a happy music,

A cry more tuneable
Was never holla'd to, nor cheer'd wit
In Crete, in Sparta, nor in Thessa

There was Dash, too, a spaniel of course, gracious hand had sketched in a river amon willows swishing, with windy birches that seen beyond.

THE KINGS HEAD, THATCHAM.

My fortune has not always been so good, after a day with the May-fly or March brown I ha considering how pleasant a portion of our life their provision of books is inadequate. A railw has (sometimes) tables of trains. At a hotel, 1860 when I return with a full creel and a delightful hunger at sunset?

I have been caged for hours in a newly-papered room, with four large Bibles and a treatise on something, while on the walls is hung "Swearing is forbidden." I am not superstitious, but once, at The Three Dragons, finding Johnson's Dictionary, I practised sortes with it, and found this quotation from Donne, illustrating the verb "inn":—

In thyself dwell;
Inn anywhere: continuance maketh hell.

Just above were the words of Spenser:—

Death is an equal doom
To good and bad, the common inn of rest.

I seemed to know that inn. But an inn should be a place where we find what we have ceased to expect at home, and not a mere "home from home" as I have seen it modestly advertised.

An impulse as sick and as profound as the fatigue du nord, or as that which drove Richard Jefferies from inland meadows to the sea, goads some of us to the life of inns. Something, we may think, that overpowers the delicious sense of home, bids us exchange that for an abode that is a truer symbol of our inconstant lodging on the earth. There we are independent of every one save the boots. We can obey or ignore a distant summons easily. Perhaps even the last summons would not sound so shrill. If I had a wish that would be met, I could wish to die at an inn, a prey only to very tranquil regrets, and without that too indignant reluctance that makes every death a breach greater than the experience of a hundred centuries might have taught—

To cease upon the midnight with no pain.

"Landlord," said a merry man, who lay dying at the Rising Sun, "you can take down the sign to-night." Shakespeare probably lived half his life in taverns, and though he may not have been happy, yet the delight of witnessing the restless scene, oneself so restless and easily erased, must have been a magnificent atonement; at least it inspired the kindliest and broadest humanity.

In several inns I have—before candles were brought in—fancied myself on board a ship in strange seas, or in a lonely camp. I seem then to be of no nation or class. The great lord "knows no such liberty." On a sharp November night, when the sky is swept broad and clean, and garnished with stars that wink as if the wind fluttered them, one may enjoy at a small inn amidst a grey country the lonely monarchy of a helmsman at sea. The host has gone. I am the only guest. . . . It is so silent that I cannot long endure the throne of tyrant over the night and all that is night's. I turn gladly to the wood fire that crackles like the laughter of children, and grins amply like the mask of comedy. But the books? . . . The cracked spinet is burdened with china (instead of the light fingers that tripped over the keys, "laughing as they went"); and if it is vocal still to sympathetic ears, it seems to murmur only "Auld Lang Syne," as if it were a sad reminiscent, when all the house is still.

There were no books among the china, but one leg of the spinet was propped by some tattered calf, and above that "The Young Man's Best Companion." It was a kind of inoffensive cyclopædia, a shabby and comical pedlar of useless information. There was too a frontispiece—a gowned master with a raised didactic hand, like an eighteenth-century statue, evidently correcting the faulty geometry of a bland youth whose stoop was full of condescending patience and interest; and underneath, these

THE WHITE HART, DORCHESTER.

"Expect to receive as you give—Frequent good co or "Yesterday cannot be recalled—Zeno and Zenot which are full of a working philosophy and of truth, the third. The young man even now might tu dictionary where I learned that "hart" meant "in or an over-grown buck." In another place I read " commendable in some, but it ruins others." The obvious remarks to make about nearly everything, a of the charms of "The Young Man's Best Companion usually says both.

The other book was of a sterner age. Called "Th of the Hooff; or seeming contradictions throughout Sa tures, Distinguished, Resolved, and Applied," it was Street, "Master of arts and preacher of the Word in of Devon," of date 1651. The dedication, to the De letters so large that were I to copy them here, I shou at almost the same rate as the most successful w time. But the dedicatory essay is penned in a s rhetoric has a Miltonic pomp without the Miltonic as in this—

Is the Sword that fights against thee, girt owne thigh? . . . Are the worst enemies th owne house? O who can appease such quarrels!
controversies! Lay the fury of such battels as ar Heaven! . . . .

The explanations were not without ingenuity here and there were blasts of the same rhetoric; an a characteristic note of that age in the signature of tion.

Thy most humble and everlasting servant,
My name thou hast written in heaven.

Yet I could not but envy the certainties of the could sincerely write:—

Our way to Heaven is none of the broadest. T hath found it strait, and his endeavour now is to co

Great Britain's monarchy," and compiled "for his country's benefit" by Cardanus Rider. Here too I have discovered the planets that rule over the names of children, and have smiled at the number of Colleys during Cibber's ascendancy. Yet I have rarely found the right book (an odd volume of Richardson or Sterne); less often have I brought it with me. I have read Browning where I longed for Prior. I have put up with Shakespeare where the ale, the signboard, and the host wanted Massinger. Now, I can only pray that I shall meet Jeremy Taylor not Bishop Hall—Smollett and not Goldsmith's Natural History. It was perhaps my best fortune to fall in with a volume called "The Unknown Way." Left behind by some tired reviewer, it may be, after a perusal that bored only a few jests, the book was still new. It was after midnight. The Welsh hills rose all around, their flanks vaster than the sky and pricked, as it were, by cottage lights. Now and then the lightning snapped a fiery finger. At length, enormous ridgy clouds moved along and encamped upon the summits of the range, and in the flashes they seemed to be castles that extended their towers like imprecating arms to heaven. The moon sailed up, and, no stronger than if she breathed into the night, a wind puffed amid a lane of poplars with a liquid whisper as I read many and many a lovely verse, and lastly these:—

A HAUNT OF ANCIENT PEACE.

> Now, till morn, remain our own
> Magic shores of old surmise,
> Peaks no morning can dethrone,
> Lands that know no boundaries—
> There the unfulfilled abides;
> There the touch of night unbars
> Gates of ways that noonday hides,
> Paths that reach beyond the stars.

For criticism one may go to Fleet-street. For appreciation I am resolved to visit the Merlin Arms again.

EDWARD THOMAS.

The Oxford University Press will shortly publish a new edition of Goethe's "Hermann und Dorothea" upon which Dr.

THE DRAMA.

"BECKY SHARP."

It is customary to attribute the practi popular novels to purely commercial causes. deal of money in a successful play, and the fact proved to the public taste when told in print justifies the expectation that it will also please on the stage. This explanation is, however, to is a genuine demand for stage versions of we and the supply, therefore, is a matter of course with commercialism than any other sequence of It is not an artistic demand, but it is very hu knows that there is nothing so hazardous as effect from one medium to another, that the v of a story getting itself worked out in a pa constitutes a strong presumption that it has f medium, and consequently that any other mediu appropriate. The artist knows that characters w under the hand of a novelist would have grown fashion under the hand of a dramatist. And h difference is at its maximum when the novelist the Fielding type, that is to say, not a mere discursive, allusive, a novelist-critic, a no novelist-gossip. Thackeray, of course, was type. In "Vanity Fair" he makes no attempt forward story. The book is full of suspens commentary, "asides." It is quite certain satisfactory play, from the artistic point of vie made out of "Vanity Fair." But it is also quite public is not a collective artist. It will alway such novels as "Vanity Fair" imported into th desire springs from the preference which the i that is to say, the vast majority of the human complete imitation of reality over a symbolic re suggestion of it. A child will be impressed by bear, but will be much more impressed if you fours and growl. Novels are collections of s surface. To enjoy them you need imagination But the actual world is solid. So is an acted pl the actual solidities of life reproduced as actual stage is to most people a keen pleasure. That the vogue of Drury Lane drama, which rep solidities—the Stock Exchange crowd, a Ho debate, a Cricket match at Lord's—"life s Tussaud's is standing testimony to the same hun

Further, we all have a desire to see and he of whom we have read or whom we only know by He must be a very "detached" philosophe pause to "have a look" if Lord Salisbury or Si or Mr. Carnegie should be pointed out to him Now, the personages of a famous novel, your Ba Rawdon Crawley and Lord Steyne, are in the personages whom we only know by description. on the stage is to bring us face to face with t of course, an important difference between their living persons. If, knowing Lord Salisbury on read about him in the newspapers, we were to s in the House of Lords, we should probably altogether in accord with our preconceived of a player, familiar to us in other parts, succeeds in adapting itself to this or that famous character, and exactly where it fails to adapt itself and why. Here, for instance, at the Prince of Wales's Theatre is Miss Marie Tempest, familiar in face and figure and voice to every playgoer, adapting herself as best she can to that other familiar face and figure of Thackeray's story and Thackeray's illustrations. You feel at once that it is not the right thing. The actress is too genial and comic a Becky. There is nothing to hate or to fear in this cheery little person, and when her actions are vile her face belies them. She is what Becky might have been if . And so Mr. Gilbert Hare's Steyne and Mr. Leonard Boyne's Rawdon are what Steyne and Rawdon might have been if –. That is to say, you have a set of deformations of Thackeray's characters, which as deformations annoy you and yet as real persons performing the actions of Thackeray's characters interest and amuse you. As a rule, too, they speak Thackeray's words, and let us at least be grateful to the arrangers of Becky Sharp—Messrs. Robert Hichens and Cosmo Gordon Lennox—for a certain literary piety there. On the whole, I do not see that the most devout Thackerayan need be indignant over this play; indeed, I will venture to confess, for my part, that two things in the cast, Mr. Holman Clark's Pitt Crawley and Mr. Granville Barker's Wenham, are more consistent and vivid for me than their prototypes in the novel. It is interesting to note how differently these two actors have set to work. Mr. Clark is the Pitt of the book, amplified, solidified; Mr. Barker re-invents Wenham, presenting us with a character of his own. Both methods—applied as they are to minor people about whom our preconceived notions, being vague, do not matter—are justified by the event.

A. B. WALKLEY.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

ARMENIA.

ARMENIA: TRAVELS AND STUDIES. By H. F. B. LYNCH. Two vols. Illustrations and Maps. (Longmans. 42s. n.)

Let no one turn away from these volumes under an impression that they are another contribution to the literature (if such we may term it) of the Armenian massacres. There is very little about this vexed question in them; and, although Mr. Lynch is a stanch believer in the Armenians, and would like to see them formed into a separate State, he does not thrust politics or "racial questions" perpetually in his reader's face. What he does say about the people and their sufferings at the hands of Russia and Turkey—especially Russia—is well worth consideration, because it is said without apparent political or religious bias, and is based upon personal observation made on two journeys, in 1893-94 and in 1898—i.e., both before and after the massacre epoch. That so careful and well-informed an observer should be ranked among the warmest admirers of the Armenians argues much for their qualities of mind and character, and seems to show that the common prejudice of most travellers—including recently Lord Percy—may, perhaps, be due to superficial acquaintance with unprepossessing specimens of the race. The Armenians one meets in the Levant are, if possible, more obnoxious than the Greeks outside Greece; but we are prepared to accept Mr. Lynch's view that in his proper country l'Arménie" in 1818. Many important works on various points or particular parts have, of course, been written. Lynch has fully availed himself of their results and a valuable bibliography of his authorities. For geology alone of invaluable wealth in the numerous writings of A archæology there are Brosset, Belck, Dieulafoy, Khanikov; for physiography, Alishan, Chesney, A Kiepert, Dulaurier, Flandin, and many more, with special studies on lake Urmiya, Brant for much valu mation in the early part of last century, and such as Morier, Ouseley, Bryce, and Douglas Freshfield a example of energy and observation. None of these however, has attempted the encyclopædic descript from all points of view, that Mr. Lynch has accomplis chief interest is avowedly geographical; he is an int of nature, and delights in describing the scenery, oft lugly beautiful or impressive, that he traversed in hi lings on the great plateau. Yet he views it always as a with reference to its causes and relations. Take the general sketch of the country that opens out as Echmiatzin on the road to Ani, the ruined capital Armenia:—

> The moderate elevation of these highlands above of the Araxes and their long extension from east t conditions favourable to the full appreciation of scape, and of each new feature in the slowly-chang Their free position contributes to invest them character of a natural gallery which commands prospects over some of the grandest works of Nat most inspired moods. The European, whose conceptio tain scenery is founded upon the arbitrary peaks and valleys characteristic of his Alps, who has looked wit upon the doubtful features of his lowlands from the some famous pass, can scarcely fail to be deeply imp the attributes of a panorama in which reliefs and dep stupendous scale are disposed as members of a gre and are seen in the pure atmosphere of an Eastern cli all the clearness of a model in clay. At his feet lies a pl is level as water, which in no very remote geological p covered by an inland sea. It is a distance of some th to its opposite confines; yet the towns and the plant pencilled upon its surface as though they had been a draughtsman's pen. The plain is bordered by th range which we have come to know as the Ararat a chain of which the jagged and fantastic outline familiar from many a rich sunset effect. The summi nearly 8,000ft. above the campagna; but how hu appear behind the train of the fabric of Ararat, immediately from the floor of the plain! The bold sno of the north-western slope are seen in face from th lands; and it is difficult to realize that the pronoun ments which compose that airy figure are removed b of nearly forty miles.

Mr. Lynch's descriptions are generally in this clab somewhat scientific style, and whilst we confess we f occasionally tedious, by frequent repetition, there c doubt that they bring the features of the landscape ve to the mind, and aid one in realizing the extraordinarily series of illustrations with which these volumes are Mr. Lynch's photographs are beyond praise, and the tinting—here a sky, there a fawn-coloured foreground that has accomplished this climb, which is difficult chiefly as a matter of endurance. Mr. Bryce, in 1876, did the 5,000ft. from the pool above Sardar Bulakh in six hours, going alone and straight up. Mr. Lynch ascended on the same side, but struck more to the right. His cousin, Major Lynch, suffered from mountain sickness, and one of the party had to be left behind at 14,000ft., but the rest got to the top (16,916ft.), exhausted but triumphant, after more than seven hours' climbing from their camp, which had been pitched at an elevation of 12,200ft. It seems clear that the Sardar Bulakh route, adopted by Abich, Khodsko, Bryce, Markoff, Raphalovich, Postukhoff, and Lynch, is decidedly preferable to that by way of the Akhury chasm. Mr. Lynch's account of the ascent of Ararat is perhaps the most exciting chapter in his book; but there is much to interest readers who are not mountaineers. The minute description of Ani and of mediæval Armenian architecture, well illustrated by photographs, will appeal to students of art. The noble monuments of the Bagratid dynasty are proof enough of the culture of the Armenians in the early Middle Ages, when they acted as intermediaries between the declining civilization of the Byzantine Empire and the nations of Asia, until abruptly checked and arrested by the tide of Seljuk invasion; and there can be little doubt that the beautiful buildings which still testify to the taste of these Turcoman Sultans owed as much to the influence and skill of their Armenian subjects as the so-called Arab art of Egypt did to the talents of the Copts. It is a grievous pity that nothing is being done to preserve these interesting relics of Armenian—and also of Seljuk—art. That wealthy Armenians are prepared to spend large sums upon national architecture is seen by the princely subscriptions they have given to the modern erections and restorations at Echmiatsin, the seat of the Catholicos of the Gregorian Church. Mr. Lynch's account of this cathedral city is extremely interesting, with its great quadrangle, resembling the Old Court of Trinity College, Cambridge, and its monastic life. He was fortunate in witnessing the anointing of the present aged Catholicos, his Holiness Mekertich Khrimean, of whom he writes with fervent admiration, and whose portrait certainly bears out the impression of dignity, refinement, and intellectual power which his career and conversation, as here reported, convey. In short, these two sumptuous volumes are brimful of interest from cover to cover. We cannot call them light reading, but to those who are able to appreciate genuine research and honest first-hand observation of a little-known country and people, "Armenia" will prove a most satisfying feast.

AN OCCULT PHILOSOPHER.

Louis Claude de Saint-Martin, the Unknown Philosopher (Wellby, 7s. 6d. n.), by Mr. A. E. Waite, who has made his reputation as a writer on occult subjects, is addressed in the first place to members of the Order of Martinism, and, secondly, to students in general of mystic thought. It would seem to have little to say to the ordinary reader, to whom mysticism is often midsummer madness and Martinism not even a name. It will certainly come to him as news that this unknown "ism" should have actually established a fragile foothold in matter-of-fact England, but it will come to him as news of a singularly unemotional sort. Yet, according to Sainte-Beuve, M. de Saint-Martin calls for at least a superficial knowledge even on the part writes :—" The streets near the house I was battle ; the house itself was a hospital where t brought, and, moreover, was every moment invasion and pillage. In the midst of all this I risk of my life, to take care of my sister half Yet it was not events such as these which had any real significance. All his real life, all his are to be found in the history of his soul. At th he made the great discovery, " There is a God, no more is wanted for wisdom." And it becam it is the mission of every true mystic, to induc wise to drop the shadow for the substance, and the inner secret way by which the erring sou its Divine Source.

But, although Saint-Martin was a mystic ginning, since mystics, like poets, are born, not determining point in his career was his mee extraordinary personage known in the occult w in any other, as Don Martines de Pasqually happened in 1767, when Saint-Martin, being in year, was following the singularly inappropriat as a subaltern in the regiment of Foix stationed

Who this Pasqually precisely was, or what history, or whence he derived his occult knowled and disciples cannot inform us. What they he was an initiate of the Rose Cross, a trans Swedenborg, and the founder and Grand Sover of Elect Cohens. Among the unregenerate order is calculated to excite a smile, but amidst all their gifts have small sense of being a quality alone of the mere peri Pasqually, a middle-aged magician, if t mitted, with his order established in Paris, Bordeaux to win fresh Cohens for it, and far t
those he came across was the young lieut regiment, Louis Claude de Saint-Martin.
shortly afterwards, Saint-Martin henceforth active propaganda, using his personal in chiefly in aristocratic circles, and writing pamphlets to spread the light and advance the put any other name on his title-pages than that Inconnu."

Of a more spiritual type than his maste abandoned early in his career the showy magical and theurgic power, the exercise of a rapping, table-turning, and the rest, in wh delights. To Saint-Martin inward illu the only thing necessary, and while he the exhibition of transcendental faculties, transcendental instrument to be the will, conformity.

There is a great resemblance to Schop
Martin's writings, although the philosopher w 1788, when the mystic's chief work was do through his studies in mystic literature, well acquainted with the Unknown Philos no mention of him when treating of mystic latter's aphorisms leave quite a Schopenhu tongue :—" The works which I have comp end than to persuade my readers to aban excepting my own." " Books are the win they are not the doors ; they point out thing

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Mr. Vizetelly's Reminiscences.

Mr. Edward Vizetelly has had an interesting and unusual, if not startlingly adventurous, career. He writes moderately, if not conspicuously, well. His rambling reminiscences entitled FROM CYPRUS TO ZANZIBAR (Pearson, 16s.), though they do not do a great deal to illuminate the dark places of history, are quite worth reading. Mr. Vizetelly went to Cyprus at the time of the British occupation, taught languages, drafted petitions for Cypriots with grievances at the rate of a dollar a petition, and edited a newspaper which the authorities did not like. He was also a prominent journalist in Egypt before, after, and during the bombardment of Alexandria, got locked up for libel, and afterwards cleared his character and got his antagonist locked up for perjury. Later, Mr. James Gordon Bennett sent him to meet Stanley on his return from Darkest Africa for the coast on behalf of the New York Herald, with urgent instructions to "scoop" the New York World. On all these matters Mr. Vizetelly writes chattily and agreeably, and if the history of his libel action naturally has more importance in his eyes than it is likely to have in those of most of his readers, his account of Egyptian journalism throws light on a subject which has not been very much written about.

King Alfred.

There will be a welcome for THE STORY OF KING ALFRED (1s.) written by the late Sir Walter Besant for Messrs. Newnes' excellent little Library of Useful Stories. It exhibits some of the faults of the author's later manner. There is over-emphasis, unnecessary reiteration, and a tone of patronage towards the reader with which, if we are not mistaken, the public of the Board Schools and Continuation classes, for whom it is specially intended, will not be particularly pleased. But, like all Sir Walter Besant's work, it is lucid and interesting. The account of the condition of England in Alfred's time is particularly graphic and gives colour to the view that when novelists take to writing history they are apt to write it, at all events for some purposes, better than the historians. On the whole this is the best book for the average man who wants to attune his mind to a proper appreciation of the millenary ceremonies.

Messrs. Macmillan seasonably publish a new (10th) edition of the late Thomas Hughes' book on ALFRED THE GREAT (3s. 6d.).

Sea-Fishing.

If there were no other books on the subject with which Mr. F. G. Aflalo deals in SEA AND COAST FISHING (Grant Richards, 6s.), his volume would, no doubt, have filled a gap. But, as a matter of fact, there is no gap to be filled; the subject is monotonous and easily exhausted. It has, indeed, been exhausted from the practical point of view by "John Bickerdyke." By the very nature of things fishing in the sea has a lack of variety, it wants all the finer elements of sport, and a list of baits when once compiled may almost stand for ever. What there is new in Mr. Aflalo's book might have been compressed into an article in the Field or Land and Water. Any future works on sea-fishing, to ensure vitality, must be more literary than scientific; they should deal with nature, with the aspect of the sea. They might indeed, without disadvantage, follow the ancient receipt for cooking chub, concentrate on the sauce, and omit the fish.

Bijou Biographies.

We do not know the name of Mr. Kent Carr, who stands on the title page of the biography of Miss CORELLI (Drane, 1s.), but the editor, in his preface, "special matter which we have been so fortuna command"—a statement which suggests that Mis herself furnished the material for it—a suggestion sug out by the book itself. We learn among other things, laughed at her critics, especially the "arch offender Hal in the pages of a magazine.

Miss Corelli laughed again when "Barabbas reached its fourteenth edition. And Hall Caine—out pale—must have had a cheery sensation of over-de loneliness as he welcomed Swinburne, H. D. Tral Allen, Zangwill, &c., to the outer darkness. It is that Edmund Gosse, "one of the minor poets," m arrived amongst them in an extinguished condition.

Mistakes.

The reader of Mr. C. E. Clark's MORE MISTAKES (Marshall, 1s. 6d. n.) is reminded of a famous remark beam and the mote, or of those who cried, "Physic thyself!" Mr. Clark's thesis seems to be that mist common in print, and ought to be carefully avoided, a course of illustrating it he makes more blunders of all k we ever remember seeing in so small a book. Many of doubt, are the fault of the printer, who must be respo "permissable" and for the curious introduction of "b "the best known word of its kind," and the statement that "Liége" is an error, while p. 28 tells us that always be written with the "accent aigue." We hav such slips by the dozen, but forbear to mention the this abundance of printer's errors should fill Mr. C compunction for the severe way in which he speaks writers whose blunders may have had precisely the sa But when we consider some of the mistakes in his which no such explanation can easily be accepted, we with a respectful wonder that so strangely ignorant should have been permitted to criticize other writ Clark, for example, really seems to believe that the fac of Arc's execution has been disproved—so far as we ca stand his rather rambling remarks on the subject of calls "her pathological imposition on the infantile and superstition of her comrades." He seems to t "Martell's Brandy" is somehow connected with Charle though we cannot quite follow his train of thought. H Scott of blundering, on the ground that Elspeth Antiquary" "has a bairn in the cradle, when she been well over sixty." We should like to have the ref this statement. The most extraordinary of all t ridiculous things in this book is the remark on the spelling of "Eureka," where Mr. Clark is very severe who omit the aspirate, adding, "Perhaps Dryden or while transcribing 'Heureka,' imagined that the philo his excitement was short of breath and so dropped his a If there is any other explanation of this amazing sugge that Mr. Clark thinks that Plutarch wrote in English, be glad to hear it. After wading through his tas almost disposed to believe that possible.

We have received Vol. IV. (poetry) of the WORKS BYRON (Murray, 6s.). It includes Manfred, Beppo Faliero, and other poems written while in Italy betw thing Byron ever said of him, that "he was not ill-favoured." Southey's hooked nose and air of surprised and sickly regret remind one of nothing so much as of Maître Corbeau, when, having sung his song, he sees Fox the Flatterer run off with the meat.

To CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF THE BOER WAR (7s. 6d.), written by Richard Danes, belongs the distinction of being the most bloodthirsty work on the subject that we have seen. It is packed with sanguinary anecdotes of hand-to-hand encounters. The book is written in lively journalese, and no doubt boys will thoroughly enjoy it. There are plenty of maps and pictures.

The third volume of Dr. Allchin's MANUAL OF MEDICINE (Macmillan, 7s. 6d. n.) deals with the diseases of the nervous system, and fully maintains the high level of excellence reached by volumes I. and II. In treating of a subject where there is so much scope for theories devoid of experimental basis, it is a great help to the student to be sure where knowledge ends and speculation begins; the present volume contains well-written accounts of what we know concerning the structure of the nervous system in health and the alterations it undergoes in disease. The etiology and symptoms of each disease are given at some length; comparatively little is said as to treatment. The book includes several good illustrations and tables, but is very inadequately indexed. It may be cordially recommended to advanced students and practitioners.

In A CENTURY OF LAW REFORM (Macmillan, 5s. n.), we have lectures delivered at Lincoln's Inn by Mr. Blake Odgers, Sir Harry B. Poland, Mr. John Pawley Bate, Mr. A. T. Carter, Mr. Augustine Birrell, Mr. Alfred Henry Ruegg, Mr. Arthur Underhill, Mr. Montague Lush, and Mr. T. B. Napier, on the improvements introduced into methods of legal procedure during the nineteenth century. Most of us know in a general way what those changes are; few of us probably realize how sweeping they have been. Here we get a very good idea of them, as complete as the conditions permitted, in a very readable form.

IN MEMORIAM HARRIET MENRICOFFRE (Horace Marshall, 5s.) is the title of a volume in which Mrs. Josephine Butler edits, with the minimum of explanatory comment, letters written by her sister, the wife of a Swiss gentleman at the head of the Protestant community at Naples. Their interest is mainly for friends of the family, whose attention we gladly direct to them.

ROBERT BROWNING AS A RELIGIOUS TEACHER, by Arthur Cecil Pigou (Clay, 2s. 6d. n.), is the Burney Essay for 1900.

EVERYBODY'S PARIS (Heinemann, 1s. 6d. n.) is one of the completest guides it has ever been our fortune to encounter. It is divided into two parts, and intending visitors to Paris are advised to study the first half of the book on the way, so as to familiarize themselves with such matters as interpreters, Custom-houses, hotels, cabs, the difficulties of French money, omnibuses, tramcars, and so forth. It has maps, tables of weights and measures, advice to theatre-goers, a directory of churches, clubs, and racecourses, and numberless illustrations. Part II. is a dictionary of sights and monuments which may be reserved for consultation on arrival. On the whole, we have seldom seen anywhere a book containing so much and so various information for the money.

THE "CHICOT" PAPERS, by Keble Howard (Arrowsmith, 1s.), are reprinted from the Sketch. The author's method is to go somewhere—to Brighton, to Oxford, to Lord's, to Molesey—and give a humorous account of what strikes his eye there. His humour is quiet but not the less effective, and the accompanying sketches by Mr. Tom Browne are much to be admired. It is as good a book of its kind as we have lately seen.

FICTION.

Dorothea Gerard.

THE SUPREME CRIME (Methuen, 6s.), by D (Madame Longard de Longgarde), brings us i The ordinary novel reader is not perhaps very with the home life of the Ruthenian popes or p but by the time he has finished this book h very much more to learn on that subject. Longgarde knows her country well, and depicts detail and minute particulars. She is, of cours and an accomplished writer, but the method sh say the least of it, leisurely. Up to about pag no means deeply interested in the fortunes of Until chapter IX. all is preparation, arrangem after that one is deep in the heart of an enth The hero, Gregor Petrow, is helped with ordination by a pope who will accept him as a Gregor is an intensely virtuous gentleman duri days, but when he comes home to claim his bri dark, heavy, passionate eldest daughter, he fall gay and foolish Wasylya, and the result of thi affections, with the sudden and mysterious deat his marriage with Zenobia, go some way towards Do the Ruthenian peasants and popes of the Gr are very nearly peasants, really lack the grain which would have set at rest the terrible t Zenobia and Gregor become involved? Cert common sense used, however, and the passionate is broken and the lives of most of the a characters are marred or end in bitterness picture of village life in this particular corner is of value; there is a reality in the doing Longgarde's people which charms and convinc wish that to them life had been a little gaye proportion.

"He's got his veins stuffed with his own If you pricked him I'm sure it would not be b run out." This is the criticism passed by the same author's SAWDUST (Heinemann, 6s.) o father-in-law. But it will bear a further app would not run out of any of the characters in author knows well the beautiful Carpathian w types of German, Pole, and Jew inhabiting it; given something more than an obvious love-sto tional, if fairly vivid, portrait of a "self-m From another writer the book might be accep tion, but the "Supreme Crime," just noticed Gerard a standard of which the present work falls

Black Friday.

Few Scottish writers can reach mid trying their hands at a story of the Forty-five Machray is no exception to the rule. But credit for making his hero take no part in the is a distinct spice of originality in the case (Constable, 6s.), who, although heir to the D remains plain Hector Maclean to the last par chapter. Birchin-lane and 'Change-alley rec Scottish nobility, instead of the Stuart cam true, to Derby and back, but it is to procure of the Prince's movements and prospects th

"Trewern."

TREWERN; A TALE OF THE THIRTIES, by R. M. Thomas (Fisher Unwin, 6s.), is a first book of quite exceptional merit. It excels in style and structure the average novel, even many of those bearing the names of authors of high reputation. It is built out of very simple materials. The tale told by himself is of the life of David Evans, the young squire of Trewern, who has a shrewd eye for nature and a love of her in storm as well as in sunshine, and also an uncommon intuitive knowledge of his fellow men. There are many sufficiently exciting episodes, and throughout the reader's interest is on the stretch to know whether the squire of Trewern will marry Mary Gwynn or Diana Trevor. His final betrothal to the latter is a scene of intense dramatic power. The book is too subtly compact to be analysed, but it will well repay perusal and reperusal.

From Natal.

It is quite plain that Mr. Turnbull has a very close acquaintance with Boers and blacks. So much is evident from his intimate descriptions of life on the veldt. There is most adequate material in TALES FROM NATAL (Fisher Unwin, 3s. 6d.) for entrancing short stories of a kind of life which has not yet found a capable interpreter unless we except Olive Schreiner. "Landula" and "Dungula," two customs of native tribes, are described with truthfulness. But the touch of the artist is lacking, though the customs themselves are so entertaining as to make good reading. "Kwa-Bahu" is another example of opportunity missed. In his sketch of Boer life, "Paul Kruher and Piet Jubair," Mr. Turnbull is less bald, and gets a little, but only a little, nearer to the artistic standpoint. Some Boers are no doubt very "bad eggs," but a sketch of any kind of life should be informed by sympathy, and of this the author has little. For the most part his writing reeks of cynicism, which leads him to serve up on p. 112 one of the hoariest of anecdotes concerning hypocrisy and apply it to a Boer household. There are other sins. What young woman, Boer or any other, would speak to her lover of her father and mother as "the former" and "the latter?" And what reader of fiction is so patient as to plough through pages of colloquial Dutch that require elucidatory notes six deep at the foot of the page? Still, with many literary faults, the book possesses interest.

Mr. Silas Hocking.

Simplicity, directness, and a sound ethical basis are the main qualities of Mr. Silas K. Hocking's art. This is demonstrated once more in THE FATE OF ENDILLOE (Warne, 3s. 6d.), which is written in the same manner as the most successful among his thirty books. It is a little late in the day for a critic to make suggestions to a novelist when the publisher says that upwards of one million volumes of his books have been sold, and, although we could find fault with Mr. Hocking's pedestrian methods and slightly Philistinic point of view, we hold our hand and merely congratulate him and his public on being so well mated. And the reader may be sure the hero of "The Fate of Endilloe" is well mated too. Justin Pentyres begins life "as principal salesman at a seed, manure, and agricultural implement store." But he is a high-spirited fellow, and after many difficulties the story ends as happily as Mr. Hocking's readers wish it to end.

Fiction for the Easily Pleased.

Among the novels of no marked literary importance but of

IN THE SHADOW OF GLORY (Grant Richards, 6s.), by Mr. A Leighton, is a tale which will make the quietest bod echo with a thousand crimes and exciting escapes, p victories. The "human interest" is not great, but plenty of melodrama, mystery, elaboration, and breathless ment. The pictures, such as "She flung out her voluntarily," are some of the worst we have seen in fiction. A SOUL TEMPTATION (Chatto, 6s.), by the auth Suburban Vendetta," Mr. John K. Leys, opens on th banks of Loch Aline:

> Two young people—a girl of about seventeen and a > years older—sat on a rock at the head of the loch wa > fishing-boat that slowly rounded the point where o > eastern hills threw a spur into the sea and shut in > from the open sound. Neither of them spoke until th > disappeared. When it was gone the girl gave a little > turned her face on her companion. It was a pretty fa > than pretty—at least Archie Lennox thought so. . .

Estelle and Archie do a good deal of harmless philo and they have their temptations and their difficulties, a is a murder, and ere the heather bell faded one year, to Ley's affected phrase, Estelle was Archie's wife. It is tale with a good deal of excitement, some Scottish sentim some domestic interest within its 330 pages.

During researches for Indian historical authorities British Museum Mr. Mark Ashton came upon the acc very curious weapon which once belonged to the r conqueror Sivaji, and decided that he could weave a novel of the Mutiny. This book, THE NANA'S TALISMAN ( son, 6s.), is well and clearly written, and the plot i The personages are such as one meets in a good many the same period of Indian life; but the Asiatic atmos brought across the Cornish cliffs, and many developm highly exciting kind are provided for the reader who l inevitably somewhat artificial style of romance. TH ROAD THAT STRETCHES (Burleigh, 3s. 6d.) is a collection of of slight adventure, one of which bears the excellent titl Adventure of the Man loaded with Mischief." The sto not make an epoch in the art of letters, but they are written, with occasional happy turns of humour. M Hartley's manner is, perhaps a trifle passé, but, at worst on the side of grace; "The Road that Stretches" is we can recommend for a holiday jaunt. There is an incre of adventure and full measure of princely society and royal in the novel entitled THE PRESUMPTION OF STANLEY HA (Frederick Warne, 3s. 6d.), by Mr. Nowell Cay. Th good and the development of the plot by no means skill; it is a light and rather cheery book which will very grave demands upon the intelligence of the rea NOBLER THAN REVENGE (Long, 6s.), by Esmé Stuart, Beauworth obtains the lady of his heart at the end of th which has been busy with his and Ruby's fortunes pages; it is not a book that has thrilled us with deli those who have read and appreciated the same author' to Coventry" and "The Strength of Straw" will find entertain them in the present volume. Mr. J. A. Farrer book THE GREAT NOODLESHIRE ELECTION (Unwin, 3s comedy of political life, and quotes his Horace with an a

> Negligens, ne qua populus laboret, > Parce privatus nimium cavere, et > Dona praesentis cape laetus horae ac

AMONG THE REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES.

Mr. Edward Dicey writes for the Nineteenth Century on "The Irish Nuisance and How to Abate it." He urges the diminution of the Irish representation in Parliament. Mr. W. B. Woodgate discusses "International Boatracing," and formulates a plan which would not interfere with the prized amenities of the Henley picnic. "Recent Science" is dealt with by Prince Kropotkin, and literature is represented by Mr. Walter Frewen Lord's article on "Lord Lytton's Novels." Much of what he says reads like the pessimistic criticism of contemporary fiction; Lytton "deliberately wrote down to the level of the paying public of his day. . . . He could sell whatever rubbish he chose to write as fast as his pen could travel. It did not matter if the social and moral reflections were babyish; it did not matter if the plot wandered; it did not matter if a glossary was wanted for the thieves' slang—all was swallowed whole by a greedy public." The secret of his popularity, according to Mr. Lord, was that "he carried on in prose the Byronic tradition." But, perhaps, that was not so small an achievement as Mr. Lord supposes. A bright paper, though inclined to violence.

There is as usual an embarras de richesses in the Fortnightly. The political articles may not be so striking as sometimes; but this is the dead season, when other kinds of articles get their best chance. "Book Collecting as an Investment," by Mr. W. Roberts, will interest many readers. It follows the fortunes of several collections, and draws the moral that "books do not necessarily improve by keeping any more than do broken-winded horses or perambulators." Heber's great collection "cost about £80,000, whilst its sale in twelve portions, carried over a number of years, produced only £57,000." Prince Bonaparte's philological collection cost about £40,000, but "after his death it went begging for several years at various figures until it dropped to about £6,000 and was only sold a few weeks ago to a Chicago library." On the other hand, the Spencer collection cost about £100,000 and realized about £250,000. George Paston in the same number discusses Mrs. Lynn Linton as "A Censor of Modern Womanhood" critically but sympathetically; Gerhart Hauptmann's life and work are related and reviewed by Miss Beatrice Marshall; Mr. L. Marillier treats "Social Psychology in Contemporary French Fiction" with special reference to Zola and Rosny; and Mrs. Clifford contributes "a serious comedy in four acts."

In the Contemporary, M. Jean de Bloch returns to a favourite subject, and in the light of the Boer War discusses "The Wars of the Future." He maintains that our South African experiences prove that "the professional soldier no longer possesses his ancient superiority over the armed civilian who has undergone the shortest course of training"—a statement which may be true of some civilians but certainly is not true of all. His allegations concerning "the superiority of the British civilian over the British Regular" assuredly are not borne out by an important despatch recently published from Lord Kitchener. Signor Paolo d'Allaro writes of Crispi that "Italy, who has seen so many strong sons die willingly for her, was loved by none with purer or higher devotion"; "The Genius of Russia" is discussed by Mr. Havelock Ellis, with special reference to the interpretation of that genius by the Russian novelists. What impresses him about Russians is that "they have at all events a profound sense of responsibility." Messrs. Henry W. Macrosty and S. G. Hobson continue their examination of "The Billion Dollar Trust," and declare the only logical conclusion of the tendency which it exemplifies to be the nationalization of the iron and steel industry.

The best of the articles on foreign politics in the Monthly Review is "Italy's Case against her Allies," by Mr. W. B. Duffield, who is documenté though dull. His purpose is to show that Italy has got very little out of the Triple Alliance, which is true enough though that alliance has probably saved article) to the effect that the Man in the I were he) may have been as great a mys historical inquirers. He may not have k imprisoned for doing!" The art paper, this mo in Dramatic Art," by Edith Sichel.

We note two new permanent feature Magazine—Mr. G. K. Chesterton reviews "Books to Read"; Mr. A. B. Walkley phi Ways of the World."

"Pianists of the past," in Blackwood's, Salaman, is a paper of personal recollection way back. We read of Muzio Clementi, J Ignace Moscheles, Hummel, Liszt, Felix Men Schumann, Czerny, Chopin, Rubinstein, and article is quite the best thing in the number month consist mainly of attacks on Lord Ro Caine. The latter gentleman is, however, d charge of impropriety. "He touches dang delicacy which Mr. Pecksniff himself might contains no page of offence."

In addition to the usual set of coloured p and not less gaudy sportsmen, the Bad article of great interest by Darby Stafford on at Home." "A pilgrimage to Coate," s almost a necessity for the student of Jeffe guide and shows us over the farm and the f us down to the Mere—"the wide and m imaginative boyhood." It is well done, appeal than most of the articles in magazines

In the Magazine of Art we would d article by Mr. Richard Garnett on "Portrai National Portrait Gallery," a paper full tion, and dealing with other portraits of S indicated in the title. A particularly inte is that of the reputed portrait of Shelley hung in the Shakespeare Memorial at Stratf it cannot be a Shelley, and if a Shelley it ca is Mr. Garnett's verdict.

Miss Georgiana Hill's article on Guizo Magazine is entertaining, though superfici solemn prig, but not the political bungler. about Guizot's life in London, but little abou marriages or the '48 business. A more to William Miller's on "The Novels of Pe Electra became the oriflamme of the anti- the Peninsula, there has been some curiosit very easy to gratify. Mr. Miller gratif telling us a good deal about Galdos' wo about the man himself. "For a number of concentrated all his efforts on the product epic which should do for modern Spain w Macquart series of novels did for modern F late Gustav Freytag in his 'Ahnen' did the ages." He is an admirer of the British C works never cause the blush of shame to m innocence. Moreover he hates a priest as he

In the Empire Review many important ma In particular, Mr. C. de Thierry states the ca of South Africa." He complains that "U fared worse than paupers in England for te and every one preferred to themselves i Transvaal," and that "to be a Loyalist in S under a ban." Mr. V. Hussey Walsh gives Post Office from Within." Sir Charles A. R of the Chief Court of the Punjab, discusses the constitution of "An Imperial Court of F T. J. Tonkin continues his lively series of pa Trade in Southern Nigeria," and "Britain's is examined by Mr. H. Kopsch, late Commissi Secretary of Imperial Chinese Maritime Cus

In the American Historical Review there is an interesting account, by Mr. H. P. Biggar, of Marc Lescarbot, who "represents in France the position occupied by Hakluyt in the history of English geography." His work was done into English at Hakluyt's request by a Huguenot pastor in London. It would have been worth the writer's while, however, to give some account of Lescarbot's remarkable poem on Switzerland, published in 1618. It contains one of the very earliest descriptions of the glaciers.

We have also received Good Words, the Sunday Magazine, the Mission World, the Art Journal, Longman's Magazine, Cassell's Magazine, Little Folks, S. Nicholas, the Century, Temple Bar, Macmillan's Magazine, the School World, the Rambler, the Universal and Ludgate, the Antiquary, the Genealogical Magazine, the Artist, the Architectural Review, the Journal of Education, the Idler, the Argosy, and the Mercure de France.

THE LIBRARY ASSOCIATION.

The proceedings at the annual meeting of the Library Association, held at Plymouth and Devonport last week, did not rank quite so high from an intellectual point of view as some of the earlier meetings, but they were marked by good practical papers, and the discussions were suggestive. About 200 members were welcomed by the Mayor of Plymouth on August 27th, when the new President, Mr. G. K. Fortescue (British Museum), read his address. Its chief point of interest, we note especially, was his authoritative description of the events from which sprang the printed catalogue of the British Museum. Royal Commissions come and go with such sameness of method and such paucity of result that the public had probably lost all recollection of that which, sixty years ago, formulated the momentous recommendation against printing the catalogue. The delay has given us a better catalogue, and we agree with Mr. Fortescue that, though it is not absolutely perfect, it is, when compared with other catalogues, easily first alike in its magnitude and its method. Mr. Fortescue definitely stated that the authorities were not contemplating a subject-index. Subject-indexing he regards as one of the pleasures of life. Mr. Fortescue is fond of mountaineering, and with the true instinct of the library enthusiast he found that, in subject-indexing and mountaineering alike, the pleasure gained is one of degree, and the measure of success achieved atones for the toil, often painful, which goes towards winning success. In the same way he thought that constant difficulties and occasional annoyances were outweighed in the end by the pleasure and privileges enjoyed by the librarian—"servus servorum literarum."

Mr. Thomas Greenwood made a rather discursive speech on Edward Edwards, whom he regards as the founder of the public library movement, and Mr. E. A. Baker discussed book-reviews as aids to the selection of libraries. Many librarians, it appeared, preferred, when reviews differed so widely, to trust to a personal examination. A paper by Mr. R. K. Dent on the help which the librarian may lend to his readers was somewhat curious in its enunciation of facts which might popularly be supposed to come tritely to such an assembly. But succeeding speakers made it clear that a library staff is not necessarily a body of specialists, and that among the aids to readers which needed improvement was too often the library assistant himself. On the Wednesday a visit was paid to Devonport, where the subject dealt with was the position of the reference department in the internal economy of the library. No one disputed the growing need of it; the difficulty was how to gain the public to whom that portion of the institution is yet a sealed book. On Thursday there were papers on classification and cataloguing, the advocate of the prevailing dictionary form of catalogue being pitted against two opponents speaking respectively from scientific and popular standpoints. The report of the Council presented at the business meeting was a record of good work. It mentioned particularly the passing of a Public Libraries

Correspondence.

LITERARY AGENTS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The article in your issue of August 24 on Literary is so well-informed in substance and so temperate in ju and expression that we hesitate to ask you to find space letter. But this is a matter of some importance; one, mo comparatively new to public discussion; and we ar therefore, that you would wish to have it adequately set your readers. It is the easier to approach it in your own mood after the conclusive way in which you dismiss a savage attack, and after your remark that "the defence, on grounds, of literary agents who conduct their business p is now superfluous."

The qualification in this phrase is, of course, nece but in presence of the Society of Authors it is hardly n to say that "there is nothing to hinder a dishonest m setting up in business as a literary agent." The young a path is hedged with the gibbets on which Mr. Thring has vicious old publishing agreements. We will not say tha not know of a single case of the kind in which an agent ha concerned. But if the instances were at all numerous in wh you say, "it is freely alleged that certain literary agent taken advantage of their clients," the detectives of Portuga would surely have made some exposure ere now. Th guarantee of honesty, however, is precisely the same in t of a literary agent as in that of any other professional man business depends upon his good repute. The affairs beginners whom you are properly anxious to protect are o value to him, the inducements to dishonesty are very small the risk of dishonesty would be as great in conductin business as in that of a Kipling, a Conan Doyle, a C Hyne. This is putting the matter on the lowest gro expediency. Theoretically, an editor or a solicitor can be b actually we believe those things do not happen. The sugg that agents may cheat their clients by selling their M less than market value is a curious inversion of the com and, we believe, more well-founded idea that they artf force up prices. We do not claim that a literary agent is a just man made perfect; and it is by no means unlike his estimate of a fair value may sometimes fall short author's self-appreciation. But the commission system a obvious need of satisfying a client afford a substantial safe and if he does not think this enough the author can reserve the right of vetoing any transaction. The wr your article seems to think that every author has a d market value. He hasn't. Most beginners and a great who are not beginners do but starve on the crumbs th from the publishing table.

"In the second place," we read, "even the scrupulously honest agent can seldom do as much fo young author as the young author, if he keeps his eyes ope do for himself." This is true enough of the mere fetchi carrying of commonplace MSS., but it is surely very far being true of everything beyond this. In fact, the difficu securing to the young author the benefit of the agent perience, his acquaintance with the literary market and leg other conditions, and his international organization, is a pr competitors is so nearly identical that he can have no reason (short of rank dishonesty) for favouring one above the other. "In the third place," you say, "the literary agent can only in a few instances make such a study of a man's work that he will know the man's market as well as he knows it himself." Experience disproves this argument, except in regard to established writers in some very narrow groove; and even they are often glad to break new ground at home or abroad, and to have business worries taken from them at the cost of a small commission.

Not the literary agent but modern competition is responsible for the collapse of "those personal associations between editors and contributors which are not only agreeable but useful." The old relation being destroyed, the agent seeks to establish a new one. If the disappearance of the agent were to mean an indefinite increase of callers at the editorial door, the agent would have to be re-created—if only for the purpose of acting as a policeman and first "taster." The editor and contributor who desire to meet will find, not that their common wish is frustrated by the agent's existence, but that it is facilitated by the presence of a man who is known to both of them.

A last point. Admittedly the author can, if he happen to combine a certain business ability with distinct literary qualities, thrive without an agent of his own. But not without the agent of other men. Such an author, acting independently, will find most publishers and editors meet him fairly and even, it may be, generously. But eliminate the agent, take away from the buyer the consciousness that the seller has at command expert opinion and guidance if he care to avail himself of them, and it would not be long before we witnessed a return to the old rule that made the earth the publisher's and the fulness thereof. Only the agent's existence makes it possible for an author to be independent of him.

Faithfully yours,

G. H. PERRIS.
C. F. CAZENOVE.

The Literary Agency of London, 5, Henrietta-street, W.C.

KNIGHTS OF ST. JOHN.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Is there not a mistake in your review of Professor Legge's "Close of the Middle Ages" in your number of August 31st?

You say of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, "only a limited number were in Holy Orders, while the rest were laymen, who had taken special vows."

Surely this Order were Canons Regular, part of the Austin Canons, with special vows. Of course, as in the case of monks, they were not all priests; but, surely, they, as all Canons Regular, cannot be described as laymen.

I remain your obedient servant,

R. PHIPPS, Colonel late R. Artillery.

The Stone, Chalfont St. Giles, Bucks, Sept. 2, 1901.

 The word "laymen" was used in the modern—which is also the ancient—sense, of persons not belonging to the three higher orders, and not in the sense of the Middle Ages, which extended the term "clergy" to all who obeyed any kind of rule. In early times all monks were "laymen" and were carefully distinguished from the "clergy." The Teutonic Order and that of St. John were divided into three classes: 1, friendly and intimate together," inkle being for "an inferior, coarse kind of tape." A impudent, over-confident," or "proud, stuck would say, "Za fess as a paycock." Sho rather be coxy's, from coxy, "conceited," or fident"? Brazil-wood is very hard and he often taken as the type of hardness. The brazil is commonly used in many parts of Eng

Yours faithfully,

University of Würzburg, Bavaria.

KING JAMES II.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—At a time when it is the custom versaries, I may perhaps be excused for calli which seems to be in some danger of being to the death of King James the Second, September 6th, 1701. From the purely litera was not, indeed, of much significance. He which have raised some perplexing problem patronized Wycherley, and was the familia Penn. But there his relations to literatur subject of much historical writing he m Englishmen an interesting figure, and a pat as Ranke said, "he moved amid illusions wh and he aimed at impossible things." He claims to be remembered; for, though he did perhaps more for English liberty and Pro other monarch; he took a real interest in great predecessor Alfred did so much to Imperialism dimly floated in his mind, and York he will be for all time associated with

I am yours faithfully,

C. B. RO

9, Cook-street, Liverpool, Sept. 4.

DEACON BRODIE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In Literature of August 31st yo of a new novel by Mr. Dick Donovan, which to one Deacon William Brodie, an eight councillor of Edinburgh." "One virtue, reviewer, "Mr. Donovan reveals—he has no a hero of this specious Deacon, who fin on an Edinburgh scaffold,"—as who should say Cæsar, who was finally murdered in an your Reviewer possibly have forgotten "Wil of the Wrights, Housebreaker and Maste course he cannot. Is he not your Review he forget David Pew or Macaire's own self. I shall not presume too unwarrantably upon your Reviewer why he attributes as a Henley and Stevenson their apotheosis of the I fancy the idea will be to most peop explanation very welcome. Personally I am by your Reviewer's insinuations as if he h novel relating to one Hamlet, a Prince of the book's sole virtue in the fact that "it specious philosopher, who finally ended his

I remain, Sir, your

W. H

by your correspondent's letter. Edinburgh is not the world, and those of its celebrities who are, so far as their deserts go, better forgotten than remembered are not the world's historical figure-heads, even though they can be reckoned among the minor ornaments of our literature. An Edinburgh eighteenth-century rascal is not a Julius Cæsar; nor the hero of a play by Henley and Stevenson a Hamlet.

THE FORTHCOMING EDITION OF HAZLITT.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In connexion with the forthcoming edition of Hazlitt's collected works, I shall be very glad to hear from any one who may possess the fourth volume (in MS.) of the "Memoirs of Thomas Holcroft." Three volumes of these memoirs, written partly by Holcroft and partly by Hazlitt, were published in 1810.

I am yours faithfully,

A. R. WALLER.

Santon Lodge, Reigate-hill, Surrey.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Next week Messrs. Constable will publish the first volume of their new Shakespeare (in twenty volumes), with coloured illustrations by well-known artists, and the first volume of their new Meredith in fifteen pocket volumes; and later in the month will come their Boswell's Life of Johnson, in six volumes, with an introduction by Mr. Birrell and 100 portraits. Messrs. Constable also announce a translation of René Vallery-Radot's Life of Pasteur, by Mrs. R. L. Devonshire (two vols.); "Dante and Giovanni del Virgillo"—including a critical edition of the text of Dante's two Latin Eclogues and of the poetic remains of Del Virgilio—by Messrs. Philip H. Wicksteed and Edmund G. Gardner; a volume of "Sermons" by T. E. Brown—the author of "Fo'c's'le Yarns"—"Burma under British Rule," by John Nisbet; "Five Stuart Princesses," by Robert S. Rait; "Pictures of War," by John Stuart, including chapters on the Siege of Ladysmith, Mahon's March to Mafeking, and Why the War Goes On; "With the Flag at Sea," by Walter Wood, illustrated by H. C. Seppings Wright; "Travels round Our Village," by Eleanor G. Haydon; and "A Ribbon of Iron," by Annette M. B. Meakin—an illustrated account of a journey over the Siberian Railway. In fiction Messrs. Constable are publishing this week "Cardigan," by R. W. Chambers, and "The Westerners," by S. E. White; next week, "Stephen Calinari," by Julian Sturgis; "The Man that Knew Better," by Tom Gallon, illustrated by Gordon Browne; and at the beginning of October Mr. Maurice Hewlett's volume of "New Canterbury Tales."

Messrs. Cassell announce a new work on South Africa entitled "Behind the Scenes in the Transvaal; Being Reminiscences of an English Official," by David Mackay Wilson, who was practically the first Gold Commissioner of the first Goldfields in the Transvaal. Messrs. Cassell also announce a new work by Dean Spence on "Early Christianity and Paganism"; a new book by Sir Robert Ball on "The Earth's Beginning"—based on the last Christmas course of lectures at the Royal Institution; a volume by Colonel W. H. Daniel entitled "The Military Forces of the Crown: Their Organization and Equipment," with an introduction; and the first volume of an illustrated edition (in six volumes) of their great work on "Social England," which was edited by the late Mr. Traill. Several sections (as those dealing with military organization and art) have been completely re-written, while the rest of colour"]; "Chinese Porcelain," by the late Mr. Monkhouse (a limited edition with coloured plates and illustrations); and "A Masque of Days: From the Last of Elia," newly dressed and decorated by Mr. Walter Cra

Mr. Heinemann has in preparation a series of volumes on "The Great Peoples" somewhat after the p John Richard Green's "Short History of the English Peo under the editorship of Professor F. York Powell; and th volume, on "The Spanish People," by Martin A. S. Hum be followed by "The French People," by Arthur Hassall, and "The Russian People," by J. Fitzmaurice Kelly.

Mr. E. H. Lacon-Watson, the author of "The Uneas Humourist" and "An Attic in Bohemia," will publish month with Mr. Elkin Mathews a book entitled "Chris Deane: a Study of School and College Life." The sc laid at Winchester and Cambridge.

A new book, entitled "All the Russias," by Mr. Norman, M.P., will be published in October by Mr. Hein in England and by Charles Scribner's Sons in New York.

The Oxford University Press collotype facsimile of the Folio Shakespeare has been fully subscribed for. The v cannot be ready for distribution until the autumn of 1902

Mr. Fisher Unwin will shortly issue a new novel b James Baker, the author of "The Cardinal's Page," dealin phases of journalistic life. Since going through C Europe for the Education Department, Mr. Baker ha travelling in Russia and Finland as a special corresponde

The regiment known as Lumsden's Horse, which di excellent work in South Africa during the earlier stages campaign, is to have its history recorded in a book by Sir I Playfair and Colonel Lumsden (the present commanding o Messrs. T. C. and E. C. Jack will publish in a few cheaper edition of the "Ordnance Gazetteer of Scotla about one-fifth of its original cost, and with the additi large map of Scotland and an abstract of the 1901 census.

Messrs. Alden, of Oxford, are publishing a book of called "Boshtan Ballads," by Mr. Lionel Begbie, of Ma whose initials will be familiar to readers of the Isis. Mr. Begbie, we understand, is a cousin of Mr. Harold Begbie

Messrs. Hurst and Blackett announce "To the Sout Regions," by Louis Bernacchi, F.R.G.S., being an acc the Southern Cross expedition 1898-1900. The author h position of Scientist to the expedition and will join the Di Expedition, now on its way to Australia, in October next

Koroléuko is at work on a novel dealing with Pug Cossack of the Ural, who professed to be Peter III., and all the south-east of Russia against Catherine the Great subject has also been treated by Pushkin.

Bernhard Berenson's "The Study and Criticism of Art," (Bell) consists of Essays contributed by the author the last ten years to various periodicals, chiefly the Ne Nation and the Gazette des Beaux Arts. Messrs. Bell ha in the press a new, revised edition of Mr. Berenson's "I Lotto," with many illustrations.

The Rev. S. P. H. Statham requests us to state th reference to his forthcoming book of Dover Charters, wh mentioned recently, the period covered does not comm 1565, but ranges from 1203 to 1565.

Books to look out for at once.

"Diary of the Boer War." By Colonel de Villebois-Mareuil. Tr by Frederic Lees. A. and C. Black.

[Translated from the Paris Liberté. With portrait of the Co

"To the South Polar Regions." By Louis Bernacchi, F.R.G.S and Blackett.

[An account of the Southern Cross expedition, 1898-190 graphs.]

"Josephine, Empress of the French." By Frederick A. Ober. Unwin. 7s. 6d.

[An American study of Josephine's life, including the corres between Josephine and Napoleon. Illustrated.]

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

FICTION.

THE OCTOPUS. By F. Norris. 7¾×5¼. 652 pp. Grant Richards.
[Deals with the war between the Wheat Grower and the Railroad Trust in California, and is the first of a "trilogy" which is to give the complete story of a crop of wheat from its sowing in California to its consumption in Europe.]

SANTA CLAUS'S PARTNER. By T. N. Page. 7⅝×5. 194 pp. Grant Richards.

A SET OF FLATS. By Mason A. Griffiths. 7¾×5¼. 236 pp. Milne. 3s. 6d.
[A detective story in which a Boer agent figures.]

THE MILLION. By Dorothea Gerard. 7¾×5⅛. 346 pp. Methuen. 6s.
[The story of a million florins left by a notary in Lycaon to establish an orphanage.]

FROM THE LAND OF THE SHAMROCK. By Jane Barlow. 7¾×5¼. 318 pp. Methuen. 6s.

GOD'S REBEL. By H. Fuller. 7¾×5¼. 373 pp. Jarrold. 6s.
[The story of a Professor at Chicago who ruins his career by his assertion of the labourers' right to live.]

REAL LIFE. By C. S. Marshall. 7¾×5¼. 280 pp. Drane. 6s.
[A modern story of religious tone.]

THE CALL OF THE FUTURE. By Mrs. B. Tanqueray. 7¾×5¼. 318 pp. Hurst and Blackett. 6s.
[The scene is the fruit and flower farm of "Neuequay." A modern love story.]

THE MYSTERY OF LANDY COURT. By Fergus Hume. 7½×5. 214 pp. Jarrold. 6s.

THE YEAR ONE. By J. Rhoscelle Burton. 7¾×5¼. 370 pp. Methuen. 6s.
[A story of the French Revolution.]

THE STRANGE DISAPPEARANCE OF LADY DELIA. By Louis Tracy. 7¾×5¼. 330 pp. Pearson. 6s.

THE SNARES OF THE WORLD. By Hamilton Aide. 8×5¼. 414 pp. Murray. 6s.
[A readable story in the Carlton House Terrace atmosphere, ending with the usual "paragraph in the Morning Post."]

THE WARRIGALS WELL. By D. Macdonald and J. G. Edgar. 7¾×5¼. 307 pp. Ward, Lock. 6s.
[Gold mining exploration in North Australia. By the author of "How we Kept the Flag Flying."]

HISTORY.

CLOUGH'S CERTIFICATE HISTORY OF EUROPE, 1814-1848. 7½×5. 301 pp. Ralph.

WHO KILLED AMY ROBSART? By P. Sidney, F.R.Hist.S. 7¾×5¼. 59 pp. Stock. 3s. 6d. n.
[Deals fully with Sir Walter Scott's errors in "Kenilworth," acquits Dudley, and concludes that Amy Robsart was killed "by a person or persons unknown."]

MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS, and Who Wrote the Casket Letters? By S. Cowan, J.P. Two vols. 9½×6½. 367-427 pp. Sampson Low. 32s. n.
[An exhaustive bibliography defending Mary and concluding that the Casket Letters were written by Maitland, Buchanan, Archibald Douglas, and Thomas Crawford.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

HOW TO SUCCEED IN YOUR EXAMINATION. By G. A. Wade. (The "How to" Series.) 7½×5¼. 218 pp. Grant Richards.
[A very practical and exhaustive little book on all subjects connected with examinations, and the preparation for them.]

DOMESTIC ECONOMY IN THEORY AND PRACTICE. By Marion Greenwood Bidder and Florence Baddeley. The Cambridge Series for Schools and Training Colleges. 7½×5. 246 pp. Cambridge University Press.
[For students in training to become teachers of domestic science subjects. A scientific and practical exposition of the arts of cookery, laundrywork, housewifery, &c.]

A HORSE BOOK. (Dumpy Books for Children.) By Mary Tourtel. 5×3½. 95 pp. Grant Richards. 1s. 6d.

FROM CYPRUS TO ZANZIBAR. By E. Vuccelli. 9×5¾. 480 pp. Pearson. 16s.
[See Review, p. 238.]

NATURAL HISTORY.

THE LIFE HISTORY OF BRITISH SERPENTS. By G. R. Leighton, M.D. 7¾×5¼. 383 pp. Blackwood. 5s. n.
[Part I. treats of the three British species. Part II. takes the various districts of the British Isles. Contains a mass of notes of local observations, and many photographs. A good book by a competent authority.]

WOODLAND, FIELD, AND SHORE. Wild Nature depicted with Pen and Camera. By G. C. Pike. 7½×5. 232 pp. Religious Tract Society. 5s. n.
[The photographs from wild life are interesting, the letterpress popular and attractive to field naturalists who use the camera.]

REPRINT AND NEW EDITION.

COLIN CLOUT'S CALENDAR. The Record of a Summer, April-October. By Grant Allen. New Ed. 7¾×5¼. 237 pp. Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.

ALFRED THE GREAT, ENGLAND'S DARLING. By Alfred Austin. 5th Ed. 7½×5. 168 pp. Macmillan. 2s. 6d. n.

THEOLOGY.

A SHORT HISTORY OF THE HEBREWS TO THE ROMAN PERIOD. By R. L. Ottley. 7¾×5. 294 pp. Cambridge University Press.
[A scholarly and careful sketch, "more consistent with the present state of our knowledge than the text books now in use." It does not enter minutely into critical or theological problems, and as to the patriarchal period it gives the Hebrew tradition, recognizing that it is now impossible to establish its accuracy. Maps, chronological tables, and appendices on the documentary sources, Hebrew law, &c.]

THE GREEK TESTAMENT. New Ed. 6½×4¼. 565 pp. Clarendon Press. 6s.

CHESS.

Address "Chess": Literature, Printing House S

PROBLEM No. 224, by J. FRIDLIZIUS, Sweden.
BLACK. 7 pieces.

WHITE. 10 pieces.
White to play and mate in two moves.

PROBLEM P. LARSEN
BLACK.

WHITE.
White to play and m

PROBLEM No. 226, by S. Loyd.—White (K sq; B at K R 6; pawns at K 2, Q B 2. Bl K at K Kt 8; Q at K R 8; R at K Kt 6; B at at K R 4, K R 7, K Kt 7, Q B 6. White to play

PROBLEM No. 227, by J. Fridlizius.—White (K Kt 3; Q at Q Kt sq; R at Q B 5; B at K B pawns at K 2, Q 5, Q R 4. Black (5 pieces) K Q R 3; pawns at K 3, Q B 3, Q Kt 3. Three m

Two simple (?) three movers by J. Möller, C

PROBLEM No. 228, by J. Möller.—White (K R sq; Q at K Kt sq; B at Q 3; pawns at K Black (5 pieces)—K at Q R 4; Kt at Q B 6; Q Kt 3, Q R 5. Three moves.

PROBLEM No. 229, by J. Möller.—White (Q B 2; Q at K B 2; Kts at K R 6 and Q K Kt 3, Q 5, Q B 4, Q R 3. Black (5 pieces)— K Kt 2; Kt at Q R sq; pawns at K R 4, K 5. These are very fine catches.

RECENT EVENTS AND GENERAL NOTES.—The New York State Chess Association at Buffalo p interesting of all recent events. The entries of F. J. Marshall, and W. E. Napier, the three y champions, proved highly attractive, and their pl with the keenest interest. The scores in the le two-round tourney were, each playing 10 games:

H. N. Pillsbury, 9	E. Delmar, 6½	F. J.
W. E. Napier, 6½	C. S. Howell, 4½	L. Ka

The poor score of Marshall is notable—he won 2, 7. During the meeting Pillsbury played 16 simultaneously, winning 11 and drawing 5. record is 20 games played thus, and this number attempted by others or exceeded by Pillsbury, doing 25 or 30. He is also said to be coming to prolonged visit and to contemplate retirement that. But we know from experience how much attached to such rumours.

Another very interesting meeting was a cong burg, organized by the Scandinavian Chess Asso in chief event:—

J. Möller, 8	J. Giersing, 5½
J. Fridlizius, 7½	A. C. M. Pritzel, 5½
T. Relfsson, 7	H. Hansen, 4½
F. Englund, 6½	S. Abertsen, 4

H. Schlichtkrull was first in the second tourn berg second. It is worth noting, as opposing deeply-rooted impression that problem study half the above, including especially Möller an

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 24. SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 1901.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

NOTES OF THE DAY 241, 242, 243
"LITERATURE" PORTRAITS.—XIX. William Morris ... 243
WILLIAM MORRIS: PRINTER AND COLLECTOR..... 249
POEM—"A Plea for Content on Earth," by "Violet Fane" 250
THE INFLUENCE OF ALFRED ON ENGLISH CULTURE, by Warwick H. Draper 251
ALFRED AS A MAN OF LETTERS 252
A SELECT BIBLIOGRAPHY OF KING ALFRED 253
THE GENERAL READER.—A "Personal View," by W. H. Fowler 254
THE DRAMA, by A. B. Walkley. 256
CURRENT LITERATURE—
The Victoria History of the County of Norfolk. Vol. I. 250
Some Recent Historical Books—
Modern Europe—History of Modern Europe—Menasseh Ben Israel's Mission to Oliver Cromwell—The Fallen Stuarts—The Chevalier de St. George and the Jacobite Movement—An Outline of the Relations between England and Scotland 258, 259
Essays from the Guardian—Motor Vehicles and Motors—Educational Foundations of Trade and Industry—Commercial Education—Commercial Education at Home and Abroad 259, 260
The History of Sir Richard Calmady 260
THE LATE REV. E. L. CUTTS, D.D. 261
CORRESPONDENCE.—Literary Agents (Mr. G. Herbert Thring)—Walt Whitman—"So Long"—Byron and Southey—Shakespeare First Folios—Piquet or Ecarte—Mistakes 261, 262
AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for... 262, 263
LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS..... 263, 264

NOTES OF THE DAY.

We shall publish next week a special portrait of Emerson and an illustrated account of his life and work.

Dr. Richard Garnett will contribute to this number a "Personal View" on the secret of Emerson's greatness.

* * * *

In addition to the illustrated account of the work of William Morris and the Kelmscott Press, we publish this week some special articles on Alfred the Great (with pictures), including an estimate of Alfred's influence on English culture, by Mr. Warwick Draper. Under "Fiction" will be found a notice of "The History of Sir Richard Calmady" (published to-day), the most powerful novel, in our judgment, which "Lucas Malet" has written.

* * * *

We publish, on page 250, a fine original poem by Lady Currie ("Violet Fane").

* * * *

Books to read, just published :—

"The History of Sir Richard Calmady." By Lucas Malet. (Methuen.)

Mr. Birrell's Introduction to the new editi which Messrs. Constable are publishing is full of cha good things. One passage will particularly plea of the public which has incurred the continuely c by its addiction to "a good long read."

It is all well enough in sundry moods confined within a scanty plot of ground—and wh wise than alive to the fascination of such a La Grande Bretèche, or of such a short aut Gibbon's?—but amidst the ups and downs of days of the week and the years of one's days, t so attractive, so provocative of affection, as a big a long book, a crowded gallery, a busy thorou its fleeting figures, its chance references, its wall character. Nothing else so stirs our sluggish so penetrates us with the "stir of existence," w sad music of humanity.

This is a new view of the matter, though we k also those who love the "good long read" mainly illusion of getting good value for their money delays the journey to the circulating library.

* * *

The notes in this edition are not numerou being that Mr. Birrell hates "examiners" and to serve their ends :—

"Examiners! hands off!" is surely a natur as their spears blacken the horizon. Our lives de in the torture chambers of the examiner, and w need the solace of books like Boswell's long after class-room and senate-house an eternal farewell. bring myself to take any pleasure in Calv Imaginary Examination Paper on Pickwick. It m since it showed dull fools how the thing might deadly earnest.

* * *

Not only Balliol and Oxford, but the whole wo has sustained a severe loss in the death of Mr. E which took place at Malvern after a life which it is not too much to call heroic. Paralysis, crippled his lower limbs shortly after he had tak and laid him literally on his back for the rema thirty-five years of his life, had no weakening spirit; rather it seemed to add to the mind that should have been also of the body :—

> Within the soul a faculty abides,
> That with interpositions, which would h
> And darken, so can deal that they becom
> Contingencies of pomp; and serve to e
> Her native brightness.

Few men of robust health have worked so and that he had a keen appreciation of what some call the lighter side of scholarship is shown by the accuracy and elegance of his Greek verse compositions. While working at the history he found time to collaborate with Mr. Campbell in producing the life of his friend and tutor the late Master of Balliol—a task which examination and selection among voluminous materials must have made most laborious and difficult. With all this on his hands he took part as fully as he could in the business of college life. He was for some thirty years a hard-working college tutor, and that, too, before tuition was considered to have the first claim on the time of a resident Fellow. In spite of increasing infirmity, he did college work till the end of the past summer term. Many generations of Balliol men will remember Evelyn Abbott as the adviser and friend who was always careful, kind, and sympathetic; who was always readier to praise a merit than to blame a fault; whose time was at the service of others when he was most hard worked; and who, whatever he may and must have felt, preserved an aspect of calm and cheerfulness, and allowed no shade of depression and despondency to enter into his relations with his pupils.

* * * *

At the beginning of the year publishers had a notion that there could not be too many editions of the Waverleys—three were launched on their career last winter. Now the cry is for Dickens. That long-suffering person the general reader, whose characteristics are discussed in another column, may well be confused with the mass of new Dickens editions at present before him. This is, we fancy, how the matter stands with regard to new issues recently completed (so far as copyrights, which are fast expiring, permit), or soon to be completed:—

The Authentic Edition, with coloured frontispieces and reproductions of the original pictures, 5s. each volume.
Chapman and Hall.

The Gadshill Edition, with introduction and notes by Andrew Lang, and the original pictures, 6s. each volume.
Chapman and Hall.

[Messrs. Chapman and Hall have also published other editions at lower prices.]

The Rochester Edition, with introductions by George Gissing and notes, mainly topographical, by F. G. Kitton. The illustrations are of places identified with the novels. 3s. net each volume.
Methuen.

Messrs. Macmillan's Edition, with the original pictures and introductions by Charles Dickens the younger, 2s. 6d. each volume.

The Imperial Edition, with new illustrations by various artists and including a literary character study by George Gissing, illustrated by F. G. Kitton. The first volume ("Pickwick") has just been issued. Gresham Publishing Company.

The Temple Edition, with coloured frontispieces, 1s. 6d. net each volume.
Dent.

The New Century Library Edition, 2s. net each volume.
Nelson.

The Daily News Memorial Edition.

The Clarendon Press Edition, the publication of which is to begin shortly.

* * * *

Lord St. Cyres, the grandson of Sir Stafford Northcote, who was created the first Earl of Iddesleigh, has been engaged for many years on a "Life of Francois de Fénelon," which Messrs made her insupportable. It is her habit to behav as she likes; she is obstinate, impertinent, vulg herself out to exasperate her employers in every w some and self-willed, she makes the life of her fel a burden to them. Besides other faults of the s she has that of listening at keyholes.

Evidently the servant question is not of such r as some philosophers suppose.

* * *

We have received the prospectus of the Playgo to be "an illustrated monthly magazine of the s entertainments," dealing with the feats of "per educated elephants" as well as with the serious d is as good as the old Playgoer, to which Mr. Jerom contributed many amusing articles, there should b and a public for it.

* * *

With reference to the Pan-Celtic Congress Graves writes:—"In my letter published in yo August 31 there are a couple of errors which I haste
The Breton delegates who spoke on the subject of music were Le Fustec, not Le Fuster, and Jaffrenou, no
The passage "so-called Celtic art in this country derived from the Roman and Byzantine schools." s
"so-called Celtic art in this country being then a the Roman and Byzantine schools."

* * *

The latest publications of the Gaelic League of D a collection of humorous short stories called "Grea hilge," by Henry Morris, which are told in colloquial and Mr. J. J. Doyle's "Tadhg Gabha," a racy st life. Other works in course of publication are an in a book of reading lessons, several new phrase book lection of old Irish melodies, arranged for harp
Mr. Owen Lloyd, the Irish harpist. Scarcely a wee without the publication of some Irish Gaelic book.

Mr. George Meredith will contribute an "ap of Lady Duff Gordon's "Letters from Egypt" to a of that book. It will be edited by the author's biographer, Mrs. Janet Ross.

During the year ending August 31, 1,305 pe
Carlyle's House in Ecclefechan. One of the visito
China and another from Japan.

During the autumn Mrs. Patrick Campbell series of matinées of Björnson's Beyond Human Stre

Mr. Osmond Tearle, the well-known Shakesp died last week in Newcastle-on-Tyne.

Signora Duse has announced her intention of the stage.

M. Victorien Sardou attained his seventieth bi end of last week.

The house which was occupied by Michael A the last twenty years of his life is to be demolis the Corso.

There appeared a few days since, in the Westminster Gazette, a detailed account of the literary earnings of the Rev. Alfred J. Church, who has been writing for about forty years, and whose books (mainly intended for the young) are decidedly good of their kind. His average annual income amounted to the modest sum of £166—a figure which might meet the views of Agur, who prayed that he might be given "neither poverty nor riches," but seems to Mr. Church to prove that "literature by itself is but a poor occupation." It does not, of course, lead to any such conclusion. To draw the inference is to commit the fallacy of generalizing from a single instance—a fallacy which is the more superfluous in this case because the facts concerning the remuneration of literary labour are easily ascertainable, and can be set forth in such a manner as to enable every literary aspirant to judge for himself what the prospects of the literary calling are, and what a great, a moderate, and a small success respectively amount to. We do not assert that a substantial income can readily be made out of poetry, books of research, or even out of belles-lettres. But take the case of novels. Provided that their length is anything between 60,000 and 200,000 words, they will almost certainly be published, in the first instance, at six shillings. The royalties of the author who has, as yet, no great success to his credit will bring him in £50 for every 1,000 copies sold. An author who has proved his commercial value by large sales in the past will get more. The extreme royalty which the cost of production will allow seems to be fourpence in the shilling, or £100 for every 1,000 copies sold. Serial rights, if sold at all, may fetch anything from £100 to £2,500, or even more; and the writer who succeeds in America may make as much (to say the least) there as he makes in England. There are also the rights of dramatization, which may be worth nothing or may be worth a great deal. Knowing these things, an author knows exactly what are the chances for which he is playing, and what the cash value of any given measure of success will be. There are novels which bring the author £50,000, and there are novels which bring the author nothing. There are also novels which bring the author £1,000, £500, £50, or any other figure that might be named. If the average income among novelists is lower than in the learned professions, there is a reason. The average is kept low by the immense number of incapable persons who write novels for no other reward than the gratification of their vanity—a motive which seldom, if ever, impels a man to practise as a doctor or a solicitor. Of the novelists who depend upon their novel-writing for their living, a considerable number do pretty well, though their revenues may not always be in proportion to their literary merits. Sir Walter Besant used to make (though not, of course, to publish) long lists of those whom he knew, through information which came to him as Chairman of the Society of Authors, to be making more than £1,000 a year. Moreover, the novelist who deserves to succeed, but by some accident does not, is—one might almost say, ex hypothesi—a good enough man to make a very tolerable living out of journalism until success as a novelist comes to him. This is a "second string" which is but seldom available for the unsuccessful member of the learned professions; and it is by no means a second string to be despised. It gradually becomes comparatively easy, it is pretty sure to be interesting. We cannot, of course, go far into details as to prices paid by different papers for different kinds of contributions; but we do not shrink from the general statement that "compensa-

Prices.

Literature Portraits.—XI

WILLIAM MORRIS.

Poet, artist, manufacturer, and Socialist, auth Earthly Paradise"—this terse, unimpassioned e
"Fast Britannia" sums up, in a form of words whi himself have accepted as substantially accurate, t work of a remarkable man.

Birth and Education.

WILLIAM MORRIS
(By permission of Mr. Hollyer.)

William M eldest son and of William Morr Skelton, was b house, Clay-hill tow, Essex, on March, 1834. T were originally descent, and E was the daught coster neighb modern outgro has nowhere,"
W. Mackail b
"Life of Willi (Longmans, 1 more devastat than in Walthan where the row built two-store in all the bri yellow brick an stretch in a s
over the Lee Valley." Morris' father became e wealthy, and in 1840 he moved across Epping Fore ford-hall. The love for the Middle Ages ca his son, and "well I remember as a boy," M in 1882, "my first acquaintance with a room faded greenery at Queen Elizabeth's Lodge, at Hatch in Epping Forest, and the impression that it made upon me!" Morris was enter borough College in 1848, and remained there till the 1851. He was considered a little mad by the other boy Church settled on as his destined profession, he Oxford, matriculated at Exeter in 1852, entering th the June of the following year. Whilst here he made ance of Burne-Jones, who has left the following p at that time:—"He talked with vehemence and so violence. He was slight in figure in these days:
dark brown and very thick, his nose straight, his coloured, his mouth exceedingly delicate and Except for the fact that he met Burne-Jones and F and discovered that he could write both verse and facility, that he decided not to take Holy Order articles with Street, the architect, Oxford does have had as great an influence upon him as upon He abandoned architecture under Rossetti's influen took to painting, and Rossetti wrote in this year "i nation and work of that kind he is quite unrivalled modern that I know." He set to work to decorate a more than usually deep mark upon the art of England), Philip Webb, the architect, Peter Paul Marshall, an engineer and surveyor, and Charles Faulkner, who was best known at that time as an Oxford don. They were in every respect the members of the firm, for those who worked under them were almost without exception unimportant subordinates and had very little to do with the brains or work of the business. The circular that was issued by the firm at the time of its establishment is within the memory of many. It was received with much the same sort of surprise and readily-awakened amusement as the early diatribes of Ruskin against preconceived artistic prejudices. The document stated that a company of historical artists had bound themselves together to execute work in a thoroughly artistic and inexpensive manner, and they had determined to devote their spare time to designs of all kinds of manufactures of an artistic nature. This was only part of an audacious scheme which was directed against the then prevailing custom of retailing works of art through the medium of assistants who had no actual part or interest in their production.

taught generally under the personal supervision of M and the products of Morris and Company soon been famous.

Morris' Theories.

The circular to which we have referred embodi political as well as his artistic theories. He felt tha could not cut himself apart from the life of the r getting, apparently, that the nation had of free choic adrift from the life of the artist. The cause of art, he is the cause of the people. "We well-to-do people, who love art, not as a toy, but as a thing necessary of man, have for our best work the raising of the s life among the people. How can we of the middle c the capitalists, and our hangers-on help? By reno class, and on all occasions when antagonism rises up b classes casting in our lot with the victims: those wh demned at the best to lack of education, refinemen pleasure, and renown, and at the worst to a life that of the most brutal savages. There is no other wa

MORRIS WORKS AT MERTON ABBEY, SURREY.

[By permission of Morris and Co.]

What perhaps caused most comment in this circular was the announcement that a man of means such as William Morris, that unpractical painters, architects, engineers, and an Oxford don should open a shop; but when, a year later, the earliest products of the firm were shown to the public at the Exhibition of 1862 seemed to think that to spread discontent was the r to provoke remedies. He found, however, that the di quite readily be inculcated, but that the suffe not always willing to accept his remedies. The ignorance and want of impressibility "of th mining company, from which he derived a decent income, he was even known to wear a "top-hat." It is true that in a moment of irritation he sat down upon the "top-hat," but the fact remains that he wore one. It was a complex temperament, but it at least had sufficient fortitude and directness of purpose to emancipate Beckenham from the antimacassar and the glass chandelier. This, of itself, was no mean achievement and a very practical accomplishment for a mediæval poet.

The Kelmscott Press.

Adam Smith has said that Society as degraded by utilitarianism would reduce the working man to a machine; Morris, not content with the denunciation of the trade union societies which supplanted the trade guilds of the Middle Ages, has persisted on the individuality of every worker, however humble. As his aims were high he spared no pains to carry them out, and it is interesting to note how very closely his early efforts were coupled with the progress of his work from time to time. It is in this way that one recognizes the connexion between the wood engraving which early occupied the original firm of Messrs. Morris, Marshall, Faulkner, and Co. in the decoration of books, and the establishment somewhat late in William Morris' career of the Kelmscott Press. The frontispiece to Miss Christina Rossetti's "Goblin Market," issued in 1862, was cut by Mr. Faulkner, and Mr. Morris cut with his own hand the greater number of the blocks which Burne-Jones designed for the illustration of the poem "Cupid and Psyche." The idea of setting up a press and printing his own books, although it took shape somewhat late, had evidently been in his mind from these early times. When the scheme fructified it was carried on with all that enthusiasm which was so characteristic of the Director. He designed several of the sets of founts, many of the initial letters, borders, and ornaments, and he superintended their cutting himself. He insisted that the paper upon which the books were printed should be of the purest and most durable quality, and he required that the ink with which the types were printed should be of a special kind. The result was not only that the products of the Kelmscott Press were pleasant to the eye, but that they will remain with greater permanency than most of the printed pages of the almost feverish literary production of the present era.

Just as much of his poetry was a brilliant and successful experiment in the romantic, his establishment of a printing press upon almost mediæval principles cast round the productions of his Press an interest which is absent from most of even the best work which was being issued from contemporary presses.

Even in this interesting experiment in production one realizes the extreme difficulty of reconciling the theories of art for the people with production without reference to economical considerations. The issues of the Kelmscott Press have a unique artistic value, but they also were produced under conditions and circumstances which rendered it impossible that they should be mediæval ardour the spirit of work for work's sake own workmen; but he entirely failed to bring his within the reach of those who most prized them an they, presumably, were intended.

The Protection of Ancient Buildings.

It is well remembered that he was largely ass
the formation of the Arts and Crafts Exhibition Soc is perhaps not so well remembered that he was the of the Society for the Protection of Ancient Bui wrote the preliminary manifesto for this eminently in 1877, and he was never tired of urging the society and the necessity for assisting in its work.
only the honorary secretary of the society, but one strenuous workers, and it is to him and to the work of that Londoners of to-day owe the preservation of m and beautiful buildings which would otherwise have the hand of the ruthless improver. And his work fined to the buildings of our own country, for the m he organized in 1879 to protest against the impend tion and rebuilding of the glorious west front of the St. Mark's at Venice cannot be easily forgotten. The with which he entered into this crusade created alm national difficulty, for it was contended that inartis could not possibly know or have any part in the artist of Italy. But Morris, basing his objections upon the of property in unique works of art, persevered in hi and the west front of the Basilica was saved. If w him for nothing else, the honour, that belongs to establishment of the Society for the Protection of An ings must be accorded ungrudgingly.

His Audience.

It would be misrepresenting the character and the characteristics of William Morris to give him a foremost place either in the literature or the art of his generation. He addressed himself to the British middle classes, and it used to be said of his poems that they were by "Morris the wall-paper man," and of his fabrics and furniture that they were by "Morris the poet." There is more truth in this than is commonly supposed. As a poet he was earnest and melodious; as a designer suggestive, resourceful, and sumptuous. But he was essentially bourgeois, and, in spite of the influence exerted upon him by his

THE KELMSCOTT PRESS, CHISWICK.
[From a drawing by Herbert Railton.]

sojourn at Oxford and by the Pre-Raphaelite movement, he never outgrew the earlier associations which came to him from the commercial class amidst whom he was born. He understood the

His Methods.

The love of beautiful things which was so s him led to the production of poems which flowed ea pen and of material things which were better in in construction, and more beautiful in colour than t passed muster twenty years ago. He did very everyday art out of the hopeless ruck into whic mercialism, as it was then generally misunderstood.
it; and he achieved this in a somewhat new way.
so much exhort the public to interest themselves did, in the beautiful and the good, but he arouse pride and self-respect in the m workmen.

> "You," he said, "you whose hands > things that should be works of art, you > artists, and good artists too, before t > large can take real interest in such thing > you have become so, I promise you th > lead the fashion; fashion shall follow > obediently enough. That is better > helplessly among the crowd of those wh > lously called manufacturers, that is > though the more part of them never di > hand-work in their lives, and are nothin > capitalists and salesmen."

This was, indeed, commencing at th of the stick. The common reply to an introduce a new mode of manufacture uses for that matter largely still is, "You demand and I will meet it readily enough Morris had set himself a dual task, to natural disinclination to be the first t method, and the typical workman's n rooted objection to cast the old aside. H easy to follow when he preached the nobil labour, the debasing effects of ignoble a that lurks in slavish imitation; but it wa agree with him when he insisted, as vehemently, that the artist should al craftsman also, that he should not execut he was working in the mediums commonly produce the fine arts. The designer of th should tool it himself, just as the sculptor employ a ghost. The skilled mezzotinter six weary weeks rocking his own plate jus painter should prime his own canvases a own colours. It is a pretty theory, but w is either artistically or economically sound.
reduced it to the limits of the absurd whether the pianist should tune his Perhaps he should.

His Influence.

It is more than probable that th have had a greater influence upon t arts of this country, and through this country upon the whole of Europe and s America also, than is properly understoo remains that, whereas in painting and literat not conspicuously behind the other European n domestic arts we are easily first, and still lead.

papers and hangings which were made at the Merton works and sold first in middle-class Bloomsbury and then in the fashionable neighbourhood of the Marble Arch. He used dexterously and with skill and taste a remarkable diversity of gifts, no one of them, perhaps, and certainly not the gift of oratory, of the highest kind, but all cultivated and interdependent. He was essentially English, lacking the Celtic fire, but possessing in an uncommon degree the rare capacity for taking pains which counts for so much. He was, moreover, strenuous and had all the elements of a great leader except the one precious gift of patience. He could march at the head of a quietly demonstrating crowd, but when he found that those whom he had had the courage to lead from Trafalgar Square scattered and fled from the batoning of a few policemen, he lost patience and henceforward seemed to leave the horny-handed son of toil very much to his own devious devices.

It says much for the strenuous nature of his advocacy of his principles of art and for the enduring nature of his work that the art movement which he headed has survived the danger of having been the fashion. That has been the death of most things, but the Morris wallpapers—by many others besides Morris—and the Morris furniture are as much in vogue to-day as they were ten years ago. He did not, it is true, live to see an artistic millennium, any more than we, bearing in mind the unalterable laws of economy, expect to find the mass of our fellow-countrymen enjoying as a matter of course a national love and knowledge of art; but he stimulated and he achieved. He worked hard to make the world more beautiful than he found it and the craftsmen more honest and self-reliant than they had been before; and he accomplished both purposes with a success that is as rare as it is entirely desirable.

His Politics.

His political opinions, too, showed the strenuous man, the man of warm heart, the enthusiast and the leader. He hardly paused to think, he was so moved by the injustice that he saw around him. In this lay the weakness of his leading. He was no politician, in the sense that Mr. Burns or Mr. Hardie are politicians, and he had none of the clever turns which are so dear to the political working man. He believed that every one was as serious as he was, every one as hopeful and every one as honest. It was difficult for him to imagine that politics was a constant struggle for the upper hand, and that the only way to maintain the upper hand was to get the first grip, and keep it. There was little that was beautiful in Socialism when it actively demonstrated on the afternoon of "Bloody Sunday"; and William Morris discovered, not until he had made most praiseworthy efforts to keep his eyes averted from the fact, that the British working man took to Socialism mainly for the hope of the thing, that he neither cared to understand it nor to follow it a moment longer than it suited his humour. As one of a crowd, he lacked picturesqueness and failed to appeal to the æsthetic sense, and as a force he was unreliable. Morris' efforts to lead him in the way he should go were entirely honest and unselfish, but they were the efforts of the visionary and not those of the subtle-minded politician. He failed more conspicuously as a political leader than as a poet and designer, and he more easily slipped from the foremost place in a demonstration than he will from the ranks of art.

His Literary Work.

The industry which characterized almost all his art work was clearly evidenced in his writing, and he had the one advantage

verse of the Æneid and the Odyssey, which followed th
"Love is Enough; or the Freeing of Pharamond
His work either in verse or in prose—as in the fas stimulating "News from Nowhere" (1891)—flowed was so well constructed, as to disclose much of the p but very little of the methods, of the handicraft always honest work done with enthusiasm, and if it than not lacked the vital spark, it was ever the fi artifice. He worked in poetry very much as his c Madox Brown worked with his brush, but with hig and more mastery over technique. He lacked the Rossetti and the sustained delicacy of Swinburne, bu artistic simplicity and workmanlike fidelity. His poe less sentimental than his politics, for he unde technique of the one whilst he totally failed to unde inwardness of the other. He hoped that he migh help—he hardly knew how—from politics in his arti ganda, and he understood that there was some connexi of his house which was near and goodly Bringing the sweet scent of the morning was clad in a goodly long green offering with silver meet for the summertide. In ~~book~~ he wrought with his hands and with his tongue he was a man of the black bearded and ruddy and his name Clement Chapman. When he saw Ralph smiled kindly, and came and held his and said 'Welcome lord! art thou Eat and drink and give a message in a pedlar's house. Yea said Ralph smiling he was hungry. I will eat & drink and go my way. And he got off his the Carle led him into his house were goodly without wotton it was well For there was a fair chamber with carven work well wrought, and a of no sorry ~~furniture~~ and the chairs & stools as fair as might be, no trays might be and the windows were glazed and there flowers & herbs & posies in them and the bed was hung with goodly webs over sea such as the Soldan loveth whereon his wife bowers were hung by the

Well at Woods End, first dra
William Morris

the accomplishment of work and the conditions o but he failed to notice that there was very little between Society and Socialism. And so the vital f life found vent in vigorous art work and were with politics and seldom present in his poems. He was without the humour of Chaucer, and unconsciously a

The Eye of the Artist.

The quality of observation which seems to us the most original feature in Morris the poet is perhaps most readily seen in the purely descriptive passages of "The Earthly Paradise." Here, for example, is a passage from the second of the stories, that of the "Man born to be King," in which we can trace without much difficulty the immediate associations of the poets' everyday life :—

For o'er the oily smooth millhead
There hung the apples growing red,
And many an ancient apple tree
Within the orchard could he see,
While the smooth mill walls white and black Shook to the great wheel's measured clack,
And grumble of the gear within ;
While o'er the roof that dulled that din
The doves sat crooning half the day,
And round the half-cut stack of hay
The sparrows fluttered twittering.

For the firs ended on the brow
Of a rough gravelly hill, and there
Lay a small valley nowise fair
Beneath them, clear at first of all
But brake, till amid rushes tall Down in the bottom alders grew Crabbed and rough ; and winding thro
The clayey mounds a brook there was Oozy and foul, half choked with grass.

That, we must confess, strikes us as being medievalism, and exhibits the particular quali Morris' mind which enabled him to assimilate old rather than to lose himself amidst them. He had a "live in tapestry," but not the faculty of comp

Not the least of his literary enterprises, certainly has some influence at the present day, wa of the weekly paper The Commonweal. To this he far the greatest portion of the literary content articles, the news, the poems, and even the so-calle This was in addition to his ordinary occupat running his factory, of organizing pub and of delivering exhortations and furtherance of the movement to whic he was apparently passionately devo effects of his teachings still remain.

His Personality.

His eyes were blue-grey in tint, a they might be described as meditative, even then, without a something in the betokened the boundless energy of th when his face was absolutely still, one the lofty uprightness of the brow than the impressed me most about William granted me the honour of personal inte him in his later years)," says Mr. Macke becoming humility, "was an indescrib power, arising in part, I fancy, becau manding presence.

"Occasionally there was an aspect a ness about his face when at rest—an in part by the great strength of will ap set of the lower jaw and in the compre

"Real kindness and good nature visible in him, and the irritability sometim was more the result, I used to think, of energy and his consequent resulting i control, stupidity, or slowness, than s To a man of his quick and ever-alert in wholesome freedom from many silly co prejudices and inanities of ordinary have appeared more than usually silly. scious of his own position in English le garding Mr. Swinburne as his only equal poets, he was nevertheless far too consi to be vain in the ordinary acceptation of

This is a picture of Mr. Morri dulgent and uncritical friend, and we whether the author of "The Earthly P considered himself in comparison wit burne. Certainly he was in no way the gard any one as his "only equal."

WILLIAM MORRIS: PRINTER AND COLLECTOR.

KELMSCOTT BOOKS AND EDITIONES PRINCIPES BY MORRIS AT AUCTION.

"Ah! I wish I could get my books printed like that." Thus did William Morris ejaculate, years before he founded the Kelmscott Press, as he looked on a volume printed by Nicholas Jenson in Venice, two decades or so prior to the close of the fifteenth century. The wish was not a mere idle one, expressed on the spur of the moment, and without definite purpose behind it. Morris lived to achieve distinction as a printer; perhaps, even, his accomplishment in this direction will be remembered long after his wallpapers and designs for tapestries are forgotten. Onward from his student days at Oxford, where Burne-Jones was a contemporary, he delighted to turn over the pages of old manuscripts; and again and again he would relate what pleasure he found in a fine Apocalypse at the Bodleian, dating from the thirteenth century. About the year 1866 a folio edition of "The Earthly Paradise" was projected, to be illustrated by Burne-Jones, its typography of a special kind. Many designs were made, blocks executed, and specimen pages in Caslon type set up. But "The Earthly Paradise" in the form projected remained a dream. Twenty years passed, during which Morris made careful study of finely-executed old manuscripts. In 1888, with the same type in the following year, Morris said the most satisfactory book issued since the seventeent It was now that the idea of becoming his own printer, detail under his own supervision, occurred to Mo unnecessary to recall how he processed to design wha as the Golden fount, because the Golden Legend wa been the first book printed therewith, a fount based o Jenson Pliny, 1476, but showing the nineteenth-century predilection for Gothic. The first sheets of the first book, "The Glittering Plain," were printed on Ma at No. 16, Upper-mall, Hammersmith; the complete dated April 4, and was issued on May 8. The new Kelmscott Press issued fifty-two works—in addition t pages of a Froissart, which would have eclipsed the Cha been completed—during the succeeding seven years. set of these books on paper, and the Froissart on v subscribers an aggregate of £144 15s. 6d. In March series realized at auction £560 14s. 6d. The Cha excepted, they have diminished considerably in v since then. The following works may be taken sentative:—

Title.	Date.	No. of Copies.	Issue Price.	Record Price.
Glittering Plain	1891	200	2gns.	£33 10 0
Biblia Innocentium	1892	200	1gn.	27 0 0
Shakespeare—Poems	1893	500	£1 5	16 0 0
Keats—Poems	1894	300	£1 10	27 10 0
Chaucer	1896	425	£20	83 0 0
Love is Enough	1898	300	2gns.	9 12 6

The Chaucer, acknowledged to be the worthy accomplishment of its kind exec ninetenth century, has steadily advanc since Morris' death. One of the first liely seen was that sent to the Arts and Cr tion of 1896; at the private view ti heard of the poet-craftsman's death. A the Chaucer was procurable at its publi some copies were bought at even less. had risen to about £30, in 1899 it fe in 1900 £72, and on July 29 last a re £83.

In December, 1898, a portion of Will valuable collection of MSS. and early pr came under the hammer in Wellington a total of £10,962 for 1,215 lots—an aver £9 per lot—there occurred many beautif not a few of which, by their marginal eating how closely Morris had studied graphy, caligraphy, and decoration. Th lum," printed by Zainer about 1471— first of his woodcut books—brought £14 craftsman's Bible, c.1473-4, again rem its woodcuts, £80; the Sherbrooke 333 ll. of vellum, written in Gothic c.1320, £350; a fine Sec. XIV. Bible, b Norman scribe, £302; Wynkyn de "Orcharde of Syon," 1519, £151; a XIV. "Decretales," on 344 ll. of th £255.

As to works by William Morris, or in collaboration with Professor Magn printed at the Kelmscott Press, but name of his friend, the late Mr. F. S.

A PLEA FOR CONTENT ON EARTH.

I.

I know this world of many mysteries ;—
The drifting and the dragging of its days,
As joy or sorrow urges or delays
The wings of Time, with all that underlies Fair-spoken words and formal courtesies ;
—I know that all here withers and decays,
False friend that smites, false lover that betrays,
And, sadder still, how even true love dies !
—Yet, in despite of all these ills, for me
My home is on this planet of my birth,
The sights whereof mine eyes were formed to see
And, howso faultily, appraise their worth,
And when my days are number'd, I shall be Content to mingle with its flow'r-strewn earth.

II.

For when this life is ended, who can tell Whither our spirits journey ? To what shore, —Serene, or tempest-swept,—as this, of yore,—
Where fierce conflicting influences dwell,
Or whether, in fair fields of asphodel,
Each with the chosen friends of heretofore,
We still may take our pleasure ? Evermore
In sweet content, afraid of no farewell ?
—This who may say, or if the " you " and " I "
Whose earthly sojourn will have ended soon,
As such shall re-awaken when we die ?
Behold this very rose of pulsing June ;—
—Will this same flow'r re-blossom by and by ?
The lyre once shatter'd, whither wends the tune ?

III.

" Lay not up treasure here," the Preacher cries ;
Yet, since we know that all things fall to dust,
—That thieves break thro' and steal, whilst moth and rust Corrupt and tarnish, surely should the wise Guard what they cherish with more jealous eyes ?
—Shall I prize less the one I love and trust
Because I know that sever soon we must
In spite of clinging hearts and memories ?
Nay, is it not this same insertitude,
—This mutability of earthly things,
That sends a note of sad solicitude
Vibrating thro' our being, and which brings
The proud and mighty to a meeker mood
Under the shadow of Death's widening wings ?

IV.

The poor are ever with us in the land ;
—As in the old time, even are they now,
Nor need we monkish cowl, or sterile vow,
Or dreary death-in-life by bigots plann'd
To do the good work underneath our hand
With cloudless conscience and uplifted brow,
And should we fail, the One to whom I bow
I feel will both forgive and understand.
Wherefore I would not waste my breath to ask Why Good with Evil is thus interblent
Here on the Earth, believing that my task

The one I lov'd had here his dwelling-place !
So, Earth, green Earth ! where deeds of high Have been achiev'd, I love not those who Only thine imperfections, in whose eyes
Evil reigns paramount, since each is free
To seek his own ideal, whence to rise
To better things, if better things there be

VI.

And if there be not, unto whom the blame ?
—For whom the gain or loss ? To empty Shall dumb grey ashes find the voice to cr Shall martyr'd men, who died by sword or flam
Arise in wrath, or hang their heads for shame,
That their one life was forfeit for a lie ?
—Nay, that they deem'd the soul should li Once it be dead indeed, were all the same !
—But Life is Life, for some to have and hold
From budding-time until the last red leaf
Quivers aloft, and the rich cornfield's gold
Is bound together in the tented sheaf,
And why should those that shrink from Winter
Love less the Summer that her days are br

VII.

Who knows if it were even well to strive
And beat our wings against a flickering lig
—To strain to this or that untrodden heig Subduing all the best we have to give Towards those primal forces that survive
And ever have the mast'ry in the fight ?
—What if our keenest impulse be the right
—What if our noblest mission is, to live
And be ourselves, in spite of all reproof,
Taking as mandate of a deathless law
Our strongest bias, for a sign and proof
Of where abides the force from which to dr
Even as one who weaving web and woof Should choose the stoutest strand without

VIII.

To live, to love, to labour and endure ;
To seek for Wisdom, tho' we may not know
What pow'r compels the meanest weed to g
To dwell in fellowship with rich and poor ;
Keep the pure mind within the body pure,
And act uprightly towards friend and foe ;
May we not thus find solace here below
Despite of all whereof we are not sure ?
—Sure were we, once, of summer-time and yout Scent of the May, and murmur of the dove —Sure that the skies that now grow grey in so Beam'd bright in blue expectancy above ;
Pilate, condemning Christ, asked " What is tr
Shall we, too, question, who knew Hope un

IX.

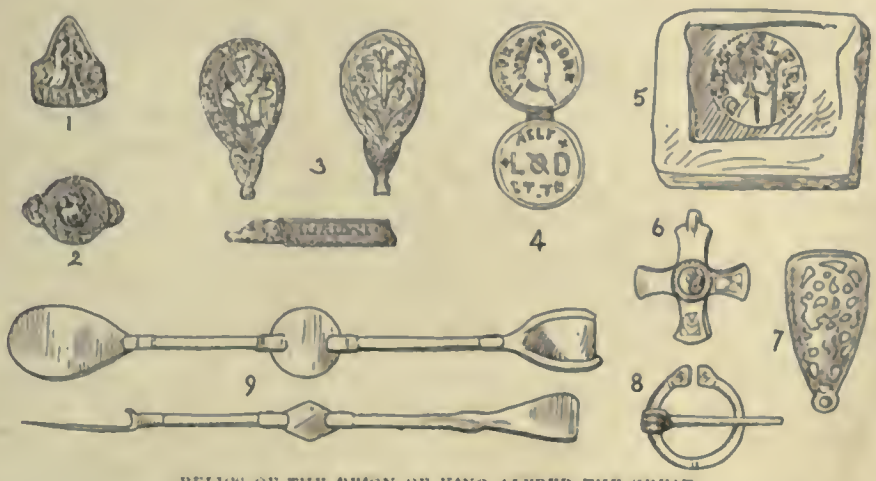
Take rather what we find beneath our hand
Wherewith to weave and fashion what we w
According as the inspiration-thrill
Directs us to the task by Nature plann'd ;

ALFRED THE GREAT.

MILLENARY CELEBRATION.

THE INFLUENCE OF ALFRED ON ENGLISH CULTURE.

Much has been discovered and written during the last fifty years which illustrates the pre-Norman history of England, so that we, who now celebrate the millenary of King Alfred's death, have a more precise and complete knowledge of his epoch than did those who, early in Queen Victoria's reign, happened to observe the same anniversary of his birth. In no aspect, perhaps, is the gain larger than in our power of appreciating his influence upon English culture. The improvement in our acquaintance with his battles, his modes of government, his laws, and even his personality, is one of degree. But the advance of Anglo-Saxon scholarship and, in particular, the service of archæology have made remarkable disclosures in the highest sphere of his activity. We can now see the civilizing and "perfecting" tendencies of his Kingly labour no longer piecemeal but as a whole. With a wealth of instances revealed by the craftsman in palæography and the true antiquarian we can illustrate this phase of his manifold energy.



RELICS OF THE REIGN OF KING ALFRED THE GREAT.

1 and 2, Finger-rings (gold and enamel) of Alfred's father Æthelwulf and sister Æthelwitha; 3, Alfred's Jewel (front, back, and edge); 4, Coin of Alfred (London type); 5, a Moneyer's Coin-die, with impression; 6, Pectoral Cross (silver and coloured glass); 7, Book-clasp; 8, Silver Brooch; 9, Silver Spoon and Fork, found in Wiltshire with 70 coins dating from A.D. 800 to 890.

Good manners and learning alike were, as we perceive, carried by him far above the level at which they stood and from which, indeed, they were falling at the opening of his reign. We rightly praise him for the victories by which, in 871 and 878, he stemmed the tide of Danish invasion. In Ashdown and Ethandune England had her own Marathon and Salamis, however different the scale. But we admire Alfred in that, after displaying the valour of a Miltiades and the statecraft of a Themistocles, he exhibited the fine wisdom of a Pericles. For, in restoring order out of chaos, he bestowed something of that life which art and letters alone can give; where foreign causes had brought anarchy, he toiled laboriously, as we know in some detail, from the year of Alfred's; but, indeed, there was little [illegible] England of the ninth century and the Continent [illegible] of a literary or spiritual kind. The rare and [illegible] the verse of Cædmon (seventh century) and Ad[illegible] century) alone seem to have represented native [illegible] great work in prose, Bede's history, was writte[illegible] Moreover, that very Danish inundation, in ches[illegible] Alfred performed so great a feat of action, had [illegible] been wiping out the fabric of the Church's work. [illegible] were burned and pillaged, and thus the sole centres [illegible] and cultivation were closed.

In what sense, then, did Alfred nourish and stimul[illegible] apparently so meagre and starved? When we look [illegible] of his achievement in this particular, we are asto[illegible] did so much in so short a time; his brilliant idea[illegible] In some cases, if prophetic, yet premature. The[illegible] views as to the meaning which we must attach to [illegible] irrespective of time and the accidents of hist[illegible] abandoning the thin definition of the pure fitt[illegible] Walter Pater, we may well accept Matthew A[illegible] mingling of the mottoes of Montesquieu and Bishop [illegible] one said its aim was "to render an intelligent [illegible] intelligent"; the other, "to make reason and the[illegible] prevail." Now it appears that, when Alfred ceas[illegible] proud feats in necessary battles to become, late[illegible] the humble scholar, he realized peace hath her victo[illegible]

No less renowned than war and, by his patronage of true [illegible] honourable crafts, he pursued [illegible] double aim of culture, both for hi[illegible] King, and for his people. In [illegible] brief space of years (for even betw[illegible] the end of the century he was engag[illegible] fighting) he accomplished a revolu[illegible] been well said by a French writer [illegible] the original work of Alfred, the [illegible] genius; and if it is in good reas[illegible] point of view of education and le[illegible] the reign of Charlemagne a [illegible] Alfred's must be called a metemp[illegible]

In the set of books which [illegible] to be translated into Anglo-Sa[illegible] several of which he contributed [illegible] prefaces, he gave his subjects [illegible] of a liberal and delightful [illegible] his choice of works and method of [illegible] he showed just that well-regula[illegible] in the central authority," without which no advance [illegible] possible in any community. Time, which for a the[illegible] has well guarded Alfred's fame, has preserved this [illegible] of the best books. It included, in translations [illegible] time made into native English (and this is the g[illegible] Orosius' "History of the World"; Bede's "History o[illegible] Boethius' "Consolation of Philosophy"; Gregory' [illegible] Care" and his "Dialogues"; the "Voyages of Ohthe[illegible] stan" and, possibly, "Blossom-Gatherings from St. [illegible] and "Æsop's Fables." In one case, at least, we kn[illegible] that he caused copies of a work to be sent to all [illegible] this was the "Pastoral Care," the Worcester, Sh[illegible] civilized society of our race, and imagine the barren living of a time when, as Alfred himself tells us in the same letter, knowledge was "in such total decay among the English, that there were very few on the other side of the Humber who understood the common prayers, so as to be able to tell their meaning in English, or who could have translated into that language a Latin passage; and I ween that there were not many on this side of Humber who could do so. Indeed, there were so few such that I do not even recollect one to the south of the Thames at the time I succeeded to the Crown." The King is himself an eloquent, if unconscious, witness to the magnitude of his feat. In the translations above referred to, and to which Alfred himself made no mean contributions, we find a store of that dignified simplicity and temperance which are at once the fruit of great art and the particular glory of English as opposed, let us say, to Celtic or Italian literature. By directing and promoting this form of human energy, by innovating the great and incomparable record of "The Saxon Chronicle," by exhibiting a personal interest (as we read) in the beautiful art of the goldsmith and stimulating (as our museums testify in abundance) the industrial crafts, Alfred influenced the cultured life of England to a degree. He had to recreate what little there had been; he had even to send abroad, as he did with a beneficent sagacity, for teachers in letters and the arts. His aim and his accomplishment were to guide the intellectual forces of his people into a proper stream, to derive them into proper channels. He laid in a stock of light (if the metaphor may be changed) for the difficulties with which his people and their sons would have to contend. He guided a movement of ideas which was just beginning, and gave it some little harmony; and he did all this "to make reason and the will of God prevail."

WARWICK H. DRAPER.

ALFRED AS MAN OF LETTERS.

There is to our thinking no more delightful story than that which tells how on a certain grey November evening ("in venerabili Martini solemnitate") King Alfred and his favourite tutor and literary companion, Asser, were sitting together in the Royal chamber. It happened, says the Bishop (whose biography, notwithstanding the doubts cast upon it by certain critics, who have rightly called attention to certain spurious passages and interpolations, must be accepted as in the main a genuine contemporary product), that a passage was mentioned to him out of a certain book. "He listened to it carefully and at the same time showed me a book which contained the daily courses, and psalms and prayers, and a number of memoranda jotted down by him"—a kind of commonplace book which existed in William of Malmesbury's days, but unfortunately has not come down to us. "The King requested me to write the quotation in his book, but I could not find any empty space, for it was already full of several matters. 'Are you willing that I should write out the quotation on some leaf apart?' I asked him. 'Your plan is good,' he answered, and I gladly made haste to get exigencies of the times—the wars in which he had b for twenty years—not to speak of the various worldly cares that oft troubled him both in mind he was an intense sufferer from a nervous disea him but little leisure to woo a mistress, who dem heartedness and all-absorbing devotion. Now, however, respite granted him, he had an opportunity of e execution projects for the education and improv people which he had harboured during the earlier troublous reign. In the grand and touching pr "Cura Pastoralis" he draws a pathetic picture of t of his subjects. Formerly, he says, knowledge had great repute among the English, but now, owing wrought by the Danes and other causes, the numbe the country could be counted on the fingers, and one could understand the language in which they w He therefore undertook (as mentioned in the pass quoted) to translate some books, "into the langua can all understand. And this I would have you d the youth now in England of free men to learn, m well able to read English writing." In pursuance o had surrounded himself with the most eminent men such as John the "Monk," Plegmund of Canterbu of Worcester, and above all Scotus Erigena. Th Saxon Court became a centre of light and leading.

Internal as well as external evidence seems t theory that the first Royal work was the tr Boethius' "Consolation of Philosophy." For a the Church, with slight leanings towards mysticis commended by the highest ecclesiastical authori tional manual of rare excellence, possessed undo tions. But Alfred, like other Catholic comment before long that the meditations of the illustrious their Neo-Platonic optimism and Stoical ethics sternly literary mould, were but ill-adapted to the of a Christian and Catholic people. So he virtually book, omitting or altering passages, making addition tions, and comments, at his own discretion and go and imparting to the whole a Christian comple sufficient for our purpose to call attention to the n tion on the "best method of government" in the or to the concluding celebration (if authentic) of attributes commencing "To God all is present, bot was before and that which is now." There is not sufficient ground for denying the King's authorship of the passage in question; but the metrical version of Boethius, though probably prepared under Royal supervision, is undoubtedly from another hand.

Having completed the religious manual, the next translation of the King appears to have been the General History of the World by Orosius, a treatise undertaken at St. Augustine's request in defence of Christianity from the attacks of pagan writers, who had ascribed the evils which had befallen their country to the introduction of the new religion. The Roman Spaniard is treated with the same freedom shown in the rendering of Boëthius. Certain sections are omitted, such as—e.g., the chapter "de diluvio sub Noë," or explanatory additions and comments are made, as when an account is given of a Roman procession or the origin of the Roman Senate. The most notable addition is the narrative of the explorations on the Baltic and the coasts of Norway by Ohthere and Wulfstan. The version of Bede's "Ecclesiastical History" has been traced by an iconoclastic critic to a Mercian source on account of differences of dialect and style between it and the "Cura Pastoralis." But we are inclined to think that the King himself had a hand in the work, according to the testimony of Archbishop Alfric. The careful adaptation to southern readers in the characteristic omission of irrelevant sections and details, and the addition of matters of national interest, such as the story of Cædmon, the first religious Anglo-Saxon poet, afford striking proof of the King's wisdom and literary tact. But the religious education of his subjects, which was throughout Alfred's chief concern, had led him in the first place to exchange the pen for the sword. So it is but natural and fit that one of his last literary undertakings should have been the rendering into English of Gregory's famous "Cura Pastoralis." He tells us how he began to translate into English the book "which is called in Latin 'Pastoralis,' and in English 'Shepherd's Book,' sometimes word for word, and sometimes according to the sense, as I had learnt it from Plegmund, my Archbishop, and Asser, my Bishop, and Grimbold, my mass priest, and John, my mass priest. And when I had learnt it as I could best understand it, and as I could most clearly interpret it, I translated it into English; and I will send a copy to every bishopric in my kingdom." King Alfred's "Will" and the "Laws" with their biblical introduction of the ten commandments, possess chiefly an historical and legal interest, enhanced in the latter case by a preface, contributed by the King. Of works connected with King Alfred should be mentioned "The Dialogues" of Gregory, translated in all likelihood by Bishop Werferth; the "Soliloquies of St. Augustine," part of which may have been the King's handiwork; and the book of "Martyrs," which bears internal evidence of having been composed in Alfred's days. But the most memorable achievement associated with Alfred's name is, of course, the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle," which Geffroi Gaimar mentions in his "Estorie des Angles" as having been inspired by the King. Valuable as an historical document, the earliest record of our national history—from the Roman invasion of Britain by Cæsar to A.D. 892—its literary interest can scarcely be overrated. "Few monuments," remarks Jusserand (quoted in Mr. Draper's book), "are more precious than these annals, for no people in Europe can pride itself on having chronicles so ancient, written in its national language." Later generations attributed to the Royal authorship a translation of the "Psalms," a version of "Æsop's Fables," a translation of "Bede's [illegible]

A SELECT BIBLIOGRAPHY OF KING A

In view of the interest aroused by the millenary c the following bibliography may be of service to our r does not profess to be more than a selection for gener and that not of sources (such as Stowe, Spelman, A modern works.

The principal original authority for the life of Alf "Annales Rerum Gestarum Ælfredi Magni" of Ass of St. David's, and an inmate of the King's Court Although doubt has been cast on its authenticity quarters, Freeman, Pauli, and other historians acce main. Mr. W. H. Stevenson's "Asser's Life of Alfred" consulted, and there is a good translation by Dr. J. A. Gi Old English Chronicles," in Bohn's Antiquarian Librar 1848). The "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle," which, if A not initiate, he undoubtedly caused to be continued detail, has been admirably edited and translated for Series by Benjamin Thorpe, the eminent Anglo-Saxo "Alfred in the Chroniclers" (London, 1900), by Profe beare, gives us passages relating to the King in

XI th Century MS.

DOMINO MEO VENERABILI PUSSIMOQUE OMNIUM BRITTANNIE INSULAE XPIANO RUM RECTORI ALFRED ANGLORUM SAXO NUM REGI ASSER OMNIUM SERVO RUM DEI ULTIMUS MILLE MODAL ADVOTA DESIDERIORUM UTHUSQUE VITAE PROSPERITATEM

ANNO DOMINICÆ INCARNATIONIS DCCC XLIX NATUS EST ALFRED ANGUL SAXONUM REX IN MILLA REGIA QUE DICITUR WANATING MILLA PAGA QUE NOMINATUR BERROCSCIRE QUE PAGA HABET UOCATUR BERROCSILUA UBI BUXUS HABUNDAN ESSIME NATET CAUSA GENEALOGIA HAS TALISERIE

(Legend, 1898

THE OPENING OF ASSER'S LIFE OF ALFRED

Facsimile, published in Wise's 1722 edition of the Life, of the 11th c MS. destroyed in the burning of the Cotton Library in 1731.

[Reproduced, by permission, from "Alfred the Great: a Sketch and Studies," by W. H. Draper (Elliot Stock, 2nd edition, 190 authorities, the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle," Asser, F Simeon of Durham, William of Malmesbury, &c. T in an introduction, has pieced together these authoriti "an authentic picture of our home King." Th

Bristol treats "The Religious and Educational Aspect," Mr. Charles Oman, "The Warrior," Sir Clements Markham, "The Geographer," Professor Earle, "The Writer," while Sir Frederick Pollock writes on "English Law before the Conquest," and the Rev. W. J. Loftie on "Alfred and the Arts." All the writers accept Asser in the main. Dr. R. Pauli's "Life" is held in the highest respect by historians; it has been translated for Bohn's Antiquarian Library (London, 1880) by Thorpe. Professor Freeman's Aelfred in the "Dictionary of National Biography" is the ablest short biography in existence; and in his "Norman Conquest," vol. I., will be found that famous panegyric so often quoted, in which he says of Alfred: "There is no name in history to compare with his. . . He is the most perfect character in history." There are several popular biographies—Hughes' little monograph, "Alfred the Great" (London, 1878); Macfadyen's well-illustrated "Alfred, the West Saxon King of the English," in the Saintly Lives Series (London, 1901); Besant's short "Story of King Alfred," in the Library of Useful Stories (London, 1901); Mr. Warwick Draper's very readable illustrated "Alfred the Great"; "The Story of Alfred the Great," by Walter Hawkins and E. T. Smith; "The Perfect Prince," by F. B. Jeffery; and Mr. Jesse Page's little popular handbook "Alfred the Great." Another recent book of value is Mr. J. C. Wall's "Alfred the Great: His Abbeys of Hyde, Athelney, and Shaftesbury." Brief accounts of the reign may be read in Lappenberg's "England Under the Anglo-Saxon Kings," translated and improved by Thorpe; Green's "History of the English People," Vol. I., and his "Conquest of England"; Palgrave's "History of the Anglo-Saxons"; and Professor Church's "Early Britain," in the Story of the Nations Series. Sharon Turner's "History of the Anglo-Saxons" (first published in 1805, revised 1807) is still of some value for the reign.

The late Dr. Stubbs' "Constitutional History" (Oxford, 1874-79) is invaluable for the constitutional side of the reign. Alfred's laws, with translation of the Saxon, are given in Thorpe's "Ancient Laws and Institutes of England" (London, 1840). Kemble's "Saxons in England" (London, 1877) is a clear and trustworthy survey of the political and social condition of the Anglo-Saxons. The relic unearthed in the seventeenth century at Athelney (where the King sought refuge from the Danes), and known as the Alfred Jewel, is carefully described and beautifully illustrated in Professor Earle's recent book, "The Alfred Jewel" (Oxford, 1901).

The most useful introduction to the study of Alfred's translations, &c., will be found in Morley's "English Writers," Vol. II. (London, 1888). Selections from them are made in Dr. Sweet's "Anglo-Saxon Reader" (Oxford, 1894). The translation of Orosius has been edited, from Lord Tollemache's ninth century MS., for the Early English Text Society, by Sweet; there is a translation from the Saxon, by Thorpe, at the end of the edition of Pauli's "Life" mentioned above. The West Saxon version of Pope Gregory's "Pastoral Care" has also been edited, from two MSS., and translated for the same society, by Sweet. Alfred's connexion with the old English rendering of Bede's "Ecclesiastical History," which Dr. Miller has edited and translated, likewise for the Early English Text Society, has been disputed. The version of Boethius' "De Consolatione Philosophiæ" has been thoroughly well edited by Mr. W. J. Sedgefield, and published by the Clarendon Press, 1899. A translation from the same hand followed in 1900. "The Writings of King Alfred," published by the Macmillan Co., is

Blackwood's Magazine, vol. 142, under the well-k
"J. S. B." (John Stuart Blackie).

We have already called attention to the su in connexion with the Millenary of Alfred the now on view at the British Museum and which be visited by many in the ensuing week. It con interesting MSS. The most valuable of them is Anglo-Saxon version of St. Gregory's "Cura treatise on the duties of the parochial clergy. The B. XI., though unfortunately severely damaged in t was undoubtedly written during Alfred's reign.
of Orosius, with its additional matter, is presented somewhat later date. We have also King Alfr
"Boethius," the great devotional book of the Ages, in a copy of the first half of the tenth cent other copy existing being found in the the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle we have several finest being probably the Cotton MS., Tiberius contains several fragments of the Northumbrian annals. The interesting document, from a legal point of view, King Alfred's Will, first edited by given in a copy found in the register of Newminster Of treatises connected with Alfred, we have known Life; William of Malmesbury's Latin Hist from the Saxon invasion to 1125; Layamon's rhy of Britain, in which Alfred is characterized a Darling"; and the life of St. Neot, in which th cakes first makes its appearance. The saint appeared to Alfred on several occasions, and to him more than once on account of his youthful literary collection is supplemented by a small objects of art and coins belonging to the Alfre excellent little catalogue prepared by the depar all the information which visitors may require.

THE GENERAL READ
A "Personal View."

No man likes to have his existence doubted, he is wicked enough to fear the detectives, or fear the begging-letter writers. As for me, wh the courage to be wicked nor the folly to be rich, to maintain, even with some acrimony, the fact of to have it doubted by a stranger is nearly as philosopher and doubting it yourself. Now a sup writing lately with a superior manner in a su journal, and hard put to it for a novelty in frigi hit on the idea of saying that "this was a goo general reader"; it had no pretensions, he went to accuracy, distinction, style, or what else deligh heart; but it was good for the general rend gravamen's in that—"if that person existed." G my word for it, he exists; and he is as reluctan out by a decree from above, as set upon exist, as Milton's Belial himself. No; aspersions and character we could put up with; these "

No, we exist; whether we ought to exist or not may be matter for argument; in that argument we trust that the literary pundit's views upon our low-caste merits may be taken for what they are worth and no more; but as to the question of our existence, why, the one little positive fact of our present appearance in Court will dispose at once of all the negative theory of our opponent.

The general reader is of course (for we are not high-minded, we have no proud books) as inferior to the special reader as the general practitioner to the oculist, or what is elliptically termed "the general" in certain domestic circles to the butler or the stillroom maid. Yet we claim to be harmless, and (if there is not to be mortality among authors and destitution in the publishing trade) even necessary. But, while it is quite certain that we are, it is much less clear what we are, the fact being, no doubt, that the genus contains several species, which our critic uncritically omits to distinguish. Even the most insignificant of bugs and beetles, we would remind him, have been held worthy to have their slightest differences catalogued. Some of us are general readers because we are like the generality of readers; this species plays in literature the part that is played in politics by the man in the street, and might be named after that analogy "the man in the arm-chair." Some of us are general readers because we read generally, not on special subjects, that is; we like a wide circle to nod to rather than a select company to embrace, and wish to hold the position towards all departments of knowledge which the Eton boys hold towards Latin and Greek—"not exactly an acquaintance with them, but a firm conviction that there are such languages." Lector vagus, shall we say? And, again, some of us are general readers because we are generally reading. We have the reading habit. What a revolution reading makes in a man's life, when you think of it! One who can read as seldom passes a day without reading anything as without speaking to any one. But, for the species we are concerned with, it fills up all the interstices of time, and seems almost as much a necessity for the eyes as air for the lungs. Gray's ploughboy whistled as he went for want of thought; reading serves the same purpose for those who have really caught the habit. It gets to be natural to employ your eyes on print, till you can go through a newspaper column quite without taking in the contents—a question would expose you in a moment; but you are at once pulled up by a bit of bad grammar. And you can read the same column over again, unwitting, and only detect yourself, perhaps, towards the end by some odd turn of phrase. Nothing but what the Latin grammars call the frequentative verb will suffice to name this species. Let him be lector lectitans.

However, though the species are distinct enough, they all fall alike under our critic's condemnation (always supposing that they exist); and, on the other hand, they treat each other very peacefully and tolerantly, so that the few further remarks to be made need not be distributed with pedantic tabulation; if incalculable because they are capricious, may be, because they are too sacred for revelation. "A man is a sort of harem; and I observe that tender reade great pudency in showing their books to a stranger the general reader has no claim to "tenderness," what may be. He does not study literature so much as use only too pleased if it can be brought to bear, short of on common life. We read partly to let off the ste emotions; the more elaborate and well-appointed life more are the poor antiquated primitive feelings st man cannot nowadays shed tears over his own wres book he quite easily can without loss of dignity. partly to improve our minds. This is very inac philistine on our parts, especially as we often fortify by quoting the apophthegm that "ignorance costs education"; we realize that by fits and starts, and p empty a few cartloads of information into our intelle Moss. It is in this mood that we compel ourselv centrate upon "those stupid romances common history." But we prefer the Macaulays to the Freem

The history of our native land
With those of Greece compared and popular Rom
And in our high-wrought modern narratives
Stript of their harmonizing soul, the life
Of manners and familiar incidents—
Had never much delighted me.

We are all Wordsworths to that extent. We li general historical impressions and to forget the pr favourite state of mind is like that to which Pepys upon some political theory, "which, if I can but reme I am now by him fully convinced of." And agai partly because man is in the twentieth century animal. Our normal course is to take up with wha itself. We sometimes attempt system in our modest on some one's hundred best books, or try whether Mr Harrison on the choice of books will do anything for roughly speaking, we read not to excite thought, bu it. Consequently we are satisfied mainly with what co —In streets and public places, the advertisements; stations we gravitate to the bookstall; the titles of more elevating (and caeteris paribus we like eleva those of sauces, bicycles, and patent medicines; i read what lies about, giving a theoretic, but not a preference to its higher varieties. Oftenest it is the n sometimes the magazines, occasionally a current book standard one; these last live on the shelves; to take for mere everyday employment is something of a de like expecting the Epicurean gods to come down shoulders with ordinary mortals. We most of us, w exercise a deliberate choice, prefer matter to mann indeed, is one of the reasons why the true man of lette us with such scorn), but some of us are not altogether

Socrates said our only knowledge was
To know that nothing could be known—a pleasant
Science enough, which levels to an ass
Each man of wisdom, future, past, and present.

But for our part we find it more comfortable to confess ignorance after and not before we have assured ourselves that it is inevitable; and for our mentor, if we were to cease to read, he must cease to write, which would be a pity.

H. W. FOWLER.

THE DRAMA.

"WHEN WE WERE TWENTY-ONE."—"JOHN DURNFORD, M.P."

"With such a being as man in such a world as the present"—to borrow Walter Bagehot's favourite quotation from Bishop Butler—it is idle to repine over the vogue of sentimentality in the playhouse. A clear-sighted outlook upon life is the last thing the average playgoer troubles himself about. What he wants is a gentle flattery of his illusions. He is loth to part with pleasant conventions and likes to live in a Fool's Paradise. Hence the instant and overwhelming success of such plays as Mr. H. V. Esmond's When we were Twenty-one. Mr. Esmond must know as well as the rest of us that his picture of life does not correspond with the reality; but he also knows that he can depend upon a general agreement among his audience to make-believe, to sacrifice truth for the sake of sentiment. His audience will contentedly accept the old convention of the typical hobbledehoy blinded by calf-love a Pendennis making a young ass of himself over a Fotheringay. It will also accept the old convention that a middle-aged gentleman must never be allowed to conceive of himself as the object of a young lady's affection—even though that young lady makes advances almost beyond the limits set by maiden modesty. Every folly that the boy Dick commits—he gets tipsy, he shows gross ingratitude to his benefactors, he secretly marries a woman of the town—is held absorbed by the commonplace that "Boys will be boys." And every absurdity in the conduct of Dick, senior, the lad's godfather, is held justified by the convention that elderly bachelors exist on the stage solely for the function of continuous self-sacrifice. The right name for this sort of thing is "staginess," and staginess seems to be Mr. Esmond's besetting sin. He provides Dick, senior, with three comrades—elderly bachelors like himself—in order that the four may strike attitudes throughout the play as a typical group of friendship. They play cards together, or they drink together, or they have reminiscences of their merry youth together—have, in fact, no life outside their collective existence. They even visit a night-club together, in order to rescue the boy, of whom they are joint guardians, from the clutches of "The Firefly." The woman at this club, who is sick of her meretricious surroundings, drinks to drown her care, and tragically begs innocent boys to flee from the wickedness of the place, is typical of Mr. Esmond's fancy for sentimental convention. So is the flamboyant "Firefly" with her red wig and her saucy tongue and her train of raffish victims. In short, the whole atmosphere of the piece is an atmosphere of cheap and silly sentiment. Yet one willingly pardons the author (on condition, bien entendu, that he doesn't do has several stories to tell but succeeds in telling clearly. (1.) There is the pursuit of a young married woman by an unscrupulous Marquis, whic interrupted dinner at an inn, as in a play of Mr.

and to the rescue of the foolish woman by a stron who takes the scandal of the elopement on her ow in the play of Mr. Carton's. (2) There is the lo strong-minded woman and Durnford, who, like Char hero, has a mad wife locked up somewhere. And political story, in the rivalry of Durnford and the the leadership of the Liberal party. Somehow the the virtuously hopeless attachment and the (qui politics do not mix. Are we to be interested misadventure of the silly little married woma daughter? Or in the gradual conversion of Durnfo against the strong-minded woman into ardent love bearings of the various love-affairs upon the inne English politics? Perplexed with these questions, ends by giving it up and hoping that, when next writes a play, he will choose some clear and simp stick to it. There are some amusing details of this piece—a railway-inn, with an outlook on and engines that go puff-puff, and an election c with the humours of polling-day. And there is acting on the part of Mr. Fred Kerr and Miss and Mr. Herz. But ingenuity of mise-en-scène is thing as the art of play-writing, and clever a adequate substitute for solid characters.

A. B.

CURRENT LITERATU

NORFOLK.

THE VICTORIA HISTORY OF THE COUNTY OF NO Edited by ARTHUR H. DOUBLEDAY. (Constab nine guineas.)

As Norfolk is the fifth largest of the count and has a vast number of parishes within its fitting that the scheme of the Victoria County H assign to it six volumes instead of the four that the great majority of the shires. This opening v the main, with the natural history of the county.
been fittingly divided between capable local stude who are recognized as having general expert know

Norfolk is a tolerably flat county rising altitude of 350 feet, and does not possess the charmi geological formation of many another county; b white chalk cliffs of Hunstanton, the mud cliffs Norwich Cragg, and the Cromer Forest Bed yield of fossil remains that the county is well known geologists as well as to English students. Its palæontological literature is abundant, and Mr. H.
has shown a rare discrimination in dealing w succinct but interesting manner. There are parts of the coast of England where nature h busy in changing the surface of the land. The portions of the Norfolk coast, especially Hap Wordwell has for centuries been steady an

Botany is under the general editorship of Mr. Herbert D. Goldhart. It is satisfactory and unexpected to learn that the number of species has certainly not diminished during the last fifty years. Notwithstanding the disappearance of a few rarer plants through drainage of the bogs and improvement of the sea coast, their loss has been more than compensated for by the discovery or recognition of other plants which had escaped the skilled attention of the earlier botanists. We scarcely recognized, by-the-by, that able local botanist the late Rev. G. Montford under the spelling, "Munford." Ferns which only grow on rocks are of course not to be found in Norfolk; but there is a remarkable abundance of those species which pertain to marshes. Lastrea cristata has been found in all the four botanical divisions of the county, whilst in some of the marshes Lastrea Thelypteris is actually mown and used for packing and rough litter. "Osmunda regalis has been harried by collectors for sale until many of its clumps have disappeared; it is, however, still tolerably widely distributed." Notwithstanding the extent of the Norfolk coast line there are but very few growing species of marine algæ; this of course arises from the almost entirely sandy or muddy nature of the shores. The marine zoology, well treated by Mr. Walter Garstang, is interesting, but less rich than that of Essex, owing to the lack of sheltered creeks and inlets. The number of molluscs recorded for Norfolk amounts to 100, which, out of a total of 139 known in the British Isles, is a very high county average. The zealous entomologist cannot fail to be pleased with Mr. J. Edwards' account of the beetles, of which some 1,800 different kinds are known to occur in the county. The description of some of their highly ingenious habits, for which nature has so abundantly fitted them, are even interesting reading to the unlearned. Every one will rejoice to have Mr. Barrett's trustworthy assurance that there is no risk of the extermination of that handsome and striking butterfly, the swallow tail; the fens of Norfolk, in conjunction with those of Cambridgeshire, are the sole haunts in these islands of that notable insect.

Under the unpromising heading of "Reptiles and Batrachians," Mr. Southwell puts on record two facts that were well worth noting. The remains of the European freshwater tortoise have been discovered in two recent deposits in the county under such circumstances that it seems probable that this species existed "contemporaneously with the human inhabitants of the locality." The edible frog was noticed in this and the adjacent county of Cambridge so long ago as 1841, when Professor Bell was assured that it had long existed in certain localities, and from the loudness of its voice had obtained the name of the "Dutch nightingale." Subsequently it became known that Mr. Berney, of Morton-hall, Norwich, had, in 1837, imported both edible frogs and spawn from Paris and from Brussels, which were deposited in meadows and ditches at Morton, Hockering, and Foulden, Norfolk. There were further importations in 1841 and 1842. In June, 1853, Professor Newton discovered a colony of these frogs at Rockland All Saints; in May, 1876, he rediscovered them in a pond at Stow Bedon. It was naturally assumed that all these frogs were of the French or Belgian type, and were descendants of Mr. Berney's importations. But when examined by Mr. Boulenger, he was surprised to find that though the frogs from Foulden were of the French form, those from Stow Bedon (Norfolk) and Foulmere (Cambs.) were examples of a race abundant in Italy and could have had no connexion with Mr. Berney's introductions. This Italian form (Rana esculenta successors. The earliest reference to Norfolk ornith obtained from the L'Estrange Household Book as ear year 1519. This was followed by the shrewd observati Thomas Browne, written about 1664, but not publis 1835. The other chief bird writers for the county are Sheppard, Whitear, Hunt, Paget, Richard Lubbock, Gu Fisher, and lastly Mr. Stevenson, to whose admirable a writings full justice is done. No part of the kingdom situated than Norfolk for the visits of the great army o migrants. Mr. Gurney's eloquent and graphic passage tive of their autumnal advent is quoted with happy effe greatest care has been taken with the list of Norf supplied by Mr. Southwell; if anything, he errs on th scepticism, which is not a bad fault. A curious sli noted when Mr. Southwell writes of the "Reed B Blackheaded Bunting"; they are distinct spec omission which was noted in the corresponding v Hampshire in this series also occurs in the descriptio natural history of the county of Norfolk. It is not general literary public, but the most intelligen naturalists, who take a considerable interest in local both flowers and insects and birds; such titles infrequently a noteworthy origin. But these pages ar most part quite silent in this direction. We have onl nine local names mentioned even for the birds; for inst Goldfinch is termed "King Harry," and the Red- Diver "the Sprat Loon." Could not room be found information of this character in a subsequent vol might possibly be comprehended under the wide-e title of Folk-lore.

The general survey of natural history havi accomplished, it was found that there was room in volume for disquisitions on "Early Man," by Mr. Clinch, "Romano-British Remains," by Mr. Haverf "Anglo-Saxon Remains," by Mr. Reginald Smit illustrated by an instructive map. Mr. Clinch take the usual round of man of the paleolithic, neolithic and iron ages, each aptly illustrated by objects disco the county; the topographical list of prehistoric an in Norfolk is admirable and seems to be exhaustiv Haverfield has done his work with that admirable clea fulness of illustrated detail for which his name is almost proverbial. Mr. Reginald Smith is excell describer of Anglo-Saxon antiquities, and proves that thorough knowledge of museums both national and lo his single brief paragraph on earthworks can only be d as paltry, and showing no grasp of the main question, far more important than the chronicling of trinkets a Probably, however, such deficiencies will be to som made good in the subsequent topography.

The volume is well supplied with maps and illus the latter largely representing objects of antiquarian One full-page presentment of Anglian ornaments in th Museum is exceedingly well reproduced in colours. frontispiece we are glad to notice the work of that a black-and-white artist, Mr. William Hyde, who present a fine view of Norwich—the spire of its cathedral set lowering sky. Besides the botanical maps there geological, prehistoric, Roman, and Anglo-Saxon.

The Victoria County History Syndicate is to be cong on the launching of the preliminary volume of anothe

SOME RECENT HISTORICAL BOOKS.

Modern Europe.

Mr. W. Alison Phillips is already known to us by an interesting study of Walther von der Vögelweide and by a judicious and well-written History of the Greek War of Independence. His MODERN EUROPE (Rivingtons, 6s. n.) will certainly greatly raise his reputation, and, indeed, should give him distinct rank among historians of the day. The history of Modern Europe from 1815 to 1880 is, of course, full of vexed questions, and we should no doubt have many points which we might discuss with Mr. Phillips; none, however, which would alter our opinion of the book. It has achieved, with a remarkable success, the difficult task of compressing into a compact space the long history of a time of extraordinary complications and entanglements; but much more important—it has never lost vigour and interest throughout the whole survey. The book is clearly that of a man who searches for principles, but who does not ignore, neglect, or adulterate facts. The completeness of the book is really extraordinary. It is very difficult to find anything that is left out, and where some sides of the subject, such as the internal affairs of the different States, are definitely subordinated, the most admirable proportion of treatment is still observed. One omission there is, however, and that an international one. Military history is practically excluded, rather after the fashion of the late John Richard Green. The omission is excusable if not inevitable. Less clearly intended is the omission of any definite discussion of the progress of thought. But, it need hardly be said, the inclusion of these two subjects would have at least doubled the size of the book. Mr. Phillips writes an easy and expressive style, which might be the better, perhaps, for an occasional pruning; he has at least the cardinal merit of securing and retaining interest. The book is by far the best and handiest account of the international politics of the nineteenth century that we possess.

A new edition of Dr. Dyer's HISTORY OF MODERN EUROPE has long been wanted, and we are glad to find that its issue has been entrusted to the competent hands of Mr. Arthur Hassall (G. Bell and Sons). Two volumes are now published, and Mr. Hassall promises us a thorough revision of the book in the light of recently published work, and a continuation down to the end of the nineteenth century. These additions should make the book, which was originally a remarkable achievement of compression and arrangement, thoroughly in keeping with the more modern standard of accuracy. We gather from Mr. Hassall's introductory note that the more important changes will occur in the four later volumes. In the volumes before us very few changes have been made, and some alterations that we might reasonably have anticipated are still to seek. Dr. Dyer's notes were largely of the nature of a bibliography, and these Mr. Hassall seems for the most part to have left untouched, thus, as we think, losing a most important opportunity of increasing the value of the book. Dr. Dyer was so accurate and so sensible a writer that his opinions require very little modification: but the secondary authorities, for the whole of the period covered by these two volumes, have been almost entirely replaced, since his first edition, by newer and more exhaustive books. To these Mr. Hassall makes no reference. We might multiply instances, but it may suffice to say that it was with a shock that we concluded in vain our search for a reference to Bishop Creighton's history of the written by Menasseh Ben Israel to promote th of the Jews, 1649-1656, but secondarily it has extremely interesting introduction by Mr.

Three excellent portraits add greatly to the val
The first is a photogravure from an etching by second a reprint of the original title-page to t Israel," 1652, and the third a reproduction o portrait by Rembrandt in the Hermitage Gallery, certainly of an eminent Jewish Rabbi of th century, has not so certain an identification others. The interest of the book itself is both personal. Historically, it shows the nature of the from fanatics and merchants almost equally—t the great mercantile and non-Christian body, a which it was prepared and, after two defeats, carried out. Some of this work had been done students, notably by Mr. Sidney Lee; but in Lucien Wolf collects and enlarges it very ably the interest centres round two characters. The ac siastic Menasseh Ben Israel is well drawn in Mr. W tion, and we feel a real sympathy with his str sad disappointments of its close. He was one of have done great work and "died in exile" Oliver Cromwell himself also receives in Mr. Wolf touches illustrative of his masterful will and hi gaining his ends in spite of the opposition of the su Protectorate. The volume is a valuable re-stu sources.

The Fallen Stuarts.

The Cambridge Historical Essays, of whic STUARTS, by F. W. Head (Cambridge University
No. XII., have long been recognized as attaining a of merit, including as they do such clever studies Whibley and Mr. Headlam on Greek politics, the Constitutional experiments of the Commonw Figgis on the Divine Right of Kings. Mr. Head's interesting as any of these, is a sound and scholarly
It may be taken as a sample of what Lord Acton Cambridge has done for young historical students i to a first hand study of original materials. In chief original source is the Gualterio have supplied some very interesting illustra tortuous Papal diplomacy of the first half of t century. Mr. Head has added a useful append has quoted many passages from the MSS. It is to he or some other competent scholar would edit th
The book may be commended as a sober and jud a subject hitherto little understood. It is to be w that the author had treated the period of the '4 up to the death of Henry, Cardinal of York—the of the whole story—in more detail. What Mr.
has told us makes us wish for more, and unle mistaken Mr. Head might have supplied what we the many interesting and novel points that c way we may note the proposal of Louis X
Clement XI. that the Holy See should achiev Italy by the aid of French and Spanish arm sovereignty. It was not half a century before D proposing to win the same position for Savoy.
a rule well written; but we cannot refrain fr following magnificent mixture of metaphor ref

temporary Writers" the best material arranged with skill and discrimination. The picture presented is both vivid and complete. The selection of passages could hardly have been better chosen or better arranged, and it is a distinct advantage that the book carries down the story to include the Swedish plot and the Spanish invasion of Scotland, so that with "The Rising of 1745" we have now a complete companion, in selections from contemporary writers, to the modern historical accounts of the Jacobite movements of the eighteenth century. We say complete, but perhaps we are hardly accurate in so doing, for we find no reference to the Oxford riots of 1716, papers concerning which were laid before the House of Lords and published in the following year, or to the less well known case of "Rex v. Tyrell and others," heard at the summer assizes of Oxford in 1747, a pretty piece of reading and a valuable illustration of contemporary feeling. But these, it may be said, do not concern Scottish history, though they belong to the history of Jacobitism. In any case, it is a proof of the completeness of Mr. Terry's work that we can note only such, and such like, omissions. The maps and portraits, and particularly the reproductions that illustrate the volume, are excellent. We wish, however, that Mr. Terry had stated in each case the sources from which he obtained them (e.g., the portraits facing pp. 22 and 200). It is a distinct loss, too, that no sketch of the history and value of the authorities and books referred to is given, as was done in the case of Mr. Nutt's companion series on English history. Only scholars will know the nature of the different writers quoted, not to mention the MSS. which have been used for the first time by Mr. Terry. The book is, however, not only valuable to historical students, but is full of good reading, both entertaining and dramatic.

English-Scotch Relations.

Mr. R. S. Rait has followed up his essay on the Scottish Parliament with a book of equal value in AN OUTLINE OF THE RELATIONS BETWEEN ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND (500-1707) (Blackie, 7s. 6d. n.). Designed, no doubt, on the model of M. Leroux's studies on the relations between France and Germany, it is less minute and elaborate in execution. It contains, in the first place, a discussion of the question of the racial animosity between the Lowlands and Highlands. Mr. Rait is not disposed to deny that the Lowlanders were English in speech and manners, but he denies that they were English in blood. None the less he admits that there was still a "Celtic heritage of the Lowlands" of which the importance of the great families of Gordon and Douglas was a survival. For his view much is to be said. The battle of Harlaw in 1411 has been made much of by supporters of the theory of racial antagonism; Mr. Rait shows that its meaning has been misunderstood. On the other hand, it seems to us that he somewhat minimizes the significance of the charters of Edgar to "both Scots and English." The subject has, of course, its bearing upon the question of the feudal relations of Scotland with England, which also is discussed by Mr. Rait. The English party in Scotland up to the Reformation—we hardly see the reason for the dividing line—are to Mr. Rait traitors and mercenaries. The later relations are well, if too briefly, sketched, and the account of the Union is particularly well done. There is an interesting appendix on the Feudalization of Scotland. The whole subject is worth a more minute treatment than Mr. Rait has yet been able to give it.

author. The "Essays" are in fact reviews of current lit appeared in a weekly journal, and the opening one ambitious title "English Literature," consists merel on four recently published "Books for Students of Literature." It contains, however, it need scarcely many interesting remarks—especially on the relation poetry and prose—and the same may be said of all th which will also have their value as admirable object l the art of cultured and urbane reviewing. Other skimmed over are The Annals of the English Stage, Mr. Gosse's Poems, Ferdinand Fabre, and the Cont Augustine Filon; there is a capable but not strikin of "Robert Elsmere"; but the most important of the " are, we think, that on Amiel and that on Wordsworth, a penetrating and admirably expressed investigatio Wordsworthian spirit.

Motors.

That large and increasing public which is inte the motor car will welcome, if they have not already w Mr. W. Worby Beaumont's recently published s volume, MOTOR VEHICLES AND MOTORS (Constable Self-propelled carriages are evidently destined to figu in the traffic of the future, and it is highly desirable country should take a proper share in the developme new industry. Mr. Beaumont's work will contribute in degree towards this end. He traces the progress of t car from its early beginnings a century ago or more to recent types, such as enable immense distances to be at express speed. As might be expected, French de applications figure largely in the story. It is curious, h note that that nation appears in the forefront in most relating to travel, whether in the heavens, on the earth or in the depths of the sea. British firms have indeed arouse themselves since the removal of our absu regulations about five years ago, but anything like m superiority in the matter is beyond the reach of hope. A might profitably be directed to the appearance of the and it is worth suggesting that a boat should be taken as t instead of a brougham or a landau. Those who are between the old and the new methods of locomotion wi reference to the tables here presented, that, for certain work, the motor car already has the advantage a economy, as well as in speed. Engineers and others interested in details of mechanism will be able to indu desires to the full as the number of drawings is very l their execution beyond reproach. The amount of space to a consideration of air resistance is, however, very while for Patent-office records and the thermodyn internal combustion engines we must await the appear forthcoming volume.

Commercial Education.

The publication of Mr. Fabian Ware's EDUC FOUNDATIONS OF TRADE AND INDUSTRY (Harper, 3s. 6d.) timed. The temporary withdrawal of the Government f our future administrative authorities a short breathin We cannot imagine a better preparation for the task th them than the perusal of this admirable account o educational methods. Out of the confusion of blue b author has skilfully disentangled the principles that hav Continental and American statesmen in their attempts subjects been allowed to encroach upon the sphere of Secondary Education. German legislators, in particular, have in all their curricula kept before them the two-fold aim of all honest education. In providing a type of education suited to train a boy for the future surroundings of business they have not failed to include a generous allowance of those more liberal and humanizing studies which will best fit him for the responsibilities and duties of citizenship. One point in the German system is justly praised. The course of education is guided by the deliberate recommendations of the teaching profession, not, as too often with us, by the haphazard predilections of local tradesmen.

More ambitious but less satisfactory is Mr. E. E. Whitfield's COMMERCIAL EDUCATION (Methuen, 5s.). It not only sets forth what has already been done in this direction by England and her rivals, but outlines an ideal form of commercial training in all its stages. According to the preface, the book is intended to serve as a general introduction to the same publisher's Commercial Series. Perhaps this accounts for its diffuseness, and explains the series of snap-shots of this and that particular branch of study which the author gives. Several chapters cover ground sufficiently dealt with by the average elementary handbook of Political Economy. Too much space is devoted to the details of the machinery of commerce, which can surely be best picked up in the business house. Mr. Whitfield believes that commercial subjects can in themselves furnish a liberal education, but after his kindly and flattering reference to Cicero, as the "famous, scholarly Roman orator," one is not surprised that he gives Latin a place in his time-table. Still, as it is to be laid aside with other childish things by the boy of fifteen, it cannot do much harm. An appendix contains a number of specimen papers, from which we gather that the examining bodies of Commercial Institutes do not always rise superior to the old-fashioned methods of Ollendorf. Such sentences as "This young lady has a little mouth" and "Is my face swollen" do not seem particularly appropriate to the requirements of Portuguese trade. Mr. Whitfield writes with evident knowledge and earnestness, but his composition is painfully slipshod, and his discussion of difficulties too superficial and desultory to be of much value.

COMMERCIAL EDUCATION AT HOME AND ABROAD (Macmillan, 6s.), by F. Hooper and J. Graham, is similar in aim and treatment to Mr. Fabian Ware's book. While it lacks the latter's statesmanlike grasp of principles, it is fuller in detail and more directly useful to those engaged in the active supervision of commercial schools. A practical experience of the requirements of British trade leads the authors to regard five subjects as essential to any well-considered scheme—modern languages, commercial practice, the study of materials, and the general principles and law of commerce. Such a course obviously requires careful graduation, and could not at present be undertaken by any one type of educational institution. Many admirable suggestions are given us as to the best way of rapidly adapting our existing educational machinery to cope with this or that part of the work. The claim advanced that the commercial departments of secondary schools should receive the same recognition from Government as the teaching of science and art is certainly reasonable. A generous subsidy means improved teaching, and this combined with a uniform system of inspection and examination would at

FICTION.

"Sir Richard Calmady."

THE HISTORY OF SIR RICHARD CALMADY (M a novel of considerable length, as novels running in fact to 618 closely-printed page take the recital of a human drama on such a scale considerable confidence, but the confidence in well-founded. A picture so finely and amply co detail of which vibrates as it were with thought a required a large canvas. "Sir Richard Calmady judgment, among the three or four novels of the —one other of them, at least, having been als woman—which, whatever popularity they may atta ably raise the art of fiction to a higher level.

The idea of a great landowner whose physic barred him from the usual pursuits, and left him proper to his position, was the motif of Mrs. Cra Life." Lucas Malet has conceived it in a manner subtle, and suffused it with the glow of an extraord dramatic imagination. The opening of the boo circumstances which attended the birth to the ho of an heir finely developed both in mind and co dwarfed and crippled from the hips. We are once with the most baffling riddle of life a riddl can find, and to which the author offers us, no though it cannot be answered in the mass, the solve it for himself; and in this book we have pres moving picture of a nature keenly intellectual, s bred, animated by strong and incalculable pas himself against the mysterious and immovable ba fate has imprisoned him, and finding, less by t experience, some kind of clue to the stran mystery of his birth.

Given the central conception a comparati the greatness of this novel does not lie in its the lines of its construction. There is the which has to work itself out, there are the amours, there is the beautiful adventuress who in the mire, there is his purging and discipline life and his gradual conversion to a career spent not for himself—themes well-worn enough, but convincing, how enthralling they become in t powerful writer! Lucas Malet has no gospel arrière pensée, no ideas which she is anxious to d the mouths of her characters. Like the gre she aims only at the essential truth of character
We do not think any living writer could suc found and vivid a realization of mental histo done in the case of Richard Calmady. He is yet he is intensely interesting alike in submission; the impalpable influences of his w tion, of his alert and cynical intellect, and of both side with his bodily deformity, are traced with fulness and power. Unlike that of many "p novelists the psychology of Lucas Malet is alw human. For her all the incidents, great or small, aspects of nature are full of meaning as mirrors of Add to this a trained eye for detail, whether of si masterly description, power, and a prose style

the ascetic priest, and the minor characters, Roger Ormiston, Lord Shotover, Dr. Knott, and others—even if Lord Fallowfeild be, unconsciously no doubt, a little reminiscent of Cousin Feenix—are strong and interesting. The story gains enormously in charm from its picturesque setting at Brockhurst, the ancient home of the Calmadys. No recent author that we can remember, not even William Black, reveals so unerring and resourceful a faculty of giving every scene the true romance of its surroundings as Lucas Malet.

In the strength and insight with which the story has been conceived, in the wealth of fancy and reflection bestowed upon its execution, and in the moving sincerity of its pathos throughout, "Sir Richard Calmady" must rank as the great novel of a great writer.

THE LATE REV. E. L. CUTTS, D.D.

Though not amongst the foremost writers of his day in history, archæology, or theology, Dr. Cutts, who died last week ripe in years, was a man of real mark in literature,. For thirty years he held the benefice of Holy Trinity, Haverstock-hill, and was an assiduous reader at our public libraries, producing valuable and appreciated books for a period of over fifty years. Mr. Cutts produced his first book in 1849, a few months after taking his B.A. degree at Queens' College, Cambridge. It was entitled "A Manual for the Study of the Sepulchral Slabs and Crosses of the Middle Ages." Considering the youth of the writer, this well-illustrated book was a remarkably able compilation, and at once gave Mr. Cutts a standing among the antiquaries and ecclesiologists of the day. At the present moment there is no other manual covering the like ground, and the book commands a good price. After admission into Holy Orders Mr. Cutts held successively curacies at Coggeshall and Billericay, Essex, and on the formation, in 1852, of the Essex Archæological Society was appointed its honorary secretary. One of his first duties, and an easy one, when occupying that position was to slay the crack-brained theory published by a brother cleric that Colchester Castle was a Roman temple. A book on the decoration and furnishing of churches, brought out whilst Mr. Cutts was in Essex, did in its time good work in curbing the extravagances of those who were fired by the shallowest side of the Oxford Movement. In 1865 Mr. Cutts was appointed secretary of the Additional Curates' Society. Once in London his spare time was given to literary work down to the very year of his death. In 1872 a well-illustrated book of his on "Scenes and Characters of the Middle Ages" was produced by Messrs. Virtue and Co., treating of the monks, pilgrims, minstrels, knights and merchants, &c., with abundant quotations. For the first time, several of these matters were dealt with after an accurate fashion; the hermit, for instance, instead of being the half-crazed, ascetic enthusiast of romance, was shown to be "a sober-minded, civilized person with definite duties."

Soon after this began Mr. Cutts' connexion with the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, of which he was one of the chief literary mainstays for the past thirty years. In 1874 that society issued his "Turning Points of English Church History," which had had a sale of 24,000 copies by 1895, when the last edition was issued. This was followed by "Turning Points of General Church History" and by works on the life and times of Charlemagne, Constantine the Great, St. Augustine, St. Jerome, and St. Augustine of Canterbury. He was also the writer of various religious books and treatises, the most important of which was "A Devotional Life of Our Lord," of some 600 pages, published in 1882. Various tales of Church epochs were put forth by Mr. Cutts, the best of which, reprinted in 1899, is "Amina, a Tale of the Nestorians."

In 1888 Messrs. Longmans published Mr. Cutts' account of Colchester, in the Historic Towns Series. His heart was chiefly

Correspondence.

LITERARY AGENTS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I have read with interest both the article a letter referring to authors' agents which have appe Literature.

It would have given me great pleasure, Sir, with you to have written at some length on a subject of which I h particular and varied experiences, a subject, too, of the importance to authors, but arrangements have been m discuss the subject fully and exhaustively in the coming of the Author.

I should like, however, to draw attention to one or tw which have come before me, especially as complaints, n from the lesser author, but also from the author of larg larity, are getting more frequent, and in many cases very

First (a point which you have yourself clearly c trated) and the increase of complaints tends to confir success of an agent for one of his employers means hi in the same direction for others.

Secondly, "the detectives of Portugal-street (or under the new address of Old Queen-street)" need to be larly wary, because the majority of agents posing as sec confidential advisers are repeatedly impressing upo employers that the contracts they make must not be refe the secretary of the Authors' Society. The destru obvious.

The same tone was taken by the publishers wh society was first started, and is taken even now when it taken safely.

And, thirdly, in spite of your correspondent's staten is not of infrequent occurrence that agreements hav passed, by these self-appointed lawyers, which no conf adviser ought with self-respect to ask his employers t nay, in some cases insist upon his employers adoptin deduction again is obvious. Under certain circumstance more useful to keep in touch with the publisher or edit the author. If this is not a fair deduction, then the agen competent.

I have put forward these statements with due and del consideration, and can support them by examples whic regret be it spoken, are constantly becoming more freque

It is only fair, however, to state that some agents are greatest benefit to some authors and some authors wou their incomes considerably reduced if it were not fo agents.

As it is, from my point of view, desirable that these and many others bearing on this subject should be dealt wi where, I regret that I am unable to use the medium o influential paper to a great extent.

Faithfully yours,

G. HERBERT THRING,

Secretary of the Incorporated Society of A

39, Old Queen-street, Storey's-gate, S.W.

"SO LONG."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Your account of Walt Whitman's work tempts me to ask a question never yet, I believe, satisfactorily answered. What is the origin of the phrase of farewell "So long"? I think it first appeared in print in one of Walt Whitman's Songs of Parting, published nearly fifty years ago. "While my pleasure is yet at the full I whisper 'So long!' And take the young woman's hand and the young man's hand for the last time." Some take it to be Scriptural, others French-Canadian, "Àtantôt." It is undoubtedly of American origin, though now used all over the world.

Faithfully yours, D. P.

11th Sept., 1901.

BYRON AND SOUTHEY.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In the brief notice of Byron's Works in your issue of Sept. 7, the reviewer observes that "the only kind thing Byron ever said" of Southey was that "he was not ill-favoured." The writer has forgotten that, after meeting Southey in London in 1813, he said, "to have that poet's head and shoulders I would almost have written his sapphics." Another remark of Byron's, which most readers will consider more "kind" than just, was his estimate of Southey's "Roderick" as the first poem of the time.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

J. D.

Wonston, Crowborough, Sept. 10.

SHAKESPEARE FIRST FOLIOS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Referring to the account of the sales of the first folio "Shakespeare," in your issue of July 20, 1901, the following extract from the European Magazine of April, 1790, may be of interest:—

> The collection of Shakespeare's Plays, 1623 (commonly called the first folio) was sold at Mr. Egerton's auction room for no less a sum than £35 14s. The Dukes of Grafton and Roxburgh were the competitors for this volume. The latter was victorious. At the same sale Romeo and Juliet, 4to., 1599, was purchased for £7 15s. and Hamlet, 4to., 1604, for £17 6s. 6d. A three-guinea subscription receipt for Alderman Boydell's "Shakespeare" was likewise disposed of at the same time and place for £6 8s.

Yours, CHARLES WALLIS.

Cape Town, Aug. 14, 1901.

PIQUET OR ÉCARTÉ?

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—A curious error has been perpetuated through the numerous editions of Dickens' works, and I have never seen any notice taken of it.

In "Dombey and Son," chapter 21, page 252, of the Authentic Edition, the Major and Cleopatra sit down to play "piquet."

"Do you propose, Major?"

MISTAKES.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The typographical errata (including accented "Liége") cited by your reviewer as o "More Mistakes We Make" were corrected months ago, so I have not the pleasure that I o have had of sending him a "Thank you."

As a reviewer of my assertions, however, he has imperilled his position, for he suggests that when of Craigburnfoot had a bairn in the cradle whe sixty years old" it is I who imagined such a thin that he would like to see the reference. He doe honour. I modestly disclaim the imagining, fo reason that the credit belongs to Scott. My c once read "The Antiquary." He will find that died her skin was so shrivelled with age that mummy's. This can only reasonably be put down some eighty or eighty-five years, though there of evidential value. Now in chap. 29 we Eveline's death occurred twenty-three years pre fore at that time old Elspeth must have been at sixty. And it was Elspeth herself who said—chap the death of Eveline, for which she was so muc had never "had a day's peace—Has not my hous with my bairn in the cradle? Have not my boats Have not a' that were dear to me dree'd penanc Perhaps this will satisfy Mr. Critic, who obvi know his Scott.

A knowledge of the difference in meaning of and "translating" would also be of service to He would then see that when I speak of Plutar "Heureka," Mr. Clark does know in what lan wrote.

Which shows that there are "ignorant" revi other "ignorant" people such as,

Yours respectfull

C.

24, Iffley-road, Hammersmith, W., Sept. 7.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISH

Art again takes the leading place in Me list. Mr. Baldry's book on "Hubert von Herko Life and Works"—with a binding designe Herkomer—will be ready about the end of t list also includes "Fra Filippo Lippi," by Edw uniform with Professor Langton Douglas' "Fra continuation of Lady Dilke's work on French art i century dealing in the present volume with "F tion and Furniture"; "The Print-Collector' by Alfred Whitman, of the British Museum Pictures at Windsor Castle," by Ernest Law worth Van Dyck Sketch Book," by Lionel Cust being here reproduced for the first time; and the Saints in Christian art entitled "The F Church as Depicted by the Great Masters," by M (N. D'Anvers). In addition to their new "Min Painters" and further volumes in their "Great "British Artists" Series, Messrs. Bell are prepa illustrated "Handbooks of the Great Craftsme editorship of Dr. G. C. Williamson, the editor Masters." The first three volumes will be "

Gower, in two volumes; the first series of "Shropshire Houses, Past and Present," illustrated and described by the late Mr. Stanley Leighton, M.P.; the second volume of "The Letters of Thomas Gray," edited by Duncan C. Tovey, (Bohn's Libraries); "The Age of Shakespeare," by Thomas Seccombe and J. W. Allen, in the series of "Handbooks of English Literature," and "The Life of Napoleon I.," by John Holland Rose, M.A. (two volumes).

Messrs. Pearson will publish next week an illustrated book on "How our Navy is Run," by Archibald Hurd, with an introduction by Lord Charles Beresford. Later in the month they will add "Ben Hur" to their "Scarlet Library," with illustrations by H. M. Brock, and issue the third volume of G. Barnett Smith's "Heroes of the Nineteenth Century." For next month they promise a biography of Lord Kitchener, by Mr. Horace G. Groser, a history of "French's Cavalry Campaign," by J. G. Maydon (of the Legislative Assembly of Natal), and a volume on "Modern Billiards," by John Roberts and other experts. Later will come "The Log of an Island Wanderer," an illustrated record of travels in the Southern Pacific, by Edwin Pallander; and "Patriotic Song," an anthology of loyal verse of Great Britain and her colonies, by Arthur Stanley. Their novels include "Monsieur," by Clive Holland—a sequel to "My Japanese Wife"; "Don or Devil?" by William Westall; "The Goddess of Gray's Inn," by G. B. Burgin; "Willowdene Will," by Halliwell Sutcliffe; and "The Peril of the Prince," by Headon Hill.

"New Poems," by Mr. Theodore Watts-Dunton, and "Other Poems," by Mrs. Meynell, are the only new volumes of original verse in Mr. Lane's autumn list, but he will have eight or nine volumes for the Lover's Library and Flowers of Parnassus Series. Volume II. is also announced of "Florilegium Latinum," giving celebrated passages, mostly from English Poets, translated into Latin, edited by the Rev. F. St. John Thackeray and the Rev. E. D. Stone. Mr. William Archer's "Poets of the Younger Generation," which again figures in the list, consists of a series of critical essays on William Watson, Stephen Phillips, Mrs. Meynell, Francis Thompson, F. B. Money-Coutts, and other living poets, and will have thirty-three portraits from woodcuts by Robert Bryden. The more important of Mr. Lane's other books are "King Monmouth: being a History of the Career of James Scott, the Protestant Duke, 1649-1685," by Allan Fea—"Jane Austen: her Homes and her Friends," by Constance Hill, illustrated; "The Wessex of Thomas Hardy," by Professor Bertram Windle, illustrated by Edmund H. New; "Ancient Royal Palaces in and near London"—twenty lithographs by T. H. Way, with descriptive notes by Frederic Chapman; "Thomas Wolsey: Legate and Reformer," by the Rev. Ethelred L. Taunton; "Walt Whitman, an Essay," with a selection from his writings, by Edmund Holmes; another album of cartoons by Mr. Charles Dana Gibson entitled "The Widow and her Friends"; "My Vicarage Garden," by Canon Ellacombe; and "From the Heart of the Rose: Letters on things natural, things serious, things frivolous," by Helen Milman (Mrs. Caldwell Crofton), who has also written an introduction to a new edition of Francis Bacon's essay "Of Gardens" which is to appear with a frontispiece and cover design by Edmund H. New. Mr. Lane's new novels are "The Just and the Unjust," by Richard Bagot, "The Usurper," by W. J. Locke, and "The World's Delight," by Mary J. H. Skrine.

Judge O'Connor Morris' new work, "Present Irish Questions," will be published by Mr. Grant Richards in October. It deals specially with the question of the Irish land.

Mr. John Macqueen announces Dr. Maurus Jokai's new Historical Romance entitled "Manassch," a story of life among a primitive people in far Transylvania.

Messrs. Ward, Lock, and Co., whose autumn list includes Mr. Guy Boothby's "Farewell, Nikola!" are publishing the following novels:—"The Fighting Troubadour," by Mr. A. C. Gunter, the author of "Mr. Barnes of New York"; "Zike Mouldom," by Ocme Agnus; another book by Mr. [illegible] other Fireside Tales"; "The Ambassador's Venture," by Allen Upward; "A Man of Millions," by Dr. Keigh[illegible] "Lepidus the Centurion," by Mr. Edwin L. Arnold.

Mr. Brimley Johnson informs us that by Mr. Alfred [illegible] desire the future profits accruing to the author [illegible] sale in Great Britain of "Master and Slave" are to [illegible] to the Bethesda Strike Fund.

Books to look out for at once.

"The Dictionary of National Biography." Supplementary [illegible] (Abbott—Childers) and II. (Chippendale—Hosta). Sm[illegible] 15s. net and 20s. net.
[The third and concluding supplementary volume [illegible] October 25.]

"Stringer Lawrence, the Father of the Indian Army." By C[illegible] Biddulph. Murray. Illustrated.

"The Voyage of Ithobal." By Sir Edwin Arnold. Murray.
[An epic poem dealing with the first circumnavigation [illegible] alluded to by Herodotus.]

"How our Navy is Run." By Archibald Hurd. Pearson. [illegible] Introduction by Lord Charles Beresford. Illustrated.

"A Nest of Linnets." By Frankfort Moore. Hutchinson. 6[illegible]
[Historical romance of Bath, introducing Dr. John[illegible] Walpole, the Sheridans, &c.]

"The Right of Way." By Gilbert Parker. Heinemann. 6s.
[A Canadian romance.]

"Despair's Last Journey." By David Christie Murray. Meth[illegible]

"Master of Men." By E. Phillips Oppenheim. Methuen. 6s.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRIN[illegible]

BIOGRAPHY.

KING MONMOUTH. A History of the Career of James Scott, "the Prot[illegible] 1649-1685. By ALLAN FEA. 9×5¾, 435 pp. Lane. 21s. n.

ELIZABETH, EMPRESS OF AUSTRIA AND QUEEN OF HUNGARY. TSCHUDI. Trans by E. M. Cope. 9×5¾, 260 pp. Sonnenschein. 7s. 6[illegible]

JOSEPHINE, EMPRESS OF THE FRENCH. By F. A. OGGR. 8[illegible] Unwin. 7s. 6d. n.

BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.

THREE CHRISTMAS GIFTS, AND OTHER TALES. By A. D. BRIGHT[illegible] Simpkin, Marshall. 3s.

WITH CUTLASS AND TORCH. (A Story of the Great Slave Coast.) STABLES. 7½×5¼, 322 pp. Nelet. 5s.

NINE UNLIKELY TALES. By E. NESBIT. 7½×5¼, 297 pp. Unwin. 6[illegible]

BAKER MINOR AND THE DRAGON. By G. E. FARROW. 8×5¾, 240 pp.

TOM AND SOME OTHER GIRLS. By MRS VAIZEY. 7½×5, 279 pp. Ca[illegible]

BLAZING ARROW. A Tale of the Frontier. By E. S. ELLIS. 7½×5, 280 pp. [illegible]

THE PINK KNIGHT. (Dumpy Books for Children.) By J. R. MONSELL. Grant Richards. 1s. 6d.

THE SIX INCH ADMIRAL. By G. A. BIRT. 6½×4½, 157 pp. Grant Ri[illegible]

EDUCATIONAL.

THE FABLES OF ORBILIUS. Part I. By A. D. GODLEY. 7×4¾, 56 pp. [illegible]

RUSSIAN SELF TAUGHT. By C. A. THIS and J. MARSHALL. 7½[illegible] Marlborough. 2s.

THE VILLAGE SCHOOL READER. Ed. by C. S. ROUNSELL. 7½×5, [illegible] Marshall. 1s. 6d. n.

THE STORY OF THE PIRATE. (Sir Walter Scott Readers for Yo[illegible] Black. 6d. n.

POEMS OF SHELLEY. (Literature Series.) Black. 6d. n.

A FIRST HISTORY OF ENGLAND. Part I., to 1066 A.D. By C. L. THOMS[illegible] 191 pp. H. Marshall. 1s. 6d. n.

EURIPIDES (Medea). HOMER (Odyssey I.). EURIPIDES (Hecuba). [illegible] Classics. Ed. by REV. T. NICKLIN, A. W. UPCOTT, and E. C. MARCHA[illegible] Bell. 2s. each.

BOYS AND GIRLS OF OTHER DAYS. A Reader for Upper Standards. By J. FINNEMORE. 7×4¾, 260 pp. Black. 1s. 4d.

CARMINA BRITANNIÆ. A selection of Poems and Ballads Illustrative [illegible] History. By C. L. THOMSON. 7½×5¼, 351 pp. H. Marshall. 2s.

BROWNING'S "STRAFFORD." Ed. by AGNES WILSON. MACAULAY'S [illegible] JOHNSON AND GOLDSMITH. Ed. by J. DOWNIE. (Blackie's Englis[illegible] 7½×5. Blackie. 2s. each.

CÆSAR, THE GALLIC WAR. Book IV. Ed. by J. BROWN. (Eton L[illegible] 7½×5, 111 pp. Blackie. 2s.

GREEK GRAMMAR PAPERS. By A. C. LIDDELL. 6[illegible]×4[illegible], 105 pp. [illegible]

STRAWS IN THE WIND. By CARLTON DAWE. 7¼×5¼. 340 pp. Hurst and Blackett. 6s.
[Society of to-day.]

THE WESTERNERS. By S. E. WHITE. 7¼×5. 370 pp. Constable. 6s.
[The American Indians in the early seventies.]

THE KEY TO THE RIDDLE. By MARGARET S. COMBE. 7¾×5¼. 354 pp. Nisbet. 5s.
[A story of the Vaudois, 1686. The riddle is Life, and the key Divine love.]

A UNION OF HEARTS. By KATHARINE TYNAN. 7¾×5¼. 296 pp. Nisbet. 6s.
[Modern Ireland.]

TWO GIRLS AND A DREAM. By JEAN DELAIRE. 7¾×5¼. 296 pp. Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.
[The struggles of two girls in London to succeed in art and letters.]

THE TEMPTRESS. By W. LE QUEUX. 7¾×5¼. 345 pp. Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.
[The story of an artist, an adventuress, and a model.]

BLUE BONNETS OUT. By T. PINKERTON. 7¾×5¼. 319 pp. J. Long. 6s.
[A tale of "the 45."]

A SOWER OF WHEAT. By H. BINDLOSS. 7¾×5¼. 373 pp. Chatto and Windus. 6s.
[Farming life in Canada.]

THE HISTORY OF SIR RICHARD CALMADY. By LUCAS MALET. 7¾×5¼. 618 pp. Methuen. 6s.
[See Review p. 260]

FORTUNE'S DARLING. By W. RAYMOND. 7¾×5¼. 320 pp. Methuen. 6s.
[English country life in the early days of railways.]

LOVE IDYLLS. By S. R. CROCKETT. 7¾×5¼. 304 pp. Murray. 6s.
[In white binding with green ribbons.]

HUBERT SHERBROOKE, Priest. By TARIKA. 7½×5. 348 pp. Simpkin, Marshall. 6s.
[The love story of a ritualistic and celibate Somersetshire vicar.]

THE FIGHTING TROUBADOUR. By A. C. GUNTER. 7¾×5¼. 271 pp. Ward, Lock. 6s.
[A tale of the wars of Prince Eugene.]

RICKERBY'S FOLLY. By TOM GALLON. 7¾×5¼. 301 pp. Methuen. 6s.
[Tells of a man who, visiting England on a quixotic mission, is suddenly plunged into a strange tragedy in suburban London.]

ROYAL GEORGIE. By S. BARING GOULD. 7¾×5¼. 333 pp. Methuen. 6s.
[A Dartmoor story of the time of George IV.]

BAGSBY'S DAUGHTER. By N. and B. VAN VORST. 7¾×5¼. 318 pp. Grant Richards. 6s.
[A story of to-day, in Chicago and London.]

LITERARY.

THE WORKS OF WALTER PATER. Essays from the Guardian. 9¼×6. 149 pp. Macmillan. 5s. 6d.
[See Review p. 259]

FAME AND FICTION. An Inquiry into certain Popularities. By E. A. BENNETT. 7¼×5¼. 288 pp. Grant Richards. 6s.

NOTES FOR A BIBLIOGRAPHY OF EDWARD FITZGERALD. By COL. W. F. PRIDEAUX, C.S.I. 7½×5. 88 pp. Hollings. 6s. n.

MISCELLANEOUS.

OUR ARMY IN SOUTH AFRICA. By R. S. SKIRVING. 7½×4¾. 43 pp. Australian Book Company.
[Criticism of the medical and other arrangements by a consulting surgeon to the Australian Contingents.]

THOMPSON'S GARDENER'S ASSISTANT. New Ed. Divisional Vol. IV. Ed. by W. WATSON. 11×7½. 192 pp. Gresham Publishing Company. 8s.

THE SOVERANE HERBE. A History of Tobacco. By W. A. PENN. 8×5½. 326 pp. Grant Richards. 6s.

THE CHILD AT HOME. By MRS. CLEMENT PARSONS. 7¾×5. 81 pp. Nisbet. 1s. 6d.

BUDDHIST ART IN INDIA. By PROF. A. GRUNWEDEL. Trans. by Agnes C. Gibson, with 156 illustrations. Revised and Enlarged by J. Burgess, C.I.E., &c. 10¼×6½. 238 pp. Quaritch. 12s. 6d. n.

A SHORT HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH COLONIES. By AGNES F. DODD. 7½×5. 222 pp. Bell. 2s. 6d.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

BOSWELL'S LIFE OF JOHNSON. Vols. I. and II. Ed. by AUGUSTINE BIRRELL. 8×5½. 266–286 pp. Constable. 6s. n. each vol.

DON QUIXOTE. Vol. II. (Complete Works of Cervantes Vol. IV.) Ed. by J. FITZMAURICE-KELLY. 7×4½. 245 pp. Glasgow: Gowans and Gray. 1s.

THE REFORMATION SETTLEMENT. By REV. M. MACCOLL, D.D. Tenth Ed. 7½×5. 377 pp. Longmans. 3s. 6d. n.
[With a new preface answering critics, and treating of the doctrine of the Beatific Vision.]

REMARKABLE ECLIPSES. By W. T. LYNN. Sixth Ed. 6½×4. 56 pp. Sampson Low. 6d.

A VOYAGE OF CONSOLATION. By SARA J. DUNCAN. (Ed. Library.) 9×6. 128 pp. Methuen.

THEOLOGY.

PAGANISM IN THE PAPAL CHURCH. By W. J. WILKINS. 7¾×5¼. 245 pp. Sonnenschein. 3s. 6d.
[The resemblance between the religious practices of Hinduism and Romanism. Written to show that a departure from "the simplicity of Scriptural practice" means "moving towards the old paganism which the Church only partially overcame."]

"FOLLOW THOU ME." Letters written on Joining the Church of Scotland. (Paper Pamphlet.) By S. MACLAREN. 8½×5½. 30 pp. Inverness: Melven. 1s.

THE PASTORAL EPISTLES. (The Century Bible.) Ed. by R. F. HORTON, D.D. 8×5½. 196 pp. Edinburgh: Jack.

SAINTS AND WORTHIES. Sermons by J. H. BARING. 7¾×5¼. 181 pp. Shellington. 3s. 6d.
[Twenty-one of the twenty-seven sermons are on Biblical characters. The last is on the Miraculous of the "Malin."]

CHESS.

Address "Chess": LITERATURE, Printing House

PROBLEM No. 230, by H. JONSSON, Sweden.

BLACK. 8 pieces.

WHITE. 11 pieces.

White to play and mate in two moves.

PROBLE
L. COLL

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to play an

PROBLEM No. 232, by H. Otten, New pieces)—K at Q R 8; bishops at Q 7, Q Kt pawns at Q B 2, K Kt 3. Black (3 pieces)—K
Q Kt 5; pawn at Q R 3. White to play and w

SOLUTIONS.—Problem No. 206, Nemo (3 followed by 2. B–B 4 ch, Kt–Q 3 ch, Q–Kt &c. No. 207, Koudelik. The author's key i Waters, however, sends a solution by Kt–Q
No. 208, De Mussett (3), 1. R–Q 7, Kt × R;
No. 209, Shinkman (2), R–Q sq. No. 210, Shin
No. 211, Corrias (2), Q–R 4. No. 212, Nemo
K–K 6; 2. Kt × P, &c., many variations. N key Kt–Q 3, threatening 2. Kt–B 4 ch, &c
No. 214, Troitzky, 1. R–K B 2, R × R; 2. Kt–
3. Kt–Q 4 ch, K any; 4. Kt–B 3 and wins.
1. P–B 7, R–Q B 5; 2. R–R sq ch, K–Kt R × R; 4. Kt–K 4 ch, K any; 5. Kt–B 3 an Tarrasch, White wins by 1. B–R 2 ch, K–K
K × B; 3. K–B 2, K–R sq; 4. Kt–Kt Kunetitzky (2), R–Q 7. No. 218, Thomson threatening 2. B–K 6 ch, &c. No. 219, Troitz the key, and White wins. Thus if 1. Q– 2. Kt–B 7 ch, K–B 5; 3. Q–R 4 ch, &c. gotsch, 1. Q–Kt 4 ch, K–K 8; 2. Q–K
3. Q–Kt 2 ch, K–Q 8; 4. Q–B 2 ch, K–K 8
K–B 8; 6. Q–B 2 mate. No. 221, Jarosz
222, Pradignat (3), key B–B 2. No. 223, Stepa by 1. R–Q 7 ch; 2. R–Q 8 ch; 3. P–K 7 ch; 4.

Correct Solutions received as follows worth (Southall), 201, 204, 206, 211; L. G. I 200, 202, 206, 211, 212; W. P. Brecknock (
213 to 216; Eugene Henry, 208 to 210; J. D.
206, 207, 211 to 213, 217, 218; R. H., 206, 211
(Grand Rapids), 196, 197, 200, 203; A. C. W to 223.

GAME No. XCIX.—An amusing variatio Defence.

WHITE. M. Marc.	BLACK. M. Troys.	WHITE M. Marc.
1. P–K 4	P–K 3	13. Kt–P
2. P–Q 4	P–Q 4	14. P–Kt
3. B–K 3	P × P	15. K–Kt sq
4. Q Kt–Q 2	Kt–K B 3	16. P × P
5. P–Q B 3	P–Q Kt 3	17. B–Q 3
6. Q–B 2	B–Kt 2	18. B–B 4 ch
7. B–K Kt 5	Q Kt–Q 2	19. B–Q sq
8. Castles Q R	B–K 2	20. R–Q
9. B–K sq	Castles	21. K–R sq
10. P–B 3	P–Q R 4	22. Q–Kt sq
11. Q P × P	Kt × P	23. P–K R 4
12. R–Kt	R–B	24. P–B

GAME No. C.—Played in New South Wa tournament at Sydney:—

CENTRE GAMBIT

WHITE.	BLACK	WHITE.

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 25. SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1901.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

NOTES OF THE DAY 265, 266, 267
"LITERATURE" PORTRAITS.—XX.—Emerson 267
THE SECRET OF EMERSON.—A "Personal View," by Dr. Richard Garnett, C.B. 271
THE DRAMA, by A. B. Walkley 276
CURRENT LITERATURE—
Dictionary of National Biography Supplement 277
The Social Question—Trusts and the State—Public Relief of the Poor—The Evolution of Modern Money—Government or Human Evolution—Social Control—Democracy versus Socialism 277
The Land of the Moors 279
Boswell's Life of Johnson 280
Josephine, Empress of the French—Travel in the First Century—Grasses—Practical Physics—Scientific Memoirs of Huxley—New College, Oxford—Some Favourite Books and Their Authors—Elizabeth Empress of Austria—The Military Maxims of Napoleon—Memoir of Henry Twells—Makers of the Nineteenth Century—Some Recollections of Jean Ingelow—Short History of the English Colonies 281, 282, 283
Love and His Mask—Jack Raymond—Mrs. Musgrave and Her Husband—Both Sides of the Veil—Alice of Old Vincennes—Prince Charming—My Heart and Lute—Mr. Leopold Lugwell—The Charm of Life—Dupes 283, 284
LIBRARY NOTES 285
CORRESPONDENCE.—William Morris (Mr. Mackenzie Bell)—Literary Earnings 285
AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for 285, 286, 287
LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS 287, 288

NOTES OF THE DAY.

Two brothers who work in collaboration will form the subject of our Portrait Supplement next week, viz.,

MM. PAUL AND VICTOR MARGUERITTE,

the now famous authors of the great dramatic romance of the Franco-German War—"Le Désastre." The portrait is a reproduction of a highly interesting and characteristic picture which was exhibited in the Salon in Paris this year.

Next week's issue of Literature will also contain an illustrated article on Crabbe and Aldeburgh.

* * * *

The Alfred Millenary Celebrations began on Tuesday, and the pilgrims to Winchester have been shown the antiquities, have been lunched and dined, have heard Sir Henry Irving recite "Becket," and have stood or sat through many speeches and addresses, including Mr. Frederic Harrison's brilliant lecture on King Alfred the Great. We shall deal fully with the proceedings next week.

* * * *

Books to read just published:—

"Love and his Mask." By Ménie Muriel Dowie. (Heinemann.)

"To the South Polar Region." By Louis Bernacchi. (Hurst

The history of the House of Tauchnitz is tol interesting article contributed to the Pall Mall M
Tighe Hopkins. Let it never be forgotten that, th Tauchnitz began his operations long before the vention, he never pirated an English author's always asked and paid for permission to reprint t had not been a baron already, he should have be for this spontaneous integrity. As it was, he grew r forfeiting the friendship of literary men. Many of t to him are printed in Mr. Tighe Hopkins' article, a interesting to read. This, by Lord Beaconsfie characteristic:—

> It is with extreme satisfaction that I ha > to your wish to prepare an edition of "Coningsb > tinental circulation, and especially for the Ger
> The sympathy of a great nation is the most precio > authors, and an appreciation that is offered us > people has something of the character and val > attribute to the fiat of posterity.

So is this by Charles Reade, who notoriously high opinion of his own work:—

> Surely the Tauchnitz Collection is not comp > my works. It is a noble collection; it contains m > who are superior to me in merit and reputation > contains the entire works of many writers who do > to my knee.

Macaulay's reply to a proposal that he shou history of English literature in the nineteenth ce interesting:—

> If I am to bring out any more volumes of m > must devote my whole time to that work, and > myself to be seduced from it by any temptation.
> and highly finished account of the English liter > nineteenth century would occupy me many month > sketch would do me no honour. I should not el > on myself the business of estimating the merit > temporaries. It would be quite impossible for > the truth without inflicting pain and making enem

So is Charles Lever's modest attitude towards a print his portrait as a frontispiece:—

> You ask about the portrait annexed to "Ja
> It is not—at least so say my friends—a resemblan > can myself assure you—that I do not squint, what > abominably. I must confess I have no longi > subject, and believe that my trash will read > without the assistance of "my countenance."

In fact the whole article is full of interesting should on no account be missed.

* * *

Literary aspirants who believe that their man rejected only because publishers' readers are inco probably have their belief confirmed by the ste

We should certainly like to see a type-writer girl's nifty neat verdict on such a work as "The Ring and the Book," or "Diana of the Crossways."

* * * *

The author's method of triumphing over difficulties was ingenious. He hired two authors of "national reputation" at high fees to read his book and report on it. They reported favourably.

> Armed with these letters, I invaded the offices of a prominent publisher whose readers had already condemned the story, and said that I was not prepared to listen with much patience to opinions by his readers, when I held two written opinions by acknowledged writers and scholars that the story was meritorious. The long quest for a publisher ended—the adverse decision was reversed, a very favourable contract was signed—the book is on sale.

It is a pretty story of perseverance rewarded; and if competent readers could really be got to read at the author's expense in the publishers' interest, the publishers would no doubt be grateful. But the author who for a large fee got an unfavourable verdict would probably be discontented.

* * * *

The great American book-stores have been making desperate efforts to break down the boycott imposed on them by publishers for giving discount on net books. Their method has been to put up and finance middlemen to get the books for them; which is pretty much what any one with a knowledge of human nature in general and American enterprise in particular would have expected. Several such sources of supply have been discovered and closed down, but others have been opened up in place of them; and if the victory does not, in the long run, rest with the book-stores, we shall believe that there must have been something wrong with the Political Economy which we learnt in the days of our youth.

* * * *

The new illustrated monthly magazine the Connoisseur (Sampson Low, 1s. net) is the most interesting first number of an art journal that has appeared since the initial issue of the Studio now some years old. Although it is not largely intended to be of service to the neophyte, but rather to entertain and assist the careful buyer and the expert man of taste, still Mr. Cyril Davenport's article on "Gem Collecting," Mr. Arthur Butler's on "Hall Marks on Old English Silver," or Mr. Horace Townsend's on "Sheffield Plate" will be found of infinite value to all who desire a groundwork of historical information on which to base their growing taste, and the illustrations are copious and admirably produced and the notes on news and sales full and agreeably put before us. A series of visits to the collections of famous connoisseurs begins with an account of the pictures collected by Sir Charles Tennant, prefaced by an extremely good portrait of the collector himself. We look forward to future issues of the Connoisseur with great interest.

* * * *

Dr. James Cranston, who died at Stroud the other day, was for six years rector of Dumfries Academy, where Mr. J. M. Barrie was one of his pupils. He had in his possession several caricatures drawn by the future author of "The Little Minister." Dr. Cranston was a well-known Scottish educationist, and translated several Latin works into English, including those of Catullus. He also edited the poetical works of Alexander Scott.

CHRYSANTHEMUMS.

Poor mourners of the ruined year,
  How sad, in summer's vast decay,
Your white and purple blooms appear!
  Like children of some house whose
Is darkened of good fortune's sun
  Who yet will make some small arra
  Of ancient state to keep at bay
The truth, that all their state is gone.

Poor orphans, who have never seen
  The mother-prime that gave you bi
That with her warm breath kindled gre
  Your pallid leaves just free from ca
And nursed but never knew the flower
  Shrill autumn thinks so little worth
  What wonder if, amid his mirth
Of herald winds, you shrink and cower

Sad witnesses of change and death,
  Lost children of a brighter day,
Fulfilled your little space of breath,
  And you, in turn, shall fade away
To some still heaven, perchance (who k
  Where lilac, daffodil, and may,
  Late balm and early primrose gay
Make endless summer with the rose.

ARTHUR

Sir Theodore Martin celebrated his eighty-fift Monday.

We regret to hear of the death of Mr. J. musical critic. He lived in Robert Louis Steven in Edinburgh, and was the great-grandson of "Tom Bowling."

The monks with whom M. Huysmans has Ligugé are about to leave France in conse Associations Act. The novelist will not accomp will return to the Latin Quarter in Paris.

M. Verestchagin, who recently visited the P made studies for over a dozen pictures of episode the Philippines, which will be exhibited in North month.

September 22 was the day appointed for the i the bust of Paul de Kock at Romainville; but it be necessary to postpone the contemplated cere a scarcity of funds.

The printed books at the Bibliothèque Nati numbering about 1,200,000 and occupying two mil are being rearranged. The change entails the re 60,000 volumes of manuscripts.

Some young ladies who presented Count flowers on his departure from Yasnaya Polyana were arrested by the police, and their schoolmis with them, was dismissed from her post.

One of the latest adaptations from novels f
"The Hunchback of Notre Dame," founded on
"Notre Dame de Paris," by Mr. Ben Landeck

should not be far wrong in identifying him with an individual whose right to live was amusingly vindicated in our columns last week—the "general reader." As to his qualities, there is a difference of opinion, and we are by no means sure that the general reader, though he certainly exists, is not as impalpable and fleeting, in bodily shape, as an Arabian genie. At one moment he is all for emotions, at another for facts; now he is a religious enthusiast, and now an honest doubter; to-day he will sup on horrors, to-morrow on mild and sugary confections; if for a season he is all for social exclusiveness and luxurious living and aristocratic Guardsmen, he will soon cut himself adrift and find his only solace in the life of the slums. The general reading public, in fact, has in the last thirty years—since the Education Act—become so enormous and heterogeneous a mass that to take a composite photograph of its features is impossible; the result would be only a meaningless blur. There are so many distinct classes; often they do not even overlap. How many readers of Mrs. Humphry Ward read also Mr. Silas Hocking? Some will prefer the ordinary and easily digestible fare provided by many admirable writers, while the strong meat of such a book as "Sir Richard Calmady" is only for the seasoned and mature; and the two classes of readers are not interchangeable. Hence we doubt whether Mr. Bennett's list of common qualities is of much value. We doubt whether it can safely be said that the average reader insists on "an imposing plot, heroical characters, and fine actions." These may be the qualities which make books live, but they are not qualities most conspicuous in "Three Men in a Boat," or in "Sentimental Tommy," or in "A Double Thread." We doubt equally whether our average reader "has a blind spot in his eye for beauty." He is not so callous to the charms of style as is generally supposed. To like bad wine is not the same thing as to dislike wine. Even if he does not, as Mr. Fowler put it in his "Personal View," "collect pretty sayings in a commonplace book," he is certainly affected by a full, rhetorical, and imaginative diction. It is, in fact, one of the chief secrets of the popularity of Miss Marie Corelli. As little does he always want "glaring tints, and crudity of sentiment," or to be "knocked, blinded, or deafened." What about Miss Wilkins, or Miss Rosa Nouchette Carey, or Miss Charlotte Yonge? Nor is "a book of revolutionary ideas" always a "success of scandal." "Robert Elsmere" was not. In two points only we believe Mr. Bennett has approached a sound solution of the problem. The general reader shares the common interest which mankind of almost every age has taken in religion—though it is a curious fact that the popularity of the religious novel is peculiar to our own generation. And he much prefers a happy ending—not, however, because he insists that virtue should have its deserts so much as because he reads to be pleased rather than depressed. Apart from these two desiderata the general reader reflects only the tastes and movements of society outside the sphere of literature. At the present moment, the writer who tilts at priests and churches and stereotyped creeds and lack of Christian charity "omne tulit punctum." It is an easy method of winning applause, and it does not redound so much to the credit of the general reader as does the fact that his literary leanings do not testify at present so conspicuously as one might expect to the growth of flunkeyism and timocracy. A season of commercial prosperity, an era of social reform, a war, new departures in science or thought, all immediately affect the barometer of popular taste; and they will continue to do so despite all the laudable efforts which Mr. Bennett would have the cultured

Literature Portraits.—XX

RALPH WALDO EMERSO

The union in one philosopher of a remarkabl ideality with an acute appreciation of the virtue a mundane stocks and shares does not, perhaps, sug experienced a being of the highest nature.

Yet so fine a man was Emerson that he could sa of the material as well as the spiritual world and of the noblest men of his century. His range was could grasp the secret of a thousand worlds; it has that his vision at least "has Olympus for one pole, the exchange." But his greatness is beyond dispute. we may not quite agree with the enthusiast wh Shakespeare or Goethe be the Mont Blanc, Emerso lourling aiguille of lesser breadth, but well-nigh eq we can, at least, own that he towers above his cont and has left upon literature an impression of nobility such as all the nations of the earth may envy th people.

An Academic Cult.

Although he may be not greatly read in Engl his popularity in the United States flourishes e There is hardly any serious current paper or magazin now in America that does not contain a direct reference to Emerson or his work. No education without a knowledge of what may be called his His aphorisms have often passed into familiar house his ideas, unacknowledged—perhaps unrecognized foundation for many hundreds of "new movements and yet, there are doubts as to his writi "imperishable Scriptures." There are even those away some of the difficulties he offers and account unbounded influence by telling of his remarkable per Mr. Archer recently found occasion to say that wha us to know, to feel, and to declare, is "that here w and radiant spirit, a unique combination of lou the metaphysician, who has contributed to the litera language some of the most inspiring pages and passag holds in that literature an eminent position, peculiarly testably his own." Like most of the essential things also It has been said before, and in many ways; it is excell and yet it sometimes seems to this generation that Emerson, vast as was its initial grandeur, has passed of its usefulness, and, like an old and noble servant o moved with dignity aside, offering, as it were, the ar doing to the lusty and eager heritor of its own fine tr

Emerson himself was so completely altruistic in hi that if it were permitted to him to view from his heights the fact that the crowd who once followed and made him foster-parent of their mental life, less aisles of people who greeted his every word with ac of approval, had grown less and less with each yea admit that what is, is right. A man who can feel mental unity, who can say: "The whole world is festation of Vishnu, who is identical with all things, regarded by the wise as not differing from, but as t themselves. I neither am going nor coming; nor is in any one place; nor art thou, thou; nor are othe pletely forgotten, overshadowed, and lost? The reader of to-day seeks in vain for the quality of quiet laughter in much of his work.

> The tongue is prone to lose the way
> Not so the pen, for in a letter
> We have not better things to say
> But surely say them better.

And yet even his correspondence is not fraught with wit. It is perhaps a quality we evaluate a little too highly at the present time. Anyway, the young American in the age of "movements" was well satisfied without the grace of humour in the work of Emerson. Culture appeared too vital a thing for many to admit the humorous side of it. But there were those who did. Lowell, for example, who treasured the memory of this time for its qualities of inspiration and picturesqueness, said that nature is always kind enough to give even her clouds a humorous lining, and that which is called transcendentalism was not without its comic side. One sometimes feels that this particular part of the movement has developed with the effluence of time. The spirit of acceptation which enabled the people of America to greet the teachings, amorphous as they sometimes appear, with so long and so warm a welcome has been followed by a more critical and perhaps less wisely generous attitude. He who was the new light, the saviour prove him correct? Who shall say—so ch conditions that a few decades have wrought? range of Emerson," wrote Lowell, "is narrow, read critic must feel at once; and so is tha so is that of Dante, so is that of Montaigne Schiller, so is that of nearly every one except but there is a gauge of height no less than individuality as well as comprehensiveness, there is the standard of genetic power, the culine as distinguished from the receptive min staminate plants in literature, that make no fr but without whose pollen, quintessence of fruct garden had been barren. Emerson's mind is emp those, and there is no man to whom our æsthetic much. The Puritan revolt had made us ecclesias Revolution politically, independent, but we we and intellectually moored to English thought ti the cable and gave us a chance at the dangers an blue water. No man young enough to have felt i cease to be grateful for, the mental and moral received from the writings of his high-minded an countryman. That we agree with him, or t agrees with himself, is aside from the questio arouses in us something that we are better for ha whether that something be of opposition or assent always to what is highest and least selfish in us, f the generation younger than his own would be dis

RALPH WALDO EMERSON

The Change in View.

That generation younger than Emerson is pass almost passed, away, and some there are who s he himself did of Knox, as "a rash and unsati but charged with pungent and unforgettable trut nesses, which occasionally affrighted his nei us calm, but the unforgettable truths remain, be occasionally obscured by the educatio which they take the stage. He was an aristo preached from democratic pulpits the creed of pa and universal love. He spoke haughtily of fine s protection against the vulgarities of the street a but he did not very much care himself for th of men. Out of the fulness of his wisdom taught a young and excited nation some of th experience and the refinement of antiquity. t naif and the fresh in a day when it seemed dignit to address the cosmos in such words as "Good by I'm going home."

The great minds must always appreciat somewhat confused outlook upon life, but t followed him unthinkingly long ago are now incl him one of the most unsatisfactory great men in While his contempt for the connoisseur, the ep sense, the humorist, alienates the suffrage of which he had much in common, his ineffective dried moral teacher shuts him out from the admira ing such as his personal appeal would have alwa His philosophy has been beaten out too thinly; line of his has been quoted in a hundred feet those dying "Literary Societies" where they praises of an elusive, possibly misunderstood, tra

EMERSON'S HOUSE AT CONCORD.

And yet the men who followed him insisted on his being an inspired prophet. He was accepted here as an ethical light, a practical preacher—one who would provide an utilitarian code, a moral rule, whereby the earnest and the acute could make their way to a sort of prudential paradise far beyond the vulgarities of the street and the tavern, but with fair roads and all necessary conveniences for refreshment. But those among the lesser minds, who look to him for an ethical code or desired a guide for the progress of life, have perhaps discovered after consideration that they appeal in vain. What he says on the matter of an elevating culture is, in effect, his creed for the conduct of many conditions of life. "As respects the delicate question of culture, I do not think that any other than negative rules can be laid down," he writes.

> For positive rules, for suggestion, nature alone inspires it. Who dare assume to guide a youth, a maid, to perfect manners? the golden mean is so delicate, difficult—say frankly unattainable. What finest hands would not be clumsy to sketch the genial precepts of the young girl's demeanour? The chances seem infinite against success; and yet success is continually attained. There must not be secondariness, and 'tis a thousand to one that her air and manner will at once betray that she is not primary, but that there is some other one or affection and honour, because he was not lying in v things"; he will ask you "what is vulgar, and the vulgarity, but the avarice of reward?" And answe the difference of artisan and artist, of talent and ge and saint. The man whose eyes are nailed not on his act, but on the wages, whether it be money fame, is almost equally low;" he will suggest valuable thoughts and hint a fine vista of aims a but he will be found general when his disciple particular, suggestive when the student demands rule of life. That is to say if the student be in a by side with much that is illusive he will come u crete passages as the following:—

> Genial manners are good, and power of acco > any circumstance, but the high prize of life, > fortune of a man, is to be born with a bias to > which finds him in employment and happiness > to make baskets, or broadswords, or canals, or sta
> I doubt not this was the meaning of Socrates, > nounced artists the only truly wise, as being > apparently so.

And certainly many of his most dogmatic utterances

"Non-Sequaciousness."

Some of his contemporary admirers hinted at this inconsistent attitude, and many to whom he is a hero at the present time admit his non-sequaciousness—now that Mr. Birrell has used that term in this connexion. As "Vernon Lee" has said, "He openly deprecates any attempts at consecutiveness, he warns mankind against wanting to do that which cannot be done without the wanting, against wishing to be or to have what they are not or have not already. He is the apostle of spontaneity; in his consuming passion for reality he confounds the deliberate with the artificial, and the artificial with the futile. The benefit of Emerson's advice on this head depends on the recognition that there are some things we can never do, some things we can never have or be—namely, all those of whose nature there is not in ourselves already a germ, a possibility." This is a very valuable lesson for Emerson to have taught; it had, however, been hinted at some time before his day in the phrase "Know thyself." But the author we have quoted is ready with an excellent defence if we aver that "the glittering cascades" of his diction confuse. "Yet," she writes, "it is doubtful whether it is not better thus—better that the exaggerations and shortcomings should be corrected by Emerson's readers than forestalled by Emerson himself. It is possible that with men of this mystic, symbolical temper the greater lucidity and practical applicability (since practice is based on reality, and reality can be obtained only by being lucid) might fail to compensate for the diminution in suggestiveness and directness. The prophetically enounced thought works its way deeper, perhaps, into the mind of the hearer when it is such as does not graze off the surface."

Of course, there is much to be said for the indirect as opposed to the direct statement of a thesis. But those who have made the widest use of Emersonian dicta in our day have often put forth by no means the best teaching of their master simply because his method has misled them. The matter is looked at from a practical and very different side by Mr. Birrell. He first states that "a wise author never allows his reader's mind to be at large, but casts about from the first how to secure it all for himself. He takes you (seemingly) into his confidence, perhaps pretends to consult you as to the best route, but at all events points out to you the road, lying far ahead, which you are to travel in his company. How carefully does a really great writer, like Dr. Newman or M. Renan, explain to you what he is going to do and how he is going to do it! His humour, wit, and fancy, however abundant they may be, spring up like way-side flowers, and do but adorn and render more attractive the path along which it is his object to conduct you. The reader's mind, interested from the beginning, and desirous of ascertaining whether the author keeps his word, and adheres to his plan, feels the glow of healthy exercise and pays a real, though unconscious, attention. But Emerson makes no terms with his readers, he gives them neither thread nor clue, and thus robs them of one of the keenest pleasures of reading—the being beforehand with your author, and going shares with him in his own thoughts"; and then Mr. Birrell adds, compare him with whom you will, "the unparalleled non-sequaciousness of Emerson is as certain as the Correggiosity of Correggio." In these circumstances it seems that "admiration gives way to astonishment, astonishment to bewilderment, and bewilderment to stupefaction." It may be owned that Emerson was not thus cunning in the art of interesting his readers. He came to the world with the proud mission of showing us the occult greatness of life, the secret miracles of the spirit. His methods were those readiest to his absorbed and retaught, that it is not easy to judg recently some of the more important essays have in a new edition, and M. Maurice Maeterlinck him as "the good morning shepherd of pale n with a new optimism that is natural and sensible," to give us some picture of the impression Emerson' within his mind:—"Man is eager for explanations, must have his life shown to him. He rejoices to fin exact interpretation of a petty gesture he has bee twenty-five years; yet there is no petty gesture main attitude of the common soul. You will not f quality of the soul of a Marcus Aurelius here.

Aurelius was thought itself. Who among us, u the life of a Marcus Aurelius? . . . Here i trimming his trees, Peter who is building his ho you who talk to me of the harvest, and I who give yet we are made so that we draw nigh to th astonished at what we effect. We did not know of the universe attended upon us, and we turn a without saying anything, like people who have s Emerson comes to affirm simply this equal and sec of life. He encompasses us with silence and wond shaft of light under the foot of the artisan co workshop. He shows us all the powers of hea busied in supporting the threshold where two nei of the falling rain or the rising wind; and al wayfarers accosting each other he makes us see god smiling upon another. He is nearer to us th our every-day life, the most watchful and persiste the most upright and scrupulous, perhaps the
He is the sage of common-place days; and comm are the sum and substance of our being."

If you walk along the Strand you will see boot-shop window plainly marked with the words " Shoe, good all through." And so his influen avatar has managed to reach from the point interests the author of the most spiritually ex our period to the mind of the practical make slight distance for one man's mental attributes to first he wrote:—"I think nothing is of value, in bo the transcendental and the extraordinary." For said:—"No matter whether he makes shoes, or st
It is the privilege of any human work that i invest the doer with a certain haughtiness." It of him that he was the lord of extremes, holding t the nadir in his two hands. The telling anti thought and language came naturally to him and touch the spirit of widely different men.

The Poet.

"I do again desiderate some concretion of t abstracta" was the cry with which Carlyle, in eff of Emerson's writings, but if, as he owned, sinceri of vision be among the qualities which make a po of "Wood-Notes" and "Threnody" must by that title. The beautiful abstracta crystallize lighter verses and leave us with a very tan marvellous melody. In many, too, that are some as a whole, there are lines which are perfect, whic feeling of absolute delight. The verses which beg

Give all to love;

So with the verses he calls "Manners," he concludes with a note of beauty, unforgettable, unimpeachable :—

Grace, Beauty, and Caprice Build this golden portal ;
Graceful women, chosen men,
Dazzle every mortal :
Their sweet and lofty countenance
His enchanting food ;
He need not go to them, their forms
Beset his solitude.
He looketh seldom in their face,
His eyes explore the ground
The green grass is a looking-glass
Whereon their traits are found.
Little and less he says to them,
So dances his heart in his breast ;
Their tranquil mien bereaveth him
Of wit, of words, of rest.
Too weak to win, too fond to shun
The tyrants of his doom,
The much-deceived Endymion
Slips behind a tomb.

In the following stanzas one has an example of Emerson undertaking the difficult and hardly lyric task of telling, as it were the story of his mystic nature in verse :—

WALDEINSAMKEIT.

I do not count the hours I spend
In wandering by the sea ;
The forest is my loyal friend,
Like God it useth me.

In plains that room for shadows make
Of skirting hills to lie, Bound in by streams which give and take
Their colours from the sky ;

Or on the mountain-crest sublime,
Or down the oaken glade,
O what have I to do with time ?
For this the day was made.

Cities of mortals woe-begone
Fantastic care derides,
But in the serious landscape lone Stern benefit abides.

Sheen will tarnish, honey cloy,
And merry is only mask of sad,
But, sober on a fund of joy,
The woods at heart are glad.

There the great Planter plants
Of fruitful worlds the grain,
And with a million spells enchants
The souls that walk in pain.

Still on the seeds of all He made
The rose of beauty burns ;
Through times that wear and forms that fade,
Immortal youth returns.

The black ducks mounting from the lake,
The pigeon in the pines,
[illegible]

See thou bring not to field or town
The fancies found in books ;
Leave authors' eyes, and fetch your own,
To brave the landscape's looks.

Oblivion here thy wisdom is,
Thy thrift, the sleep of cares ;
For a proud idleness like this Crowns all thy mean affairs.

The same idea is somewhat differently treated in the following poem :—

THE APOLOGY.

Think me not unkind and rude
That I walk alone in grove and glen ;
I go to the god of the wood
To fetch his word to men.

Tax not my sloth that I Fold my arms beside the brook ;
Each cloud that floatest in the sky
Writes a letter in my book.

Chide me not, laborious band,
For the idle flowers I brought ;
Every aster in my hand
Goes home loaded with a thought.

There was never mystery
But 'tis figured in the flowers ;
Was never secret history
But birds tell it in the bowers.

One harvest from thy field
Homeward brought the oxen strong ;
A second crop thine acres yield,
Which I gather in a song.

The somewhat elusive character of these two poems prove that, as a friend of Emerson told us long since, the many of his best poems can be found only in his life, and intercourse with his intimate friends. This is very plain his contemporaries, but unfortunate for those who come into the world a few generations later and desire just opinion of his work. Such poems, however, as "The Girl," published first in 1858, may be considered fair exa which Emerson may stand or lapse as a poet, for here he lyric opportunity which some of his more intentionally essays in verse deny him. We fear the following ve hardly thrill the modern reader :—

The sun goes down, and with him takes
The coarseness of my poor attire ;
The fair moon mounts, and aye the flame
Of Gypsy beauty blazes higher.

Pale Northern girls ! you scorn our race ;
You captives of your air-tight halls,
Wear out in-doors your sickly days,
But leave us the horizon walls.

And if I take you, dames, to task,
And say it frankly without guile,
Then you are Gypsies in a mask,
And I the lady all the while.

Go, keep your cheek's rose from the rain,
For teeth and hair with shopmen deal ;

It is rather remarkable that one who can write the baldnesses of, say, the fourth stanza, should in the same moment, as it were, be able to give the charm of the last two lines of the penultimate stanza. But such an example is highly characteristic of Emerson; side by side with infinite beauty lie the things that are harsh, clumsy, depressing; near his bravest flights of transcendental beauty jostle what we often find a somewhat ignoble utilitarianism, or so it sometimes seems to those who have not been under the influence of his immediate personality. Those who were thus fortunate have ever spoken of all his works and moods with enthusiasm.

His Personality.

One said, "If Emerson goes to hell the tide of emigration will set that way." Lowell's testimony to his influence and worth is well known. Mrs. Lowell said to a friend, "If he but mentions my name I feel myself ennobled." As he wrote himself, "The boundaries of personal influence it is impossible to fix, as persons are organs of moral or supernatural force." Such diverse personages of his time, as Hawthorne and Walt Whitman and Harriet Martineau, Carlyle and Thoreau, to mention a few out of many hundreds, were among those whose intercourse with him led them to appreciate the beauty of his nature and the comprehensiveness of his outlook upon life. Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes' "Life" displays it in every chapter; his immediate friends show it in every word they have written of him. Looked at from any point of view his personality was obviously that of a gentle, wise, and magnetic character.

Biographical.

"I have the feeling that every man's biography is at his own expense. He furnishes not only the facts, but the report. I mean that all biography is autobiography. It is only what he tells of himself that comes to be known and believed." These were the very characteristic words which Emerson himself pronounced upon the subject, and, in effect, he provides his autobiography in his writings, but those who run as they read will not be able to find it. The plain man who does not happen to be a careful student of the young American of 1843-1849 may come to believe the pursuit a little difficult. Ireland, Cooke, Conway, and, after a particular fashion of his own, Oliver Wendell Holmes, have all given us admirable pictures of Emerson's quiet and effective life, while Mr. J. E. Cabot, from his fulness of knowledge has produced a sound and absolutely authentic history. But, as Dr. Richard Garnett says, in a note to his "Life," which makes the best possible use of all these and other sources of information, Emerson did not live his days with any thought of providing amusing matter for his biographers; he neglected an opportunity, as do many great men, and led "a life devoid of incident, of nearly untroubled happiness, and of absolute conformity to the moral law." Born on May 25, 1803, the third son of William Emerson, minister of the "First Church" in Boston, Ralph Waldo Emerson learned to know almost the whole of the intellectual life of the century upon which his influence grew to be considerable. He came of one of the American "Academic Races," estate Boston had grown to be the centre o American literature; it may still have been the gods, but great voices were heard echoing from the

The main influences in Boston were "whi tarianism and ruffled-shirt Episcopalianism atmosphere appears to have been fitted for t of Emerson's mystic and profound mind when began to study theology. Six years later he as minister of the Unitarian church in Bo married Ellen Louisa Tucker, to whom some of as "To Ellen in the South," "The Amulet," & less, written. After a few years his wife die first visited Europe, meeting, in England, Car and Wordsworth. In 1834 he removed from Bo famous old Manse, Concord. A second mar peaceful days followed, during which he lect country and preached his message at home at the of Philosophy at Concord. The story of his life h many times; is not the name of his biographer most valuable account of his life is to be fou The chronological list of these as given in Dr. where may be found Mr. John P. Anders bibliography, is as follows:—

"Nature"	1836		"Conduct of Life
Essays (First Series) ...	1841		"May Day and Ot
Dial (edited)	1841-44		"Society and So
Essays (Second Series) ...	1844		"The Wanderer,"
Poems	1847		(edited) ...
Miscellanies...	1849		"Letters and Soc
"Representative Men"...	1850		"Correspondence
"English Traits" ...	1856		Carlyle and R. W

While the first essays were appearing, experiments inspired by Fourier's ideas—in Alc at Fruitlands and the widely-remembered att Farm—were greatly talked of. About this time to Carlyle that every reading man has a draft munity in his waistcoat pocket. These plans which his friends propounded interested him watched them with a somewhat amused smile.

was almost persuaded to become a Brook farmer. As a matter of fact, however, his spirit was detached and individualistic in a marked degree. "Nothing can bring you peace but yourself. Nothing can bring you peace but the triumph of your principles," he wrote. Mysticism, study, his devotion to something afar, his general philosophy, made his earthly existence so slight an occurrence in his career of living that, as one of his biographers has said, the incidents of time and space seem quite secondary matters to one who has been long living in the companionship of his thought. In what seemed at the time the great matter of Brook Farm his "crystal isolation" determined his action—the highly intellectual picnic was to get itself enacted, so to speak, without his aid. Although there was tragedy in it, one cannot but be grateful to those ladies and gentlemen who provided Hawthorne with the ground-work of his novel "The Blithedale Romance," which will keep its memory fresh. "The Brook Farm Institute of Agriculture and Education" has long since passed away, but the romance remains, humanly speaking, for all time. The men and women who initiated the experiments have gone, but they were the spiritual children of Emerson, and their example, their ideal, has brought forth fruit.

After publishing his poems, Emerson again visited England and lectured here. About 1860 his power was at its zenith, and afterwards his life appears to have passed in unbroken serenity. The lectures were heard with avidity, his books were read with delight; his serene power was lauded in a hundred schools. "No modern thinker has so courageously fulfilled the duty of hope," said one of his recent critics; "none has written in so invariably happy and courteous a temper." This phrase naturally reminds one of his long connexion with Carlyle. In regard to his supposed likeness to Carlyle, one of his warmest admirers, Russell Lowell, has pictured him, very truly and amusingly, in his early verses the "Fable for Critics." It wearied people of his generation to hear Emerson constantly named with Carlyle, and thus Lowell comes to make his informing contrast;—

There are persons, mole-blind to the soul's make and style,
Who insist on a likeness 'twixt him and Carlyle;
To compare him with Plato would be vastly fairer,
Carlyle's the more burly, but E is the rarer;
He sees fewer objects, but clearlier, truelier,
If C's as original, E's more peculiar;
That he's more of a man you might say of the one,
Of the other he's more of an Emerson;
C's the Titan, as shaggy of mind as of limb,—
E the clear-eyed Olympian, rapid and slim;
The one's two-thirds Norseman, the other half Greek,
Where the one's most abounding, the other's to seek;
C's generals require to be seen in the mass,—
E's specialties gain if enlarged by the glass;
C gives nature and God his own fits of the blues,
And rims common-sense things with mystical hues,
E sits in a mystery calm and intense,
And looks coolly around him with sharp common sense;
C shows you how every-day matters unite
With the dim transdiurnal recesses of night,
While E, in a plain, preternatural way,
Makes mysteries matters of mere every day;

and so forth until a good deal of kindly jest and criticism has been spent upon one who could have been laughed at a good deal more bitterly and remained unhurt.

Last Stage of all.

"Up to this moment," I inquired, "how many criminals you reformed?"

"Not one!" said Hollingsworth, with his eyes still fixed on the ground. "Ever since we parted I have been busy with murderers."

[From "The Blithedale Romance." Illustrated by F. H. Townsend. (By permission of Messrs. Nisbet and Co.).]

"It was my fortune," he says, "to be sent to Concord at Mr. Redpath's suggestion, to see if Mr. Emerson would come in and give us a lecture. I went out and met the man at the Manse-house. He greeted me very cordially, gladly accepted the invitation to come in and lecture. The old South was filled with as choice an audience of the blood of Boston as has ever assembled in that old church. Emerson came in and was introduced by Father Neal. He began reading his lecture the audience was very still. After a few moments he lost his place, and his grandchildren sitting in the front row of seats, gently stepped towards him reminded him that he was lecturing. He saw at once he was wandering, and with the most charming, charming apologetic bow he resumed his place—an incident that seemed to affect the audience more than anything that could have occurred. A few moments later he took a manuscript in his hand, and turning round with it, laid it on a side table." The scene was closed by a tactful American who went to Emerson and warmly thanked him for the lecture. This was the last public appearance of one whom the whole world held in veneration. His last public act was for charity and the cause of tender thoughts and tears to those who were near at hand. In 1882 he passed peacefully from what he considered as a part of some great whole. His so

"Good-bye," verses of which he said, in forwarding them to Mr. Freeman Clarke for publication, "I send you a corrected copy, but I wonder so much at your wishing to print them that I think you must read them once again with your critical spectacles before they go further. They were written sixteen years ago (1823) when I kept school in Boston and lived in a corner of Roxbury called Canterbury. They have a slight misanthropy, a shade deeper than belongs to me." This "Good-bye" was, however, intended as a farewell to Boston and the business of the city, rather than an adieu to the world at large as it has sometimes been thought:—

Good-bye, proud world! I'm going home;
Thou art not my friend, and I'm not thine.
Long through thy weary crowds I roam;
A riven ark on the ocean brine,
Long I've been tossed like the driven foam;
But now, proud world! I'm going home.

Good-bye to Flattery's fawning face;
To Grandeur with his wise grimace;
To upstart Wealth's averted eye;
To supple Office, low and high;
To crowded halls, to court and street;
To frozen hearts and hasting feet,
To those who go, and those who come,—
Good-bye, proud world! I'm going home.

I am going to my own hearth-stone
Bosomed in yon green hills, alone,—
A secret nook in a pleasant land,
Whose groves the frolic fairies planned:
Where arches green, the livelong day,
Echo the blackbird's roundelay,
And vulgar feet have never trod
A spot that is sacred to thought and God.

EGAN MEW.

THE SECRET OF EMER

A "Personal View"

By Dr. RICHARD GARNETT, C

Much may not unjustly be said in disparagem but the fact remains that within little more tha his countrymen will be keeping his centenary, proceedings will be followed with lively interes English language is spoken, and here and there where it is not. After this, discussion as to the fa eminence may be waived as superfluous; but useless to seek for some formula summing the m expressing, if this be possible, the peculiar secret tion. No such definition can be exhaustive, the of genius, however great their diversity, alway quality in common, that they are incommensura approach as near as is feasible, and, reversing himself tells us of the instinct of the human m circle as widely as it can around every object, dra to the original as may be, in the hope that one n come to be inscribed in process of time.

If one strove to state the peculiar characterist in the fewest possible words, it might not be a him as a seer without pretensions to the supernatu midway between mystics like Blake and Swed teaching is professedly based upon communication world, and reasoners like Stuart Mill or Herbert it may be objected, does the poet, who, though he Dante, claim to have perambulated Hell, Heaven, must be able to affirm with Coleridge,

I on honey-dew have fed,
And drunk the milk of Paradise.

But there exists a clear distinction between po including under this term all obviously inspired w their form of expression be verse or impassion Emerson. It is the distinction between inspiration
The poet, when he really writes as such, is in an abnormal state. He is conscious of a visita out, of the presence of something that has come his seeking, and might any moment depart, leaving and mute. "The mind in creation," says one of poets, "is as a fading coal, which some invisible an inconstant wind, awakens to transitory brigh literally and figuratively, may be described as i is as conspicuous in great imaginative prose-w Carlyle and Ruskin, even in writers of the grade Jeffreys, as in the poets themselves. In Emer exceptionally wanting, but is replaced by the though perhaps not finer, endowment of intuition not a prophet, but a seer. It is usual to class hi and the points of contact are assuredly numer

within. And, as a crystal or a gem cannot be partly genuine and partly false, Emerson is commonly either very right or very wrong. You cannot say of his deliverances, as so often of Carlyle's, that they are a mingling of truth and error; they must in general be taken altogether or rejected altogether. If they are accepted, this is by no means due to the author's powers of reasoning, or to any special gift of eloquence, or to the ability to overwhelm the contrary views with sarcasm and invective. The appeal is simply to the intuitive faculty of the reader or hearer, who is supposed to be capable of verifying what he was incapable of discovering for himself. This is precisely the position of Blake or Swedenborg, and Emerson is hence more fitly classed with the seers, whose insight comes to them by simple intuition, than with the poets and prophets, who require to be taken out of themselves.

To all but a thorough mystic Emerson's advantage over Blake and Swedenborg must appear unspeakable. Their supernatural pretensions are a continual offence, inasmuch as, by a continual propounding of what it is impossible to accept, they force upon the most friendly hearer the alternative of deception or delusion. Neither of these has any possible application to Emerson; he might as well be accused of burglary or arson. It is much to have demonstrated that there is no necessary connexion between spiritual insight and supernatural phenomena, and that a seer need never have had a trance in his life.

From a purely literary point of view, Emerson's peculiar gifts may well be less advantageous to him. They disable him from the practice of literary art on any extensive scale. Art implies the subordination of parts to the total effect. Something must be kept in the shade. Emerson's disquisitions, consisting mainly of a succession of detached thoughts complete in themselves and but loosely connected with each other, are incapable of this treatment. As they resemble crystals in their purity, their individual symmetry, and their permanent worth, so also in their incapacity for combination, save as constituents of a chain or a pattern. As a German æsthetician might say, Emerson's composition is deficient in architectonic; he builds up nothing. How weak the instinct for formative art was in him, his Essay on Art, valuable and suggestive as it is in many respects, sufficiently indicates. The same indifference to art is notable in the other great teacher of his age, Carlyle. Yet one feels sure that this consummate master of portraiture with pen and ink must have appreciated a fine portrait with the brush when he saw one; one has not the same confidence as regards Emerson.

Carlyle was an artist in other respects; he delighted in the concrete, and he excelled in giving his conceptions imaginative form. The concrete is in a sense the element of art, whose most airy conceptions must be moulded out of something, and their embodiment in imaginative form is, at least as regards its higher departments, the very cause and condition of its existence. Emerson's remarks frequently in its totality. Much less can he create a [illegible] ment, as Carlyle has done in "Sartor Resartus." H[illegible] loss must be may be realized if we can imag[illegible] poetry and all the wisdom of "Sartor Resartus" [illegible] but Teufelsdröckh and Weissnichtwo and Ent[illegible] whatever imparts substance to the vision take[illegible] Emerson could have embodied his gospel in a figure [illegible] dröckh, or even in lifelike portraits of some of the [illegible] disciples with whom he was actually familiar, such [illegible] or Alcott, he would have appealed to much wider [illegible] gained greatly in influence and popularity. Ruskin [illegible] able as Emerson of evolving an ideal charact[illegible] delineating a real one. The sight of so extensive [illegible] "Modern Painters" is somewhat alarming; one [illegible] echo Carlyle's naive ejaculation on beholding [illegible] house and furniture, "Can all that have come out [illegible] But Ruskin's subject compels him to deal with th[illegible] He means to preach and he does, but he cannot [illegible] five minutes without importing some gorgeous la[illegible] beautiful natural object, or striking trait of human [illegible] or supreme work of art.

Emerson has, nevertheless, one signal advantage [illegible] his contemporaries who claim to be something [illegible] narrators or reasoners. None of them is so like [illegible] in the very element of beauty. The beauty whi[illegible] commend itself to him when it came as art at one [illegible] the primal source captivated him entirely when [illegible] itself as nature, or as human characters, or institutio[illegible] with the reason of things. He then writes as wit[illegible] pleasure; his words are the aptest and choicest. [illegible] language has in a remarkable degree the power of e[illegible] sentiment of beauty. Unlike the ambitious splendours [illegible] the dainty device of Pater, his words never appear to [illegible] for the sake of rhetorical effect, or selected for pecu[illegible] but to come of their own accord as self-conscious th[illegible] no others are the right ones. Save for an occasio[illegible] at unseasonable smartness, his diction never loses t[illegible] propriety. It may be said to him, as he says to his

> Thou can'st not wave thy staff in air,
> Or dip thy paddle in the lake,
> But it carves the bow of beauty there,
> And ripples in rhymes the oar forsake

The character which we have attributed to E[illegible] seer without supernatural pretensions invites comp[illegible] two illustrious Englishmen of whom the same may [illegible] be predicated, Coleridge and Wordsworth. Colerid[illegible] perhaps be entirely acquitted of an occasional proper[illegible] querade in prophetic attire; but undoubtedly the m[illegible] he is the less he is of a seer. His claims to the gift [illegible] rest less upon his philosophical than upon his critical [illegible] which are sometimes so marvellously illuminating [illegible] directly derived from the source of all light, and [illegible] corroboration by the exercise of the reasoni[illegible] in isolated sayings, nearly always polished and symmetrical, and in a few poems like "Rhodora," so beautifully finished as to render the generally amorphous character of his poetry almost incomprehensible. Another puzzle arises out of the lack of humour common to both these illustrious men. One has just as much of it as the other—that is to say, neither has any; and yet, by some grace of innate refinement or benediction of the Muses, Emerson never appears absurd from insensibility to the humorous, as frequently happens to Wordsworth.

THE DRAMA.

"SHERLOCK HOLMES."—"ARE YOU A MASON?"

A newspaper paragraph seriously disconcerted me the other day by referring to some Edinburgh gentleman as "the original of Sherlock Holmes." Whatever the facts may be, I would much rather not think of this great man as modelled on any actual person. I should as soon believe in "the original" of Vautrin or of Monte Christo or of Falstaff. There was, by the way, an original of Falstaff, but who really knows or cares anything about him? No; Sherlock's father was M. Lecocq, and his grandfather was Zadig. And his twin-brother (if you don't believe me see the portraits of Sherlock in the Strand Magazine) is Mr. William Gillette, the American actor, who has helped, or been helped by, Dr. Conan Doyle to construct a play about him, and, what is more, takes the principal part in it himself. It is a wonderful thing to meet the legendary Sherlock face to face, to be on familiar terms with him like Dr. Watson (have we not always envied that naive medical man?), to see him at work, burying his thoughtful brow in his capable hands, or meditatively puffing at his pipe, or injecting cocaine (despite Dr. Watson's earnest remonstrances) into his wrist-veins, or toying with a revolver, or wearing elegant evening dress with the best of 'em, or holding a horde of ruffians at bay with a mere frown. I say it is a wonderful thing—most of us would have as soon expected to make the personal acquaintance of Li Hung Chang, or Aguinaldo, or M. Santos Dumont, or the other heroic figures of the illustrated newspapers—but like all such introductions it is a little disappointing. And the reason for that is that imagination, in such cases, always transcends reality—a reason by the way which Lamb gave for objecting to Lear on the stage. The idea we have formed of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra and the rest from Greek legend is something bigger than the dust and gold ornaments found at Mycenæ, whatever Dr. Schliemann may have thought to the contrary. Still, there are two sides to every question, and a flesh-and-blood Sherlock in the playhouse will be eagerly welcomed by the unimaginative. The pity of it is that the particular adventure of Sherlock Holmes which is shown at the Lyceum is not absolutely characteristic; it does not exhibit the quintessential—that is to say, the detective—Holmes so much as the man of cool courage. Now, much as I admire Sherlock's iron nerve, I had always thought that the very best part of him was the brain—the Newtonian brain which deduced the process of the suns from the fallen apple, the Napoleonic brain which marshalled big battalions of facts, the Nasmyth steam-hammer brain which cracked nuts with the nicest adjustment—in short, the Sherlockian brain. And in the Lyceum play, though Sherlock cannot be Sherlock behave in the Stepney gas chamber? W step is to tell the ruffians that he proposes to ide at Bow-street next morning; his next is to smas atoms with a chair; and his third to use the re cigar as a will-'o-the-wisp. "Follow the light ruffian is heard to shout out of the darkness, a follow it to the window only to find that the c stuck in the shutter while Sherlock escapes by the But I am bound to add that Sherlock's brain does fair. For, knowing that the glow of a cigar could be seen by the vast audience of the Lyceum, it has a small red electric light. Evidently mechanical e have a great fascination for Mr. Gillette. He penses with the curtain by turning black darkn when the act begins and vice versa when it ends. my conservative notions that the old-fashioned cur as well; but Mr. Gillette comes from the land of E a perfect right to play with electricity if he choose

He is, however, something else than an electri He is a highly accomplished and conscientious acto playgoers who have already seen him over here Johnson and Secret Service know very well—and gives you the impression, right or wrong, of be character off as well as on the stage. An actor w just that impression is, of course, the very man to the iron-willed Sherlock Holmes. Whether the a his voice for the part or not I do not know; but i thing, toneless, almost dead. Mr. W. L. Abingd fully lurid as the Napoleon of Crime; and Miss G a female villain with much gusto.

At the Shaftesbury there is to be seen a farce the American idiom "from the German of Laufs whoever they may be. As it is called Are You a wise will already have guessed that it deals w husbands who account to their wives for "nights flection of visits to a masonic lodge. This joke is lo another which is concerned with dressing up a man It all takes place amid incessant noise, and, to my t vulgar, brainless affair, which substitutes tomfool fun. But I see that many newspapers report very f it, and I am quite willing to admit myself an o qualified from a proper appreciation of riotous a and practical jokes.

A. B. W

"Taste is the feminine of genius." Few venture to think, would be able to say at once t known aphorism comes out of "Polonius: A Collec Saws and Modern Instances" made by Edward The saying is FitzGerald's own, though the book m of excerpts from other writers. Such miscellanee stitute the chief interest of "Notes for a Bib Edward FitzGerald," by Colonel W. F. Prideaux that, "perhaps, the first appreciation of FitzGe which had appeared in public" was a very favourat the "Six Dramas of Calderon freely translated," Archbishop Trench in his "Life's a Dream" (18 Prideaux's notes are intended rather as an ine study of FitzGerald than as an exhaustive biblio confines himself to the issues which were printed in

CURRENT LITERATURE.

MEN OF OUR TIMES.

DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY SUPPLEMENT. Vols. I. and II. (Smith, Elder, 15s. n. per volume).

The supplementary volumes of the dictionary are three in number. Two are before us, and the third is announced for October 25. An unique feature is the memoir of the founder and publisher of the dictionary, George Smith, written by the editor and printed as a preface. It is an interesting record of the useful though uneventful career of a hard worker whose activities were multifarious. George Smith was not only a publisher, but an export agent, a shipowner, a proprietor of two newspapers, and of the mineral water with which, as many advertisements have proclaimed, her late Majesty Queen Victoria used to dilute her whisky. He was probably better loved by more eminent men of letters than any publisher of his generation. His relations with a few of them—with John Ruskin, and James Grant, for instance—may have been strained; but most of the rest, from Thackeray to James Payn, bore enthusiastic testimony to his worth. And he was one of the few publishers who have been at once able and willing to render literature disinterested service. This dictionary, which is his finest monument, is the best thing of the kind in any language; and he produced it at his own cost, whereas similar dictionaries elsewhere have been subsidized from the public funds. The few public honours which he received were quite inadequate to his deserts. Most of the names that appeared in recent birthday honour lists were less worthy of the distinction than his.

We are informed that more than two hundred of the names in the supplementary volumes "represent accidental omissions from the previously published volumes." It is not really a large number, considering the scale on which the work was done; and, so far as we can see, none of the omissions were of grave importance. A few Indian warriors, a few mediæval chroniclers, a few seventeenth-century divines—these are the principal persons whose claims to biographies were overlooked. The main purpose of the supplement is to deal with distinguished persons who died at too late a date to be included in the original work. The length and character of the list is melancholy evidence of the loss we have sustained during the period in all departments of activity. We find lives of statesmen like Gladstone, Bright, Childers, and Lord Randolph Churchill; of poets like Browning, Matthew Arnold, and the author of "Ionica"; of novelists like William Black, R. D. Blackmore, and Wilkie Collins; of historians like Froude, and Freeman, and Creighton; of divines like Edward White Benson, and Harold Browne, and Harvey Goodwin; of such eminent men as Sir Samuel Baker, Colonel Valentine Baker, Ben Brierley, Lewis Carroll, Richard Congreve, Birket Foster, Archibald Forbes, Sir John Gilbert, Sir George Grove, Sir Augustus Harris, and Admiral Hornby.

The supplement differs from the body of the work in the fact that many, if not most, of the contributors were writing of men whom they had known personally; and the difference is reflected in the tone of many of the contributions. The rule "no flowers by request," though still no doubt maintained, has not been enforced quite so rigorously as heretofore. A certain latitude is given to enthusiasm; and there are sometimes reticences which would not have been observed by the historian dealing dispas-

he displayed in dealing with [illegible] " [illegible] always pay the personal attention which political [illegible] the less elevated kind expect." Mr. Paul does not [illegible] to the new explanation given in Lord Selborne's "M[illegible] (1898) of Gladstone's sudden dissolution of Parliament [illegible] an explanation, we may add, corroborated in the [illegible] of Mr. Childers. Mr. T. S. Leadam's life [illegible] Bright is by comparison colourless. Mr. Sidn[illegible] Life of Lord Randolph Churchill is picturesque, the [illegible] from the speeches being remarkable for their aptit[illegible] longest of the literary lives seems to be that [illegible] Browning by Mr. Edmund Gosse, which covers fourte[illegible] and includes a considerable enumeration of personal [illegible] lists. Dr. Richard Garnett writes very soberly [illegible] Arnold. He is perhaps the most successful of the [illegible] in suppressing his enthusiasms. Mr. Stuart J. Re[illegible] R. D. Blackmore is unique in resting upon no author[illegible] "personal knowledge and private information." It [illegible] the most interesting and valuable of the lives. Othe[illegible] lives to which we will draw attention are those of [illegible] pl "Alpine Guide" fame, by Mr. Douglas Freshfie[illegible] Stuart Blackie (very picturesquely written) by [illegible] Alexander Gordon, of Edward Bradley, the author [illegible] dant Green," by Mr. Thomas Seccombe, of Dean [illegible] Mr. A. F. Pollard, of Wilkie Collins by Mr. See[illegible] Lewis Carroll by Mr. E. V. Lucas, of James Anthon[illegible] by Mr. A. F. Pollard, and of P. G. Hamerton by Dr. [illegible]

ECONOMIC FACT AND FANCY.

Mr. Hobson has taught us to expect from him [illegible] and well-written work, and his latest volume T[illegible] QUESTION (Nisbet, 7s. 6d. n.)—is clearly the work of [illegible] writer who is genuinely convinced of the importa[illegible] beliefs. Mr. Hobson is an idealist, and his books p[illegible] attraction which only the work of the enthusiast a[illegible] can possess. They also have the inevitable faults of [illegible] The first thesis is apparently as follows. There [illegible] Social Problem, not many Social Problems. Politic[illegible] professes to deal with the economic side of this Social [illegible] but in reality it is useless, because it professes [illegible] value by money, and "money measures not wealth [illegible] But what is want but utility? And surely value [illegible] determined by utility, and can therefore be roughly me[illegible] the money Mr. Hobson so heartily despises. Again, [illegible] economy treats of the economic man, a being who is a[illegible] Mr. Hobson. We cannot help thinking that our [illegible] unduly hard upon the economists. No one who has [illegible] Mill's Fifth Book could accuse him of dealing with a[illegible] and inhuman science. Moreover, no one has yet [illegible] the old arguments that ordinary men in the ordinary [illegible] of life are "economic men," that, even granting the [illegible] of many other motives than that of "enlightened self-[illegible] it is important first to realize the effects of the o[illegible] and then to allow for the others. You must [illegible] your skeleton before you can draw your full figur[illegible] Mr. Hobson suggests that economics are only valuable [illegible] as an abstract science, that economists can give [illegible] statesmanship or to the solution of the Social Prob[illegible] who can deny that abstract economics have had a[illegible] expect to find more than mere suggestiveness in his books. Yet when one comes to examine the truths he enunciates with such a joy of new discovery and often in an unnecessary paradoxical manner one finds that after all they are mostly old familiar friends. Mr. Hobson makes one think that he is in such a hurry to preach his own particular gospel, and incidentally to condemn those who differ from him, that he has not had time to read carefully the writings of those despised economists, for in the pages of Mill and of Marshall may be found all that is of real importance in Mr. Hobson's work. The rest is largely skilful juggling with words or fighting with enemies which, if indeed they were ever more than misty ghosts, have long since ceased to exist.

Mr. Macrosty's book TRUSTS AND THE STATE (Grant Richards, 5s.) is very different. It is the first volume of a new Fabian Series, which is to consist of "volumes dealing from the Fabian point of view with politics and economics." It has the severely practical aspect of so many of the Fabian documents, and deals not with vague and attractive ideas as Mr. Hobson does, but with material facts and figures. The chief fault we have to find with it is its title. "Trusts" are an absorbing subject, and we are all anxious to hear the opinion of experts upon this new or apparently new economic phenomenon. But of Trusts themselves Mr. Macrosty tells us comparatively little. About half his book is taken up with an historical sketch of English economics, which is fairly accurate, not particularly inspiring, and written—as indeed the whole book naturally is—with a strongly marked bias. There is also much that is interesting and sympathetically written about Co-operation, Trades Unions, and the like. Mr. Macrosty's main point is that commercial enterprise has passed out of the region of individualism proper and is now almost entirely dependent upon consolidated organizations managed by salaried experts. This is the intermediate stage, which is to lead us to State control and to—jawbreaking word—collectivization. But it is not quite clear that either trusts or municipal water supplies, or even Imperial dockyards and the Post Office, do necessarily lead us to State Socialism, and Mr. Macrosty does not make it at all evident that such a consummation is desirable. We are aware that he thinks it desirable, but we do not gather his reasons. Our freedom no doubt must be restricted to some extent; and great trusts may well be obliged to submit to more publicity, even to more interference, than the multitude of small traders, in whose numbers lies safety. But that does not carry us necessarily to the doctrine that freedom should cease or that the régime to which Mr. Macrosty looks forward would not be undermined by red tape and incompetence.

After the numerous more or less Utopian schemes for social reform with which we are deluged, Mr. Mackay's book PUBLIC RELIEF OF THE POOR (John Murray, 2s. 6d. n.) is as refreshing and bracing as cold spring water after sweet and cloying liquors. Mr. Mackay's precepts are dictated by common-sense and far-seeing charity. He is convinced that "pauperism and dependence among the poorer classes are largely artificial and unnecessary conditions," and that "what is wanting to secure the great reformation which lies within reach is a reasoned conviction of the possibility of dispauperization." The six lectures which form the substance of the book present the arguments which establish the theory and enunciate the general principles. While most social schemes involve great changes, revolutions, upheavals, and are yet quite uncertain as

The principles elucidated by Mr. Mackay destitution is economically avoidable, and that depends on two things: the quickened econom our industrial population, and the relaxation o feudal status of servitude which, as the pa lingers in our midst, arresting progress and deve business is to secure a free outlet for the true co of social life, and to lessen the retentive para man's primitive immobility and indolence, c mind which are apt to be impervious to the ben economic motive."

These principles Mr. Mackay illustrates an his tracing out of the origin and history of t Law, and his description of its present conditi The fifth chapter considers the relation bet voluntary agencies of relief, and in the last an of the present drift of events. The whole volu and we trust that it may be widely read.

In THE EVOLUTION OF MODERN MONEY (Mac Mr. Carlile has endeavoured to trace from the point the various changes undergone by money. that monetary historians usually confine them the passing of statutes or the adoption of st of realizing that "the function of legislation h mainly to the consecration of facts that are already For instance, the Act of 1816, which is gen the point of transition from a silver to a go England really only stereotyped existing c ordinary silver coins had become so worn that t face value was greater than their intrinsic wort coins, in imitation of this state of things, wer a face value greater than the value of the met them. Gold, Mr. Carlile believes, had become t standard in the eighteenth century. The book, into two parts—the first describing "Historical T Monetary Standard"—and the second "The Orig Nature of the Standard" is an interesting an piece of work. It is a pity that Mr. Carlile does ences to any of the original sources, but mer authorities. His style is on the whole pleas become at times verbose and slightly obscure.

The second volume of Mr. Edmond Kelly's C HUMAN EVOLUTION (Longmans) deals with t Collectivism versus Individualism. Mr. Kelly enthusiastic, yet broad-minded and moderate firmly in collectivism as an ideal at which to a that the times are not yet ripe for the collectivis tivism cannot be imposed upon a nation not read grow up, if at all, gradually and naturally, but should do this, men's minds must be prepare must be clearly set before them, and the work of be undertaken seriously. The first part of the individualism, its nature and history, its "inst property," and its results. Mr. Kelly feels tha tions are evil, that the amount of crime, misery, world are so great that every man and woman think at all, find it intolerable. Mr. Kelly's ow for instance, of New York should succeed in ron to thought. Next, in Book II., we have collecti and discussed, some of the objections to it an

Everything is divided up into neat headings, paragraphs, sections, and subsections, and in the midst of such an orderly but scrappy array it is quite bewildering to come across appeals to "you, reader," a method of address to which we are unable to reconcile ourselves.

In the Far West, as in the Middle Ages, there are still writers who take all knowledge for their province. Their books, which they produce with refreshing ease, are largely made up of long quotations from the most diverse writers. Even when they nominally confine themselves to one subject, they take care to choose a satisfactorily wide one, which will give scope to their versatility and to their notebooks. Dr. E. A. Ross, the author of SOCIAL CONTROL (Citizen's Library, Macmillan, 5s. n.), is Professor of Sociology in the University of Nebraska. We should imagine from his book that he is a useful and capable teacher, whose lectures prove stimulating to his pupils. He is clearly a man of wide reading, and touches a number of notes whose multitude must occasionally prove bewildering to his readers. The chapter on Personality may serve as an instance; it contains an astonishing number of illustrations, but we must confess our ignorance of the personalities of the presumably Western heroes Sam Houston, Phil Kearney, and Custer of the Yellow Curls. Neither are we quite certain of the significance of "ankylosis." When, breathless, one arrives at the end of Dr. Ross' volume, and meditates upon its contents, the first conclusion is that it might all have been equally well said in about half the space; the second, that the style is unnecessarily precious at times and the quotations too numerous and commonplace. For the rest, no doubt, the book will prove useful to young students of sociology, who must, however, remember that "no light responsibility is laid upon the investigator who explores the mysterious processes that take place in the soul of a people, and dissects in public the ideals and affirmations elaborated in the social mind. The fact of control is, in good sooth, no gospel to be preached abroad with allegory and parable, with bold type and scare head-lines." Finally, we may quote two sentences from the chapter on Art. "In many the first straying from the ego is not toward fellowship, but towards the vast. Not sympathy, but thirst for largeness, carries them out of themselves." Here we feel that we have found the keynote to Professor Ross' work.

Mr. Max Hirsch, of Melbourne, the author of DEMOCRACY VERSUS SOCIALISM (Macmillan, 10s. n.), was moved to produce this book by his evidently sincere conviction that Socialism could not prove a cure for social injustice, and that the writers who share this view have devoted far too much time and space to purely negative criticism. He himself has endeavoured to write a book which shall deal with Socialist conceptions and proposals as a whole. His work is divided into five parts, the first of which analyses and describes Socialistic teaching, the second and third criticize Socialist economics and ethics and explain the author's own views as to true economic and ethical principles. The fourth shows the conflict between the industrial and distributive proposals of Socialists and the probable results of the former. In the fifth Mr. Hirsch describes the social reforms he would himself wish for, and the means which he considers best adapted to promote social justice. The book is evidently the work of a conscientious and hard-working man. Mr. Hirsch has read the vast literature of his subject carefully, and his own proposals (the institution of the Single Tax on land, which by checking monopoly enables the State to secure equal rights and equal

THE MOORS.

THE LAND OF THE MOORS. By BURGETT MEAKIN. (Sonnenschein. 15s.)

The second volume of Mr. Meakin's exhaustive Morocco is more interesting, though not more valu the first. "The Moorish Empire" necessarily contai deal of jejune chronicle, where the dull crimes Sovereigns were unrelieved by any of those efforts and art which often redeem Oriental despotism. "Th the Moors," on the other hand, deals with the com is, without too much insistance on historical even when they awaken European associations. In the Tangier, for example, it would have been absurd to interesting episode—brief and fruitless as it was rule in that beautiful town, the loss of which was among blunders of our statesmen in the days when Imper undeveloped. Mr. Meakin is, as usual, full and accu information on this subject, and his account is by some excellent contemporary illustrations of Tangie in the day of Charles II., who himself regarded it as a immense magnitude in the Royal diadem," while Mr. Pep it would be "the most considerable place the King o hath in the world." No such glorious anticipations wer as to the future of Bombay, which Catharine of Bragan to the Crown at the same time as Tangier; but the two cities has reversed all prophecies. Bombay is the of Indian commerce, whilst Tangier is a not very sanit and pleasure resort for a few Europeans, restricted b ignorant and uncivilized Government that the Mediter known since the invasion of the barbarians. Tangi has been full of contradictions. The English began, to the Portuguese, by breaking images and sacking but very soon the new possession came to be regarde of papacy, where "Irish troops and Roman bastards port themselves unchecked." The history of the of Tangier might supply one of the few argument ingenious pleader might adduce in favour of the cul the Irish language; for when the garrison was clos the Moors in 1678, it kept up communications with th messages shouted in Irish through speaking-trumpets present day the advocates of the Irish tongue appear t able to dispense with such artificial aid to making t audible. The whole history of Charles' mismana Tangier is a lamentable example of opportunities thr As Pepys said, "this place was to the King, as Carnarvon says of wood, that it is an excrescence of provided by God for the payment of debts"; whe found to cost money, instead of bringing it in, it doned, and the "jewel of the diadem" was treated paste.

Mr. Meakin's admirable accounts of all the chie Morocco—Tetuan, Laraiche, Sallee, Rabat, Mazagan, Fez, Mequinez, Marrakesh, &c.—the sacred towns Idris, Zarhon, Shefshawan, and Wazzan, and many of places, are a mine of information, carefully selecte best authorities, and supplemented and verified by exploration. It is not an easy thing to explore Moro must disguise oneself as a native (though not neces Mahomedan) in order to escape the imputation of a sus greater, though Pellow believed that "hollowing and staring" at the royal beast and abusing him in the language of the country—supposing him ignorant of English—would suffice to cost him. The Arabs are said, however, to have discovered a better method, founded upon a knowledge of the lion's sense of decorum; they preferred to meet him naked, and Leo Africanus reported, somewhat sceptically, that if a woman did so the lion would "with crying and roaringe cast his eyes upon the groundé and so depart." The volume ends with a brightly-written description of the author's personal experiences when travelling in Morocco, which has perhaps too much the air of a magazine article to be quite in keeping with the solid and detailed information presented in the rest of this useful and elaborate volume. The numerous and excellent illustrations are an attractive feature.

BOSWELL ONCE MORE.

Boswell's Life of Johnson. Edited by Augustine Birrell, and Illustrated by Portraits selected by Ernest Radford. In six volumes. (Constable. 6s. n. per volume.)

The editions of Boswell increase apace; and, since "the immortal biography" is "a book which no gentleman's" (or, indeed, no moderately well-educated person's) "library should be without," it is well that the variety of the supply should keep pace with the demand. By this time, however, the biography, with all the possibilities it offers to the commentator, has probably been edited and re-edited as elaborately as human ingenuity can contrive, and nowadays the interest in a new edition is almost inevitably bibliographical rather than literary. It would be difficult, for example, to surpass Dr. Birkbeck Hill's encyclopædic recension for thoroughness, or Mr. Arnold Glover's for dainty convenience; and most other recent editions range, as it were, between these two, like men-at-arms in a goodly line, "tallest on the right, shortest on the left." So, when a new reprint of Boswell comes before us, we ask, naturally, what the publisher or printer rather than what the editor has done for it; and the rivalry of the booksellers in respect of this particular book is now almost exclusively a rivalry of form and decoration.

This consideration, indeed, is particularly true of the handsomely bound edition which Messrs. Constable are now engaged in producing; for in this case both the notes and the introduction, for which Mr. Birrell is responsible, have, if we mistake not, appeared in an earlier reprint issued by the same house some few years ago. Indeed, it seems that the same plates have been used for printing both editions, and the result is not altogether satisfactory, for the page of type designed for the smaller edition is not in very happy proportion with the wider margin now employed. The result is that the typography looks too delicate for the volume, and there is a loss of that harmony between external and internal decoration which is the high-water mark of artistic manufacture.

The new edition, however, is far from being a mere replica of the old, for it contains a very interesting and well-conceived novelty in the shape of an exhaustive series of portraits, upon which, since they form the principal feature of the edition, a good deal of thought has been very properly bestowed. Mr. Ernest Radford [illegible]

commentary upon the passage they reinforce. We however, to a certain lack of confidence in the fa Mr. Radford seems to us to have performed the t his undertaking.

The preface which he supplies is couched in t altogether. It is partly marred by an affectation is quite out of keeping with its surroundings, a sort of facetious slovenliness of arrangement whic of nonchalance and flippancy to a task in whic possible room for the display of such foibles, from saying that a share of wit and humour is with the atmosphere of Boswell; humour, inc essence of the original. But literary affectation seem a violence to the occasion, and both of t Mr. Radford's notes.

This, for instance, is what we mean by trivial style:—

> The Johnsonian of whom I pretend to k imaginary creature, knowing so little of art t be a considerable tract of uncultivated land on estate; and now that his hero's life is about t with portraits, it may seem that the time has arr ing a little at least.

Or again this:—

> Though it may not have been easy, the for whatever it is, enabled Mr. Leask to suppr signs of his mirth; and the consequence is t its class and kind is one of the very best.

Each of these passages offends the taste in a but none of them is conceived in a tone the leas Johnsonian commentator. Even more fantastical Mr. Radford's little comments in the tab Illustrations."

> William Hogarth. 1697-1764.
> National Portrait Gallery.
> Thinks Johnson may be an idiot.

An entry like this is in the worst literary t only otiose, but positively stupid. By such error Mr. Radford detracts very seriously from a really labour of research and selection.

Mr. Birrell's part in the edition is already collector of Boswelliana. He does not, perhap ponderous view of the duties of an editor, bu performed a congenial task with all his accust and grace. "When you know you must is writes with his easy air of graceful concessio course is to decline competition." And so no elaborate system of annotation, contenting with the best of Malone's notes, supplement but only a few, of his own, and confining functions mainly to the provision of a characteris engaging introduction which, if, after the fashion o essays, it does not penetrate very deeply into it least completely successful in arousing the rig reader, and in putting him in vein for the Garg wit and wisdom which Boswell and Johnson hav him. In short, Mr. Birrell lets his author spe standing modestly aside in the presence of n whose literary quality no amount of commentary enhance.

does scant justice to the pains and judgment of the collector. A very little extra trouble would have prevented this; as it is success has been missed, as it were, by a hair's-breadth. This is a great pity, for the edition, of which the volumes are handsome and light to the hand, might have been made quite unique of its kind, whereas in its present form it seems to us much better in conception than in execution.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Josephine.

Mr. Frederick A. Ober's biography of JOSEPHINE, EMPRESS OF THE FRENCH (Unwin, 7s. 6d. n.), is written in the style of a sentimental historical novel, which is by no means the best style available for the purposes of the biographer. The author appears to have had access to "family archives" which gave him an advantage over other biographers in dealing with Josephine's early life in Martinique; but they do not appear to have been a very rich mine to dig in, and the new matter is of little interest or importance. The general purpose of the book seems to be to whitewash the Empress; Mr. Ober's method of dealing with adverse evidence is the very simple one of saying that he does not believe it—not a very effective method when evidence is strong. Nor does he present that adverse evidence with the impartiality proper to an historian. His great concern is to discredit the legend that the wife of Napoleon was the cast-off mistress of Barras, and that Napoleon got the Italian command as a reward for marrying her; and he imagines himself to have disposed of the story by quoting Carnot's statement that it was he, and not Barras, who proposed Napoleon for the appointment. But this statement, even if true, really proves very little. Even if Carnot proposed the appointment, its confirmation may very well have depended upon the good will of Barras; and if Napoleon and Josephine believed in the influence of Barras, our opinion of their conduct can hardly be affected by the discovery that Barras imposed upon them. Nor is it fair to represent that the case against Josephine rests solely upon the gossip of jealous women. It also rests upon very circumstantial statements made by Barras himself in his recently published memoirs. The whole book, however, is written in the tone of the special pleader, as witness the statement that, in associating with the murderers of her husband and her friends, Josephine "merely accepted the inevitable." There was nothing whatever inevitable about her conduct. She was perfectly free to go back to her mother in Martinique if she chose. As a matter of fact, she was a woman with a singular lack of sensitiveness, as Napoleon soon discovered, and as his letters to her bear ample witness.

Travel in the First Century.

The subject of TRAVEL IN THE FIRST CENTURY (Cambridge University Press, 5s.) is an attractive one, though it undoubtedly loses somewhat in special interest when we remember that travel in the eighteenth century was very similar to travel in the first century; if anything it was a little less convenient. Horace and Dr. Johnson made their journeys in similar fashion, save that the former had the advantage of good roads. As a clever writer has remarked, Trajan and Peel took the same number of hours to travel from Rome to London. Miss Caroline Skeel has, so far as the limits of an essay allow, gathered together in this volume, which was written for the Gibson Prize at Girton, the chief on the few references which can be found to riding on [illegible] In addition to the one or two which she quotes we [illegible] Pliny's remarks (Epp., i., xvii.) about the way to [illegible] Laurentian villa, which show that journeys on horseback [illegible] uncommon whenever the route lay out of the main road.

Grasses.

Professor Marshall Ward, of Cambridge, has written [illegible] (Cambridge University Press, 6s.) "in the hope" th[illegible] be used in fields and on hillsides as well as in laboratories specimens of our ordinary grasses in the hand. It is a [illegible] of our common native species of grasses, so arranged [illegible] readers may learn how to examine and understand the [illegible] parts of "these remarkable plants," with plenty [illegible] statements about the biology and physiological peculi[illegible] grasses. The scheme of the book is clear and compa[illegible] somewhat reminding a critic of that of the best flo[illegible] France, but full of original touches, such as we have [illegible] expect from Professor Ward. Two chapters are devote[illegible] liminary information about the vegetative organs of gr[illegible] then the author supplies a list of grasses classified acc[illegible] their vegetative characters.

A chapter of information about the anatomy and hi[illegible] grasses is followed by a list of grasses classified acc[illegible] the anatomical characters of the leaf (readers should [illegible] larly notice the descriptions of two glyceria ope[illegible] fluitans); a well-illustrated disquisition upon g[illegible] flower introduces a catalogue of grasses grouped acc[illegible] their "flowers and inflorescences," (which will fasci[illegible] young botanist who takes the book out of doors to [illegible] living specimens); and after information about the [illegible] "seeds" we have a synopsis of grasses classified [illegible] to their grains. A useful "bibliography," from which [illegible] of Babington need not have been omitted, precedes [illegible] best indices ever issued with a small English scientific [illegible] is in many respects a model botanical handbook.

Science.

In old time the great Cathedrals were led to deve[illegible] own "uses." In the same way it is in our own day [illegible] more and more the custom for the principal seats of l[illegible] evolve their own laboratory courses, to which only spe[illegible] books are appropriate. Nay more, by the issue of [illegible] EXERCISES IN PRACTICAL PHYSICS (Cambridge University [illegible] Drs. A. Schuster and C. H. Lees, of Owens College, h[illegible] that, in one and the same institution, a difference of r[illegible] bring about radical changes, even in a few years. [illegible] decessors, Prof. Balfour Stewart and Mr. Haldane G[illegible] a series of which, unfortunately, the volumes on Light [illegible] have not yet appeared, but which in general scop[illegible] superior to anything of the kind attempted either [illegible] since. But its very comprehensiveness detract[illegible] its value for certain purposes, and the modern [illegible] to specialization leads, however undesirably, to [illegible] duction of books addressed to candidates for a [illegible] degree, in this case that of B.Sc. at the Victo[illegible] versity. Within the limits assigned, however, this ne[illegible] admirable both in design and execution, and in ac[illegible] their unwritten motto "Be ye diligent in correctin[illegible] the authors impress upon the student the most impor[illegible] tasks. Another feature of the book is the comparati[illegible] number of experiments which have to be gone throu[illegible] sequence of the special purpose of the book just referr[illegible] expressly disavow any attempt at completeness it is not possible to find fault with them for leaving gaps here and there, provided that these are not of vital consequence. A few trifling printer's errors have escaped notice in the revision, and the punctuation marks have, for the most part, been allowed to take care of themselves.

The third instalment of Huxley's collected papers, THE SCIENTIFIC MEMOIRS OF THOMAS HENRY HUXLEY, VOL. III. (Macmillan, 30s. n.), covers the period 1861-1872. In some ways it is the most important part of his career. It includes the work of his ripest years, before the burden of official responsibility and ill-health had begun to weigh on him too heavily. Here are to be found his papers on the classification of birds; the mutual affinities of dinosaurs, birds, and reptiles; the methods and uses of ethnology; and the relations of the organisms of yeast and mould (Penicillium, Torula, and Bacterium), besides addresses to learned societies, which may even now be perused with pleasure and profit. The entire list extends to thirty-eight separate headings, and in all of them may be discerned his keen powers of observation, his swift critical and logical acumen, and his lucidity of exposition. At an early period he confessed to Sir H. de la Bèche that "he did not care for fossils." When Palæontology began to be looked upon less as the handmaid than the nurse of the theory of evolution his change of attitude was very striking. From this time forward Huxley gradually drifted away from his physiological studies, and became more and more absorbed in the grand generalisations opened out by the "Origin of Species." Of special interest to him were the problems of avian and reptilian morphology presented by the still-surviving Ratitæ and the extinct forms Archæopteryx and Compsognathus on the one hand, and the dinosaurs with their peculiar affinities on the other. Ultimately he was led to unite the two classes in one province—Sauropsida—just as fishes and amphibians fell into the province Ichthyopsida. Another demonstration of the highest interest to all evolutionists was the genealogy of the Equidæ, traceable through Marsh's discoveries from Eocene to modern times in a continuous chain, though the linking of the early and final forms would have been deemed audacious in the extreme had it rested on conjecture only. Yet Huxley never allowed judgment to wait upon enthusiasm, and his care to avoid overstepping the bounds of legitimate inference is well shown by his coinage of the word homotaxis to express the similarity of arrangement of strata in detached or widely separated areas, without implying that layers in which even the closest parallelism can be traced are necessarily contemporaneous in date. Many of the papers furnish food for reflection, but it may be remarked that those on ethnology do not, either by their number or the nature of their contents, represent the full value of Huxley's services to that science. With the year 1870 a turning point in his career is reached when, as president or officer of this or that society, or as a member of the London School Board, or of a commission of one kind or another, his energies were directed into other channels, during such intervals of decent health as an overworked system allowed him to enjoy. Two years of this period are covered in the present volume; the remainder will be dealt with in the final volume now in course of preparation.

New College.

NEW COLLEGE, OXFORD, by H. Rashdall and R. S. Rait, M.A. (College Histories Series) (F. E. Robinson, 5s.), at any rate to Walter de Merton and Willia that life had greater affinity to Scotch than to I sities of to-day. The Universities, as Dr. Rash were originally "great guilds or autonomous co N. Europe of teachers, in the south of stude gradually acquired legal status and privileges, endowments. The College system introduced the University system. A College was only a a way of supporting students who were attending the University. That in course of time the shadowed the University was due partly to their and esprit de corps, but still more to the sy introduced, as Dr. Rashdall claims, by Willia and destined "to revolutionize Oxford educatio the teaching of the University Regents (i.e., M still called Magistri Regentes in the Latin fo Convocation) and practically to transform the Uni federation of educationally independent and isola But Dr. Rashdall is probably right in holding t College founders had no conscious intention or pr a change. Wykeham, for example, was not educational reformer that he is sometimes credit His immediate design, as specified in his found was to remedy the falling off in the number account of the Black Death and other epidemic which drew them to other avocations, and the lack which led to "Idleness and frivolous vanities"; educational idea being "an increased appreciati of sound grammatical teaching." But the two not by which the "sole and munificent founder of the Winton Colleges" sought to carry out the so ideas of his own time, have after many vicissitude of which they became instances of the very ab intended to cure, well justified his care and libera story of those vicissitudes through the Reforma the Revolution and the Restoration, the dead of the eighteenth century, and the awakening li half of the nineteenth, we must refer the picturesque pages of Dr. Rashdall. The fou notary, clerk of the works, architect, Royal pluralist, Bishop of Winchester, and Lord Hig England—played a leading part in English hi founding Winchester and New College exegit perennius.

SOME FAVOURITE BOOKS AND THEIR AUTHO Shaylor (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d.), is a neatly book by an author who has published one or two o books of the same kind. It is designed mainly "general reader" to learn more than he generall names the sound of which is familiar to him, to "p to further study of the great classics by a sho writers, and an extract or two from their writi gratulate Mr. Shaylor on his selection, which i judicious.

Those who like small talk about "royalties care whether it is well substantiated or not will shoulder to shoulder and form a public for E. M. C tion of Mrs. Clara Tschudi's ELIZABETH EMPRE (Sonnenschein, 7s. 6d.). The writer makes no prete any first-hand knowledge of her subject; and it

War." This introduction points out that several of our disasters in the early stages of the Boer campaign resulted from the violation of one or another of these maxims. The moral is, that it is necessary for soldiers to be clever as well as brave, and studious as well as clever, not only remembering the maxims but knowing the military history which illustrates them. A good deal of this history, with hints for further researches, will be found in the notes appended to the maxims.

Canon Twells has some claim to our remembrance as a hymn-writer, if only as the author of "At even, ere the sun was set," which is certainly one of the most popular hymns in the language. He was also a thoughtful preacher, who had ideas of his own on the subject of sermon writing, and expounded them in an interesting little book called "Colloquies on Preaching." But the MEMOIR OF HENRY TWELLS, which was the last work of the late Dean of Peterborough (Wells Gardner, Darton, 6s.) contains a great deal of matter—chiefly letters in verse—which would have been better omitted. Canon Twells had a remarkable facility in rhyme: he could turn out friendly letters in this medium with singular ease, and no doubt they were very welcome to the recipients, but they are certainly not worth reprinting, and they rather tend to give a false picture of the man. It is interesting to note that the subject of this memoir was educated at King Edward's School, Birmingham, under Dr. Prince Lee, afterwards Bishop of Manchester, where he had as schoolfellows such future dignitaries of the Church as Benson, Lightfoot, and Westcott. He was for some years a Proctor in Convocation for the Peterborough Diocese, and he founded and endowed the Church of St. Augustin's at Bournemouth.

It seemed doubtful, at a first glance, whether the papers brought together by Mr. Richard A. Armstrong under the title of MAKERS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY (Unwin, 3s. 6d. n.) were to be regarded as lectures or as sermons. Reading a few paragraphs aloud, and fancying that we heard a sound as of the thumping of a hollow tub, we gathered that they belonged to the latter category. The presumption is, however, that the bulk of the congregation which listened to them was very imperfectly educated, and it is not unlikely that they set that congregation thinking, and even induced some members of it to read the works of Darwin, Matthew Arnold, Ibsen, Newman, and Martineau. In that case they served a useful purpose. There are not wanting indications that Mr. Armstrong could do better work (from the literary critic's point of view) out of the pulpit than in it.

SOME RECOLLECTIONS OF JEAN INGELOW (Wells Gardner, Darton, 3s. 6d.) is an anonymous book raising by its title expectations which the contents do not fulfil. The earlier chapters merely give conjectural gush about Jean Ingelow's childhood. The later reminiscences are rarely personal, and mainly trivial. We read, for instance, that "two of her fellow pupils of whom she sometimes spoke were the Misses Rogers, beautiful girls of good family in Lincolnshire, both of whom died young." And that is all. With that idle remark the Misses Rogers, whoever they may have been, pass and are no more heard of. We are told again that Jean Ingelow had many admirers, but we are not told so much as the name of any one of them. The most interesting story in the book is that, when Tennyson met Jean Ingelow, he exclaimed: "I declare you do the trick better than I do." But this is really the only interesting story that the book contains. Closing the volume we feel that the life of Jean Ingelow remains to be written, and ought to be written, and that Mr. Mackenzie Bell, whom the anonymous author frequently quotes, would probably write it as well as any one.

FICTION.

"Back to the Army Again."

All of the many different kinds of novel readers
LOVE AND HIS MASK (Heinemann, 6s.), by Méale Mur
(Mrs. Henry Norman). It is a book that skilfully the more interesting points of a war story, the intimat of the now popular love-letters, the joys of an aristocra the consideration of the subtleties of a woman's heart delineation of the conventional, straightforward, nol less, necessary mind of man. The simple hero who p attracts the beautiful woman, and widow, Mrs. Leslie unknown to her. It is Major-General the Hon.
Riddington, V.C., C.B., commanding the 6th Brig of those heroes a little more frequent in the flection of lady novelists than in the rough-and-tumble continent of lost reputations. He has been in the has won his commission; he is a little over forty; he is w by the English men and women of his day. Leslie has the age when a woman knows she wants something and knows also that he will never understand, or ra he will always misunderstand, what it is that she wan she had ruled him out of the sum altogether. What sh could never be had, she argued, from any man if she k so she had decided to secure it to herself by not know
The idea, though a new and unused idea, was, in its simple. She had ruled him out, but she had carefully the man who was to be her quantité négligeable." Basil Ri is the man for her purpose; to him, unknown and unkno writes her secret meaning. That no one shall know is a that she strictly observes; a typewriter and other m attributes help to this end. "Secrets," says the
"are commonly supposed to be difficult to keep; fo especially so. This is really because most people are hearted in their desire to keep secrets—again, women par so. It may not be good for her to do so, but can keep a secret, even as the marble conceals of legend—through a hundred years." Although we personally know any lady who has kept a secret for a years, the fact that a woman can be close if there be personal need for it has been proved often enough. L be secret—she is a most delightful woman, simple as and believing herself to be remarkably complex—bu stances are against her and, as the story develops, thi out. Toby Tollemache and Basil Riddington, who at appear to have equal chances for the hand of Leslie "ruled out" man, are the pleasantest of fellows. Th characters of the book interest us at once and hold us out; the story is a refreshment from the beginning to We like it better than Mrs. Norman's previous novels this opinion we shall, we believe, find ourselves in ag with the general public. "Love and his Mask" will the most popular novels of the autumn season.

Mrs. Voynich.

Mrs. Voynich fully demonstrated her power i Gadfly," but, not content with the victories that volume her, she has, in JACK RAYMOND (Heinemann, 6s.), ch almost impossible subject, determined, as it would ap show us that in the most difficult circumstances her ta command our admiration. There is hardly anything

ley and his mother bring new light and love into the soul of Jack. The narration of his devotion makes an extremely unconventional book in which extraordinary insight is blurred by lack of external information, happy inspiration marred by what appear to be purposes foreign to art. There are drama and sympathy in the book, but Jack Raymond remains not quite articulate and real. He is of the kind of subjective character that clever lady novelists create to further their own usually altruistic or reformatory ends. Such novelists as Ouida, Livingston Prescott, and Olive Schreiner have produced this kind of man and very effective and heartrending he is—but is it art? Mrs. Voynich is so bold, so cunning, so alert in her work that one is inclined to beg her to consider the question. If the early part of the book is intended by its moral to ameliorate the condition of youth this inverted ideality will militate against so admirable a purpose. To overstate a case is not the way to win it. If on the other hand the opening of the story is intended as a prelude to a work of art, it lacks the spirit of beauty. Judged by the highest standard, the only one suitable for any writing of this clever lady, "Jack Raymond" is unsatisfactory. It is an unpleasant essay in a direction that is most difficult to all who take the profession of novelist seriously. Its unconventionality is not atoned for by its undoubted sincerity.

Mr. Richard Marsh.

Mr. Richard Marsh is acquiring a reputation as a weaver of mysteries, and as a prolific writer who may generally be trusted not to waste too much time in beating about the bush. In MRS. MUSGRAVE AND HER HUSBAND (John Long, 3s. 6d.) he secures for us a plentiful crop of murder and suicide, and manages by this simple device to give his story a fillip whenever it shows signs of becoming dull. To do him justice, the interest is sustained well enough (it is a short story, and there are five violent deaths in it), but the main features of the tale can scarcely be called pleasant. There is cleverness displayed in the construction, although suicide is always a poor way out of an impasse, and the scene culminating in the murder in a railway carriage is not badly done. It was presumably for the sake of heightening the agony that Mr. Marsh chose to pile these horrors upon the unfortunate heads of a newly-married pair. They appear an amiable couple, and we are sorry for their troubles, but this sort of direct appeal for pity is apt to overshoot its mark. Mr. Richard Marsh is of the forcible school, and his seasoning is scattered with too generous a hand. Fortunately for him there are plenty of people who like a high flavour.

Some of the same author's stories in BOTH SIDES OF THE VEIL (Methuen, 6s.) are also exciting enough. They are a curiously mixed collection, however, and not a few, especially towards the end, are weak and dull. It may be that the arrangement is faulty. Mr. Marsh has never been remarkable for his attention to detail—his proofs, for example are more carelessly revised than those of any author we remember—and he begins this volume with so startling a pair of stories that such quiet interludes as "The Match of the Season" and "A Rubber or Two" strike the reader as somewhat commonplace. Two or three of the stories are connected with spiritualism, which gives the author an opportunity for a title and for a rather attractive cover.

American-Historical.

The purveyors of historical romance are having a great while Colonel George Rogers Clark and his sul finest of fine fellows. Alice Roussillon, too, is thing out of the common. But the writing once careless and clumsy. No doubt this is of l in these days. America demands historic publishers know how to push a story that popularity; and the author can readily consol own phrase) with "the beatitude of him whose are latest." We do not imagine that his book remarkable popularity in England.

Court Dress.

PRINCE CHARMING, by "Rita" (Sands, pretty little fantasy indeed. There is plenty Court flattery, and tinsel compliment, but wit of sound principles concealed in the backgr thing in Anthony Hope's earlier vein, when he books as "The Heart of Princess Osra," an at the most serious parts, anything but go experiences of the unknown Prince in Eri author's fanciful name for Hibernia) make episode as could be wished. "Rita" has most of her sex, and she has also vivacity an pleasant talent for handling conversation. Sh correct her proofs more carefully, or employ a duty off her shoulders. But in all essentials th book of its kind.

MY HEART AND LUTE, by A. St. Laur Stoughton, 6s.), would not be a bad story dialogue, which is like nothing either human or Lord Rodwell is asked, "Have you ever m replies "Never, 'pon my honour. Delighted, you know?" On another occasion he greet
"Ah! Lady Wentworth, delighted to come,
It is a trick of certain writers to fall back on th
you know?" when they wish to suggest inanity it—not in the characters alone, but in the whol

MR. LEOPOLD LUGWELL: HIS BIRTH AN Philip Sterne (Blackwood, 6s.), deals with a chiefly unpleasant, in a manner that is decid except for some rather tedious conversation laboured repartee. Mr. Leopold Lugwell fi title than he does anywhere else. In fact, h all into the story, which plays round the chara and mother, a strangely assorted couple of unf ings. The book is a trifle long-winded, but qu

It is remarkable that, no matter how bad can generally muster opposite its title-page a notices, if not of itself at least of some author. THE CHARM OF LIFE (Griffiths, 3 author of "An Episode at Schmeks," and this work appears to have been regarded with i the reviewers. We fear that the most co gentlemen will scarcely mete out the same anonymous writer's last novel, which is a work indeed. The main idea of the sto sentimental; it is told with portentous dulnes patches of (unintentionally) comic melodrama writing the less said the better.

DUPES, by Ethel Watts Mumford (Put

LIBRARY NOTES.

In last week's Literature we gave a select bibliography of Alfred the Great. The Manchester Public Libraries have now issued a special list of works which more than ever shows what a great contribution has recently been made to our knowledge of Alfred. The list is divided into sections on the life, writings, kingdom, fleet, and general history of the king, and is excellently annotated. A certain number of volumes appear to have been dragged in, but the list should provide an admirable basis to work upon.

"The Library Association Year Book" for 1901 reproduces most of the annual features which render it of use to those interested in libraries. Under the head of examinations and classes are printed the questions set at the professional examination. Last year we commented unfavourably upon the questions, which were mostly quite out of the region of practical librarianship. The present papers are of far greater utility. They demand knowledge of importance to any librarian, and are of a kind to encourage the aspirant for a certificate. Some, however, presuppose a too great critical faculty on the part of the examinee, who is asked to state at length matters of opinion rather than of fact.

Petty thefts constitute a well-known annoyance to the librarian. The offence is often so needless in kind that it is arguable whether it is not the result of some kleptomaniac tendency. From a certain Church paper in a London library the Sunday-school lessons have been weekly "commandeered." After all a kleptomaniac may be of some service in a library. The harm often done to the reference department by the acceptance of worthless gifts was referred to in a paper read at the Plymouth Conference of Librarians. Let librarians who suffer from depredations place a few open shelves in the news-room and on them their unwished-for gifts, surmounted, if necessary, by a card, "Please take one." It is conceivable that the book and paper thief might be moved to repentance.

Mr. G. K. Fortescue's presidential address to the Library Association has drawn attention to the abortive catalogue of the British Museum in 1841, of which only letter A was published. On a vote of over £21,000 for the Museum Sir Robert Peel was asked when the catalogue would be completed and printed. He replied, "Owing to the assiduity of persons entrusted with the preparation of the catalogue it is now nearly in a complete state, and will soon be available to the general readers . . . . I may state that the catalogue will be printed by the 31st December, 1844." Rarely are such precise Ministerial assurances so wide apart from actuality.

The Librarian of the South African Public Library, Cape Town, writes to us as follows :—

> I have not seen the article in the London Argus of June 21st dealing with Public Libraries at the Cape, to which you refer in your issue of July 6th, but I hope it is not so misleading as your extract would lead one to suppose. The writer has evidently obtained a "general abstract of returns from all libraries" for the year 1899, which cannot be relied upon for statistical accuracy when required for librarians' purposes. Had the writer turned to the balance sheets and reports of the various institutions he would have learned that the sum of £2,325 was the grant to this library for a year and a-half, and that the income given as £3,792 was a total containing amongst other things the balance brought forward from last year. The general abstract of returns only contains such information as is asked for by the Colonial Government. For other not less interesting matter we have to consult the reports themselves. I cannot tell whether the writer made clear that there is no free library in South Africa such as

Correspondence.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In the course of his thoughtful article o Morris, which appears in your issue of the 14th Wallace L. Crowdy quotes the words "fully conse own position in English letters, and regarding Mr. Sw his only equal among living poets" which form description by me of Morris (that occurs in an artic published in the Fortnightly Review for November, then adds, "we doubt whether the author of 'Th Paradise' ever considered himself in comparison Swinburne."

Perhaps I may be permitted to mention that i years that elapsed between the death of Tennyson in Morris' own death in 1896, the remark to which M demurs was justified fully by Morris' conversatio presence; though concerning the claims as a poet o life-long friend Mr. Swinburne, Morris spoke always characteristic force of eloquent persuasiveness as t least one of his auditors feel that it is only the really who can judge adequately of a supreme poet.

I am, &c., MACKENZIE

London, Sept. 17.

LITERARY EARNINGS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—With respect to your remarks, published issue of last week, touching the question of remune journalistic work, will you kindly allow me to make ment? While a thousand words or so can be written hour or thereabouts, the information itself may be the o of years, or perhaps considerable expense has been in obtaining the information, irrespective of the time an expended. This remark is, of course, an obvious one; considering the prospects of journalism as a "profes important matter of expenses must never be lost Taking into account the cost of obtaining the materi time and trouble expended, the remuneration re frequently by no means excessive, to say the least.

Yours respectfully,

September 15, 1901. J

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHER

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT AS A WRITE

President Roosevelt's first book was his history Naval War of 1812," published in 1882, when he w twenty-four years old. His next contribution to l curiously enough, will be another study of the sam occupy the first place in the sixth volume of Mr. Lair history of the Royal Navy, which Messrs. Sampson about to publish. When it was first announced Clowes had invited both Captain Mahan and Mr. Ro assist him in his work, a New York literary journal cong itself that at last English readers would be told the wh Powell and Selous in England, his books are extremely popular —especially his hunting books. His "Naval War of 1812," too, is in its eighth edition, and his history of "The Winning of the West," in four volumes, appears both in the library and cheap editions, while a volume of "Episodes" from the same work—useful for the American student rather than the general reader—came out not long ago. The President publishes his books with several firms, including Messrs. Scribner and the Century Company, but mainly with Messrs. Putnam. They issue all the works just mentioned, as well as his "American Ideals and Other Essays, Social and Personal," which is of special interest at the present moment. He also contributed the volume on New York to Messrs. Longman's "Historic Towns Series." His latest book is his "Oliver Cromwell" (Constable), the special interest of which—as Mr. Frederic Harrison remarked at the time—lies in the fact the author has opportunities for judging the career of the Protector "from a practical experience such as none of the previous biographers (and hardly Mr. Morley himself) have possessed." The following is a list of the President's principal publications:—"The Naval War of 1812," 1882; "Hunting Trips of a Ranchman," 1885; "Life of Thomas Hart Benton," 1886; "Life of Gouverneur Morris," 1887; "Ranch Life and the Hunting Trail," 1888; "The Winning of the West," 1889-95; "New York," 1891; "The Wilderness Hunter," 1893; "American Ideals," 1898; "The Rough Riders," 1899; "Oliver Cromwell," 1900. He is to be part author of the Deer Family in "The American Sportsman's Library" (Macmillans).

The first of Messrs. J. M. Dent's new season's children's books will be a new edition of "Grimm's Fairy Tales," edited by Marian Edwards, with illustrations by R. Anning Bell. They have a new series of little books for young children, entitled "The Bairn Books," to be opened with "A Farm Book" and "A Book of Days," illustrated by Charles Robinson. The same publishers, with their usual enterprise in embarking on series of reprints, announce "The Cloister Library," a new series to contain a selection of works of a meditative character. The first volume will contain Sir Arthur Helps' "Cloister and the Crowd" and "Companions of my Solitude." This will be followed by St. Teresa's "Way of Perfection," with a prefatory note by Dr. Alexander Whyte; and other volumes will be Crashaw's Poems, Coleridge's "Aids to Reflection," the Letters of St. Francis of Sales, Herbert's "Temple," The "Spiritual Exercises" of St. Ignatius of Loyola, and selections from Dora Greenwell's Writings.

"Scottish Men of Letters of the Eighteenth Century" is a volume which Messrs. A. and C. Black have in preparation, by the Rev. Henry Grey Graham, whose "Social Life of Scotland in the Eighteenth Century" has just reached its third (revised) edition. It refers also to Women of Letters to whom Scotland is indebted, such as Mrs. Cockburn, Lady Anne Barnard, Lady Nairn, and others. Messrs. Black also have an illustrated volume of travel in the South Seas, entitled "Sunshine and Surf," written by Douglas B. Hall and Lord Albert Osborne; and "Human Nature and Morals, According to Auguste Comte," with notes illustrative of the principles of Positivism, by Dr. John Kells Ingram.

Messrs. Archibald Constable and Co. will publish this autumn Mr. P. E. Newberry's "Foreign Tributaries of Thothmes III.," his second memoir on the great tomb of Rekhmara at Thebes, and also an "Introduction to the Study of Egyptian Scarabs" by the same author, illustrated by over a thousand specimens. Messrs. Constable will also shortly have ready "English Coronation Records," edited by Leopold G. Wickham Legg, with many illustrations and a long [illegible]

J. Guthrie, sometime editor of "The Elf," viz. of Edgar Allan Poe," in six quarterly parts, pri eighteenth century manner," and the first thre "Brownie Series," little square volumes in "The Rainbow Garden," from the same volume of stories and drawings by Miss Gra niece of Charles Kingsley.

The fresh items in the new list of books i the Clarendon Press include "The Lay of Hav edited by Dr. Skeat; Volume IV. (Latin Work Complete Works of John Gower," edited by G "The Works of John Lyly," edited by R. "The Troubadours of Dante," by H. J. Chay German Prose Composition," by E. Ehrke; " spondence of Thomas Cromwell, Earl of Essex," man; "The Welsh Wars of Edward the First," "The Memoirs of Bishop Burnet," derived Harl. MS. 6584, Bodleian Add. MSS. D. edited with Notes and a Prefatory Essay on History, by Miss H. F. Foxcroft; "Εἰσαγωγή J. Cook Wilson, M.A.; "Selections from Platonists," edited by E. T. Campagnac, M.A.

"Dragons of the Air," by Prof. H. G. (from Messrs. Methuen), is a popular history of able flying animals which ever lived.

"Mastersingers: Appreciations of Music a is the title of a new musical book to be publi by Mr. William Reeves, including an Essay on The author is Mr. Filson Young.

Messrs. Dent inform us that the co-operati Hazlitt, grandson of the critic, has been obtaine coming edition of Hazlitt, and he has put at t store of portraits.

THEOLOGICAL ANNOUNCEMENTS.—Messrs. publishing among other religious works: "O and Modern Ritualism," by the Rev. F. Meyric firmation and Communion of Infants and Young the Rev. H. Holloway, with a preface by Vi "A Thousand Things to say in Sermons," by the Corbett; "Religious and Social Work amongst Lucy Freeman; a new volume of sermons for Canon Skrine; "The Coronation Service," incl and order of the service as used at the Coro Victoria, by the Rev. J. H. Pemberton; and la "Sermons for the Coronation," by various prea a selection of Coronation hymns and tunes, incl verse for the National Anthem.

Apart from the new work by Dr. Spence on "Ea and Paganism" already referred to in Lite Cassell announce an important volume on "The of the Redeemer," by various writers, including Gloucester, Dr. Lefroy, Dr. Croswell Doane, Bis U.S.A., and Principal Fairbairn. They are al newly-illustrated edition of the "Child's Bibl also be issued in twelve monthly parts, beginning Messrs. Macmillan's announcements for thei logical Library are:—"The Brahmo Samaj an in their Bearing upon Christianity: A Study in by Frank Lillingston, M.A., Lecturer in Heb History at Selwyn College, Cambridge; "H siastical Polity," Book V., edited by the Rev. "Laud's Controversy with Fisher," edited by Simpkinson; "Sermons," by the Rev. H. C. B Earliest Gospel: A Historico-Critical Commenta According to St. Mark," by Professor Allan Luke the Prophet," by Dr. Edward Carus Selw Credibility of the Book of the Acts of the Hulsean Lectures for 1899-1 by the Preside College, Cambridge; while from America, in the

the same press—the new edition of "Nova Legenda Angliæ," in two volumes, re-edited by Dr. Carl Horstman. The text is based on the printed edition of Wynkyn de Worde (1516), and includes much fresh material. The first part of Dr. Stockoe's "Manual of the Four Gospels" will also be published shortly.

Messrs. Methuen announce "An Old Testament History," by Dr. G. W. Wade, Tutor at Lampeter College. The next volume in their Library of Devotion will be "The Song of Songs," being a volume of selections from St. Bernard, edited by Mr. B. Blaxland.

On October 11 Messrs. Methuen will publish Dr. A. Robertson's "Regnum Dei"—the Bampton Lectures of 1901, reviewing historically the main interpretations of the teaching of Christ. Next month they will issue a life of Bishop Butler by the Rev. W. A. Spooner in their series of "Leaders of Religion."

Messrs. A. and C. Black announce "A Historic View of the New Testament," by Dr. Percy Gardner—a volume containing the lectures delivered by the author on the new Jowett foundation in London. The views set forth by the writer are the same as those maintained in his "Exploratio Evangelica," of which these lectures may be regarded as a summary adapted for more general circulation. The same publishers are preparing a new life of Christ ("The Story of Stories"), written for children by the Rev. R. C. Gillie, and illustrated by famous pictures.

The next volume of Messrs. Putnam's "International Handbooks to the New Testament" will be Dr. Orello Cone's work on the "Epistles to the Hebrews, Colossians, Ephesians, and Philemon, the Pastoral Epistles, the Epistles of James, Peter, and Jude," with a sketch of the Canon of the New Testament. Other theological books from Messrs. Putnam include "The Christ Ideal," by Horatio W. Dresser; "The Doom of Dogma and the Dawn of Truth," by the Rev. Henry Frank; and "The Passing and the Permanent in Religion," by Dr. Minot Savage, author of "Life Beyond Death."

Books to look out for at once.

"The Edinburgh Folio Shakespeare." Part I. Edited by W. E. Henley. Grant Richards.
[The first part of the new Shakespeare, printed at Edinburgh by Messrs. Constable. The cost of each part (there are to be forty parts altogether, paged to make ten volumes) is 5s. n., but the work is sold only in complete sets.]

"Hubert von Herkomer, R.A.: A Study and a Biography." By A. S. Baldry. Bell and Son. £3 3s. n.
[With Photogravure Plates, &c., and Binding designed by Professor Herkomer.]

"Arts Under Arms: An University Man in Khaki." By Maurice Fitzgibbon, Moderator in Classics, Trinity College, Dublin, late of Forty-fifth Company (Irish Hunt Contingent) Imperial Yeomanry. Illustrated. Longmans. 5s. n.

"Pictures of War." By John Stuart. Constable. 7s. 6d.
[A Boer War Book. Maps and Plans.]

"Glories of Spain." By Charles W. Wood, F.R.G.S. Macmillan. Illustrated.

"The Spanish Settlements within the Present Limits of the United States, 1513-1561." By Woodbury Lowery. Putnam. 12s. 6d.

"Old Dutch Towns and Villages of the Zuider Zee." By W. J. Tuin and J. G. Veldheer. Illustrated. Fisher Unwin. 21s.

"With the Flag at Sea." By Walter Wood. Constable. 6s. Illustrated by H. C. Seppings Wright.

"The Lost of the Masai." By Sidney Langford Hinde, H.M. Collector British East Africa Protectorate, and Hildegarde Hinde. Illustrated. Heinemann. 15s.

"Dragons of the Air." By Professor H. G. Seeley. Methuen. 6s.
[A popular history of the extinct species of flying animals. Illus.]

"Famous Violinists of To-Day and Yesterday" and "Famous Pianists of To-Day and Yesterday." By Henry C. Lahee. Putnam. 6s. each. Illustrated.

"Owen Glyndywr, the National Hero of Wales." By Arthur G. Bradley. Putnam. 5s.
["Heroes of the Nations" Series. Illustrated.]

"Heroes of the Nineteenth Century." By G. Barnett Smith. Vol. III. Pearson. 5s.

"From the Heart of the Rose: Letters on Things Natural, Things Serious,

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINT

ART.

FRANCESCO RAIBOLINI Called Francia Great Masters in Painting an By G. C. Williamson. 8×5½. 160 pp. Bell. 5s. n

THE STUDY AND CRITICISM OF ITALIAN ART By B. Berenson 9 Bell 10s 6d

DUTCH PAINTERS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. Vol IV Rouman 12½×9½. 248 pp. Sampson Low £2 2s n.

BIOGRAPHY.

SOME RECOLLECTIONS OF JEAN INGELOW AND HER EARLY 7½×5. 168 pp. Wells Gardner. 3s. 6d.
[See Review, p. 283.]

APOLLONIUS OF TYANA The Philosophic Reformer of the First G. R. S. Mead 9½×6. 159 pp. The Theosophical Publishing Company

THE QUEEN'S COMRADE. The Life and Times of Sarah, Duchess of By F. Molloy Two vols., 8½×5½. 658 pp. Hutchinson. 24s. n.

THE DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY Supplementary vo Ed. by Sidney Lee. 9½×6½. 430+462 pp. Smith, Elder. 15s. each
[See Review, p. 227]

THE CHILDHOOD OF QUEEN VICTORIA. Mrs Gerald Gurne 238 pp. Nisbet. 6s.
[Contains some unpublished correspondence between the Duchess o the Bishops of London and Lincoln and new matter relative to the Queen

BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.

THE BEDTIME BOOK. By Mrs. E. Ames 8½×10. 100 pp Grant Richar

MOTHER HOLDA STORIES. By Edith H. Scott. 7½×5. 150 pp Allen

HOW THE DREAMS CAME TRUE. By the Author of "When the Sw Again. 7½×5. 192 pp. Religious Tract Society 2s

TREGGS TRIUMPH. By Evelyn Everett-Green. 7½×5. 192 pp. R.T
[A story of the struggles between master and men in the early days of

ANTHONY CRAGG'S TENANT By Agnes Giberne. 7½×5. 256 pp
[Cragg is a furniture dealer.]

MORE ABOUT PEGGY. By Mrs. G. De H. Vaizey. 7½×5. 287 pp R.T

EDUCATIONAL.

POEMS OF LONGFELLOW (Black's Literature Series.) 6½×4½. 96 pp

ENGLISH HISTORY FROM ORIGINAL SOURCES. 1307-1326. (Black Series.) By N. L. Frazer 7×4½. 128 pp. Black. 2s. 6d.

JULIUS CÆSAR. (Black's School Shakespeare.) Ed. by L. W. Lyde. 7 Black. 1s. n

CÆSAR, GALLIC WAR I.-III. (Classical Texts.) Ed by J. M. Hardwic 171 pp. Blackwood 1s 6d.

JOHN BULL, His Origin and Character, and Other Papers on Education By 7½×5. 78 pp. Allen. 5d n.

FICTION.

THE ROMANCE OF A HILL STATION, and Other Stories. By "Valeri 149 pp. Unwin 2s 6d.
[Short Stories of Anglo-Indian Society.]

UNPROFESSIONAL TALES. By Norman 7½×5½. 248 pp. Unwin 6s [Stories and Scenes partly from real life, partly fanciful.]

BY FANCY LED. By Leslie Keith. 8×5½. 296 pp H. Marshall. 3s 6d
[A modern English love story.]

THE TRIUMPH OF HILARY BLACKLAND By R. Mitford. 7½ Chatto and Windus 6s
[A tale of the Matabele war.]

HERB OF GRACE. By Rosa N. Carey 7½×5½. 484 pp. Macmillan. 6s

MEMORY STREET. By Martha Baker Dunn. 7½×5½. 312 pp. Jarrold
[A Story of New England life and character, by an American authoress

THE FOURTH ESTATE By A. P. Valdes. Trans by Rachel Chall 461 pp Grant Richards 6s
[The scene is in Spain. The story contains the quarrels of two editor

YOUTH GOES A-MARKETING. By J. A. Pearce. 7½×5½. 342 pp. All [Cornish mining.]

HEARTS IN REVOLT. By H. Gilbert. 7½×5½. 357 pp. Allen. 6s.
[Lower middle-class life in London in the early seventies depicting th young man against religion, loved by a girl who is torn by her love for h sense of religious duty.]

ONE OF THE RED SHIRTS. A Story of Garibaldi's men. By H. Hayen 368 pp. Nisbet. 6s.

STEPHEN CALINARI. By Julian Sturgis. 7½×5½. 377 pp. Constabl
[Some of the chapter headings are "In Summer Term," "To the Gay Start for Stamboul," "In Fight and Fever," "At a Political Meetin Cathedral City."]

DEBCLAVEL. By Mary E. Palgrave. 8×5½. 392 pp. Religious T 3s. 6d. [England two hundred years ago.]

DAUNTLESS. By E. Martin. 7½×5½. 305 pp. Pearson. 6s.
[A story of the time of the Civil War.]

A STOLEN OBERON. By Charles Dawson. 7½×5½. 297 pp. Dawson

MISCELLANEOUS.

HOW TO REMEMBER. By E. H. MILNE. 7½×5. 278 pp. Warne. 2s. 6d.
[A clear and practical examination of the memory, its helps and its difficulties, and of the proper use to be made of "Systems."]

CEREMONIES AND PROCESSIONS OF THE CATHEDRAL CHURCH OF SALISBURY. Ed. by C. WORDSWORTH. 9×6. 227 pp. Cambridge University Press. 15s. n.

THE AMERICAN INVADERS. Their Plans, Tactics, and Progress. By F. A. MCKENZIE. 8×5. 126 pp. H. W. Nell. 6d.
[Letters from the Daily Mail showing how America is wresting from us our commercial supremacy.]

THE LIBRARY. Vol. I. New Series. Ed. by J. Y. W. MACALISTER. 10×6½. 461 pp. Kegan Paul. 12s. n.

THE "GOTHENBURG" EXPERIMENTS AND PUBLICHOUSE TRUSTS. By J. ROWNTREE and A. SHERWELL. 8×5½. 176 pp. Hodder and Stoughton. 2s. 6d.
[A detailed examination of the methods and results of the few experiments already made towards the elimination of private profit in publichouse management, with summary of the conclusions arrived at in the authors' previous book, "The Temperance Problem and Social Reform." The information thus compactly given is indispensable to all interested in the question.]

A MOTLEY CREW. By MRS. G. W. STEVENS. 7½×5½. 323 pp. Grant Richards. 6s.
[Reminiscences, observations, and attempts at play writing.]

THE CORONATION SERVICE ACCORDING TO THE USE OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND. By REV. J. H. PEMBERTON. 7½×5. 69 pp. Skeffington. 2s. n.

THE AGE OF CHAUCER, 1346-1400. (Handbooks of English Literature.) By F. J. SNELL. 7×4½. 242 pp. Bell. 3s. 6d.

HANDBOOKS OF PRACTICAL GARDENING. Vol. II. The Book of the Greenhouse. By J. C. TALLOCK. 7½×4½. 103 pp. Lane. 2s. 6d. n.

FABLES AND FOLK-TALES FROM AN EASTERN FOREST. Collected and Translated by W. SKEAT. 8½×7. 92 pp. Cambridge University Press. 7s. 6d.
["Taken down from the lips of the Malay peasantry during the progress of the Cambridge Expedition of 1899." With notes, index, map, and admirable illustrations by F. H. Townsend.]

POETRY.

POEMS. By R. MALLETT. 7½×5. 234 pp. Sonnenschein. 2s. n.

ARROWS. By ALICE F. BERRY. 7½×5. 126 pp. Simpkin, Marshall. 3s. 6d.

FOLIA CADUCA. By R. BEACON. 7½×5½. 120 pp. Nisbet. 2s. 6d.

TESTAMENTS. By JOHN DAVIDSON. No. II. The Testament of Man Forbidd. 9×7. 29 pp. Grant Richards. 6d. n.

ALFRED THE GREAT. A Drama in Three Acts. By E. L. HILL. 7½×4½. 87 pp. Unwin. 2s. 6d. n.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

THE WORKS OF TOBIAS SMOLLETT. Vol. XII.—Miscellanies. Ed. by W. E. HENLEY. 9×5½. 482 pp. Constable. 7s. 6d. n.

DE QUINCEY'S CONFESSIONS OF AN ENGLISH OPIUM EATER. Ed. by J. DUNLOP. 7×4½. 333 pp. Black. 3s. 6d.
[Contains Professor Masson's notes, article on De Quincey from the "Encyclopædia Britannica," and introduction and notes by the editor.]

SCENES FROM CLERICAL LIFE. By GEORGE ELIOT. 6×3½. 644 pp. Lane. 1s. 6d. n.

LOVE POEMS OF LANDOR (The Lovers' Library). 5½×3. 114 pp. Lane. 1s. 6d. n.

THE ODES OF JOHN KEATS. Illus. by R. A. Bell. 6×4½. 42 pp. Bell. 1s. 6d. n.

CASA GUIDI WINDOWS. By ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING. Ed. by A. Mary Robinson. 6¾×4½. 88 pp. Lane. 2s. n.

THE ETHICS OF FREE THOUGHT, and Other Addresses. By K. PEARSON, F.R.S. 2nd Ed. Revised. 9½×5½. 421 pp. Black. 7s. 6d. n.

DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI. An Illustrated Memorial of his Art and Life. By H. C. MARILLIER. 2nd Ed. 15×9. 171 pp. Bell. £2 2s. n.

HORACE AT CAMBRIDGE. By OWEN SEAMAN. New Ed. 7×4½. 100 pp. Lane. 3s. 6d. n.

SCIENCE.

USE-INHERITANCE. Illustrated by Direction of Hair on the Bodies of Animals. By W. KIDD, M.D. 8½×5½. 47 pp. Black. 2s. 6d. n.

A TREATISE ON ZOOLOGY. Part IV. Ed. by E. RAY LANKESTER. 9½×6. 204 pp. Black. 15s. n.

THEOLOGY.

A THOUSAND THINGS TO SAY IN SERMONS. By REV. F. ST. JOHN CORBETT. 7½×5½. 249 pp. Skeffington. 5s.

ON THE PATH OF PROGRESS, or the National Church and a needed Forward Movement. By H. L. JACKSON. 8×5½. 96 pp. Stock. 2s. 6d.
[Revised sermons appealing for a broader basis for Anglican thought and practice, sincere but not strikingly original.]

THE EARLIEST GOSPEL. A Historical Study of the Gospel According to St. Mark. By A. MENZIES, D.D. 9×6. 208 pp. Macmillan. 8s. 6d. n.

THE ETHICS OF JUDAISM. Part I. By M. LAZARUS, Ph.D. Trans. by Henrietta Szold. 7½×5. 300 pp. Macmillan. 3s. 6d. n.

THE HEARTS OF MEN. By H. FIELDING. 9×6. 324 pp. Hurst and Blackett. 10s. 6d. n.
[The interest of this book which the author thought of calling "What is the meaning of Religion?" is largely autobiographical. Mr. Fielding has written many successful books about Burma and the East. . . . He has been impressed with the divorce between Christian doctrine and practice, and among the lonely hills of Burma he was led to reflect on the origins of religion. His main thesis is that creeds vary according to the religious instincts of different peoples, and he has much that is suggestive to say in comparing Christianity and Buddhism, and in discussing their psychological origins.]

BY THE RIVERS OF AFRICA. From Cape Town to Uganda. By ANNIE R. BUTLER.

CHESS.

Address "Chess": LITERATURE, Printing House

PROBLEM No. 233, by M. DONABELLI, Italy.

BLACK. 11 pieces.

WHITE. 13 pieces.
White to play and mate in two moves.

PROBLEM
K. FR

BLACK.

WHITE
White to play and

PROBLEM No. 235, by J. Schwers.—White: K R 2; B at Q B 2 and K R 4; Kt at Q 4; pawns at K 3. Black (4 pieces)—K at K R 4; Q at Q B 2 and K 2. White to play and win.

NOTES AND NEWS.—At the recent meeting Chess Association there was a suggestion of a Holland and London, and the proposal is now b the British C. C. Hertfordshire is one of the stirred up to form a Chess Association.—It is s in Europe next year, Mr. Pillsbury will ent tournaments, including Monte Carlo, Hanover, is reported on good authority that he has Lasker; but the match is evidently far away A New South Wales championship tournam recently, leaders being J. K. Christenson an Mr. Christenson won the championship tourney of Arts Club.—Mr. A. F. Mackenzie (Jamaic has won many prizes recently in problem comp

GAME No. CI.—Played by correspondence two years:—

QUEEN'S PAWN GAME.

	WHITE. F. England (Stockholm).	BLACK. J. Fillitzius (Gothenburg).		WHITE F. Englund (Stockholm).
1.	P–Q 4	P–Q 4	28.	Kt–Q 2
2.	Kt–K B 3	Kt–K B 3	29.	Kt–Kt 3
3.	P–K 3	P–B 4	30.	Q–R 3
4.	P–Q Kt 3	P–K 3	31.	Kt–Q 2
5.	B–Q 3	Kt–B 3	32.	Kt–B 4 (c)
6.	B–Kt 2 (a)	B–Q 2	33.	Q–Kt 2
7.	P–Q R 3	Q B–B sq	34.	Kt–K 5
8.	Q Kt–Q 2	P–Q P	35.	Kt×P (d)
9.	P×P	B–Q 3	36.	B×P
10.	Kt–K 5	Castles	37.	Q×P
11.	P–K B 4	Kt–K 2	38.	Q–Kt 3
12.	Q–K 2	Kt–K sq	39.	R–K 7 ch
13.	Castles	P–B 3	40.	P–Q 5
14.	Q Kt–B 3 (b)	P–K Kt 3	41.	B–Q 4
15.	Kt–B	Q–Kt	42.	R×R ch
16.	P–Kt 3	Kt–K 3	43.	Q–K 3
17.	K B–K sq	B–Kt sq	44.	B×Kt
18.	P–B 4	Kt–B 3	45.	P–B 6
19.	P–Q B 5	Q R–K sq	46.	P–Q 6
20.	P–Q Kt 4	B–B 2	47.	Q×R
21.	P–Kt 5	Kt–Q sq	48.	Q×Kt
22.	Q–Q B 2	Kt–B 4	49.	K–Kt sq
23.	P–Q R 4	Q–B sq	50.	Q–K 6 ch
24.	K–R sq	B–Kt 2	51.	Q–Q B 6
25.	Q–Kt 2*	Kt–K 2	52.	Q–Kt 6 ch
26.	B–K 2	Q–Q 2	53.	Q–Q 5
27.	Q B–K sq	K–B 2		White

(a) Or P–Q B 3, to prevent Kt–Kt 5, by which Black might exchange Kt for B.

(b) Of course intending, if P×Kt, 13. B×P ch, &c. Or (4. P×Kt: 15. B P×P. Kt–B 4. 16. P×B, Kt×P (Q 6): 17. Q R–Q sq, with a good game.

BLACK.

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 26. SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1901.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

NOTES OF THE DAY 289, 290, 291

"LITERATURE" PORTRAITS.—XXI.—Paul and Victor Margueritte 291

AUSTRALIAN VERSE TO-DAY.—A "Personal View," by A. W. Jose 293

THE MILLENARY OF KING ALFRED 294

CRABBE'S ALDEBURGH, by Francis Gribble 295

THE CREATOR OF "JACK HARKAWAY" 298

THE DRAMA.—"Iris," by A. B. Walkley 298

CURRENT LITERATURE—

King Monmouth 299

Mary Queen of Scots, and Who Wrote the Casket Letters? 300

Magic and Religion 301

Transactions of the Bibliographical Society—A Book Bound for Mary Queen of Scots—The Testament of a Man Forbid—How to Write an Essay—Essays, Descriptive and Biographical—Russian Self-Thought—The Idler out of Doors—An Artist's Walks in Bible Lands—The Child at Home 300, 302, 303

The Devastators—The Luck of the Vails—Catherine of Calais—Bagsby's Daughter—The Snares of the World—The Lady of Lynn—Mr. Bernard Brown—The Millionaire Mystery—A Vanished Rival—The World's Finger—Madt—The Ghost of Tintern Abbey—The Octopus—Cash is King—A Daughter of the Veldt—Derwent's Horse—The Lost Regiment—The Coward—The Bread Line—Two Girls and a Dream—The Story of Roger King—A Son of Mammon—The Gold that Perisheth—Souls of Passage—The Maid of Maidenlane—Must Yield to Win—Ira Lorraine—My Silver Spoons—Caroline—The Death of the Gods—A Woman Derelict—From the Land of the Shamrock—A Union of Hearts—Marr'd in Making—On Peter's Island—Zilgrahof—The Lost Key—The Vicar of St. Luke's—John Jones, Curate—The Awakening of Anthony Weir—The Manse Gate—Master and Slave—God's Rebel—The Temptress—Her Ladyship's Secret—Impertinent Dialogues—Red Fate—Real Life—The Innocents on the Broads 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for 308, 309

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS 309, 310

NOTES OF THE DAY.

Next week we shall publish, as in previous years, a Supplement containing a full list, classified according to subjects, of the Publishers' Autumn Announcements.

The LITERATURE PORTRAIT for next week will be one of special interest. The writer whose portrait will be presented to our readers will be

MR. ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE.

The likeness is a highly characteristic one, and has, like others in our series of portraits of living authors, been specially taken for Literature. It will be reproduced in photogravure, and will thus be well suited to form a framed picture for the library. In order to avoid delay, orders for this portrait should

"Memoirs and Letters of Sir James Paget." Ed. Paget. (Longmans.)

"The Sovereane Herbe. A History of Tobacco." By Penn. (Grant Richards.)

"King Monmouth." By Allan Fea. (Lane.)

"The Just and the Unjust." By Richard Bagot. (L

"Glories of Spain." By Charles W. Wood. (Macmi

"From the Heart of the Rose." By Helen Milman.

"Master of Men." By E. Phillips Oppenheim. (Me

"The Giant's Gate." By Max Pemberton. (Cassell

"Arts under Arms." By M. Fitzgibbon. (Longman

"War Notes." By Colonel D. Villebois Marcuil. (

"Pictures of War." By J. Stuart. (Constable.)

* * * *

We have noted elsewhere the success of t Millenary celebrations at Winchester, and have gi Mayor the credit which he so thoroughly merits. But the interesting historical address that he gave on t Hyde Abbey he allowed his wishes somewhat t probabilities, if not facts. In 1788 the site of the gre of Hyde Abbey was selected as an appropriate plac detention of felons. The notes then taken on the sp Howard and communicated to the Society of A (Archæologia XIII.) rendered it exceedingly probabl coffins and the dust of Alfred, his queen, and his so the Elder were then destroyed and scattered. Mr threw just ridicule on a local antiquary who dug in place in 1863 and found a skull which he labelled " but yet he seems to think the illustrious remains are and advocates extensive research. If perchance they beneath the sod—an almost impossible surmise—may be left in peace? And will it not suffice to erect ther as suggested by the Mayor, and merely to inscribe, " spot rested the remains of Alfred"?

Concerning another particular in the same adl Bowker will pardon us for offering a comment. We show him to read Mr. Round's masterly criticism of t Domesday Survey, as recently put forth in the fir of the Victoria County History of that shire. He will that the ordinarily accepted view of the Conqueror's t of Hyde Abbey is a greatly exaggerated one.

* * * *

Many visitors, especially Americans, repaired to th Museum last week, on the day that the King Alfred proceedings opened, to see the exhibition of Alfre An admirable little catalogue was prepared, which much credit on the Museum authorities, and was sold

We have received from Mr. Heinemann Mr. W. Nicholson's fine portrait of the late President McKinley, which many people will like to possess at the present moment. It was drawn in 1900, and is in the artist's well-known style of black massed shadows carried over every unnecessary detail. We do not think it the happiest of Mr. Nicholson's pictures, but there is a strength and dignity about it which grows upon the spectator, and its method lends itself to a telling reproduction of the vigour and determination which characterized the lower part of the late President's countenance.

* * * *

We are glad to hear that Mrs. Pinwell, the widow of the late George J. Pinwell, the artist, has been granted a Civil List Annuity of £75 a year. No small share in this result is due to the efforts of Dr. G. C. Williamson, who wrote the book published by Messrs. Bell last year upon Pinwell, and drew the attention of the public to the condition in which, owing to the failure of the Liberator Companies, his widow has been left. Mr. J. W. North, A.R.A., Mr. E. J. Gregory, A.R.A., and many other artists also made constant efforts on behalf of Mrs. Pinwell.

* * * *

What will in future be the only complete edition of "The Dolly Dialogues" will be published, at six shillings, next week by Messrs. Nisbet. It will contain several new dialogues; will be illustrated by Mr. Howard Chandler Christy; and will appear in two bindings—one similar to that adopted for most of Mr. Anthony Hope's novels, and the other in a new and special design.

* * * *

Mr. George Allen has a volume of "Two Plays" by Maurice Maeterlinck in hand, as well as his new volume of essays. The plays are "Sister Beatrice" and "Ardiane and Bluebeard," translated by Bernard Miall.

* * * *

It was announced that the autobiography of the anonymous and exiled author of "The Martyrdom of an Empress," which Messrs. Harper are about to publish, would be illustrated. The portraits, &c., have, however, been withdrawn at the writer's request, lest they should lead to her identification. The new book, which is entitled "The Tribulations of a Princess," contains an account of the writer's career at different European Courts, and contains many intimate recollections of various ruling Sovereigns.

* * * *

The "Letters of John Richard Green," edited by Mr. Leslie Stephen, will be published shortly by Messrs. Macmillan. The letters form in reality a biography, since Mr. Stephen has furnished introductory narratives for which information has been supplied by Mrs. Green.

* * * *

Details are forthcoming of the "Illustrated History of English Literature," by Dr. Garnett and Mr. Edmund Gosse (Heinemann). In one type there will be a consecutive history of English literature from Anglo-Saxon times to our own day, and in a different type a biography of each author will be supplied, with at least one characteristic quotation. The volumes will be illustrated by portraits, many of them [illegible]

Professor Goldwin Smith has promised a don[illegible] to Toronto University, as a tribute to King Alfre[illegible] of his old University of Oxford.

It is stated that the Dowager Duchess [illegible] engaged in writing the memoirs of the late Duke, [illegible] will probably be published during the next few mo[illegible]

We regret to hear of the death of Sir Edward [illegible] Tuesday. Besides editing the Globe edition [illegible] d'Arthur," Sir Edward was the Author of "Thes[illegible] and Politics," "Miracles and Science," "Jewish [illegible] Politics," "Talk at a Country House," and [illegible] Hamlet.

Sir Rennell Rodd, who is hardly less well k[illegible] than as a diplomatist, is shortly to take up h[illegible] Rome as First Secretary of the British Embassy.

The Hon. Francis Lawley, who died suddenly [illegible] week, was born in 1825. He went through the [illegible] War as special correspondent of The Times, and [illegible] been a member of the staff of the Daily Telegraph.

Mr. Marion Crawford's play, written for Sar[illegible] on Francesca da Rimini, will be translated by M. M[illegible] who made the French version of Hamlet for Sarah [illegible]

Miss Louise Imogen Guiney is at work on a [illegible] Hurrell Froude.

Miss Corelli has offered a number of man[illegible] belonged to her stepfather, Dr. Charles Mackay, [illegible] man Library at Perth, of which town he was a nat[illegible]

Mr. W. M. Crook, at one time the editor of [illegible] met with a serious accident on the Théodule G[illegible] Injuries are not so serious as was at first believed.

An Australian circulating library reports th[illegible] easily heads the list in point of popularity wit[illegible] Bulwer Lytton and Sir Walter Scott come next, w[illegible] though fourth, is not far ahead of Captain Marry[illegible] Lever.

Mr. William Michael Rossetti, editor fifty-[illegible] of the Germ, entered his seventy-third year las[illegible] and Mr. Sidney Cooper, R.A., was ninety-eight la[illegible]

* * *

SEPTEMBER.

As one who lieth on a bed of death,
And knowing in truth that he hath soon t[illegible]
For months and months in silent dream de[illegible]
And mind grown clear, his whole life pondere[illegible]
And sees it fade before him like a breath
That smokes a glass, so thou, hushed mont[illegible]
The whole year's memories in thy quiet g[illegible]
Of inward thought that no speech uttereth.

Here, haply, musing by thy silent fields,
Thy ripened woods, thy brown, shorn harv[illegible]
And hazy hillsides, he who seeks may find
The sort of soul he is, and at thy doors

But he had a sympathy, a sense of beauty, and a power of drawing the sort of picture that lingers in the memory which forbid the just judge to non-suit him on the strength of his "Psalm of Life." His most popular work is often bad; but his best work is very good, and it is a sound rule of criticism that the best work must decide the verdict. The rule is the more worth repeating because an American critic, Professor Triggs of Chicago, has just been setting the literary circles of the United States by the ears by some remarks about Longfellow which suggest excommunication by bell, book, and candle. And the interest of those remarks lies in the fact that they judge Longfellow by a standard that Longfellow never attempted to conform to, and proceed to lay down a number of rules for the guidance of American poets in general. It is a case of Chicago getting hold of culture and telling it what tune to hum. There must be nothing "feudal" or "traditional" about that tune. It must be inspired by "the sweep of the prairie winds and the whirl and jar of this industrial age." It must express the "roughness, bareness, and uncouthness" of the Americans. Such is the Ars Poetica, edited, revised, and brought down to date by Professor Triggs of Chicago; and the observations which it suggests to us are various. The first is that we do not see any reason why Americans should wish to be any more bare and rough and uncouth than they can help. For them, as for other people, progress has consisted, not in cultivating uncouthness, but in getting away from it. Their poets, as might have been expected, have got further away from it than their cow-boys. Their Mr. Joaquin Miller, whose flowing locks and weird sombrero made him the lion of a London season, was the last of their poets who was uncouth to any extent worth speaking of; and we have heard that even he is uncouth no longer. Our second remark is that the notions of Professor Triggs are not new notions, but were worked out, long ago, by Walt Whitman, as was pointed out in the appreciation of Walt Whitman's work lately contributed to our columns by Mr. Lacon Watson. Walt Whitman deliberately repudiated everything that he regarded as "feudal," and deliberately set himself to express his contemporaneous United States. The result is something like the catalogue of a jumble sale, occasionally redeemed, indeed, by flashes of genius, and also by occasional throwbacks to the despised "feudal" methods. For which reason, as well as for other reasons, we conclude that Professor Triggs is sadly led astray by the pride of patriotism when he exhorts the American poets to burn their boats and bridges, and live on the country instead of maintaining their line of communications with the old world. For the American is not a poor Indian with an untutored mind, or any other sort of wild man of the woods. His status is that of the heir of all the ages who happens to have gone West. He may have learnt something by going West—though it is from the East that wisdom has always come. As a sacred poet he has learnt, as we once pointed out in a review of an anthology, to be more at his ease in Zion than the Eastern poets—even to the point, if one may so put it, of putting up his legs on the mantelpiece. But he has learnt nothing there which entitles him to dispense with the wisdom of the East in the writing of poetry any more than in the building of houses or in the cooking of food. Otherwise, he would have to begin at the bottom of the ladder, and would take a very long time to climb it. And that, of course, is what American poets know. Their writings may be influenced by their prairies and forests—as were the writings of Châteaubriand before any American literature worth mentioning existed, but they are

Literature Portraits.—XX

PAUL and VICTOR MARGUERI

Instances of collaboration on the part of br frequent enough in modern French literature. At the list stands the notable instance of the Goncour which recalls a series of works of profound obser brilliant style sprung from an intellectual union severed only by death. Closer to our own day writers, the brothers Rosny, have so combined their li and their talent as to achieve a perfect union, and reads "Nell Horn," that penetrating study of Engl "Vamireh," the romance of prehistoric man, would s duality of authorship. A third example of a similar tion has for some years held the public attention by able literary product—that of Messieurs Paul a Margueritte.

Unlike the Goncourts, these writers did not début in the world of letters simultaneously. Paul M entered it some years before his brother. The son Margueritte, who met a hero's death on the field of S Margueritte owed to his father, who was in his time able writer, much valuable guidance. The infancy brothers was passed in Algeria, where their father was They learnt at an early age to love the beautiful and p aspects of that country—the white Arab quarters, th and the blue sky, the stern beauty of Mount Atlas a forests. From his earliest youth Paul was nervous a sionable. To his passionate study of writers such a and Zola must be traced the gloomy outlook upon marks his earlier writings; it led him also to attentive, and pessimistic study of modern life.

His story "Tous Quatre" is a work frankly violent, and crude in form, and savouring of cynicis same time he produced a work of an entirely diff which shows at the outset the variety of his talent. It w mime, Pierrot Assassin, which the author himself prese salons of Alphonse Daudet, and which was an interesti to revive the traditional type of the classical make of him a modern personage, reflecting the aspir doubts, the despairs of a young writer. "J'imagin the author himself, "un Pierrot conforme à mon mo esthétique tel que je le sentais, ce fut un être névrose fantomal."

Since these first two works, so different in their M. Paul Margueritte has inclined now to one, now to of the two directions which they indicated. He twofold current, one of exact observation, and the imagination. In the "Force des Choses," "Jours d' there may often be found a happy blending of exact d pression, a certain soaring of the fancy, a suggestion which gives to his talent a strikingly individual In "La Maison Ouverte," "Pascal Géfosse," "Ama Cuirassier bleu," "Ma Grande," he revealed a uniqu gift and the possession of a style at once luxuriant delicate subtleties of expression.

While Paul Margueritte was entering successfull career of letters, while, strong in the protection o on the point of giving it up when Victor offered to write it in his place, and, adapting himself with great skill to the ideas and style of his brother, he wrote over the latter's signature an article which was ready when required, and revealed no evidence of the substitution of another hand. This event, trivial enough at first sight, had a profound influence on the future of Victor Margueritte; it gave him confidence in himself and aroused in his mind the ambition to devote himself henceforth to the career of letters and become something more than an amateur. Paul offered his brother to share with him the fame he had already acquired. They decided that henceforth nothing should appear that was not signed by both names. It must be remembered that Victor had already a distinct personality and accomplishments which promised well for this collaboration. Some of his verses are full of exquisite tenderness in form and in sentiment, such as those in which he describes an evening in Africa.

. . . . Et le soleil descend dans le soir orageux ;
Le parfum est si lourd que le cœur en défaille . . . .
Saturant l'air voilé par l'épaisse chaleur,
On le respire jusqu'au travers des murailles,
Le pénétrant parfum des orangers en fleur.
Des jardins et des bois, du ciel et de la terre Il s'exhale, profond jusqu'à l'écœurement.
Et voilà qu'on sanglote, à ce point solitaire
Que le goût de la mort énivre brusquement.
Il se mêle à l'odeur amère et suffoquante,
Et ce serait vraiment une divine mort,
Se dissoudre à jamais dans cette tiédeur lente,
Dans ce silence parfumé, comme on s'endort.

The first work produced by the collaboration of the two brothers was a collection of children's tales—"Poum," apparently frivolous, in reality conceived in an indisputably philosophical spirit. Such a familiar and simple presentation of great thoughts is a method adopted by some even of the greatest French writers, among them La Fontaine. The Margueritte then devoted their genius for exact analysis to the study of woman at the end of the nineteenth century—that complex and elegant being who moves upon the canvas of Sargent, Boldini, Hellen, and von Glehn—and "Les Femmes Nouvelles" was the result.

The two writers next determined to apply their powers of psychological observation to a much greater subject. It was the moment when Zola had just published "La Débâcle," a work of unquestionable power, but somewhat restricted in its outlook. Zola had selected as types of the French army in 1870 certain soldiers who embodied the virtues and the vices of the trooper. He restricted himself to the special study of these types, showing the effects on them of defeat, and noting the passions, too often the evil passions, which the horrors of war begat in them. He drew only details, true no doubt and well observed, but never general effects.

The two Margueritte took a different point of view. Their aim was not to give a study of certain individuals during the campaign of 1870, but to present the epic and dramatic history of the war; they tried to see not one corner of the fight, but the entire field of battle, the regiments and army corps, not the companies and detachments. Zola, in short, had made a minute easel painting, the Margueritte undertook to produce a great fresco. War, invasion, besieged towns, the Commune, what scenes could be more dramatic? Nothing could be more poignant, more tragic, nothing at the same time of greater true proportion; they penetrated the secrets of str Désastre," the first part of the work, has been follo by "Les Tronçons du Glaive." Apart from their accuracy and truth, both these two works are dist their picturesque quality; the reader will find in the in brilliant diction, the stir, the noise, the colour aspects, at one moment so enthralling, at anothe and tragic, of those battlefields which became massacres so terrible. These two books are so productions of these two writers. Their early laboration were mainly experiments, but here we h a decisive literary and historical achievement.

Edmond de Goncourt has described in his "Mé particular qualities which Jules de Goncourt respectively brought to their fraternal collabo brothers Margueritte have shown themselves unwi any such revelations, either in writing or in Yet an important psychological document may en this subject. It is the recent portrait, exhibited in 1901, where the painter, M. Anquetin, has represe writers at their table, with a picturesque military and by studying the faithful representation, which t given us of his subjects, we see something of the me of the brothers Margueritte, and we can learn t part which each would play in the work of collabora Margueritte (who appears on the left of the pictu strongly marked keen features, his resolute and glance, appears as a man of action, one who would a subject heart and soul with the determination while Paul Margueritte, more conscious, more refl investigate his theme with more scrupulous cons and bring to the impetuosity of his brother the appreciation which marks his individuality.

Whatever be the qualities which each of thes brings to their common work, that work—and it which matters—has a strong personality as Désastre" and "Tronçons du Glaive" are conce writers are in their full physical and intellectual v have not said their last word, and they have cer give us their "chef-d'œuvre."

HENRI

Paul Margueritte, son of General Auguste Ma
born at Lagherat, Algeria, in 1860. He entered th Minister of Public Instruction, but he soon follo for letters, and rapidly acquired fame as a writer
He has published "Mon Père" (1881, new e
"Tous Quatre" (1885), "Maison Ouverte" (18
Gélosse," mœurs du jour (1887), "Jours d'Épre bourgeoises (1889), "Amants," roman contemp
"La Force des Choses" (1891), "Sur le Retour; Bleu" (1892), "Ma Grande" (1893). Since Margueritte, born in 1866, an officer in the army, ha with his brother, and published with him " Femmes Nouvelles," "Le Désastre," "Les
Glaive." Many of these stories have first app Revue de Paris, which is just publishing a third of their work on the 1870 war. The brothers Marg also in many daily journals. They publish each we or a "chronique" in the Echo de Paris, and also Gaulois. MM. Plon Nourrit et Cie. are the publish MM. Paul and Victor Margueritte's works.

Last Saturday began this year's festival o

AUSTRALIAN VERSE TO-DAY.

A "Personal View."

Thirty years ago and more Adam Lindsay Gordon published in Melbourne his last (and his good) book of ballad-verse—"Bush Ballads and Galloping Rhymes"—which the eager pen of Marcus Clarke exalted into "the beginnings of a national school of Australian poetry." And, partly because Gordon was an ardent horse-lover, partly because his verse was alive and strongly tinged with local colour, Australians accepted their favourite journalist's dictum; though, significantly enough, it was always the racing rhythms of "How we Beat the Favourite" that roused bushmen to enthusiasm rather than the scrub and stockyards of "From the Wreck" or the wattleblossom sentiment of "The Sick Stockrider." These appealed to the new chum, the tourist, the townsman, who straightway (having read Clarke's preface) felt themselves transported into a fantastic and almost legendary land, full of trees without shade and flowers without perfume and flights of cockatoos shrieking like evil souls. So the cult grew, while with Gordon men associated Kendall—Australian indeed, but introspective, inactive, life's victim:

> The world is round me with its heat,
> And toil, and cares that tire;
> I cannot with my feeble feet
> Climb after my desire.

Surely there was never a "national" poet so untypical of his countrymen! And as for Gordon, his verse is Australian just as much and as little as "With Kitchener to Khartoum" is Sudanese or "The Silverado Squatters" American.

But while this cult absorbed the critics, Australians were beginning to speak for themselves. Timidly at first, with avowed imitation of the leaders ordained for them, the young men who did things found voice also. Of the track and the camp-fire songs are born; the primitive emotions run to verse in all climates and among all races. One sits down to write prose; its muse is really sessilis rather than pedestris. The tramp of your horse's feet or your own beats your thought into simple but live rhythm; you hum it to yourself as you go, you chant it—with some bashfulness—to your mates in the evening; presently you think so well of it that it goes by mail (and that way, in Australia, is not as prosaic as it sounds) to seek favour of an editor. And for twenty years there has lived in Sydney, New South Wales, one editor at least with ears on the strain to catch the note of any genuine singer, and a hand to welcome any man who could tell his fellows without cant what things he saw and felt day by day in going about his ordinary business. With the politics of the Bulletin we have nothing to do here; its services to Australian literature are great, and are these—that it has consistently chastened the ambitious writer and exposed the pretentious, but has never refused a hearing or encouragement to any one who had something to say and was knows better the life of small townships and [illegible] unhoping, unending round of the swagman out back claim Dyson; Brady weaves the sailor's chantie verse; Adams interprets New Zealand, more roma his fellows perhaps, and getting not so near the he The earlier comers, Paterson and Lawson, were England as they deserved; since then critics [illegible] tired of this simple verse, and new-comers have b with more or less sarcasm—"another Australian place must be full of them!"

There are, no doubt, reasons for this tired Australian writer is apt to lack judgment an value finished style; the Australian public supposed by its publishers to call) for bulk in most volumes published in Sydney or Melbourne su quence from undue padding. Somehow, when a to the temptation of interpolating his poorer his better, it is always on the padding that t eye lights. Nor can a poet complain of s justice; though he, too, has his excuse, for bookb colonies are few in number, and the author must ap them, to some by style and some by subject and s animal spirits. It is not exactly anybody's fault t fers have been of late judged mainly on their dem it has happened, more's the pity. And if any o why, in this age of minor poets, it is worth while judgments and obtrude again the work of a few singers—well, it is so just for this reason: th minor poets sing of their personal affairs and group from the South Seas is typical and expl home, of its countrymen, of a race that is differen physically and intellectually from the stock islands. One must not raise the question, alw whether their verse is really "literature" in t sense. To the Englishman the best of it will re to the Australian even its crudities are dear, becau the tang of his scented bushlands. Only lite studies with zeal work of all sorts done beyond and for reason of race and training the Channel sev far more sharply than all the oceans. One's own f after all, as well worth understanding as the peo road.

The Australian who writes because it is in h not much of a reader—in the literary sense, that all sorts of journalism, but sustained work of goo not come his way. In expressing the emotions he the world he is apt to follow cheap and shoddy p the only models he has (so that his love-verse, for be either penny plain or twopence very highly c his own ground, however, he talks in altogether diff You open on

> You have crossed my life with your fair sw
> You are filling my lone heart's vacant plac

She dipped her red shafts low in the slush as a spoonbill dips her beak,
The black mud clung to the wheels and fell in the wash of the Wilga creek,
And the big roans fought for footing, and the spreaders threshed like flails,
And the great wheels lifted the muddy spume to the bend of the red float rails,

(Just a dray crossing the five-mile swamps of a flooded creek); or

Where the mulga paddocks are wild and wide,
That's where the pick of the stockmen ride
At the Back o' Bourke!
Under the dust clouds dense and brown,
Moving southward by-track and town,
That's where the Queensland mobs come down
Out at the Back o' Bourke!

or the burden of the shearing song

For the Western creeks are calling,
And the idle days are done,
With the snowy fleeces falling,
And the Queensland sheds begun!

Simple, enough, no doubt: but so Ogilvie stirs his mates. As for Brady and his sailors—

They swung across Newcastle bar
And sou' by east away;
They saw the Cross hung out afar
Below the Milky Way:
They saw the land die down a-lee, and heard the rollers go Across the road, along the road, the road to Callao!

It may not be literature, but it has the lilt:

A mermaid's not a human thing,
An' courtin' sich is folly;
Of flesh and blood I'd rather sing
What ain't so melancholy.
Oh, Berta! Lou! Juanita! Sue!
Here's good luck to me an' you—
Sing rally! ri-a-rally!
The seas is deep: the seas is wide:
But this I'll prove what o'er betide,
I'm bully in our alley!

With such verse the men who are doing much work stir themselves to do more. For the dreamer and the tired man there is verse of other quality:

There was no water in the land,
Deep in the night of each ravine
Men, vainly searching for it, found
Dry hollows in the gaping ground,
Like sockets where clear eyes had been,
Now burnt out with a fiery brand.

The West—the far, unknown, central plains that Leichhardt vanished into, and many a man since—is never far from the dreams of our poets: witness Quinn—

"And how are these wayfarers called,
And whither do they wend?"
The Weary-Hearted—and their road
At sunset hath an end.

"Shed tears for them." . . . Nay, nay, no tears!

I have said little of what I meant to say. been better, perhaps, to do nothing but quote, fo much left out—the work of Paterson and Lawson Stephens, because England knows a little of them of Quinn's and Daley's, and all Brennan's, bec mainly personal and appeal to a smaller audience country; a dozen others, because they write graceful imitations, using Australia merely as an ground for otherwise commonplace figure-drawin may be found, perhaps, for one more singer; for her own feeling for Sydney, Louise Mack echoes the dragging desire of the true Australian towards

Dreaming, I tell you all my tale—
Tell how the tides that wash your fee
Sink through my heart and cut its cords:
Dreaming, I hold my arms, and drag
All, all into my heart—the flag
On the low hill turned harbourwards,

And all the curving little bays,
The hot, dustridden, narrow streets,
The languid turquoise of the sky,
The gardens flowing to the wave,
I drag them in. O City, save
The grave for me where I must lie!

ARTHUR

THE MILLENARY OF KING AL

The national commemoration of the thousandt of the end of Alfred's reign has come and gone Bowker well merits the congratulations that h on the remarkable success attending the whole and of the demonstrations of the Anglo-Saxon race in great founder of England; for without the litera and broad-hearted labours of the Mayor of W celebration might have been easily vulgarized character.

The proposal, at one time made and strongl the national celebration should be held in the happily thwarted; for, as Dr. Garnett recent Winchester, in Alfred's days, was a well establishe London was little better than a marsh. Winches claim to the honour; it was Alfred's ordinary seat of his government, and the place of his burial. tion of the particular year for the demonstra fortunate and more open to criticism. Histor is always to be desired, and yet one result o gatherings will be to rivet in the minds of av speaking folk the idea that Alfred died in grace 901. Whereas the King's death was certain but either in 900 or in 899. We happen t thoroughly trained an historian as Bishop Stubbs by Mr. Stevenson's arguments in the English Hist that the death year was 899.

If the greatest praise is due to Mr. Bowker f and method of the recent three days' festival, gathering together of so remarkable an assembly and representative men, it should not be forg address, Mr. Bowker, who had but just entered the civic Council of Winchester, was first to do what lay in his power to carry out this suggestion, and speedily entered into cordial communication with Mr. Frederic Harrison in the hopes of securing due honour to the memory of the great founder of our national unity. The movement met with much favour both at home and on the other side of the Atlantic, but it has had to encounter a series of sad reverses. The raising of funds and the sustaining of interest in the project were naturally much impeded by the outbreak of the Boer War. Then all else was forgotten in the nation's sorrow for the death of Queen Victoria, accompanied by another great diversion not only of money but of thoughts; and it needed the display of a rare amount of resourceful tact and perseverance on the part of Mr. Bowker and one or two of his zealous supporters to prevent the evaporation of the project. Another severe blow was the death of Sir Walter Besant, who had taken a most lively interest in the matter, reviving on one occasion the flagging interest of the Winchester citizens by a stirring lecture. The date for the meetings of this year had long been fixed for July; but as the time drew nearer, first one important personage and then another pleaded for delay, and the date had somewhat hurriedly to be changed to September. Again, on the very eve of the celebration came the cruel assassination of President McKinley, and there were not wanting those who strongly urged another postponement. The time for the great project was, however, rightly adhered to, with the full assent of the American Minister. Difficulties such as these, with others none the less real because they were of a minor and more local character, would have been sufficient to have crushed many another project; but it was only fitting that they should fail to turn from their purpose those who were intending to perpetuate the memory of a man whose higher qualities were drawn out in the midst of adversity and personal suffering.

Winchester, which was a venerable city when Alfred was a boy, and which preserves to the present day far more of its older features and original plan than any other city of the United Kingdom, was scarcely recognizable last week by those who knew it best. The substantial traces of antiquity were, of course, not overshadowed, but there were few parts that did not blaze with bunting, or blossom out into greenery and flowers. The result was all the more charming, because no common scheme of uniform decoration prevailed. Winchester, in the course of its long and eventful history, has seen many an imposing and historic procession pass through its streets; yet it is safe to say that not only Winchester but London itself has never witnessed so remarkable and in every way distinguished and representative a procession as that which was marshalled last Friday through the streets of the ancient capital of Wessex. It was not only that the gathering was, in the best sense of the term, Imperial and to some extent International in its character, but it represented every possible phase of real national life, a feature that was lacking in the almost exclusively military pomp of the two great jubilee processions of recent years. The sea and land forces of the King were rightly and duly represented; but the procession was mainly formed from the ecclesiastical, municipal, scientific, artistic, literary, charitable, and artisan sections of the community. Is it possible to point to any other occasion when archbishops and bishops and every rank of the clergy have walked in procession with lord mayors and mayors from every part of the kingdom, with representatives

These all, with many other representative b enumerated, made their way from Castle-square thr High-street to the Broadway. There, about noon on Septe on one of the oldest and most historic sites of the aged unveiled by an ex-Premier of England, the nation's m for the moment, amid the booming of big guns from around, the finest colossal statue that the land possess on two huge blocks of grey Cornish granite towers t bronze figure, in itself some eighteen feet in height, " comely and gracious of aspect." In the uplifted r the sword is grasped, but held with the cross-hilt u thus suitably betokening that the great hero-saint sword only in defensive attack, and that his fame re higher Christian graces of justice and mercy. The fa bearded, though Alfred's coins show a smooth-shave but this lapse from accuracy by Mr. Thornycroft can forgiven, for the ideal of the statue is most nobly portr

Lord Rosebery, famous for his skill in selecting phrases and the most picturesque expressions just notable occasions was, in Winchester, at his best. " A Truthteller " was to him the most suitable name for su " a far nobler and more distinguished title than the prostituted epithet of Great . . . . there was him of the Alexander or the Cæsar." With Lord R single point of criticism on the statue we find ourse accord, namely that for the one word " Aelfred " seul the granite " Alfred " should be substituted. Eve are not quite agreed as to the orthography of Saxo thousand years old in modern characters; but for our children he will always be Alfred. Lord Rosebery has been well reported in the daily press; but we ma that an " authorized edition," admirably printed, purchased of Mr. A. L. Humphreys, Piccadilly, for th one penny.

During the three days when the commemora in active progress, Winchester rightly heard m such men as Mr. Frederic Harrison of Alfred as the the English nation and the father of English literat Sir John Evans, the best exponent that could be fo learnt of Alfred's coinage and his other relics; from Irving they had dramatic readings; and from the primate the lesson to be learnt from Alfred's piety a faith. But amidst all the flow of oratory and the t well qualified professors that which will be remembered as the most moving portion of the whole proceedin singing within the grey walls of the ancient and cathedral, at the conclusion of the special service, of th hymn :—

For all the Saints who from their labours rest
The earnest life and piety of Alfred seemed the keyn celebrations.

CRABBE'S ALDEBURGH.

It would be an exaggeration to say that th associations of Aldeburgh begin and end with Cra place is also linked with such literary names as those Collins, Grant Allen, and Mr. Edward Clodd. Gran particular made good " copy " out of its peculiarities.

THE REV. GEORGE CRABBE.

This reproduction of a portrait by Thomas Phillips, R.A., forms the frontispiece to the reissue which Mr John Murray has published this year of "The Life and Poetical Works of George Crabbe," by his Son, with the excellent engravings included in the same publisher's 1860 edition.

characteristic of Crabbe's genius was that he was always some half a century or so behind the times in which he lived. He started behind the times, and he never tried to catch them up. His point of view was always that of the eighteenth century, though he flourished well on into the nineteenth. The fact has puzzled some of the critics; but it need not puzzle any one who has been to Aldeburgh. Such a mental condition would almost be possible in the Aldeburgh of to-day. Before the railway, and the daily papers and the lodging-houses, it must have been not only possible, but inevitable.

Nowadays, as all the world knows, Aldeburgh is a watering-place, with pretensions. The boating is good; the bathing is well-spoken of; there are golf links; there is a new hotel; there are high prices. But the watering-place has by no means swamped "the borough"; and it needs only a slight imaginative effort to see the place without its latter-day accretions. The railway station does not matter much. It is dirty and unobtrusive; and even if you want it, you may have a difficulty in finding it. A modern hotel must go; but it is not a very large one. So must the bathing machines; but there are not very many of them. There are also a few lodging-houses, and a few

There is even something terrifying in its aspec you see it for the first time in the twilight.

The pious literary pilgrim who essays to t footsteps through the borough finds no superabu marks to confuse him. It is useless to look for a his birthplace; for his birthplace is now at th sea. But you may see a monument in the chur poet served as a curate; you may stroll dow Quay—a moist, unpleasant place on the river wh his boyhood, performed the very unpoetical t trading ships with cheeses; and you may find a still called Crabbe's house, and a room in the W which is still called Crabbe's room. The house by a grocer and general dealer. It has some old remarkable cellars which you explore with a lant without some risk of banging your head against romantic past those cellars were probably us smuggled goods—not, we will hope, by the poet o of his family, though the gentleman who kin counter to guide you through their dark intric consider the hypothesis untenable. As regards in the White Lion there is an equal lack of defin
The landlady does not know whether the poet wro or not; but she supposes that he smoked and d any other client of the house. She herself uses nursery. A suggestion that the room might be Crabbe Museum, with old furniture, old books, o some relics, does not entirely please her.
conscious of nesting a nursery than of nesting a the landlord views the proposal with more favour its execution might not be an entirely barren sa ment. Now that Aldeburgh, stimulated by Mr who owns and edits the local paper, is bestirrin view to a worthy celebration of the 150th anniver birth, he will certainly turn the matter over in very possibly see his way to adopting the idea.

This is practically all there is in the way of lite
—except for those who will take the trouble to go Borough" line by line, rummaging for allusions. P will perform this useful service in view of the fo festations. In the meantime any student not abs with antiquarian zeal can get along without th important thing is not that Crabbe sat on such a worshipped in such and such a pew, admired sn prospect, or picked flowers in such and such can dispense with these identifications, as one ca
the identification of the cheeses which the poet Slaughden Quay. It is not even profoundly observe that the natural surroundings correspon account of them. His method of description was of the auctioneer's catalogue—a method which na
the direction of accuracy. The really interesti is that everything that seems peculiar in Crab and genius is explained when you have spent an the place in which he was born and brought up.

Tennyson might have been thinking of Aldeb spoke of a place where no one comes or hath making of the world. Even now, when you go and get your morning paper soon after breakfast, about links, and caddies, and tees, and putting,
very much as if you had got to the back of beyon

in which the only sort of cleverness that was understood was the shrewdness of the peasant, and the only recognized ambition the ambition to get on in life. He was quite out of sympathy with the environment, but it set its mark on him none the less. A certain note of something which we may almost call "low cunning" pervades his poetry, making it racy of the soil. It is obviously the work of a man who has grown up in a circle in which it is the general habit to poke your nose into other people's business, and discuss it with your neighbours in minute detail and at unconscionable length. A Londoner could not have written as Crabbe wrote. Nor could a man who had travelled, or a man who had been to a public school or a University.

The influence of Aldeburgh society must, however, have been in the main an unconscious influence. Crabbe can never have been aware that there was anything distinctively provincial in his profound interest in the cackle of his burgh and the private affairs of its inhabitants. The influence which he consciously sought and accepted was unquestionably the influence of books. There was no one to tell him what to read and what to reject—what belonged to the past and what to the present. He cut slices, so to say, out of the cake of culture at random. He thought things out in his own way—since no other way was available. He acquired certain fixed ideas, which were not the less firmly fixed because they were the ideas of a previous generation. He had a natural stubbornness of character which enabled him to divinely appointed measure for all poetical compo would have been as hard for him to quit it as for an become a pianist. One hardly knows whether he h himself by using it or not. What one is quite sure o addiction was the result of the circumstances of his Aldeburgh.

To his isolation at Aldeburgh one may also reaso bute his profound belief that any one who wrote thereby entitled to eleemosynary support from public "patron," in that sense, had practically ceased to time when Crabbe began to write. But he had no him this. He had read about patrons; he had tho them; he had created for himself an imaginary wor the purses of the patrons were at the disposal o Finally he went to London to seek a patron; and h before potential patrons in an old-fashioned way that puzzled them. He wrote begging letters to Lord Nor Shelburne, to Lord Thurlow—obviously with a profe

THE OLD MOOT HALL, ALDEBURGH.

(By permission of Mr. C. C. Clarke, Aldeburgh.)

tion that it was the bounden duty of these great men his assistance. He complained to Lord Shelburne, fo that the result of his application to Lord North was ing refusal brought me by an insolent domestic" whi mined my suit and my opinion of his lordship's privat He offered, so to say, to "crack up" Lord Shelbu gistic verse if his necessities were relieved, and he specimen eulogy beginning:—

him, and persuaded others to help him. Lord Thurlow gave him a bank-note, and the Bishop of Norwich ordained him and the Duke of Rutland made him his domestic chaplain, and he subsequently held fat livings. It is a strange career; the direct result of a tenacious hold upon notions only possible in those days to a young man from the country, drawing his knowledge of the world from books, and combining a peasant's obstinacy with a peasant's disposition to cringe before his "betters" when there seemed a chance of getting something out of them, and revile them when they would not give. But Crabbe was just such a young man; and one understands his story the better for having been to Aldeburgh.

FRANCIS GRIBBLE.

THE CREATOR OF "JACK HARKAWAY."

Bracebridge Hemyng, who died last week, has a whole column to himself in the British Museum Catalogue. In the late sixties and early seventies he seems to have written a number of novels which got themselves published, though they made no noise in the world. It appears from the same work of reference that he also, at the same period, wrote essays about the Social Evil. But the work for which he was really notable is not mentioned in the catalogue, presumably because it never appeared in volume form. Those who know him at all know him only as the creator of "Jack Harkaway"—a famous character introduced to the world in the pages of the Boys of England. This paper belonged to a certain Edwin J. Brett, who made a fortune out of it, and, having begun life in a very humble way, lived to acquire a country seat in the Isle of Thanet and a collection of ancient armour which has furnished a subject for articles in the high-class magazines. His principal contributors were Percy B. St. John—Sir Spencer St. John's brother—who was the Paris correspondent of a London paper during the revolution of 1848, and Bracebridge Hemyng, a barrister, from whose brain sprang "Jack Harkaway." They did not make their fortunes, for Percy B. St. John worked for a weekly wage, and Bracebridge Hemyng sold his copyrights for ridiculously small sums of money.

Let there be no mistake about the immense popularity of "Jack Harkaway." Desiring to ascertain whether my belief in it was illusory, I raised the point at a gathering of literary men. Every one under forty remembered "Jack Harkaway" well. Almost every one recollected the time when he had waited with an uncontrollable excitement for the next instalment of Jack Harkaway's adventures. This was conclusive evidence; though, as a matter of fact, the case is proved independently by the persistence of the Jack Harkaway stories. It must be thirty years since the cycle began with Jack Harkaway at school. It has continued almost without intermission. We have read, or had the opportunity of reading, about Jack Harkaway at sea, Jack Harkaway at Oxford, Jack Harkaway among the brigands, Jack Harkaway travelling round the world, Jack Harkaway going everywhere and doing everything. This very day I saw a poster advertising the narrative of Jack Harkaway's enterprises in the Transvaal. Neither Sherlock Holmes nor Captain Kettle has held his public for so long.

As for the secret of Jack Harkaway's great popularity—that is a difficult matter to explain. Perhaps the name had something to do with it. It would be hard to hit upon a name

Once, in one of the desert islands of real life—in an inn at Rock Ferry which harboured me on when I had missed the last boat for Padstow—stranded with no one to talk to and nothing some old volumes of the Boys of England, con of the Jack Harkaway stories. It was an opp be missed of renewing an old friend's acq seized it and read long and late; but the ol pointed me, as the old friends one has lost sight often do. One scene I remember. Jack Harkawa emptied the six chambers of his revolver at a bri brigand dodged the bullets by rapidly jerking right or left. Probably there were many scenes li upon a time I had delighted in them. Now, though I found them unobjectionable, as a "general reader dull. To parody the well-known saying, I coul about that story any different from any other sto sort; and I went to bed with the dolorous fee one grew older, one was doomed to lose, one all one's capacities for innocent enjoyment.

THE DRAMA.

"IRIS."

The construction of Mr. Pinero's new five- raises once more the old question of what a dra show his audience and what, on the other hand, tent merely to tell them. We leave his eponym the end of the third act a comparatively " personage, weak, to be sure, and with the germs We find her degraded in the next act, a hopelessly In the two years which are supposed to have " interact " (a word which has the authority of field, and which, I think, might be usefully rev passed through a whole series of adventure gradually brought about her ruin; and all tha knows of these adventures is gathered from th lips. The question whether this is sufficient w hotly disputed among playgoers. Some will say tha considered, it is no more evidence than "what the For my part, I think Mr. Pinero's method is fu the result. The dramatic significance of an actio in the details of its progress all along one li beginning and end of that line, its points de dramatist shows us in one scene Jack's bean, careful to let us know the bean's magic properties us in his next scene the beanstalk fully grown; t to show us its steady growth. And that is the see Iris, at the end of the third act, letting her po lover go "out West," promising to struggle wit self in his absence, until in two years' time he s come back and marry her. But we have also seen luxury-loving and too weak-willed to give her success in a struggle with poverty. Further, we h after refusing a cheque-book offered her by a frien (whom she has jilted), unable to resist fingering the table, and ultimately dropping it into her last significant little action we are prepared for are not at all surprised to find her in the ne " guilty splendour " in the millionaire's flat. No as that of Ibsen, who very often gives us plays (e.g., Ghosts and Rosmersholm) whereof an integral part of the story has happened before the curtain rises on the first act.

Thus Mr. Pinero's play falls naturally into two parts. The first (Acts I., II., and III.) deals with Iris' character and shows us the dilemma in which she is placed. The second (Acts IV. and V.) shows us the horn of the dilemma upon which she is impaled and her ultimate fate. It is the doubt about Iris' character which makes the transition from the first to the second part so poignantly interesting. The moment the curtain rises on the third act our doubt is set at rest; we know which way Iris has gone; and all our curiosity is shifted to the question, How did she get there? That question is fully answered in Iris' confession to her young lover, who comes back to claim his courageous, patient bride, and finds her the millionaire's wretched mistress and slave—one of those ironic situations, by the way, the invention and proper conduct of which mark the born dramatist. As to the doubt about Iris' character, it is skilfully suggested to us from the very outset. In the first act we see Iris, then a rich young widow, who is to lose her fortune if she marries again, feeling herself slipping into love with penniless young Trenwith, and, to save herself from a poverty which she has not the strength to face, offering her hand to the wealthy Maldonado, whom she does not love. Yet, the very next moment, she takes back her plighted troth, and throws herself into Trenwith's arms. The young lovers are subsequently found in a fool's paradise on the Italian lakes—a paradise rudely shattered by the intelligence that, through the fraud of a trustee, Iris has lost her whole fortune. At first she bears up bravely and is evidently for the moment sincere in her resolution to endure poverty in patience at home while Trenwith is preparing a home for her out West. But then comes the business of the tempting millionaire and the cheque-book, and once more we are in doubt whether self-indulgence or self-denial will get the upper hand. When we learn in due time the unhappy outcome and see the woman in her ruin, we also learn that the woman's native weakness of character has been handicapped by heavy odds. She has tried her best to escape from Maldonado, but the man has laid his revenge-plot too well. She was never of the stuff to prefer starvation in the gutter to a handsome flat in Mayfair. Perhaps, even then, she does not see how low she has fallen until her old lover shrinks from her and leaves her without a word. She had thought he would forgive her, and rescue her—for was not her first fault committed through love of him? No? Then, though her heart is broken, she will try and make some sort of a life with Maldonado. But Maldonado by this time has had enough of it. He "sees red," as the French say. Mad with balked love, with jealousy of the other lover—the full extent of which he has only just discovered—he thrusts Iris into the street, and vents his impotent, blind rage upon the furniture. It is a "curtain" of daring novelty; but what haunts the spectator is not that, but the pale, stony face of Iris as she slinks away into outer darkness where there is weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth. The woman who began in a fool's paradise ends in an inferno. A cold shiver of horror runs through the playhouse.

On this account the playgoers—and there are many—who do not go to art for shivers will not like Iris. And yet it is impossible to deny that this is absolutely the right ending for the play. The conventional dénouement of violent death would be trivial by comparison, and certainly not so true. For sheer

CURRENT LITERATU

"KING MONMOUTH."

Mr. Allan Fea has been fortunate in his choice ing subject for his latest work, and in King Mon 21s. n.) he has given us an excellent specimen of research, printed in a most readable form. We ha to us here, almost for the first time, a complete bio unfortunate "Protestant Duke." In the successful of such a volume Mr. Fea was specially aided by knowledge of old English country houses and th histories, with the result that he has enabled us t facility the semi-royal progresses of Monmouth th land, in the golden days of his prosperity before th
the Rye House Plot.

Mr. Fea opens his book with an impartial a mystery surrounding his hero's parentage. The vexe to whether the Duke was the son of a king or a colon undecided, although to our mind the evidence s whole, to favour the theory that Monmouth's
"Robin" Sidney, who must not be confused with brother Henry, Lord Romney. From Sidney's diar has extracted much useful information, but he n dubbed its compiler the "first Earl of Romney," without issue, Henry was the only member of the S bear that title.

Of the handsome Duke's boyhood and early car his reckless love-affairs, his street brawls, his je the country, and his constant disputes with the D an entertaining record is furnished. Moreover, we read a more clear or trustworthy version of the Ry spiracy, so far, indeed, as Monmouth's share in it wa than that rendered by Mr. Fea. But the most imp of the "uncrowned king's" life is, of course, tha prised his foolish campaign in the south-west. Her trustworthy history, based on original documents, w found to be in striking contradiction to the more but far less faithful, account drawn up by Mac proved once more to have been at fault in attributi Penn, the Quaker, the management of the nefarious in connexion with the pardon of the Taunton scho Fea prints the sensational letters written by M seeking to obtain a pardon, after his capture. Of James, dated July 12th, 1685, we reproduce a permission of the publisher:—

I had forgot to tell your Ma[illegible] th be very necessary to send some trooper down i for there are several Gentlemen there tha Arrear in gaigl [illegible]. I hope your M be angry with me if I take this opportunity in mind that there are several that [illegible] for their own sakes, without considering Service but Jam[illegible] you are the just and see such people will have any credit a [illegible] not be angry with me if I tell you the probable guilt of the treacherous Sunderland. Monmouth's mother (whose maiden name, Mr. Fea thinks, was Walter, and not Walters) is dealt with a little too leniently. Her loose life and faithless disposition were so conspicuous that we fail to recognize as a point in her favour the fact that she had "many personal charms," or that "she came of a good stock."

More romantic is the love story of Henrietta, Lady Wentworth, who was referred to by Monmouth on the scaffold as his "wife in the sight of God." To the heiress of the house of Buccleuch, a mere child when married to Monmouth, it is hardly surprising that her gay young husband so soon proved false. That Lady Wentworth was genuinely in love with the Duke cannot be denied; that she went out of her way to encourage his advances is also a fact. James, Duke of Monmouth, was, in truth, but an ignoble and poor-spirited individual whom we see through the glamour of romance which casts a false light upon his career. Imperfectly educated, he was a very prince of rakes, as befitted a son of Charles II., or Robert Sidney, and of Mrs. Barlow. He was often a coward. He was selfish and ungrateful. Dazzled by the brilliance of the prospect suddenly laid before him after his recognition by Charles in 1662, led away by designing politicians whose tool he too readily became, enervated by a life of luxury and dissipation, he was forced to play a part in politics which he was never competent to fill. Nature had merely destined him to be a fine gentleman, nothing more. Nor must it be forgotten, whenever the question of his claims to the throne may be treated of by future writers on the history of his times, that he was not even, in any event, the eldest natural son of Charles II., as has been generally supposed; so that he has enlisted a good deal of sympathy from posterity, as he did a measure of popularity from his contemporaries, to which he was never fairly entitled.

The volume includes an admirable series of portraits reproduced from contemporary sources.

MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS.

Mary Queen of Scots, and Who Wrote the Casket Letters. By Samuel Cowan, J.P., of the Perthshire Advertiser. 2 vols. (Sampson Low, 28s. n.)

The controversy about Mary Queen of Scots is unending, and it is conducted with wit and knowledge on both sides. It is incontestable that all the difficulties are not yet solved; and it is highly probable that they never will be solved. For our own part we are willing to wait till Mr. Andrew Lang and Mr. Hume Brown, both writers of the fullest historical competence, and the former with the essential gift of genuine historical imagination, shall give us, in their second volumes, an exhaustive summary of recent work as well as of the original sources. Meanwhile Mr. Samuel Cowan, J.P., of the Perthshire Advertiser, comes forward frankly as a partisan, with a very free condemnation of those who disagree with him. He does not appear to us, we may say at once, to justify his position. He is very free in assertion, particularly in regard to the Casket Letters. Mary, we are told, could not have done such and such things or written such and such things. Why not? Because they do not fit in with Mr. Cowan's view of her character. This is hardly conclusive. A great deal of time is spent in these two stout volumes upon abuse of the plaintiff's attorney. A good deal is told which is quite [illegible] subject, the Casket Letters, for example, he k[illegible] apparently, of Bresslau, Sepp, or Gerde. And w[illegible] face to face with facts he is far too much inclined t[illegible] what does not suit his conclusions. The chief c[illegible] which he arrives are that Mary was in no way con[illegible] murder of Darnley or cognisant beforehand of it, [illegible] Casket Letters were written by Maitland Buchana[illegible] Douglas, and Thomas Crawford, inspired by Mo[illegible] Ruthven, and Lindsay. On the first point it is pr[illegible] sible to come to a certain conclusion; but Mr [illegible] nothing to banish the grave suspicion which Mary [illegible] conduct no less than her behaviour at the time [illegible] has naturally engendered. On the second point [illegible] reasons are produced for the concert of so larg[illegible] persons in the alleged forgery; and the high im[illegible] so many people being able to keep their own c[illegible] last is not even considered. Of course, in the [illegible] Casket Letters there are serious arguments to be [illegible] sides; but when all is said there remains the fact [illegible] are genuine, Mary's character and life are consis[illegible] explicable, and that if they are forgeries her histo[illegible] indeed to explain on any coherent theory.

In matter of detail we may note that Mr. C[illegible] good deal of having recently discovered the "or[illegible] for the murder of Riccio, and with regard to the per[illegible] part in it triumphantly observes that Tytler, Hosa[illegible] are all of them wrong. He does not mention th[illegible] given in Ruthven's relation are exactly the same as [illegible] in the bond which he prints in facsimile, though [illegible] did not actually sign it, or more probably signed [illegible] As to the general style, and the general historical [illegible] the book, there is not much to be said that is favou[illegible] wonder is that an insurrection did not get up [illegible] Elizabeth and put Cecil in the Tower. That [illegible] called for, as the execution already referred to a[illegible] ing of innocent persons on the rack were unpar[illegible] need not condemn the French Revolution when [illegible] such cold blooded murders at our own doors." [illegible] 1561, "This year the King of Navarre fell in love [illegible] The King was by the way in France and Mary in [illegible] will be seen we think that whatever may be the [illegible] the whole matter, Mr. Henderson, at present, hold[illegible]

The Bibliographical Society's last two publica[illegible] Actions, Vol. V., Nov., 1898 to June, 1900, and [illegible] No. IX., A Book Bound for Mary Queen of [illegible] somewhat belated, are characteristic of its high[illegible] research. The principal contribution to the "T[illegible] is Mr. R. S. Faber's paper on "Printing in Sicily [illegible] A controversy long raged whether at Palermo [illegible] was printed the first Sicilian book. It is now gener[illegible] that the "Consuetudines" printed at Palermo i[illegible] precedence of all others. The printing is of a hig[illegible] the troublous days of the Spanish domination were [illegible] to the fostering of the newly discovered art. On M[illegible] paper, now printed as a Monograph, we had occasio[illegible] when it was read before the Society last Decem[illegible] completed it by adding to it the list of Mary's boo[illegible] the Bannatyne Club in 1853, and some notes on t[illegible] which can now be stated definitely to have be[illegible] Queen's library. Seven, or eight, is the chronicled [illegible] there may be others as unnoted as was the "P[illegible] subject of the Monograph) itself before it cam[illegible] Sunderland sale of 1883. The chances of this a[illegible]

MR. LANG AND THE GOLDEN BOUGH.

MAGIC AND RELIGION. By ANDREW LANG. (Longmans, 10s. 6d.)

Two or three years ago, when Mr. Lang produced his amusing miscellany entitled "The Making of Religion," he deemed Mr. Frazer's "Golden Bough" worthy only of a passing notice in somewhat disparaging terms. A second edition of that work having recently appeared, in which the matter is enlarged to twice its original bulk, and fills three stout volumes, Mr. Lang proceeds to examine it more closely. It is true that "Magic and Religion" is miscellaneous in form, dealing, amongst other things, with such well-worn topics as "Science and Superstition," "The Theory of Loan-gods, or Borrowed Religion," "Cup-and-ring Markings," "First-fruits and Taboos," and "Fire-walking." All this, however, is merely the sawdust and shavings in which the infernal machine which Mr. Lang deposits, with his compliments, at Mr. Frazer's door, is neatly packed up. The "operative part," as lawyers say, of the book begins with Chapter III., which bears the general title of the volume as its particular heading. Like those who preach from pulpits, Mr. Lang begins with a Scriptural text—and he is really so original in his treatment of it that we must let him speak for himself:—

> "The sin of witchcraft is as the sin of rebellion." The idea which inspires this text probably is that a person who seeks to obtain his ends by witchcraft is rebelling against the deity or deities through whom alone these ends should be sought. Witchcraft is also an insult and injury to the official priests, who regard the witch as the surgeon regards the bone-setter, or as the geologist regards the "dowser" or water-finder who uses the divining-rod.

Before expounding his text the preacher should look it out and see that he has it correctly. He should, at all events, do so before sending his sermon to the press. Mr. Lang will find that the text runs thus:—"For rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft (1 Sam., ch. xv., v. 23)." The idea which inspires the aphorism is not very recondite. It means that disobedience to the specific directions of the Lord's prophet in reference to a particular occasion, and in circumstances to which the general Mosaic law does not apply, is no less a sin than wilful breach of the straitest precept of that law, and will be visited on the offender accordingly. Mr. Lang's inversion of his text reminds one of the negro evangelist who took Jonah for his subject, informed his hearers that the prophet swallowed a whale, and went on to remark that he must have been a devil of a fellow for fish.

Mr. Lang's original criticism of the "Golden Bough," in his "Making of Religion," was that it was a sort of "Jack-in-the-Green" business. Pursuing the same vein, he now denominates those who hold that spirits and gods of vegetation had a considerable share in the formation of ancient theologies as the "Covent Garden School"; but his objections to the "Golden Bough" in its revised form are by no means limited to the fact that Mr. Frazer is a prominent exponent of this not very novel doctrine. In the new edition of his book Mr. Frazer expresses the opinion that magic has universally preceded religion, and that mankind invented the latter mainly because they found that the former could not be depended having any religious signif[illegible]nce wh[illegible]tever att[illegible] Religion, in the ethnological acceptation of the w[illegible] prayer and sacrifice to the unseen beings whom [illegible] as benevolent or malevolent powers, and some at[illegible] ever rude, to give these beings visible and tangible [illegible] Unless something of this kind accompanies it, no su[illegible] be properly admitted as evidence for the theory o[illegible] religious sense. Mr. Frazer's position is not una[illegible] Mr. Lang's attack on it has not been directed to [illegible] points. It would have been more to the purpose [illegible] that magic and religion are not so easily separa[illegible] Frazer seems to think; that a certain amou[illegible] survives even in the most advanced religions; and t[illegible] obviously not be impossible for religious concep[illegible] formed and brought to maturity without the ne[illegible] stage being entered at all.

Nor do we think Mr. Lang fortunate in his [illegible] some minor matters of opinion advanced by Mr. [illegible] may instance, in the first place, one which Mr. Lan[illegible] last—the peg on which Mr. Frazer's whole wor[illegible] suspended by its author for exhibition—the "Golden Bough" itself. Mr. Frazer takes as t[illegible] venient and striking example of his main thesis [illegible] embodiment of spirits of vegetation—the tree nea[illegible] of Diana in the grove of Aricia, from which no [illegible] be plucked, unless the person who plucked it were [illegible] meet the priest of the temple in mortal combat, s[illegible] of right to the priestly office if he killed him. [illegible] well known to the general reader, through Maca[illegible] quoted lines:—

> The trees in whose dark shadow
> The ghastly priest doth reign,
> The priest who slew the slayer,
> And shall himself be slain.

But the fatal bough plucked at Aricia was n[illegible] bough at all. What has it to do with the only g[illegible] known to mythology or poetry, the fabulous one sa[illegible] to have been plucked in the grove of Avernus by [illegible] passport to the underworld? Nothing whatever. [illegible] asks Mr. Lang, as other readers of Mr. Frazer's v[illegible] asked before him—why, in the name of sound [illegible] common sense, does Mr. Frazer call the bough o[illegible] "golden bough," put the "Golden Bough" on hi[illegible] and adopt Turner's beautiful but wholly fanciful [illegible] Avernus as a frontispiece? Mr. Frazer's ans[illegible] according to Servius, or some preceding comm[illegible] Virgil whose notes were incorporated by Ser[illegible] work, people generally in those times recog[illegible] sort of connexion between the two; a connexi[illegible] founded on the circumstance that in each [illegible] bough was intended to serve as a passport [illegible] the difference being that the golden bough, unlike [illegible] one, entitled the holder to make the return journey. [illegible] with Mr. Lang that this analogy, if not wholly ill[illegible] slight to justify the use to which Mr. Frazer has ap[illegible] similar objection may fairly be made to Mr. Frazer's [illegible] of the plucking of the Arician bough. Mr. Frazer s[illegible] because Diana has, amongst other attributes, thes[illegible] spirit, the ghastly priest was slain by his succes[illegible] carnation of the tree-spirit, his life being safe out[illegible]

Aricia. Hence (it is physically conceivable, but I lay no stress on it) the asylum was at last limited to one fugitive slave at a time. It was not like the forest in the Indian fable, populated by "millions of hermits," who cannot have been very solitary anchorites. Any fugitive slave who took sanctuary had to kill and dispossess the prior occupant. There was only sanctuary for one at a time. More would have been most inconvenient. In any case the one solitary duty of the ghastly priest (as far as we know) was to act as garde champêtre to one certain tree. Why this one tree, we do not and cannot know.

Mr. Lang ought to know that the right of asylum in sacred places, although common enough in Greece, never existed, so far as the learned are aware, in Italy, and is unknown to Roman law. It is futile to cite the mythical "asylum" of Romulus, which could have been nothing more than a suburb where strangers and outlaws were permitted to settle under the protection of the original Roman burghers. And on any intelligent reading of the authorities it is ridiculous to suppose that the only function of the rex Nemorensis was to guard the tree. As the principal priest of what was, according to Lanciani, the largest temple, and probably the richest sacred benefice, in Italy, his primary duty was to perform the usual sacrificial rites for the benefit of the numerous pilgrims who frequented the shrine, to superintend the lectæ virgines who formed the staff, and generally to manage and direct the affairs of what recent excavations prove to have been in fact a very large hydrotherapeutic establishment. To describe him, with Mr. Frazer, as a "murderer," always liable to displacement by another "murderer," is misleading. A gladiator who fairly defeats and takes the life of his adversary in single combat is no murderer. The "ghastly priest" was simply an official who gained a lucrative post by a peculiar and not inappropriate form of competitive examination. We could never believe that he was necessarily a fugitive slave, though the class of fugitive slaves largely contributed to the ranks of the gladiatorial profession; and the sole authority for the proposition that he was a fugitive slave is Pausanias, a foreigner, whose evidence should not be construed too literally. Inadequate as we have always thought Mr. Frazer's treatment of the Arician sacra, we do not think that Mr. Lang has improved upon it, nor can we accept his explanation of the traditional connexion of Orestes and Hippolytes with Aricia as "an aetiological myth." It is more probable that the adventures of these worthies were depicted on the temple walls as parts of the general Artemisian legend. From this to the popular notion that they had actually had to do with the foundation of the temple the transition is easy.

Another matter which provokes Mr. Lang's wrath is the fanciful connexion which Mr. Frazer traces between the mockery and scourging antecedent to the Crucifixion, as described in the Gospels, and similar incidents belonging to the Jewish feast of Purim and the Babylonian Sacæa. In his haste to bring Mr. Frazer to book Mr. Lang incoherently charges him at the outset, almost in the same breath, with professing to discover in these incidents "the origin of the Christian Faith" and "the origin of the belief in the divinity of Christ." Turning to Mr. Frazer's book, we see that he was led to make the comparison by another equally fanciful resemblance suggested in a recent contribution to a foreign periodical. A German, eagerly seeking some new thing, fancies that he sees through his spectacles a resemblance between this part of the Gospel story evidence warrants." Here Mr. Lang rubs his han to use a phrase of his own, that he has the avail"; and he devotes 128 pages of his book difficult task of turning what he describes as hypothesis of the origin of Christianity" inside o it to shreds. We shall say no word tending complacency with which Mr. Lang may fairly c monumental effort. As for Mr. Frazer, he delighted that so eminent a critic as Mr. La thought so slight a matter worthy of so much seri

Apparently Mr. Lang has somewhat fa stand Mr. Frazer's real attitude in regard t discussed in his book; and it is not surpris deaf to the singular charm which has won for Bough" its popularity. Mr. Lang calls it hypotheses, eighteen storeys high." Mr. Fr claimed for it the modest merit of being a lar facts, intelligibly arranged, bearing mainly on t aspect of ancient religions—an aspect which Mr. Ignore. The facts, in Mr. Frazer's words, ar "bridges" of hypothesis, often of airy lightne of Mr. Frazer's book is that, while he collects facts, he seldom does more than suggest his imperceptibly leads his readers to modify the others for themselves. Herodotus was not m distinguish between what he had seen for himse related on the authority of others than Mr present his facts as something apart from hi "bridges." A writer who observes this rule by the mere fact of so doing, to a large degree and when, in addition, he warns the reader that to pursue a particular speculation further tha warrants, a prolonged attack directed to this very seems called for.

OTHER NEW BOOK

The Man Forbid.

Mr. John Davidson in his second Testament — OF A MAN FORBID (Grant Richards, 6d. n.)—is st the solitary prophet denouncing the world; b though his message seems to us to be, he is a proph feelings in magnificent blank verse, strong, r imaginative, and that is perhaps enough. "The finds the world very little to his liking; he rates purpose that it drives him, mudbespattered solitude. When he comes back a penitent, one addresses him in a tone of excellent good sense, back again. He is left haunting the hills the sea:—

> Here as I pace the pallid doleful hills
> And serpentine declivities that creep
> Unhonoured to the ocean's shifting verg
> Or where with prouder curve and greene
> Surmounting peacefully the restless tide
> The cliffed escarpment stands in storm-c

Even if the noble rage of the poet leaves still admire Mr. Davidson's fine gift of poet which this poem is a good example.

Essay Writing.

rules which Stevenson uniformly violated. Yet there are those who hold that Stevenson was the better essayist of the two. The book before us, though by no means the best book of the kind that we know, certainly contains advice that some essayists would do well to take; but we are quite sure that essayists who need the advice have missed their vocation. In an appendix the author gives a list of papers "open to consider outside contributions." Our own organ very properly figures on the list; but we should not accept the specimen essay printed in chapter III., and we doubt whether any of the other papers, from the Nineteenth Century to M.A.P., would be any more likely to do so.

Lady Prestwich's Essays.

A few months after the completion of her labour of love, the "Life of Sir Joseph Prestwich," his widow passed away in the pleasant house near Shoreham in Kent which had been her home since 1870. In the volume just mentioned Lady Prestwich's own personality is studiously kept in the background, and it is fitting that some independent evidence of her worth and attainments should be forthcoming. This is now available by the publication of ESSAYS, DESCRIPTIVE AND BIOGRAPHICAL, by Grace, Lady Prestwich, with a memoir by her sister, Louisa E. Milne (Blackwood, 10s. 6d.) Being the favourite niece of a distinguished geologist (Hugh Falconer), and in some sense a pupil of his, endowed, moreover with receptive powers of a high order, in addition to considerable skill as an artist, and a charm of manner which can be traced even in her writings, Lady Prestwich might, under different circumstances, have won for herself an independent reputation. But her life, though far from uneventful, ran in a more tranquil groove. As Falconer's travelling companion, after the death of her first husband and infant son, Grace McCall, as she was then, came into contact with many of the celebrities of forty years ago. Among these may be mentioned Madame Mohl, whose salon was then and for long afterwards the resort of statesmen, novelists, artists, poets, and others, who came to do homage to this bright little Scotchwoman (née Mary Clark). Also Mrs. Somerville, and M. Boucher de Perthes, a noted amateur geologist, whose share in demonstrating the antiquity of the human race should not be allowed to die, though his enthusiasm more than once led him into sad blunders. Anecdotes, reminiscences of travel, and descriptions of scenery, in which vivacity and felicity of expression are equally mingled, make the reader sorry to close this book. The memoir which prefaces the collection supplies just the amount of biographical detail needed.

The "Self-Taught" Series.

The lethargy of our educational authorities in the matter of commercial education lends importance to the series which Messrs. Marlborough are bringing out under the title of the "Self-taught Library." We make the remark particularly in connexion with RUSSIAN SELF-TAUGHT, by C. A. Thimm and J. Marshall (Marlborough, 2s.), which we have just received. A knowledge of Russian is becoming of more and more importance in the political and business world, and the German continuation schools have introduced it as a compulsory subject. The "Self-taught" Series, of which ten volumes have appeared—the present volume being preceded by "Swedish Self-taught"—caters fully and in a handy form for the linguistic requirements of sportsmen, cyclists, photographers, and travellers generally; but Messrs. Marlborough have been well-advised in

AN ARTIST'S WALKS IN BIBLE LANDS, by Henry (Religious Tract Society, 6s. n.), is a pleasantly-written and often suggestive volume, with numerous excellen executed in "wash."

THE CHILD AT HOME, by Mrs. Clement Parsons (1s. 6d.), consists of two essays on "An Only Chil "The Beauty of Simplicity." The former deserv study by the large class of parents who have to difficulty of training a child who is deprived of the education of brothers and sisters, and we do not re have seen elsewhere so thoughtful and sympathetic a tion of it. The second essay is more general in scope nessl of greater simplicity in society generally. M writes in a very pleasant and cultured style, an cordially recommend her book to parents of the "upp

FICTION.

PLEASANT STORIES OF TO-DAY.

Ada Cambridge.

THE DEVASTATORS, by Ada Cambridge (Methuen, work of a writer who does not turn out books at exp or trust to her excellence in the past to condone present. Her last book is as full of charm, humour, characterization as anything she has ever written Peggy is delightful more attractive than a thousa tional beauties. Her pathetic end somewhat tries t sensibilities, especially as it is painfully well done. people of the story are all well depicted. We have vaguely discontented man who hints at dark conf which resolve themselves, when he is pinned down instances, into the grievous fact that his wife has sla by becoming fat! The motherly woman, again, wh before anything else, and looks upon a son-in-law as " of the nature of a cheque, the true value of which w could be cashed into grandchildren"—how real she "Devastators" of the title please us, as studies, less quieter characters. But the whole book is good read most fastidious.

Mr. E. F. Benson.

Mr. Benson appears to desire to conquer all th the novel writer. From "Dodo" to THE LUCK OF (Heinemann, 6s.) all fashions in fiction may find a p "Luck" is a golden cup, carven and bejewelled thought to bring with it length of days. Harry Vail, baron of that name, finds this awkward treasure, Francis Vail, his great-uncle, a most delightfully man and the real raison d'être of the story, uses ingenuity to dispose of Harry and, with the aid of the reign in his stead. The plot is said to have been s Mr. Arthur Christopher Benson, to whom the boo tionately dedicated "by its admiring scribe." Spi the idea, the telling of it is equally skilful and interes characters are as real as most of Mr. Benson's ma There are melodrama, comedy, characterization, and wit and humour in "The Luck of the Vails"; a clev a clever man.

A Student of Her Sex.

ally clumsy. But the novel is above the average in interest, and far above most in characterization. The Chilcotts are excellent: Catherine herself has always a firm hold on the reader's heart, and Lady Sarah (although not perfectly consistent) is amusing. Mrs. de la Pasture is to be congratulated on her last novel, and the more because it preaches unobtrusively the advantages of simplicity and unselfishness. If it were better written it would be a very good book indeed: as it stands it should be popular—especially among ladies who like to see the foibles and virtues of their sex analyzed with a delicate touch.

"Bagsby's Daughter."

BAGSBY'S DAUGHTER, by Bessie and Marie Van Vorst (Grant Richards, 6s.), if it is a first novel, is very promising indeed. It is dramatic, and the drama is kept up breathlessly from start to finish. It just escapes being farcical, but abounds with humour, sometimes subtle and sometimes rollicking. The old pillmaker and his wife are charmingly done. We shall look out for the next book by the joint authors.

Mr. Hamilton Aidé.

Mr. Hamilton Aidé has rarely done better work than in his latest novel, THE SNARES OF THE WORLD (John Murray, 6s.). Its heroine, Moyra O'Connell, the daughter of a Irish peer, is as charming a creation as one could hope to meet. Her beauty of face and of character atones in the opinion of her admirers for her comparative poverty, and of admirers she has her pick. Mr. Aidé's gallery includes the usual conventional types, the romantic Hungarian magnate, the Duke with the inevitable hawk-like nose, and the fashionable Countess with a taste for slumming. But Mr. Aidé knows how to dress up the old puppets anew and make them dance to new tunes. The conversation is natural and unaffected, and there is no wearisome straining after epigrammatic smartness of phrase and allusion. The book is a capital specimen of the best and most wholesome type of English fiction.

Sir Walter Besant.

THE LADY OF LYNN, by Sir Walter Besant (Chatto and Windus, 6s.). It is an ungracious task to approach the work of a veteran who is dead in any spirit but a grateful and appreciative one. Fortunately there is little to criticize in "The Lady of Lynn." True, it lacks the charm of Sir Walter's earlier work. And its initial improbabilities are very great: for instance, the strange neglect of the very simple process of examining the signatures in the marriage register. But the book is healthy and lovable. The heroine is a breezy, straightforward young woman, not over idealized, and free from that taint of sentimentality which has tinged some of her predecessors. Molly is a sturdy, "sonsy" lass, no angel and no fine lady. In effective contrast to her is the Lady Anastasia, the frivolous woman of a worse than frivolous set, partly redeemed by her real feeling for the callous villain of the piece. The teller of the tale is an honest young sailor, whose reward is not difficult to foretell when Molly is freed from her complicated matrimonial affairs. The book is not strikingly good in any particular, but it shows that pleasant cheery spirit upon which one could always rely in its author.

MYSTERY AND CRIME.

Since we must have our murder mysteries in fiction, we may be thankful to find them done as well as in MR. BERNARD BROWN, by E. Phillips Oppenheim (Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.). All stories of this kind must needs have a strong family likeness. concluding scene is a pleasing adaptation of th "The Silence of Dean Maitland." On the wh invented, well-elaborated plot. The writing seem picturesque, but no doubt readers of mysteries decorative style.

One detective story is very much like anoth natural that Mr. Fergus Hume's detective storie in addition a certain family likeness of their own THE MYSTERY (Chatto, 6s.) is no less of a mys its predecessors. It has a respectable plot, i tried to cast suspicion upon every one in turn (it, is the great aim of the artist in mysteries), an who are villainous, heroes who are all that t maiden young and fair and not too much har suspicion, and a sufficiency of the comic elem Blair has the merit of being, at the worst, a pos he is neither superhumanly acute nor ridiculou law, no doubt, is good novelist's law—it is obvi expect a hard-worked writer to reconcile all th of his characters with hard fact.

Mr. John Bloundelle-Burton has the reputati to produce stories of adventure by land and and a due proportion of exciting incident to th numerous people. Unfortunately A VANISHED 6s.) concerns itself with other and mo topics, being merely a machine-made detectiv customary type, such as most industrious author if, in Dr. Johnson's phrase, they chose to l sufficiently. The writing displays no distinction (with the possible exceptions of M. de Nes d'instruction) no individuality. It is readable certainly is not worth serious consideration, a diminish than enhance Mr. Bloundelle-Burton's

Mr. T. W. Hanshew frankly calls THE V (Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.) an improbable story. B mysterious double murder, it follows the tort the conventional detective tale. The dovetaili clever, but the incidents are absurdly extrav reader who would be "thrilled," this is the boo MAD? by T. Pym Loughman (Greening, 2s. which represents one individual in the act of s on a balcony under a particularly full and brill contents are to match. Here is a sentence. was preying on his mind, to such an exten mention of 'Vendetta' roused him to fren should Danncey be mixed up in this seemingly m of a diseased brain?" "Seemingly mental . . . brain" like "mobled queen"—is "goo

In THE GHOST OF TINTERN ABBEY, by Mrs. A (T. Baker and Son), the ghost is the means murder. The writer evidently knows and loves neighbourhood. Her style is naive, but not slip TRUSTS.

The liquefaction of all solid problems into th has not often been so frankly illustrated as it Norris. He announces three books connected wi so far as they relate "to (1) the production, (2) (3) the consumption of American wheat." Bu economical treatises. They are novels: and In reader by its sheer strength: by its sharply-defined characters —Annixter is a truly fine study of humanity—its largely and poetically conceived pictures of wheat growing on a large scale, and its vivid descriptions, closing with the terrible death of Behrman of the railroad gang, by drowning—not in water, but in the wheat as it rushed down upon him in a thundering cataract through the chute into the ship's hold. The book gives us, amidst all the familiar scenes and themes of fiction, a new thing: a set of conditions actual and vital and unlike any thing that has existed before in the world's history. It should be read not only for the power of its writing, but because it is pregnant with the problems of the future. We shall look forward to Mr. Norris' treatment of another side of the same problems in the second book of the "Trilogy"—"The Pit, A Story of Chicago."

Cash is King (H. J. Drane, 6s.) is described by its author, William A. Reid, as a monogram, which we may assume to be the American for monograph. It purports to be the memoirs of Sir Albert Alling, Knight of the United States, and Baron of Ohio. Briefly, the tale is a dip into the future, and describes the conditions of life at a time when all capital is controlled by a few syndicates, and these eventually by a single all-powerful Trust of Trusts, while labour seeks to protect itself by a similar combination of trade unions. The inevitable death struggle follows. Capital is triumphant, strikes and the agitator disappear, and Mr. Lapap, the "boss" of the plutocrat ring, becomes the first King of the United States. The story, however, is crude and disappointing. Occasionally there is a flash of humour, as in the description of the Religious Syndicate, which insists on church-going, but leaves choice of creed to the individual. But considering the opportunities there is a lamentable lack of imagination, and for this the slight didactic value which the book possesses is hardly enough compensation.

AFRICA.

Mr. Basil Marnan has chosen a rather topical catch-penny title for his clever book A Daughter of the Veldt (Heinemann, 6s.). It is by far the best novel dealing with life in Africa since the "Story of a South African Farm" and reminds us in its power and truth of that admirable example of fiction; there are the same wealth and correctness of detail, even a certain prolixity in approaching a point, a certain superfluity of minor issues, explanations, and, as it were, verifications of facts. There are the same remorseless analysis of misery, the same piling up of terror, horror, tragedy. There are also the same brilliancy of description and arresting character drawing. The prelude to the novel, a story, one may call it, of thirty-two pages is in itself an original and highly interesting piece of work. The scene is that of the N'Ritani Mission Chapel built on the top of a great swell of upland. The Rev. Mowbray Wrixon has worked hard to achieve this undertaking which he began with a certain enthusiasm and ended by despising. "The Rev. Wrixon," as we are sorry to say Mr. Marnan calls him, is something of a humbug. He falls in love with the daughter of a farmer, with whom he has stayed; but, even in his most fervent feelings, he was guided by a saving sense of economic prudence, and he desires promotion such as this splendid but uncultured girl could only mar. But the story is so cleverly and sincerely told that we will not spoil the reader's pleasure in it by further suggestion of the plot. If this be Mr. Basil Marnan's first book we shall look forward to those that follow. "A Daughter of the Veldt" with no small told much after the manner of "Three Men in a Boat. not convinced that the humorous treatment is the one; but we have enjoyed the reading, though lat comes there is a feeling of tiredness at the lon attitude of burlesque. We like the Scotsman who cut a slice off his neighbour's loaf," nor would we have missed the bugler who could not bugle because t got into his bugle. As a record of the war the book is m everything is distorted in the interests of the comic is no sort of cohesion about the book, which is in story. But as long as one realizes that warfare and ca here reflected in the kind of convex mirror that comic distortion of feature, the interests of truth suffer.

The Lost Regiment, by Ernest Glanville (Methu begins with a proposal of some magnificence from a " duffer," who has been respectfully informed that are not required by a grateful country. The "duf fortunate owner of "a few thousands a month," an that land in Africa may be had at a low rate. buying a few thousand square miles from some native raising a regiment to be officered by the rejected of . . . . We should easily pick up, say, ten thous miles, with a mountain in the centre." The working modest idea is spirited, ingenious, and humorous, spicuously literary.

IN THE LITERARY WORLD.

The journalist is not an uncommon figure in fict generally not a very satisfactory one. Mr. R. L. any rate knows his subject, and The Coward (Ward is at once an interesting story and a fairly accurate p certain sort of journalistic life. Catesby, the hero, drawn, but Detheridge, a sort of Napoleon of th certainly the best character in the book. Unfort story tails off sadly at the finish. An indeterminate is never very satisfactory, and this is more indeterm most. But it is worth reading, and will no doubt ap young literary aspirant.

The struggling journalist appears again in The (Kegan Paul, 5s.), but Mr. Paine shows that it is possi a hackneyed theme freshly. The tale is of four New paper men, and their effort to eclipse all previous the world of magazines. As they have neither cap perience, their enterprise can have but one end, and months they are reduced to taking their place in all the long, sad line of dole-seeking waifs, which has name to the book. But the story is not all gloom. Th relieved by the cheeriness and unflagging spirits men. A graceful little love idyll is interwoven with tive, though, unfortunately for the reader, the charm appears only in her letters. However, these, one records, are natural and unaffected.

Two Girls and a Dream, by Jean Delaire (W 6s.), has a delightfully bright girl in it. She literary fame, and her conversation redeems the complains that some of her grandest inspirations her bath. She dreams of a "general massacre of a clear the air. In fact, she is amusing all through.

THE STORY OF ROGER KING (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.) has one or two points that differentiate it from the common run of lovestories. In the main it resembles these poor relations somewhat too closely; there is that ancient piece of machinery—the foundling substituted for the heir—which has solved many hundreds of riddles since the trade of novel-writing began. On the other hand there are one or two fair sketches of character, an engaging heroine, and a good account of Roger's boyhood. Mr. B. Paul Neuman's hero runs away early from a tyrannical grandfather, falls among thieves in the orthodox style, and is rescued by a good Samaritan, who is also a writer of novels. This part of the book is better than the rest; it is fresher and less mechanical. When Roger discovers his supposed parents the interest of the story fades rapidly, for only one solution is possible. Mr. Vicars, the novelist, and Mr. Lovibond, the architect, are Mr. Neuman's most successful creations in a readable but undistinguished story.

DOMESTIC.

A SON OF MAMMON (John Long, 6s.), by Mr. G. B. Burgin, is a good specimen of the quiet domestic novel. The main theme is the baneful influence of too absorbing a pursuit of wealth. Most of the scenes and characters, drawn from a journalist's London experiences, are natural enough. The heroine is compared to a rose "kiss-kissed into coloured perfume." Fortunately Mr. Burgin rarely indulges in rhapsodies of this kind, and his style will not unduly tax the intellectual powers of the average person. The story is quite worth reading.

THE GOLD THAT PERISHETH (Religious Tract Society, 3s. 6d.) is an old story retold; but Mr. David Lyall has contrived to put life into his stock characters. Two of them, an elderly brother and sister, are truly charming in their quaintness. The story fluctuates between a modern stockbroker prince's palace at Sydenham-hill, the City, and the humble home of reduced gentlefolk at Camberwell. As the title partially indicates, this, too, is a tale levelled against ill-made money; and its religious tone is not too insistent.

SOULS OF PASSAGE (Fisher Unwin, 6s.) is one of Miss Amelia Barr's quiet, sympathetic tales—this time about Glasgow and the Highlands. It contains a contrast she is very fond of, between a flighty beauty who fascinates and a gentle damsel who retains the hearts of men. A slight supernatural element, which harmonizes with the Highland background, is introduced.

THE MAID OF MAIDEN-LANE, by Amelia E. Barr (Fisher Unwin, 6s.), is a quiet, graceful story, full of charm, and with a touch of Miss Mary Wilkins' tenderness about it. The "maid" is delightful—a sweet type, refreshingly free from complications, though her doings and sayings are far from being invariably meek or mild. Her lively friend, Arenta, is very human and piquante. Like Clarissa Harlowe's "dear Miss Howe," she furnishes most of the spice of their dialogue. But the maid's demure replies show a certain appreciation of diablerie that makes one find in Miss Barr a good deal of quiet humour. The book is a thoroughly pleasing one.

MUST YIELD TO WIN, by "Adelina" (Drane, 3s. 6d.), relates the adventures of a governess, rather scurvily treated by the boys of the household that she has to take in charge during the absence of its master and mistress. The adventures are very mild, and the story is inconclusive. There is no wedding and no love affair—two sufficiently remarkable

But the story is too diffuse. Many of its des excellent in themselves, will be skipped. Th amongst English landed gentry of to-day, with a b beauty, Ira's stepmother, as trouble-maker. The bo one in which young men and maidens will find ente is a book for lending libraries, for a young g enjoy, understand, and suffer no harm by it.
Fevez is a new writer of whom we may expect go she has learnt restraint.

When a lady writer is good enough to let reviewer into the secrets of a young girl's early can hardly choose but be grateful for the engaging
We all like to hear confessions, and there is so nially fresh and charming about the artless histo True, it is perhaps scarcely a fair way of arousin is hardly "playing the game" (as our athletic but, after all, it is an author's first duty to be r Edith Hawtrey—if the lady is unmarried—tells,
SPOONS (Drane, 3s. 6d.), the story of Miss R attempt at a Platonic friendship. It is done, of first person, and really it is a pretty little tale.
exactly in the best taste—or let us put it dow conception of humour—but the book itself is title and the first few pages would lead us to very light, but it is an agreeable soufflé.

CAROLINE, OR THE DAYS OF HER YOUTH, b
Campbell (Stockwell, 3s. 6d.), is a simple stor religious flavour, and should be suitable for a prize.

Julian the Apostate.

"The historical novel, pure and simple, exi says Mr. Herbert Trench in an interesting pre his translation of Dmitri Merejkowski's THE GODS (Constable, 6s.), and he goes on to explain genius who now adopt this form are only tra stage of the world a drama which is being play souls. In this, the first of the Russian novelist of historical romances, Merejkowski handles the between the Christian idea and the Hellenic. The is that of Julian the Apostate, and he has re scenes and characters of that distant epoch for us skill. To prepare himself for his task Merejk through Asia Minor and Greece, visited Syria nople, and made an exhaustive study of the Gnostics, the Fathers of the Eastern Church, Sophists. The result is a fine psychological himself, and a convincing series of pictures of li century. Beginning with the childhood of Julia their palace-prison of Macellum, it carries us t death at the head of his army, fighting against S is planned on a large scale, and executed with th power; the translation is very good—there is r sion used with which serious fault could be found Is hoped that Mr. Trench will continue his good translations of "The Resurrection of the Gods Christ," the two remaining volumes of the t Merejkowski is certainly an author who deserv good and careful translation.

Loss of Memory.

Of the many labourers in the great mill of discovered, she finds her husband, in despair, has married again. This is an awkward situation, a delicate blend of Mr. Clark Russell's "John Houldsworth" and the late Lord Tennyson's "Enoch Arden." Incidentally we are introduced to one Dr. Strong and his lunatic asylum; to Lady Cotswold, who is a rather well-drawn character; and to the family of Sir Adam Lee-Hobbes, Governor of New Zealand. The book is rather above than below Miss Crommelin's usual level of respectable mediocrity.

Ireland.

It is a little hard to believe that anything quite so Irish exists as Miss Jane Barlow's delightful peasantry in FROM THE LAND OF THE SHAMROCK (Methuen, 6s.). But she draws them with such a quaint, irresistible pen that one can only accept them and be thankful. The book is a collection of short stories full of fascinating characters, such as the courteous Larry, who says consolingly "Git on, Anthony O'Keefe. I believe ivery word you're after sayin', lies or no." It is a book that will stand reading many times.

A UNION OF HEARTS, by Katharine Tynan (Nisbet, 6s.), is another Irish book, but of a different order. It deals with "rale gentry" rather than the country folk, and has more of a conventional love-story in it. The man who comes from England with a fortune made in trade and a whole host of notions as to "managing" his Irish tenants for their good is familiar. He usually proceeds on the lines of Mrs. Hinkson's hero. He meets with prejudice and outrage. He learns to modify his own preconceived ideas. He wins the proud Irish maid descended from kings, and ends with popularity and wedding-bells. But if the outline is commonplace, the treatment prevents the book from becoming tedious. It is well written, and by no means without humour.

A Beth Book.

There is a certain charm in MARR'D IN MAKING (Constable, 6s.), and pungency, point, and fun, too, are to be found there. But the author, the Baroness von Hutten, appeals rather to the casual than the literary public. Beth is the heroine, with a very charming picture of her as frontispiece, but she does not live; her peculiarities contradict one another so frequently that the reader at last fails to credit the author's stories and thus the interest wanes. But there are clever chapters in "Marr'd in Making," and some rather risqué and original situations, and a good deal of pathos that might well be tragedy—if one were only convinced. The Baroness von Hutten places in the fore-front of her book these lines

—Some there are who tell
Of one who threatens he will toss to Hell
The luckless pots he marr'd in making—but they are not particularly appropriate. Beth is marr'd rather by the author than by the Master of the universe; at no time does she appear to be a likely figure for the problems of eternity.

Russia.

It is a little difficult to work up much interest in the Russian novel compact of mysterious police, the "isvostchik," the "young Pole," and the rest of the stock-in-trade. Unfortunately, many clever people try it, for example Mr. Ropes and his sister in ON PETER'S ISLAND (Murray, 6s.). We own that if we must read one more novel of Petersburg life under Alexander III. we are delighted to find it is from the versatile pen of Mr. Ropes. We have followed him from the days of the mathematical tripos and the short history of Europe through his ballades and rondeaux to his lyrics for the libretti of many light plays. He touches every-

a second book more inferred with the real spirit of re dependent on externals and observed incidents of importance.

Tragedy is the key-note of the seven short stor panying ZILGRAHOF (Simpkin Marshall, 2s. 6d. n.), w tale of Nihilist vengeance. From a Maori love story, blood, they reach to St. Petersburg; and Mr. John C. crisp style suits them admirably; but he has attac much needless matter to the front of each one. Good a they would have been better had he gone straight into

At Malta.

Lady Acland calls her story, THE LOST KEY (Macq an international episode, which is true enough, for th of the lost, or rather the stolen, key which wrecks th of the unfortunate Sir William Browne has very with the main thread of the novel. The book i teresting, but it suffers from aimlessness: it is mor tion of such episodes than a connected story. So characters have only the slightest connexion with t it can be called a plot. They seem to have been p book merely because the author had met them and f interesting studies. The pair of Socialists, for exa nothing whatever to do with Lady Acland's tenuou romance, nor can we detect any reason for the accou Mainwaring's death, except that the author proba to try her hand at pathos. The local colour is go must serve as an excuse for this indefiniteness of purp a certain amount of carelessness in the writing.

Clerical.

THE VICAR OF ST. LUKE'S, by Sibyl Creed (Longm an interesting tale on the not very new subject of a maliciously slandered and attacked before his parishi moral charge of which he is entirely innocent. The excellent bits of character-drawing. One is the morbid hysterical figure of the girl Lena; the other is the st of Docker, the curate. He is all airs and affectation cynicism until his chief is attacked, when he beco own surprise, his boldest champion. The author sh grotesque expressions such as "air givingness," "a ness," and "velleities." She has the gift of putting good story.

There are two couples playing at cross purposes d greater part of JOHN JONES, CURATE (Fisher Unwin, 6s. are such a long time over sorting themselves properly strain upon the reader's nerves gets rather severe. novel is original, pleasantly written, and with plent colour. Miss Gwendolen Pryce bears a Welsh name has taken the little isle of Anglesey as her especial Some of the characters are interesting, but it canno that any are drawn with remarkable insight. The c his rival, young Rees, are perhaps the two best; ladies, curiously enough, are somewhat shadowy. conscientious endeavour to draw a picture of modern Welsh habits, and the result is a creditable novel tha doubt be popular among those who are not afraid to gr the intricacies of Cymric spelling.

THE AWAKENING OF ANTHONY WEIR (Religi Society, 3s. 6d.), by Silas K. Hocking, gives us a car of the mental evolution of a man who becomes a minis strong vein of worldliness in his nature. The stor bably cause some flutterings in Dissenting circl honestly, yet not over ruthlessly, lays bare the world that governs too many chapels. In its way it is a sermon on the issue raised in Anthony Weir, despi that Mr. Hocking does not stir the passions of his very deeply. For so practised a writer, the plan of a second chapter forecast a part of the story seems to take in construction.

The Purpose Novel.

MASTER AND SLAVE, by Alfred T. Story (Brimley Johnson, 2s.), has rather too pronounced a flavour of the Socialistic pamphlet about it, but is an extremely pathetic little sketch. It tells of the terrible life led by an agricultural labourer under the worst conditions, and of the martyrdom of his wife. It is piteous when the poor woman rejoices in dying at the thought that her death will enable the little growing-up daughters to have a bedroom to themselves and escape the awful overcrowding that she dreads. Mr. Story's narrative style is telling and appropriate.

GOD'S REBEL, by Hulbert Fuller (Jarrold, 6s.), has an idea in it. In fact, one might almost say it has too many ideas. It is long, rambling, and a little incoherent, with here and there a leap into farce, and occasionally a rather startling trenching on very serious ground. There is hardly room in the same book for the purely farcical publishing firm of Goldsmith-Smith and the medical question discussed on page 328. Then the strike in chapter twenty-two, the love-stories of Julia, of Enid, Mabel, and Nannette—they should have made half-a-dozen novels, rather than a single involved one. And the title? We have had too many of its kind of late. There is no particular connexion between the Deity and any character in the whole inconsequent, if clever and unconventional, novel.

THE TEMPTRESS, by William Le Queux (Ward, Lock, 6s.), is like the rest of its author's sensational stories. The plot is not badly worked out. Mr. Le Queux is fond of generalities, which sometimes have the incontestable merit of truth. Take this one: "The majority of cases of suicide by pistol or by poison would not have occurred if the weapon or potion had been absent."

Mr. William Westall has, perhaps by some subtlety unknown to himself, put a quiet and underlying humour into his last book HER LADYSHIP'S SECRET (Chatto and Windus, 6s.), much of which should be thoroughly serious. The title fits only about an eighth of the book. The "secret" is shelved too long; when it appears in the latter half of the book it proves to concern Lady Bramber—formerly Mrs. King, a widow, robbed of her child by her brother, who has adopted it. As Lady Bramber, the mother finds her first husband alive—the unscrupulous President of a fictitious South American Republic, and the guest of her second husband. In the neighbourhood lives the unrecognized daughter with her adopted parents—all three of whom are very well characterized. The "situation" is strong; but Mr. Westall seems to have written it in a rather perverse mood of levity. Still much of the book bears the impress of probability, and in one way or another it is all interesting.

IMPERTINENT DIALOGUES (Arrowsmith, 3s. 6d.) are light, frothy, and brisk. Mr. Cosmo Hamilton has attained to considerable skill in this kind of writing, and if he never goes below the surface he is at least generally amusing. These dialogues are ephemeral enough: they are all concerned with "topics of the day"—the war, charity entertainments, theatricals, private and public, and any other little matters familiar to Londoners—and they are full of conversation that is lively and up-to-date. Most of them have appeared before, in the pages of the World and the Outlook.

RED FATE, by Edmund Fortes (Greening, 6s.), has some signs about it of having been written by a woman as well as by a novice at fiction making. It is crude and sentimental, especially where male dialogue is brought in. At the same time, there is a distinct attempt at realising an uncommon type of temperament. The author has not taken a stock young man for her principal character and made him do the proper things. She has a powerful presentiment in her own mind of a storm-tossed human being. That her presentment of him on paper is a little less powerful is not extraordinary. On the whole, it is worth while to tell her to go on.

IN REAL LIFE (Drane, 6s.) Mr. Charles S. Marshall tells an old-fashioned story of life at a sea-side boarding-house, all too

AUTHORS AND PUBLIS

In addition to the new volume by Mr announced in Literature entitled "Lon Messrs. Cassell have a new serial (fortnigh trated work in preparation, called "Living L and its Play, its Humour and its Pathos, Scenes," edited by Mr. George R. Sims. Par on October 23. Another new serial which are about to start in fortnightly parts beginni is "The Nation's Pictures: A Selection Modern Paintings in the Public Galleries of reproduced in colours. Each part will conta plates, with descriptive text. The Old Maste as well as in Art, are being taken up by Me will start their "Standard Library" of shilling on October 25 with "Adam Bede." It will, equal in appearance to the usual six-shilli November volume will be Kingsley's "Westwa other items in Messrs. Cassell's now announced in Literature are "Familiar Moths," by Mr. W. F. Kirby, assistant i Department of the British Museum (Natural Hi by coloured plates; and a promising book fo R. Kearton, entitled "Strange Adventure Land: Stories told by Mother Birds to ann illustrated by a characteristic series of ph author's brother, Mr. Cherry Kearton.

Mr. Archibald Colquhoun has written fo
"The Mastery of the Pacific"—a result of in the Pacific, where, he is convinced, the gre twentieth century will be waged. The new Mr. Henry Norman, M.P., entitled "All the be published by Mr. Heinemann shortly, and Journeys" of W. D. Howells, a companion vol
James' "Little Tour in France," with picture

Messrs. Sampson Low expect to have the
"The Times History of the War in South very shortly. "The Times Life of Queen volume, is also due this autumn, and will about twenty-five photogravure portraits co period of the Queen's life. The sixth vol Clowes' history of "The Royal Navy" will the end of the month. "Types of Naval remarks on the Development of Naval Wa Eighteenth Century," is the title of Capt work, illustrated by portraits which Mess also have in hand. Next month the same issue the history of the "Naval Brigades in War," which has been written by officers attac brigades, and edited by Surgeon T. T.
"England and France in the Mediterrane Walter Frewen Lord. Their remaining anno "Napoleon's Campaign in Poland," by F. L Japanese Miscellany" another volume of and stories of Japan, by Lafcadio Hearn; a the Meynell Hounds and Country, 1780 to 1901, with forty photogravure plates.

Messrs. Putnam are publishing Mr. A.
"Owen Glyndywr"—the chieftain who headed last fight for Independence about five hun the "Heroes of the Nations" Series. The n the series will be "Henry V., the Typical by Mr. C. L. Kingsford; and "Edward English Justinian," by Mr. Edward Jenks. prominent part in Messrs. Putnam's new volumes besides those already mentioned h also announced:—"A Memorial to William S
Mr. Charles Devidé, chess editor of the N

"Mathematical and Physical Papers"; "Life and Letters in the Fourth Century," by T. R. Glover, Classical Lecturer of St. John's College, Cambridge; "The Teaching of History," edited by Lord Acton; "English Law and the Renaissance," by Professor Maitland (Rede Lecture for 1901, with notes); "The Care of Books: From Roman Times to the End of Last Century," by J. W. Clark, Registrar of the University of Cambridge; and the first volume of "Thesaurus Palaeohibernicus," a collection of the oldest monuments of the Gaelic language, edited, with translation, notes, and a glossary, by Dr. Whitley Stokes and Professor Strachan.

"How to Study English Literature," a new volume of Mr. Grant Richards' "How to" series, will be ready on October 2.

Books to look out for at once.

"Madame Récamier and her Friends." By H. Noel Williams. With Portraits. Harper. 30s. n.

"Unstoried in History: Portraits of Some Famous Women of the Sixteenth, Seventeenth, and Eighteenth Centuries." By Gabriele Festing. Nisbet. 6s.

"The Spanish People: their Origin, Growth, and Influence." By Major Martin Hume. Heinemann. 6s.
[First volume of "The Great Peoples" Series.]

"The Tribulations of a Princess." By the anonymous author of "The Martyrdom of an Empress." Harper. 7s. 6d.
[See note on p. 290.]

"The Royal Navy from the Earliest Times to the Present Day." Edited by W. Laird Clowes. Vol. VI. Sampson Low. 25s. n.
[Opens with a history of the naval war of 1812 by President Roosevelt.]

"Lord Kitchener." By H. G. Groser. Illustrated. Pearson. 2s.

"Chivalry." By F. W. Cornish, Vice-Provost of Eton. Sonnenschein. 4s. 6d.
["Social England" Series. Illustrated.]

"The Novels of Samuel Richardson." Chapman and Hall.
[New edition in twenty volumes, complete sets ready on October 1. 2s. 6d. net and 3s. 6d. net each volume.]

"Poets of the Younger Generation." By William Archer. John Lane. 21s.
[With portraits from wood engravings by Robert Bryden.]

"Kim." By Rudyard Kipling. Macmillan. 6s.
[Illustrated by J. L. Kipling.]

"The Cankerworm: being Episodes of a Woman's Life." By George Manville Fenn. Chatto and Windus. 6s.

"Clementina." By A. E. W. Mason. Methuen. 6s.
[A romance of Jacobite times.]

"Angel." By B. M. Croker. Methuen. 6s.

"Don or Devil." By William Westall. Pearson. 6s.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

BIOGRAPHY.

FRANÇOIS DE FÉNELON. By Viscount St. Cyres. 9×5¾, 311 pp. Methuen. 10s. 6d.
[A biography, with full discussion of his relations with the mystics.]

THE LIFE OF MAJOR-GENERAL CLAUD MARTIN. By S. C. Hill. 7½×5, 156 pp. Calcutta: Thacker and Co.
[Martin has hardly had justice done to him, and students of Anglo-Indian history will find interest in this defence of the much abused and remarkable Frenchman who rose to high office under the East India Company, became the chief agent in the Government of Oudh, and accumulated a fortune which he bequeathed to philanthropic objects.]

SAINT DOMINIC. (The Saints Series.) By Jean Guiraud. Trans. by Katharine de Mattos. 7½×4¾, 194 pp. Duckworth. 3s.
[The book bears the imprimatur of Cardinal Vaughan.]

MEMOIRS AND LETTERS OF SIR JAMES PAGET. Ed. by S. Paget. 9×6, 438 pp. Longmans. 12s. 6d. n.
[The Early Life is from Sir James Paget's own memoirs; the remainder is by the editor with copious extracts from letters, diaries, &c. "His work in pathology, and his private practice have been put in outline only."]

BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.

UNDER THE GREAT BEAR. By K. Munroe. 7¾×5, 313 pp. Cassell. 3s. 6d.

THE RAINBOW GARDEN, and other Stories. By Graziana [illegible] 6½×7, 119 pp. Brimley Johnson. 3s. n.

THE WORLD'S DELIGHT. By Mary F. H. Skrine. 7½×[illegible] Lane. 6s.

THE BLUE BABY, and Other Stories. By Mrs. Molesworth [illegible] 132 pp. Cassell. 2s. 6d.

TWO BUSYBODIES. By Mrs. S. G. Arnold. 7¼×5¼, 312 pp. [illegible]
[The adventures of two little boys.]

RELIGION FOR THE HEART, and Other Readings. Illustra[illegible] Religious Tract Society. 1s.

GRIMM'S FAIRY TALES. Ed. by Marian Edwardes. [illegible] 8×5½, 400 pp. Dent. 5s. n.
[Prettily got up in light green ornamental cover. Copio[illegible] tions by Mr. Anning Bell.]

FICTION.

LITTLE CHÉRIE; OR, THE TRAINER'S DAUGHTER. By [illegible] Dixie. 7½×5, 207 pp. Treherne. 1s.
[A slight "pretty" story of how Lord Cairnsmore came [illegible] the daughter of a trainer.]

THE LITTLE SAINT OF GOD. A heroine of the Red Terror. [illegible] F. Cuninghame. 7¾×5¾, 328 pp. Hurst and Blackett. 6s.
[Closely founded on fact, giving the story of the Ma[illegible] Rouérie, the great Chouan leader in Brittany, and his love [illegible] de Moellien, "the Little Saint of God."]

THE WOOING OF GREY EYES. By R. Stephens. 8×[illegible] Murray. 6s.
[A collection of stories, the title story—an Irish [illegible] occupying half the book.]

DESPAIR'S LAST JOURNEY. By D. C. Murray. 7½×[illegible] Chatto and Windus. 6s.
[A long novel of theatrical life in London and about the [illegible] Paul Armstrong's marriage with a wife who takes to drink. [illegible] for another woman leads to the Divorce Court, and [illegible] vaguely finds peace in the thought of "duty" on the last p[illegible]

NEW CANTERBURY TALES. By G. M. Hewlett. 7¾×5[illegible] Constable. 6s.
[Mediæval tales told by travellers on "the Pilgrima' w[illegible]

IN THE GATES OF THE NORTH. By Standish O'Grad[illegible] 171 pp. Watkins. 3s. 6d.
[Tells the story of how Cuculain held "the Gates of [illegible] against a host of invaders. The reader, says Mr. O'Grad[illegible] the story at first "a severe mental exercise," but will be r[illegible] enjoying "a great tale, one of the greatest in the whole w[illegible] well told in fine poetical prose.]

THE GIANT'S GATE. By Max Pemberton. 7¾×5¼, 360 pp. [illegible] [Described as "Mr. Pemberton's largest and greate[illegible] Describes an attempt to depose the President and found a[illegible] modern Paris.]

TALES FROM TOLSTOI. Trans. by by R. Nisbet Bain. 7¾×[illegible] Jarrold. 6s.

THE CRIME OF THE CRYSTAL. By Fergus Hume. 7¾×[illegible] Digby Long. 6s.
[Another of Mr. Hume's brightly told mystery stories [illegible] murder is traced to its source partly by visions in the crysta[illegible]

——AND AFTERWARDS? By Mrs. H. E. Gorst. 7¾×[illegible] Greening. 6s.
[The revenge of a woman on an artist who had wronge[illegible] bachelor days. The skill with which the plot is hand[illegible] noticeable than the style of the telling, which is risque and [illegible] "smart."]

"WHERE THE ORANGES GROW." By N. A. Leykis. [illegible] Count S. C. De Soissons. 7¾×5¼, 336 pp. Greening. 6s.
[The adventures of a party of Russian travellers in N[illegible] Carlo, Rome, Naples, and Venice. The author is describ[illegible] "Mark Twain of Russia," but the Russians do not quite reveal [illegible] of the "Innocents," and it evaporates a little in the transl[illegible]

LE CRÉPUSCULE DES DIEUX. By Elemir Bourges. 7¼×[illegible] Paris; Stock. Fr.3.50.
[A reprint of the famous work, long out of print, o[illegible] chosen last year as member of the Goncourt Academy.]

MASTER OF MEN. By E. P. Oppenheim. 7¾×5¼, 314 pp. M[illegible]
[One of the author's well-written and moving stor[illegible] cultured Socialist mechanic who rises to Parliamentary [illegible] hampered by his early marriage to a [illegible] girl.

HISTORY.

THE LAST DAYS OF THE FRENCH MONARCHY. By SOPHIA H. MACLEHOSE. 7½×5½. 391 pp. MacLehose. 6s. n.

[A popular account, ending at 1788. Another volume is to carry on the story.]

A VANISHED ARCADIA. Some Account of the Jesuits in Paraguay, 1607-1767. By R. B. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM. 9×5¾. 291 pp. Heinemann.

[" Rightly or wrongly, but according to their lights, they strove to teach the Indian population all the best part of the European progress of the times in which they lived, shielding them sedulously from all contact with commercialism, and standing between them and the Spanish settlers, who would have treated them as slaves."]

THE GROWTH OF THE EMPIRE. By A. W. JOSE. 8½×5½. 422 pp. Murray. 6s.

[This popular account of the growth of the Empire has already been published in Australia. It is now much augmented.]

LITERARY.

THE ANGLO-SAXON REVIEW. Vol. X. 49, Rupert-street. 21s.

THE WORKS OF SIR PHILIP SIDNEY. (University College, London. The Quain Essay, 1901.) By EDITH J. MORLEY. 9×5¾. 60 pp. H. Rees. 1s. n.

MISCELLANEOUS.

L'UNIQUE MOYEN. By COMTE LÉON TOLSTOY. Trans. from the Russian by J. W. Bienstock. 7½×4¾. 32 pp. Paris: Stock. 50c.

[The latest production of Tolstoy's; written during his recent illness. The "Sole Way" is the sole way to freedom—namely, to throw off conventional religion, and conform to the divine law of Fraternity.]

FROM THE HEART OF THE ROSE. By HELEN MILMAN (Mrs. C. Crofton). 7½×5½. 216 pp. Lane. 5s. n.

[In the form of letters, dealing with gardens and many other things "natural, serious, and frivolous." The frontispiece is a very interesting photograph of Mr. G. F. Watts in his garden.]

DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE OF PLAYS, &c., 1901. 7×4½. 72 pp. French.

FRENCH'S INDEX TO READINGS AND RECITATIONS, 1901. 7×4½. 47 pp. French.

A HAPPY MOTHERS' MEETING, and Other Addresses for Mothers. 7½×5. 199 pp. Religious Tract Society. 2s.

MIDDLE CLASS COOKERY. By "VERA." 8½×5½. 190 pp. Cartwright. 6d.

EARLY RENAISSANCE ARCHITECTURE IN ENGLAND. By J. A. GOTCH, F.S.A. 9½×6½. 281 pp. Batsford. 21s. n.

[Quite distinct from the author's well-known large work "Architecture of the Renaissance in England." It begins the story in the reign of Henry VII. and stops short of Inigo Jones. Profusely illustrated with photographs and plans.]

ELECTRICAL ENGINEERS' CENTRAL STATION DIRECTORY, 1901-2. 8½×5½. 522 pp. Biggs.

THE BOOK OF THE GRAPE. Handbooks of Practical Gardening. Vol. III. By H. W. WARD, F.R.H.S. 7½×5½. 97 pp. Lane. 2s. 6d. n.

THE AMHERST PAPYRI. An Account of the Greek Papyri in the Collection of the Right Hon. Lord Amherst of Hackney. By B. P. GRENFELL, D.Litt., and A. S. HUNT, D.Litt. Part II. 13½×10½. 213 pp. Frowde. 52s. 6d. n.

MILITARY.

PICTURES OF WAR. By J. STUART. 7½×5½. 111 pp. Constable. 7s. 6d.

WAR NOTES. By COL. D. VILLEBOIS MAREUIL. Trans. by F. Lees. 7½×5½. 283 pp. Black. 5s.

ARTS UNDER ARMS. A University Man in Khaki. By M. FITZGIBBON. 7½×5½. 232 pp. Longmans. 5s. n.

[The author is a Moderator in Classics at Trinity College, Dublin, and volunteered for the war. Gives, as the author believes, the first published account of the capture of the 13th Battalion of Imperial Yeomanry by Christian de Wet outside Lindley.]

PHILOSOPHY.

DICTIONARY OF PHILOSOPHY AND PSYCHOLOGY. Vol. I. Ed. by J. M. BALDWIN. 10½×7½. 641 pp. Macmillan. 21s.

[This is an American undertaking, the editor being a Professor at Princeton. But on the long list of "consulting editors" and contributors are some English names, such as Prof. Poulton, Dr. B. Bosanquet, Dr. G. F. Stout, and others, and the editor has been

SONGS IN THE NIGHT, and other Poems. By 7½×5. 140 pp. Jarrold. 1s. 6d.

WAGNER'S NIBELUNGEN RING. Vol. II. Sieg of the Gods. Translated into English Verse 163 pp. Longmans. 4s. 6d.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITI

A KENTUCKY CARDINAL AND AFTERMATH. I 286 pp. Macmillan. 6s.

[Delightful pictures by Mr. Hugh Thomson.]

A DIGIT OF THE MOON. Trans. by F. W. BAIN.
Parker. 3s. 6d. n.

[We are glad to see a reprint of this beautifu has a new stanza from the MS. printed on the
in a prefatory note.]

POPE'S RAPE OF THE LOCK. (Flowers of Par
Beardsley. 5½×4½. 71 pp. Lane. 1s. n.

[Reproduces Aubrey Beardsley's well-known

ANNA KARENIN. (Library Ed. of Count Tolstoy' Trans. by CONSTANCE GARNETT. 9×6. 493+426
360 pp. Heinemann.

[The beginning of the new Library Editi translated by Mrs. Constance Garnett, the of Turgenev. She believes it to be the onl English version. The preservation of the feminine says, no parallel in English and is not in accorda Russians who speak English. The book is we form, with a portrait of Tolstoy at twenty.]

THE POEMS OF SCHILLER. Trans. by E. P. ARN

SCIENCE.

ZOOLOGY. (Cambridge Natural Science Manuals and E. W. MACBRIDE. 9×6. 632 pp. Cambrid 10s. 6d. n.

DRAGONS OF THE AIR. An Account of Extinct
G. H. SEELEY, F.R.S. 7½×5. 238 pp. Methuen

[The author worked at the subject for n
Adam Sedgwick and, with the aid of the Ro studied all the specimens in Europe. The popular and clear in arrangement, with abund Thus treated the subject is new to the public, an importance in solving the mystery of the growth

SPORT.

AMERICAN TROTTING AND PACING HORSE
7½×5. 118 pp. Philadelphia: Coates.

THEOLOGY.

THOUGHTS ON OUR LORD'S TEMPTATION.
PALMER. 6½×4½. 380 pp. Parker. 4s. 6d.

A CRITICAL AND EXEGETICAL COMMENTARY
OF ST. PETER AND ST. JUDE. By REV. C.
353 pp. T. and T. Clark. 10s. 6d.

OLD TESTAMENT HISTORY. By G. W. WADE,
Methuen. 6s.

[This book is similar in its purpose to volume which we noticed recently—viz., it gives criticism now presents it to us. Both books kind. Dr. Wade's is fuller in detail, and o Ottley's is, we think, clearer in arrangement, an it perhaps more useful for educational purposes.]

THE SONG OF SONGS. Selections from the Sermo by the REV. B. BLANLAND. (Library of Dev Methuen. 2s.

[The selections are from 31 of the 86 sermon more truly on the spiritual life generally—wri Clairvaux, a life of whom is prefixed to the work

THE GREEK CATHOLIC CHURCH. By R. B.
70 pp. Williams and Norgate. 1s.

[A paper read before the Exeter College C union with the Eastern Church as the true Cathol

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAV

FLORENTINE HERALDRY. A Supplement to t
H. WILLS. 8½×5½. 208 pp. Dean. 10s. 6d.

THE LAST OF THE MASAI. By S. L. and HILDEG
180 pp. Heinemann.

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 207. SATURDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1901.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES OF THE DAY	311, 312, 313
"LITERATURE" PORTRAITS.—XXII. Algernon Charles Swinburne	314
THE QUALIFICATIONS OF A CRITIC.—A "Personal View," by Stephen Gwynn	316
THE COMPLETE SMOKER	318
FOREIGN LETTER.—Germany	319
THE DRAMA, by A. B. Walkley	320
CURRENT LITERATURE—
Asia and Europe	321
Highways and Byways in the Lake District	322
The Voyage of Ithobal	323
To the South Polar Regions—Who Killed Amy Robsart?—The Childhood of Queen Victoria	324, 325
Kim—The Just and the Unjust—New Canterbury Tales	325, 326, 327
CORRESPONDENCE—Crabbe's Aldeburgh—"Jack Harkaway" and the Authors' Society—"Master and Slave"	327, 328
AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for	328, 329
LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS	329, 330

NOTES OF THE DAY.

The subject of the Literature Portrait next week will be MR. H. G. WELLS.

We shall devote space next week to Educational Publications.

* * * *

Books to read just published:—

"Kim." By Rudyard Kipling. (Macmillan.)

"Poets of the Younger Generation." By W. Archer. (Lane.)

"Unstoried in History." Portraits of famous women of the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries. By Gabrielle Festing. (Nisbet.)

"The Right of Way." By Gilbert Parker.

"The Secret Orchard." By Egerton Castle.

"Mousme." By Clive Holland. (Pearson.)

* * * *

During the war fever, the public interest being to some extent diverted from fiction, the publishers to some extent stopped publishing novels. But the authors did not to any extent stop writing them. They accumulated, so to say, like wine or spirits in bond; and now they are being taken out of bond in a scrambling hurry, which suggests that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is suspected of a dark design of imposing an excise duty on them at an early date. No fewer than ninety novels were, we understand, recently offered to the trade for subscription on a single morning. An excise duty heavy enough to seeing that the Bishop of London took up the cudg recited, "with tears in his eyes," passages from his w him an "Imperial Poet," and inquired: "How coul be Catholic which didn't begin by being Imperial?" does not seem to have used the word "Catholic" i accepted theological sense, but as a literary critic impeachable.

* * * *

Dramatic composition is one of the many recent developments of women in England, and particularly i where Clara Viebig, Ernst Rosmer and others hav some success, presenting the strong self-reliant wom stage. Much interest has been aroused by the new pla just produced at the Gymnase Theatre, the first drama a French woman writer, Jeanne Marni (Mme. Fournie well known as the successful author of sprightly dial was at one time secretary to La Fronde, the Pa paper entirely conducted and written by women. He play is much more ambitious. Its plot is a peculiar an if not a pleasing, one. A servant in the house Chaisles becomes a mother. The father of the ch called Geneviève) is admittedly Madame Chaisles' Mme. Chaisles regards it as her duty to keep the c house and constitute herself its civil mother. But thou what she conceives to be her duty, her attitude continual reproach; and she reveals no sign of tender innocent girl Geneviève. The struggle in her mi duty and repugnance is given with fine dramatic extremely careful observation of the life of middle-clas

* * * *

When fiction has become, as we are often told it wi form of literature and the Universities include it in t culum, Calverley's famous examination paper in "I will take its proper place as a model test paper. But was not the first to anticipate the future, and M Warren Vernon has in a "Boz Club Paper," just issued, a "Students' Guide to the School of Literæ composed by the Rev. H. E. Tweed, of Oriel, which Calverley's jeu d'esprit by two years. It is quite as Calverley's and on a much larger scale. A good ma authors besides Dickens are among the subjects "set examination, but to the author of "Pickwick" "gr will be attached in the examination."

* * * *

Some of Mr. Tweed's questions would not be ou in a "general paper" for a school scholarship examinati

Translate into the style of Dr. Johnson:—

never lighted on this orb, which she hardly seemed to touch, a more delightful vision. I saw her just above the horizon, decorating and cheering the elevated sphere she just began to move in; glittering like the morning star, full of life, splendour, and joy."

Mr. Tweed, in fact, takes a higher view than Calverley of the intelligence of his student of Dickens.

Point out he asks the principal coincidences between the narratives of Gil Blas' initiation into Madrid life by the valets of the noblemen, and Sam Weller's introduction to Bath at the Leg-of-Mutton Swarry.

The examinee is also invited to Compare the Mrs. Harris of Sairy Gamp with the Daemon of Socrates.

The latter question is under the heading "Philosophy and History of Philosophy," &c., and in this section the first question referring to Dickens is the extremely subtle one—

Is Mr. Sam Weller's Philosophy adequately described as an expansion of the system of Mr. Weller senior?

* * * *

No one, so far as is known, has ever attempted to enter for Mr. Tweed's examination, and we do not wonder. Calverley's was comparatively easy, and only required research. Mr. Vernon, in fact, supplies a key to it. In question twelve Calverley's genius both for practical joking and for parody got the better of him; and the sentence in the style of Sam Weller which he asks the examinee to illustrate by other references to dumb animals speaking is an invention of his own. It is this:—"'Any think for air and enterprise,' as the wery old donkey observed ven they voke him up from his deathbed to carry ten gentlemen to Greenwich in a tax cart." Mr. Vernon, by the way, supplies an apt illustration of Jingle's—"half-a-crown in the bill if you look at the waiter." "Forty years ago," he says, "when I was a member of White's Club, before it was remodelled and reformed, the prices were so extortionate that it was a common saying among the members that if you looked at the waiter it was a shilling, if you spoke to him it was half-a-crown, but that if he spoke to you it was five shillings."

* * * *

Packages left to the nation with instructions that they are not to be opened until after the lapse of a certain number of years are more often than not disappointing. The Soane Museum in Lincoln's-inn-fields has afforded more than one instance of this. But the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris possesses certain papers that at any rate ought to be interesting to lovers of literature. The latest bequest is the diaries and correspondence of Edmond de Goncourt, which are not to be opened until twenty years after his death. The same institution possesses also the papers and manuscripts of Edgar Quinet, which are held back until 1910; the love letters of de Musset, written to a lady who had promised to destroy them but failed to do so when it came to the point; and some bulky parcels containing the correspondence and other unpublished papers of Renan and Thiers. De Musset's letters will be unsealed in nine years' time, Renan's in 1920, and Thiers' ten years after the death of the lady who has presented them. There are also fourteen volumes of unpublished letters from Louis Philippe, his son, several European monarchs, and distinguished politicians and men of letters. Parisians should have plenty to talk about during the first quarter of the black on hand-made paper. Circumstances conne Book of Common Prayer render it essential that order to be of historic value, shall be issued with the King's printers; but Mr. Edward Arnold ha secure for subscribers to the Essex House Press pu first offer of copies if applied for before the 31st ins date such priority cannot be guaranteed.

* * *

A FUNERAL IN FLORENCE.

Over the Arno sinks the sun:
The distant hills stand out in gold,
Their purple ridges darkly scrolled
Against the sky, while Iris-souled
Over the Arno sinks the sun.

The muffled drums throb out a knell;
A wave of sound sweeps to and fro,
A myriad solemn footsteps go,
And on the bridge the torches glow,
While heavily rings the passing bell.

A fragrance from the censer swings,
Where priests and choir their threnod
Breathe out beneath the brooding sky,
For all the sleeping souls who lie
Borne softly down on Death's dark wi

The mournful music sobs and wails;
Across the bridge the thronging feet
Pass with their dull funereal beat,
And wind along the stately street
Where Justice stands and holds her sc

Blind Justice stands and holds her sca
The funeral pomp flows proudly past,
Pure flow'rs upon the bier are cast,
The mourners' tears are falling fast—
But Justice stands and holds the scale

MARY BRADFORD

Lord Rosebery is writing a history of the Sta with which he is connected on his late mother's sid

It is stated that the name of Mr. J. E. C. Bodle historian, was suggested in connexion with the Go Queensland (which will shortly become vacant), Queenslanders desired to have a Governor of high the political world.

The house in which Ruskin was born in 1
Hunter-street, Brunswick-square, is being complete
It was erected at the close of the eighteenth centu

Miss Corelli has begun an action for libel proprietors of a weekly newspaper called the Topic

On and after October 21 the Irish Literary perform two new plays, the pieces selected bei and Grania, a play in English by Mr. George M W. B. Yeats, and The Twisting of the Rope, a pla
Dr. Douglas Hyde.

Last week the death took place of Mr. J. G.

The street sale of the Petersburgskaya Gazeta has been prohibited for one month on account of the publication in its columns of details concerning the present stay of Count Leo Tolstoy in the Crimea.

The Books of the Blind.

In the new (Bohn) edition of Prescott's "History of the Conquest of Mexico" there is an introduction by Mr. George Parkin Winship, telling the story of the infirmities with which the author struggled throughout his laborious life. A missile thrown at him in play in his college dining hall permanently impaired his eyesight. Thenceforward he could read on an average, with great effort, rather less than two hours a day; and even this light labour (as other students would consider it) often brought on severe and protracted neuralgia. In spite of these sufferings and hindrances he became one of the greatest, and decidedly the most popular, of the American historians. It is a cheering story of human resolution triumphing over difficulties which a weak man would deem insuperable; and the parallel cases which can be adduced only make it more encouraging. There is the case of Francis Parkman, whose life closely resembled Prescott's, and who, similarly impeded, wrote books equally important, if less widely popular. There are also the cases of Milton, who was blind when he wrote Paradise Lost, and of Henry Fawcett, whose blindness did not hinder him from mastering and expounding the science of Political Economy. Probably there are other cases, though we fail to recall them at the moment. Looking at these instances one is tempted to speculate whether, in the case of the brave man who determinedly makes the best of things, this terrible loss of a precious faculty may not sometimes have its compensations. The Greeks certainly had the idea that it might, as we see in the story of Demodocus in the "Odyssey." The gods, it is written, gave him both good and evil—they robbed him of his eyesight, but bestowed on him the Divine gift of song. And Homer himself lives in legend as "The blind old man of Scio's rocky isle." The idea that inspiration—to use a more general word than "song"—may be the reward given to console the blind is evidently an old one; and perhaps, with an effort of the imagination, one can realise how this may be. For the loss of sight—appalling though the mere thought of it appears to every one—does not isolate a man from the interests of his fellows quite so much as the loss of speech or hearing. We have all known blind persons who have been very agreeable companions; whereas, whatever one's pity for a deaf man, it is not so easy—though with improved mechanical appliances and the wonderful methods of lipreading it is becoming much easier—to make a friend of him. The feeling that they can thus hold communion with and become intimate with their fellows preserves the blind, when they are brave, from despair and stimulates them to effort. On the other hand they are shut off from the world to this extent, that they escape a great many of its trivialities and distractions. They are almost compelled to concentrate their thoughts on the particular thing that happens to be of interest to them, and the fact that they do so much of their thinking without constant reference to print or manuscript may well help them to broad and luminous generalization. With most of us our reading is out of all proportion to our thinking. This can hardly be with those who are wholly or partially blind. One cannot indeed draw any

Literature Portraits.—X

ALGERNON CHARLES SWINE

In Mr. Algernon Charles Swinburne the world last of that splendid constellation of great poets the age of Victoria. Perhaps one cannot call Mr. star of the first magnitude; there has rather be wildly cometary about his career, which threatens carry him beyond the bounds even of poetic lic star he undoubtedly is, and his name will always be "high collateral glory" near the names of Tenny and Matthew Arnold, along with those of Mrs. Brow Morris, and Rossetti.

It is still a matter for discussion, indeed, Swinburne's place in the estimation of posterity w rear of the first group or at the head of the seco it is too early at present to attempt to settle t When a great writer is happily still amongst us, that the comparison of his best work with that something more than usually odious in it. Edward has told us how odd he found it to think of Macaula and Mackintosh bawling at one another acro "Which is the greatest poet? what is the greates greatest poet?" and so forth. At times the argum less enough, though it must always appeal to so than to others. Mr. Swinburne's own critical metho "I have never been able," he has said, "to see attract men to the profession of criticism but the n of praising." This is a far cry from the methods of Revue, with the famous motto which it took f Syrus. Of course it has to be remembered that a critic, who has to examine whatever is laid befor in so happy a position as the amateur, who reads o work that attracts him and is able to confine h classics. And Mr. Swinburne himself has not alw what he preached, as a certain paper on "Whit remind us. Still one has pleasure in remembering ation, "My chief aim, as my chief pleasure, in all as these has been rather to acknowledge and applaud noble and precious than to scrutinize or to stig might perceive to be worthless and base." And, Swinburne's prose work consists mainly of literary h always stimulating and impressive, even if it be embroidered with superlatives.

The same tendency is responsible for most of Mr. Swinburne's verse, and has, perhaps, done most to early genius from developing as freely as did that or Browning from a much smaller germ. It is c member that, if we compare the work which each of poets had published by the age of thirty, we must tempted to assign the first place to Mr. Swinburne. know what Tennyson and Browning, when they were had done that could be set above, or even beside, " Calydon" and the "Poems and Ballads," for lyrical m tained splendour of style. But Mr. Swinburne, for re might be variously described, can hardly perhaps c a rank to-day as the best judges would have all he had to pay for his courage by listening to critics who held that "Dolores," for instance, was "only a poetic and highly-elaborated form of caterwauling." We do not now judge a poet solely by the standard of an undeviating propriety: it is an artistic heresy to do so, and the pendulum has swung rather to the other extreme. If an objection is now to be raised against ranking Mr. Swinburne in the very highest class of our poets, it is due to the absence of what Rossetti called "fundamental brain-work" in his books. The Quarterly Review long ago accused him of going with too light a heart to so serious a business as poetry, and he himself has told us that he worked "simply by impulse and to please" himself. "Mes vers," he said once, "sont des vers de jeune homme"; his critics assert that they have never attained manhood.

But poetry is not wholly an affair of the intellect. Matter and manner must both go to the making of the highest poetry. Mr. Swinburne is perhaps the finest instance in our literature of what can be done by manner alone. We cannot place him with Homer, yet he must not be refused admission where the greatest classical lyrists have gained a place. Like Coleridge and Poe and Gérard de Nerval, he has more in common with the musician than with the poet. As an inventor of harmonies he has scarcely had an equal in our language, and his mastery of every form of verse is to be admired even more than it is to be praised. "It seems a paradox," said Lowell of "Atalanta," "to say that there can be too much poetry in a poem, and yet this is a fault with which all poets begin, and which some never get over." Mr. Swinburne has never got over the exuberance of his imagery and the wonderful richness of his verbal music. To dwell upon the defect, if defect it be, seems unnecessary and ungrateful, but Mr. Swinburne is so great a poet that one feels it necessary to show his limitations and to take his excellence for granted. When one recalls the perfect beauty of his best work, of the "Garden of Proserpine" and the "Hymn to Proserpine," the "Garden of Cymodoce," and the choruses in "Atalanta," it is hard to deny a place among the highest to the man who revealed such undreamt-of possibilities of lyrical music in the language of Shakespeare and Milton. Without doubt Mr. Swinburne is one of our greatest lyrists, and, though his work will be rigidly sifted by time, we can hardly doubt that some of it will live and be ever fresh in the mouths of poets and lovers.

There is one special aspect in which Mr. Swinburne deserves the land and honour of every Englishman. He has had few equals and no superior as "the exultant singer of the sea and the sea-wind, the high-hearted lyrist of the great deeds and imperial destiny of England." The heart stirs as with the sound of a trumpet at the gloriously resounding lines in which he sings of > England, mother born of seamen, daughter fostered of the sea,

> Mother more beloved than all who bear not all their children free,
> Reared and nursed and crowned and cherished by the sea-wind and the sun,
> Sweetest land and strongest, face most fair and mightiest heart in one.

Even a man from Bedfordshire, as Stevenson has observed, who scarcely knows one end from the other of the channel steamer till she begins to move, and is as sea-sick as Nelson, finds a sympathetic interest in the sea, and no poet has ex-

This is the great style, simple, direct, and son had the time, it would be a delightful task to go Swinburne's works and make a little anthology of
It would begin with that magnificent passage, what may be called the Decorated style of blank ve Meleager describes the voyage of the Argo, when p the "sunless and sonorous gulfs" to see the her beheld "the lightning of the intolerable wave," an

> The whole white Euxine clash together an > Full-mouthed and thunderous from a thou

It would contain the story of the lover who would > Go back to the great sweet mother,

> Mother and lover of men, the sea

It would give us that glorious song, with all the freshness of the waves in it, which tells how

> The wind is as iron that rings,
> The foam-heads loosen and flee,
> It swells and welters and swings,
> The pulse of the tide of the sea.

The music would rise and climb to that sy echoes how

> With chafe and change of surges chim
> The clashing channels rocked and > Large music, wave to wild wave timin
> And all the choral water sang.

As long as we love the sea, such an anthology s to us as the music of the waves and the winds.

Mr. Swinburne's life has been marked by public interest save in the field of literature.
average reader knows or cares to know of his biog summed up in the words of Vapereau, who tells born in London, studied at Oxford, and visited I more than that has indeed been told of Mr. Swi doubt the future biographer will reveal much mo personal life." But we are chiefly concern columns with the literary aspect of Mr. Swinb and we need only glance at the other salient facts

Mr. Swinburne comes of an ancient North with a romantic history. Many of his poems recall one of the earliest we read how "the ways are sa to the Tyne," a statement which must appeal t travelled by the roads of Northumberland. Am poems we note the "Jacobite's Exile," with it of some similar and still finer lines of Macaulay :—

> O lordly flow the Loire and Seine,
> And loud the Dark Durance,
> But bonnier shine the braes of Tyne,
> Than a' the fields of France,
> And the waves of Till that speak sae
> Gleam goodlier where they glanc

Mr. Swinburne never lost his affection for

> The sea-banks fair,
> And the sweet grey, gleaming sk
> And the lordly strand of Northumber
> And the goodly towers thereby.

His father was an admiral—appropriate parent

most University men with the itch of writing, he helped to fill the pages of a University magazine. Its name was the Undergraduate Papers, and it was edited by the late Professor Nichol of Glasgow; amongst the chief contributors were T. H. Green, Mr. E. V. Dicey, and Dr. Birkbeck Hill. Mr. Swinburne's main contribution—an essay on Marlowe and Webster—shows how early his tastes were led in the direction of the Elizabethan drama, which he has since done so much to illustrate.

The most striking of many fruitful experiences in Mr. Swinburne's Continental travel was a visit to Walter Savage Landor at Florence, shortly before his death. Mr. Swinburne afterwards wrote,

> I came as one whose thoughts half linger,
> Half run before;
> The youngest to the oldest singer
> That England bore.

He was already entitled to call himself a poet, for the publication of "The Queen Mother and Rosamond" had brought him definitely before the public. This tragedy was a somewhat crude and amateurish piece of work, showing much Elizabethan influence and (in a less degree) that of Browning, without any hint of the lyrical splendours that were to follow. About the end of 1862 Mr. Swinburne settled for a time in Dante Rossetti's house in Cheyne-walk, of which Mr. George Meredith also proposed to be an inmate. Among the friends thus made was Mr. Theodore Watts-Dunton, who exerted a powerful influence over the young poet, and with whom Mr. Swinburne's later years have been spent.

The poetical environment in which Mr. Swinburne then lived seems to have favoured the burgeoning of his genius, which soon burst upon the world in what many readers still hold to be his finest achievement—that "unique and almost faultless work of art," "Atalanta in Calydon." This thin quarto, now so prized by collectors, with its cover designed by Dante Rossetti, was taken by all good contemporary judges to announce the advent of a new poet, who might come to rank with the very greatest names in our literature. Such lovely lyrics as that beginning

> When the hounds of spring are on winter's traces, such resplendent blank verse as the passage in which Meleager describes the voyage of the Argo, have never been surpassed by their author. In the same year Mr. Swinburne, still clinging to the dramatic form, produced the first of his plays on Mary Stuart, "Chastelard," of which J. R. Lowell said with his usual critical insight, "The hand is the hand of Swinburne, but the voice is the voice of Browning." The book somewhat cooled the hopes which "Atalanta" had raised; but the next year all doubt as to Mr. Swinburne's real poetic genius was set at rest by the meteoric blaze of the famous "Poems and Ballads." It is hardly necessary to do more than mention the storm which some of Mr. Swinburne's passionate and highly-coloured pictures of a very different state of society from ours aroused. The book changed its publisher, though not a line of it was suppressed, and Mr. Swinburne brought out a vigorous pamphlet in his own defence which nobody need nowadays read. His poems revealed a lyrical power, an intricate mastery and sweetness of language such as our literature had scarcely known before. Mr. Swinburne's next publication was "A Song of Italy," where praises of Mazzini and Garibaldi indicated the development of that republican spirit already and himself as the "Fleshly School of Poetry," Microscope," Mr. Swinburne's contribution to the is one of the most scathing pieces of invective 1875 was a very prolific year with Mr. Swinburne books of verse and two of prose then bore his name. a drama which it is easier to compare with Vi "Cromwell" than with anything else, and which yo least like "Cromwell," was the second part of completed later by "Mary Stuart." "Songs of T (Italy and France) carried on the political poetry. "Essays and Studies," together with the later "M and "Studies in Prose and Poetry," gives Mr. title to be ranked, with Coleridge and Matth among the fine poets who have also approved the critics. A study of George Chapman—in wh way, Browning was splendidly defended from the co of obscurity—was the forerunner of similar w Jonson, Shakespeare, Charlotte Brontë, and Vi in which the glowing rhapsodies of praise a more remarkable than the judicial faculty. On Swinburne returned to the Greek model which had s well in "Atalanta," and produced in "Erechtheus" comparative lack of spontaneity and freshness w balanced by its maturity of grasp and virile self-c second series of "Poems and Ballads" was chi for striking afresh that chord of sea-music been so nobly sounded in the first series. series of "Poems and Ballads," in which the of "The Armada" stirred the blood of every also revealed Mr. Swinburne as the unquestion of the nursery. But on the whole his later work h a disappointment to his early admirers. "Studi and "Songs of the Spring-tides" do not contain ver holds the memory, whilst the "Century of Rounde brilliant tour de force. The tragedies of "Locrine Sisters" are already forgotten. His genius bla when he touched the Arthurian legends, which inspired Tennyson and Arnold, and "Tristram of and "Balen" contain some of Mr. Swinburne's most assured work.

I have omitted to mention one remarkable v has never had Mr. Swinburne's name attached to i no one doubts to be his. This is the "Heptalogia," of some of the most brilliant parodies on contem that have ever been written. Occasionally, as i Tennyson and Owen Meredith, the jesting is ra but anything can be forgiven to the cleverness and with which the author exaggerated the worst mannerisms in lines like the following:—

> Mild is the mirk and monotonous music of me > diously mute as it may be,
> While the hope in the heart of a hero is br > breach of men's rapiers, resigned to the r > Made meek as a mother whose bosom-beats bo > bliss-bringing bulk of a balm-breathing ba > As they grope through the graveyard of creeds > glowing green at a groan for the grimness

W. E. GARRETT

and Iseult," as Mr. Swinburne puts it in an unpublished letter which Mr. Wise quotes in his bibliography. "If ever you see these worthless rarities," adds the poet, "please remember that they were literally a boy's work—legally an infant's. . . . When I think of the marvellous work that Rossetti (whose acquaintance I made just afterwards) had done at the same age, I am abashed at the recollection of my own rubbish." The poem was afterwards rewritten, but the University Papers remains one of the most coveted treasures in the list of private and semi-private magazine rarities. Mr. Swinburne's first book (dedicated to Dante Gabriel Rossetti), containing the two plays "The Queen-Mother" and "Rosamund," was published in 1860 by Pickering, of Piccadilly, but it is said that the volume was withdrawn before the first twenty copies had been circulated, and transferred to Moxon, who immediately issued it with a new title-page. The book has long been out of print. "Dead Love," which came next (1861), is another rarity. It appeared originally in Once a Week and was brought out in book form by Messrs. Parker and Son. The volume has never been reprinted. A year later came Mr. Swinburne's first masterpiece, "Atalanta in Calydon," dedicated "to the memory of Walter Savage Landor." Here Moxon was again the publisher, and it is generally understood that he printed only a hundred copies of the book. Anyhow, a second edition had to be issued before the year was out, though there was nothing on the title-page to distinguish it from the first edition. The third edition did not appear before 1868, by which time Mr. Swinburne had deserted Moxon for John C. Hotten, whose successors, Messrs. Chatto and Windus, have acted as Mr. Swinburne's publishers ever since. The finest edition of "Atalanta in Calydon" came from the Kelmscott Press.

"Chastelard"—dedicated to Victor Hugo—was published by Moxon in 1865, and there were a few copies remaining in the following year, when the honour of being Swinburne's publisher fell to Hotten, who issued a second edition of "Chastelard" in 1868. The cause of the transfer was the publication by Moxon in 1866 of the first series of "Poems and Ballads"—dedicated to "my friend Edward Burne-Jones"—when the storm of abuse roused by certain of the contents of Mr. Swinburne's book so alarmed the poor publisher that he only breathed freely again when he had washed his hands of the poet entirely. Hotten had to publish a second edition of "Poems and Ballads" before the end of that year, and to-day it has the largest sale of any of Mr. Swinburne's volumes. "Notes on Poems and Reviews," in 1866, and his "William Blake"—dedicated to W. M. Rossetti—and "Siena" were both published by Hotten in 1868. "Songs before Sunrise" (dedicated to Mazzini) found another publisher for the time being in Mr. F. S. Ellis, though this subsequently found its way, with the rest of Mr. Swinburne's works, to Messrs. Chatto and Windus. "Songs before Sunrise" is second only to the first series of "Poems and Ballads" in popularity, but we understand from the present publishers that there is a steady demand for all Mr. Swinburne's books.

Of his later works, all published by Messrs. Chatto and Windus, and still in print, the principal volumes are:—

"Bothwell," 1874.
"Essays and Studies," 1875.
"Erechtheus," 1876.
"A Note on Charlotte Brontë," 1877.
"Poems and Ballads" (second series), 1878.
"Songs of the Springtides," 1880.
"A Study of Shakespeare," 1880.
"Mary Stuart," 1881.
"Tristram of Lyonesse," 1882.
"A Century of Roundels," 1883.
"Marino Faliero," 1885.
"A Study of Victor Hugo," 1886.
"Miscellanies," 1886.
"Locrine," 1887.
"A Study of Ben Jonson," 1889.
"Poems and Ballads (third series)," 1889.

THE QUALIFICATIONS OF A CR

A "Personal View."

There is little peace to be had in the same wor
A. B. Walkley for those who practise the business, o have it, the art, of criticism. Speaking for m "Personal View," I find that I can rely with absolut on other critics for a complete ignorance of what writing; and I reciprocate it. But Mr. Walkley i enamoured of the business—or art—that he not only reads contemporary criticism. If he did this in an spirit of admiration, we should have no cause to co
the truth is that he goes about like the lion of Seri ing whom he may devour; and since, as he confided to the columns of a newspaper, I have an unfortun arousing his special wrath, it did not surprise me in find (on returning from a land of holidays remote interruptions) that a paper in the Pall Mall Mag bore the inoffensive title, "A Sea-side Exam Conscience," was in reality, for the most part, an at harmless obiter dictum which had been let fall in t Literature. (I ought to explain that before I wrot habitually I used to read the critical writings of M with zeal, and the habit still occasionally asserts i from the natural curiosity to see what is the latest which some other critic, if not myself, has been guilt

The iniquity in this case was that I had been (That was not always the defect with which thi charged me.) The examination of Mr. Walkley's led him to state (in the most honorific terms, fo gratitude is appropriate) that I had been pervers said, in appreciating Mr. Gosse's work, "There is o to become a critic of any consequence, and that is b the art you criticize." It appears that Mr. Norm thinks likewise that "actors, in spite of jealousy an are the best critics of acting"; and since I cannot b
Mr. Walkley I am very well content to be wro Hapgood. If his dictum had not been cited, I mig away and said, what was true, that my casual re reference to the interpretative but only to the c
Mr. Hapgood's authority gives me courage to say from Mr. Norman Hapgood nor from Mr. A. B. Walk in my judgment as good dramatic critics as any no English, have I ever derived any light upon what the unseen side of acting—the side that is turned actor and away from the audience. "Criticism," Walkley, "is the art of telling your feelings with that you can communicate them." Saving Mr presence, it is a good deal more than that. Else wou be exactly on the level of the crowd that roars with some inane farce. It is very difficult to resist the stand, above all, what the artist is driving at—what is the artist's state of mind towards his work. I must illustrate first from my own experience as an ignorant layman in regard to the art, or one of the arts, which Mr. Walkley criticizes. Two things only have illuminated for me the psychology of the actor-artist; and one was a paper read by M. Coquelin in which he discussed, amongst other things, the question whether the actor in playing a king should make himself as well as other people believe that he is a king. The other thing was a lucky chance which brought me into the same house with Mrs. Bancroft, then just quitting the stage. When she repudiated indignantly the notion that a three hundredth performance of the same part might be wearisome—"Tired of it—when you feel that you are coming into a company of people who are all glad to see you, and perhaps recognize your voice if you speak a word before you come on!" I realized, for the first time (not perhaps in words), how every performance, new or old, was the actor's means of expressing his or her emotion and awakening that response of feeling which is the object of all artists, as Dr. Hirn has set out in his very suggestive book on the "Origin of Art." I do not know if I make my point clear, but I mean that I learnt from M. Coquelin and from Mrs. Bancroft, artists representing very different standpoints, something of what acting means to an actor. And it is necessary to understand the intention. If a man paints his picture, taking for his theme, for the thing which he desires to illustrate, the incidence of light upon a figure, there is no use in criticizing it as if he meant to convey the character of a head. And I maintain that the critic will very frequently fail to understand the intention, unless he has either practised the art of painting or consorted a great deal with artists. In either case the practice of the art is the fountain-head of valuable criticism. Mr. Walkley tells us that Sarcey never wrote plays. But did Sarcey not live a good deal in the company both of dramatists and actors?

And, after all, Sarcey, admirable critic as he was, was seldom or never illuminating. He gave you an excellent common-sense judgment on the matter put before you, expressed in a way full of genial charm. But, if I am not greatly mistaken, he failed, for example, to see what Ibsen was driving at: and therein he agreed with the people who had not attempted creative work on their own account, and disagreed with the vast majority of those throughout Europe who had really tried to invent. Would Mr. Walkley really have preferred to take Sarcey's judgment of Ibsen to that, say, of Dumas fils? Of course he would not.

There is no doubt an ambiguity in the term "critic," and it may be justifiable to assert that "few dramatic critics of consequence have written plays." Mr. Walkley is mistaken, however, in thinking that the names of Corneille, Dryden, Lessing, Goethe, and Jules Lemaitre exhaust the list. Lamb would need to be added, and surely also Voltaire. But in the ages when playwriting has particularly flourished very little

Mr. Leslie Stephen, who discourses admirably abo one like Robert Louis Stevenson, who discourse like an artist, making the reader feel what the wri do, calling his attention to the means employed, ing how far the result conformed to the project asserting is merely that artists, like any other craft best judges of their own craft. Mr. Walkley himse in quoting Scott's estimate o' Jane Austen as if from heaven, and not without reason, though Scot side of craftsmanship was deficient, and on the sid impulses excessive, is not a safe authority.
Treasury, in its original form one of the monumen insight, was in that form compiled in consultation w who, had he not had better things to do, would c been among the most instructive of critics. Passion sway Mr. Swinburne violently, but who among cri than Mr. Swinburne at his best? I retract my "critics of any consequence"; there have been cri quence, like Mr. Stephen and Mr. Walkley, who h their hand at the business of actual invention. B critics of the first consequence—the men who can who are learning to read and learning to write w literature really means—critics like Lamb, Matt Stevenson, Taine, and Sainte-Beuve—I only name which has not attached to it creative work value. My exception is M. Emile Faguet, and
M. Faguet's criticism, say, of Victor Hugo, who will
M. Faguet—let him publish it or no—has not writte

Of course, almost everybody—probably even Mr. Walkley himself—has written verse, if not also as a rule, a blank verse tragedy is the skeleton in e cupboard. But I hold it well on the whole that t critic should be enough in earnest about the m publication. To begin with, it increases that hu
Mr. Walkley deprecates, but which I uphold and, him, exemplify. And, to go on with, a man whose with judging the effect of compositions will learn from watching the effect of his own. But the vital the critic ought to understand, from personal ex process which in all cases must have a certain sin elaboration and shaping of an idea, the things t chance, the things that come easily, the things tha hammered into their places, the providential ex sometimes makes into a flower what threatened t excrescence, the compromises that have to be a inward debate as to what degree of quickness in co may be expected from a reader, the relation of an a to its suggestion in nature or in fact, and so on; in the ups and downs, leaps and delays, exultations an of teeth, that go to the work of composition. The analogue of the great, and the critic who has tried a th for him will be quick to recognize a similar effort, b

THE COMPLETE SMOKER.

"Their pipes were often cold, their tents melancholy," said the Duke of Cornwall as he recalled to the Blacktest chiefs the days of their fathers when "the Government of the Great Mother" first came to them. Nothing could be more fitting than that it should fall to England to repay the debt of gratitude which the East owes to the West for a civilization founded, if we accept as our guide the author of "The Soverane Herbe" (Grant Richards, 6s.), upon tobacco. To the ancestors of "Running Rabbit," "Crop-Eared Wolf," and the rest we owe the discovery of the uses of tobacco; and the only drawback to our satisfaction in restoring prosperity to the Indian of to-day, or, in the Duke's metaphor, relighting his pipe, is that he has, we believe, so far degenerated from ancestral custom as to smoke, not unfrequently, the decadent cigarette. That smoking as we know it, and as it is universally practised by every civilized nation on the globe, has sprung solely from an, at first sight, unattractive and not very cleanly habit indulged in by North American aborigines there is no doubt at all. Mr. Penn, the author of the book we have mentioned, has collected and discussed the evidence for and against the use of tobacco in Europe earlier than the sixteenth century, as indeed he has collected, in a most interesting book, all the facts procurable on every subject connected with tobacco, and produced a volume not likely to be superseded, and filling a real gap in our miscellaneous literature of information.

The inhaling of smoke for medicinal purposes was occasionally practised in classical times, but it went no further, and the few alleged discoveries of pipes dating from early times must be regarded with suspicion. It is, indeed, remarkable that the meditative East should have had to learn from the barbarous West so potent a source of philosophic inspiration, but the history of tobacco is throughout one of surprises. It is difficult to realize that there is no allusion to smoking in the "Arabian Nights," but so it is. America gave tobacco to Europe and Europe gave it to Asia. Some have asserted indeed that the Aboriginal American emigrated from China. Tobacco, if we accept this theory, would complete the circuit of the world, but it is not supported by ethnology, nor by the Chinese tradition as to the introduction of tobacco into the Celestial Empire. All unconscious of the waiting East, the remote and primitive Indian smoked his pipe; for him it was full of religious and symbolical significance; and above all the Calumet or Peace Pipe, first smoked by Gitche Manito the Mighty, became the recognized pledge of amity and good will. His pipes have been found beneath the roots of enormous trees centuries old; they have been found with the bowls carved in the likeness of the extinct mastodon. But for Aryan and for Semite alike my lady Nicotine lay through the centuries hidden below the setting sun. "Tobacco," as Cooper wrote, "was not known in the Golden Age. So much the worse for the Golden Age."

It was characteristic of the English that they would accept the new gift only from its original source. Tobacco was brought to Europe by a Spaniard in 1559, and cultivated in the Peninsula. It was brought to France in 1561, and its virtues revealed to Catherine de Medicis by the French Ambassador to Portugal, one Jean Nicot; and the French called it Nicotaine. The exact date and method of the introduction of tobacco to England is uncertain; but England certainly found it later clouds of smoke." James I., we know, inveighed aga practice in his "Counterblaste," and issued a decree

We out of the dislike We have of tobacco"—to forbid tion of the plant in England. "Under the tobacco-less fact, of the Stuarts, "England was ill at ease, beheadi and flinging out James II. William III., an honest the one who set the country to rights again." Tha us that it was a tax on tobacco in Holland that expenses of William's expedition to England; a other effect tobacco may have upon the life of unquestionably is a factor of supreme importance in world. If there were no revenue from tobacco, man Government would totter to its fall. One-tenth of national revenue in England was in 1900 derived f
And as the duty is a high one this is not surprising some 81,000,000 pounds of tobacco per annum, an gant are we that we throw annually into the gutte sterling in the shape of cigar and cigarette end determined enemy of tobacco will hardly wish to se out of fashion when the nation has to pay for a lon sive war.

Will smoking ever go out of fashion? Nothin unlikely, and yet a Chancellor of the Exchequer some anxiety when he reads the history of tobacco
We think of smoking as having come into univers last fifty years. And so it has. The eighteenth ce latter half of its career did not smoke—except in t the pot-house. But under the later Stuarts smoking universal than it is now. As early as 1650, in Recreation," we have

> Tobacco engages
> Both sexes, all ages,
> The poor as well as the wealthy,
> From Court to the cottage,
> From childhood to dotage,
> Both those that are sick and the health

The great plague enormously increased the Men smoked in church, at municipal council mee House of Commons; women smoked; mothers sent t to school with a pipe of tobacco to serve them inst fast; the proper method of smoking was even part curriculum. Yet half way through the eighteenth fashion had changed, and by 1773, Dr. Johnson
"smoking has gone out." "Society," at any rate it was considered vicious, and still worse, vulgar.
indeed in the form of snuff. Snuff had always especially in Scotland and Ireland. It is an circumstance of which no explanation so far as we k coming that, although Shakespeare's contemporarie to tobacco, there is no mention of it in his pla however, refer to snuff or to something like it in th

> A pouncet box, which ever and anon
> He gave his nose and took't away again

The use of snuff increased during the eighte both among ladies and gentlemen.

To the beaux of the Regency the social signi snuff-box was as great as the religious significance the primitive Red Indian. Lord Petersham had a and on the increased variety and cheapness of tobacco and pipes that we must rely to prevent any such decadence in the cult of tobacco as came about in the eighteenth century.

The literature of tobacco both in prose and poetry is voluminous. The praises of the poets have been garnered in Mr. W. G. Hutchinson's "Lyra Nicotiana." The controversy as to the merits and demerits, moral and physical, of tobacco, which Tolstoy has affirmed to be smoked solely "to drown the voice of conscience," has been carried on from the earliest times in print. But there has been, we fancy, no complete account of the herb carrying its history up to the present day, and the public should be much indebted to Mr. Penn for his labour, and for his attractive and exhaustive presentment of all there is to be said about tobacco, pipes, cigars, cigarettes, and snuff; their history, manufacture, literature, and statistics.

FOREIGN LETTER.

GERMANY.

WILHELM RAABE.

On September 8, his seventieth birthday, Germany offered a somewhat tardy tribute to Wilhelm Raabe, her greatest living humourist, and perhaps the deepest humorous writer she has so far produced. But he has never been recognized at his proper value. True fame does not lie in the mouths of the multitude, but in the heart of the work; a lasting reputation is graven not on the sunny southern side of the rock of ice on which Chaucer built his Temple of Fame, but on its cold northern side. Yet, considering how entirely in accord with everything that is most German in the German nation is the whole of Raabe's work, it seems singular that it should have suffered neglect. His most read and best known book, "Die Chronik der Sperlingsgasse," appeared as long ago as 1857. Raabe himself said the other day, "People behave exactly as if I had died a quarter of a century ago. They know my 'Hungerpastor,' and my 'Chronik,' and my 'Schudderump,' but they know nothing about the books I've written in the last five and twenty years." The German papers of the last few weeks have been full of articles on his life and work and of pæans to his greatness. An English public may care to learn something of the man whom the Germans are just now delighting to honour.

Wilhelm Raabe was born at Eschershausen, in the Duchy of Brunswick, September 8, 1831, and of his first school at Amelungshausen he gives reminiscences in his tale, "Das Odfeld." He attended the Gymnasium at Wolfenbüttel, and was for some time apprenticed to a bookseller at Magdeburg; but, realizing that he was better fitted to write books than to sell them, he went in 1851 to Berlin, where he studied history and philosophy. He made his first appearance as a writer in 1857 under the pseudonym of Jacob Corvinus with "Die Chronik der Sperlingsgasse." From 1862 to 1870 he lived at Stuttgart; since then Brunswick has been his home. He has published altogether about forty volumes; the last, "Hastenbeck," appeared in 1899.

The world's greatest humourists have invariably been inspired by the tragedy of life, and to this rule Raabe, whatever may ultimately be his rank among them, is no exception. A himself is his style and his treatment of his m Fielding, Sterne, and Thackeray he constantly spea person, but his manner of doing so is not the resembles that of our Elizabethan romancers, Lod Nash. "Ought we not now," he asks his reade after the Burgomaster?" Or:—"And what of Elise? Presently I will step across to the beaut who lives at No. 12. Her piano has been sounding and weaving thoughts in my head all the afternoo will speak of Gustave and Elise." He blames, apostrophizes his heroes and heroines without sti his material or his ideas fall into confusion, wh intentionally or not—they often do, he implores th goddess of "Topsy Turveydom." A funeral pro him an opportunity of addressing observations to passers-by who observes it. The names of his pe nearly all symbolical of their character or fate, an Raabe makes symbols of inanimate objects which stand, as it were, behind the story. Raabe, in fact, t tale of German childhood, sets it down among the co ties of life, and surrounds it with every sort of detail. Sometimes, as in the "Hungerpastor," that, so to speak, overshadows the characters. Th from some kind of hunger, from a hunger for the w delights, from a hunger for self-advancement or for too numerous to mention, but always from a hunger satisfied but little or not at all. Thus the pe story share a similar lot, reflect each other, and contrast or modification help to work out the m the story. And, finally, to appreciate Raabe prop never forget that he is throughout the hero of his whilst for that very reason we scarcely remember d long line of people he introduces to us—as we do th before us by Sterne, or even by Gottfried Kelle forget Raabe.

Raabe's work divides itself easily into four peri he was almost overwhelmed by the fulness of thoughts. The "Chronik der Sperlingsgasse" to this and serves to illustrate his mood of the mome sciousness of struggle between the pain and pleasure The characters live in three houses of a little away amid the stir of a great city, scarcely notic yet indissolubly connected with it by a thousand th wonderful book for a young man of twenty-thre how great was even then his knowledge of men a expression. In the second period he is held by contrasts of life, and pessimism of various shade work. His heroes strive in vain with the ordina in the marsh of every-day obstacles, and, shipwreck they wearily bring their damaged vessels into port. ness is futile, only he who calmly takes upon his s day's burden is content. Death will look aft Slavery among savages is preferable to liberty an conventionalities of philistine German towns; a relieve the one, while from the other there is no "We strive," he says, "for breath, for air, for lig succeed in securing, from the top of a heap of r glance into the distance, where we see the world golden light of beauty and peace. Then we thi great and powerful, we cry "Victory!" but we without, and what is destroyed in the circle of his existence by hostile forces he must ever seek to restore; that is the secret of happiness. He who lets his arms sink in despair is irretrievably lost. But he who valiantly defends every step on the road to the grave, who can pass with dignity from the highest summits to the lowest depths, he, and he alone, conquers. He steps into the abyss as one who is victorious, he is not hurled there as one subdued.

Some Recent Novels.

Clara Viebig shows as admirable a technical grasp of her art in the short story as in the long novel. "Die Rosenkranzjungfer und Anderes" is a series of short stories about her native district, that of the Eifel. There is much about the fickleness of men, the falseness of husbands. To this the title story gives the keynote. If among the rosary maidens who pray beside a dying man's couch there is one who is not pure, his soul cannot pass; and in this story the dying man's last word in the presence of his wife is the name of one of the rosary maidens who is his mistress. Not until she has been ejected from the room does his soul find rest. Pleasanter themes are those of the widower whose wife died at the birth of his child, and whose one thought as the child grows more interesting day by day is "Oh! if Marie could only see you!"; and the poor little dressmaker's apprentice who feels all her emotions deeply stirred by the influences of spring but understands not what they mean. One of the most powerful of the tales is "Der Heilige," that of a village pastor who resists marriage with a girl whom, had he not decided to be a saint, he could have loved, and whom he knows to love him. The girl goes into service, gets into trouble, and comes to ask help of the pastor; his saintly life forbids him to befriend her, and she drowns herself.

German novelists of the day find a curious fascination in making their heroes or heroines possess in their past lives some terrible secret which at a given instant they, like the Ancient Mariner, feel bound to confess to the first comer. In "Aus Spätherbsttagen," by Marie von Ebner-Eschenbach, also a volume of short stories, the best is perhaps "Die Reisegefährten." The hero, a distinguished medical man, has allowed a patient to die because he knew that by his brutal conduct the man was ruining the lives of his family. After the man's death everything goes well with his wife and children, but the doctor, in his remorse, refuses any sort of reward, and suppresses his love for his patient's daughter, although by way of compensation he is able to save one of the children's lives. To a chance travelling companion he one day confesses his crime. The plan of leading up to a point at which a sudden or decisive change takes place in the characters or from which the events appear in a changed light is a favourite device with this author. She has just finished a long novel, entitled "Agave," of which the scene is laid during the Italian renaissance; it is the outcome of winters spent in Italy.

In "Der Holzhändler," Max Kretzer is scarcely at his best. Here, again, is the hero with a secret. A rich timber merchant shoots his wife for her unfaithfulness, and makes it appear that she had committed suicide. Remorse preys on him, he feels that his secret has been discovered, but it is not until after many years that he destroys himself under the very tree where he had killed his wife. The writing is commonplace and the characterization poor; the only thing to commend is the

It is not every writer who realizes that th is neither a short novel nor an anecdote. Arthur scarcely ever written anything better than his Gustl," a tale of eighty pages, which might " Episode of a Night." A young lieutenant is insu witnesses are present, by a baker. He cannot, of cou him, but his honour is outraged, and, according to t code of honour still adhered to in the German remains for the lieutenant but suicide. He is the baker suddenly dies from paralysis, and so never become known to any one. The tragi-c emphasized and shows how these curious notions of weak young men who have hitherto thought of debts and their love affairs. The military authorit object to such satire, and Schnitzler, who was me the reserve, is to lose his standing as an officer. the enormous success of the little book may be so tion to him; and the equal success of Har Rosenmontag, and the public attention aroused military trial in Germany, point to the likelihoo no distant date.

Peasant tales find a grateful public in " Lugisland," Wilhelm von Polenz reveals again the small details of peasant life and for the psyc people. He can draw character, and is better story than at the long novel. The peasants of Hans are more ignorant than those of Polenz, more at the primitive impulses. The heroine of "Die Schwar is a good Roman Catholic, who, for the sake of married an old drunkard. Actually in love with a awaits her husband's death. Her mother assures will be good and send some means to bring abo consummation. But the old scamp is long a-dyin prays for help to the image of the black Madonna her room. At length the situation grows unbear ing as if enjoined by the Madonna, Martha murder The author's skill lies in his ability to portray t these people in a manner that renders them not q hensible to us who seem to inhabit another sphere.

THE DRAMA.

"THE UNDERCURRENT."—"THE G MILLIONAIRE."

It is to be suspected that Mr. Carton had n plan in his mind when he sat down to write The that he hoped the play would somehow write its along. Unfortunately, plays are not to be turn happy-go-lucky principle, and Mr. Carton's piec among his successes. What is the subject, the c of the play? That is the question which the s playhouse always, consciously or unconsciously, and, asking the question on this occasion, he ca factory answer, for the simple reason that Mr. has not made up his mind on the point. Is t development of the sentimental relations betw natured but unstable Baronet (genre, the "clean, English gentleman) played by Mr. Arthur Bou process would have been to write a play. But Mr. Carton only suggests that play; he has not written it. He has not shown the awakening process in the Baronet's mind, but merely marries him off to the Countess in the last act without being at the pains to induce the spectator to desire the marriage. Here, then, is one subject—a very promising subject—suggested but not worked out. Let us try again. Is the subject of the play the story of the relations between the Baronet and the vindictive Lady Shelmerdine? One might think so from the importance given to the affair of the compromising letters in the third act. Lady Shelmerdine has been the Baronet's mistress, and, under the impression that he is about to marry the heiress, she threatens to prevent the match by producing her lover's letters. Upon that threat is constructed a scène de deux femmes in which the Countess, having discovered that there is a criminal secret in Lady Shelmerdine's past life, uses her knowledge to compel the surrender of the compromising letters. These scenes, in which one antagonist is cool and resourceful, the other unscrupulous and defiant, are very familiar on the stage and generally cast in the same mould; and Mr. Carton's in no way departs from the conventional type. But it is vitiated by the trifling circumstance that it happens to be pointless, for every spectator knows beforehand that the packet of letters round which the battle rages is without the slightest value to any one. The fact is that the American heiress has no intention whatever of marrying the Baronet, being secretly engaged to his younger brother. Here, then, is a possible subject deliberately spoiled. Either we ought to have been made to care whether the Baronet marries the Countess or not, or, failing that, to care whether the Countess extorts the letters from Lady Shelmerdine or not. Neither subject being properly handled, we do not care. Further, Mr. Carton not only leaves us in this state of indifference as to the outcome of his two chief stories, but he teazes us by laboriously elaborating the stale old fun of country-house private theatricals. Three out of four acts are filled with this fun, which was amusing a century ago in Mansfield Park, or even a year or two ago in The Pantomime Rehearsal, but has for the present ceased to be amusing. Probably Mr. Carton, when starting out upon his play, meant to use this particular element very sparingly, but was tempted to over-elaborate it upon finding that neither of his main subjects answered to his expectations. That is the sort of thing which happens when a dramatist has not carefully "blocked out" his design beforehand. Plays are not, like some novels and many discursive essays, to be written au hasard de la plume.

The time has now come round again for the inevitable Autumn drama at Drury Lane, written by Mr. Cecil Raleigh, and produced by Mr. Arthur Collins. This one is called The Great Millionaire, and contains (1) an eponymous hero who, ostensibly "to revenge himself on society," but really to lead up to a capital scene of a bread riot, makes a corner in wheat and sends the quartern loaf up to five shillings; (2) a long-lost daughter, surrounded by sympathetic gypsies who provide sentimental conversation in the "carpenters' scenes"; (3) the spectacle of the Guildhall, when the Freedom of the City is being presented to a foreign potentate, and of the Carlton Hotel at dinner-time; (4) two real motor-cars, one of which smells villainously of petroleum, while the other, containing first and second villain, is made, with the aid of a kinematographic device, to seem to tumble over a precipice . . . . . and many other things [illegible]

CURRENT LITERATUR

THE HINDU AND THE ENGLISH

Asia and Europe. Studies by Meredith Tow
(Constable. 10s. 6d. n.)

These thoughtful essays form the most suggest Indian character that has appeared since the fir Sir Alfred Lyall's "Asiatic Studies." We say Indian because we think that Mr. Townsend makes a seri in generalizing from his undoubtedly intimate kn the Hindu and Mahomedan Indian to the Asiatic with whom he is less at home. Whilst we are rea that there is a "comity of Asia," just as there is Continental Europe, the divergences between Hindus a Persians and Turks, are far greater that those be European nations, and what is true of Indians is not true of Egyptians or Ottomans.

The real subject of the book, when divested sweeping generalization, is the essential separation b Indian and the European mind, and the hopeless attempts to influence the Indian by European ideas. T influence has been achieved in history may be grant
The Greek found himself more in danger of bein than the Persian of becoming Hellenized; whilst t had not enough imagination to absorb or to modi modes of thought. Neither left any permanent t portions of Asia they held for a time. But when the applied to the present European domination it do very closely. The European has permeated thoroughly, and he treats Asiatics in a different f far, no doubt, it is impossible to point to any decide of Europe which may be regarded as permanently any fundamental part of the social or intellectu of Asia; but never before has a European invasion on the present comprehensive scale been attempt domination of the Briton in India, of the Russian in and of the Frenchman and German in China, is too rec the ground of any fixed conclusion. That Englan perceptibly modified the Indian character or intellect more than a century of gradually increasing intercou wonderful, and cannot be taken as proof that in the influence may not be exerted with permanent results.

Whilst we hold Mr. Townsend's argument as n we are free to confess that there is every probab favour. The separation between the Indian and th who governs him is as wide as ever, and there is no sign that it is in course of being bridged over. In essays on "The Influence of Europe on Asia," "Th Asia for Asiatics," "The Mental Seclusion of India," " Asiatic Feeling Contrasted," and so forth, Mr. Towns with reiterated insistence upon the essential incomp Indian and English ideals; but he puts European say English, and here again he generalizes too wi Spaniard or Portuguese, for example, is able to unde assimilate the Asiatic or the South American mind no Englishman ever can or wishes to assimilate them the extremes of the Hindu and the Englishman, one to the doctrine here laid down with so much evident

verities, of which his European masters know nothing and take little thought. The fact which one is so apt to forget is that "the continent Europe desires to conquer is not a continent occupied by savages, but one full of great and small nations highly though imperfectly civilized, proficient in all arts except in sculpture and painting, with great cities, great laws, great literatures, and a great amount of social happiness, perhaps greater than exists in Europe." The essay on "The Charm of Asia for Asiatics" points out what people in England rarely realize, that it is quite possible for Orientals to prefer their own form of civilization—which they do not admit to be "imperfect"—to that which we foolishly believe to be the best for all the world merely because it seems to be the best for us. "It would be hard to explain to the average Englishman how interesting Indian life must have been before our advent; how completely open was every career to the bold, the enterprising, or the ambitious." What is mere order and justice, that supreme gift of the Anglo-Saxon to the East, in comparison with the many-coloured variety of the old Asiatic life? Above all, what in the European conception of social life—a life of endless small trouble, endless energy, restless activity, perpetual alertness—can compensate for the loss of that freedom from worry, that power to do as one pleases (under a few necessary restrictions), that life of slippered ease instead of collars and dress coats, which is the ideal of the leisured East? It is not colour that divides the East from the West; it is "the difference in permanent ideals." "The European cannot merge himself in the Asiatic without a sense of degradation, which is almost invariably followed by its reality."

On the other hand, the Indian has no desire to merge himself in the European, whom he respects as a strange but irresistible fighting and governing machine of extraordinary precision and exasperating energy, but whom he neither likes nor envies. "The Englishman is in Asia the man who will insist on his neighbour doing business just after dinner, and being exact when he is half asleep, and being 'prompt' just when he wants to enjoy—and he rules in Asia and is loved in Asia accordingly." If the British Raj, that "most marvellous example the world has ever seen of the possibility of governing human beings through abstract principles, when these principles include impartial justice, perfect tolerance, and the most absolute respect, not only for personal freedom, but for personal idiosyncrasy," has achieved its triumphs in the past century without coming any nearer to understanding the people it governs, the Indian has done no better. He does not understand these "unaccountable, uncomfortable works of God" any more than they understand him.

> I often think [says Mr. Townsend] that the feeling of the Celtic Irishman towards the Englishman, which appears to be unchangeable, is the nearest analogue to that of the Asiatic for the European. He regards him, if an oppressor, as a brute to be resisted with any instrument at hand; if a just man, as a disagreeable, slow-witted, uncomfortable outsider who has no right to interfere with him, and who ought to be driven to a distance as speedily and as finally as possible.

Nothing can exceed the Indian's amused contempt for the "stupidity" of the energetic Sahib, and nothing will induce him to open his mind to him. With all his charm of manner and conversation, and his "inexhaustible amount discipline of ages, until it is not an incident, essential of his character."

We have said enough to show how profoundly how provocative of thought, and also of argument th collection of studies of Asiatic problems is. challenges opposition. Its author delights in upse conceptions, and his pessimism strikes cold upon Imperial enthusiasm. Orientalists, too, will cas flaws in the argument, especially when Mr. Tow his familiar India and treats of Arabs and Mongol knows far less. When he says that the early "barba "contemplated conquests in Asia," he has forgott Huns, whose descendants are still believed to form som strata in the population of India; when he says th learnt our method of fighting, he ignores th artillery in Persia and India; when he writes of the Crusading epoch, he should substitute Turks. himself, and he talks of dead people, such as Laya were alive, and uses titles which have been changed merely means the want of a little revision. The of the book is at once fascinating and perplexing; thought and depresses hope; it never ceases to be time intensely convincing and provoking. T between East and West are no new subject; Urquhart's "Spirit of the East," they have ex minds; but we do not remember any book that closely to the heart of the secret, that lays bare incompatibilities so clearly and with such perception enlightening is it on Asiatic religion and on the govern the progress of Islam and Christianity in Core of Hinduism" is an illumination of the subjec the contrasts between India and Europe none is m of results than this, that the European is "essentia intent on objects he can see, whilst the Asiatic is religious—that is, intent on obedience to powers wh see but can imagine. . . The European judges results, declaring that if these are foolish or evil or the creed is false. The Asiatic does not consider but only the accuracy or beauty of the thoughts his own mind," which he must admit and obey, personal consequences. On Eastern religion Mr at his best, and his best is something far bey achievement.

THE LAKE COUNTRY.

Highways and Byways in the Lake District Bradley. With Illustrations by Joseph Pe millan. 6s.)

Like its forerunners, this latest addition Macmillan's "Highways and Byways" Series do to be a guide-book. It is well calculated to prov interesting than a guide-book to the Lakeland vis bound for a day, and tantalizing enough (the rea descriptive tours) to the reader who is hundreds from the glorious district it comments on. indeed, readily point to any better book of the dealing, on a topographical basis, with Cumberla instance, are devoted to the eventful story of Carlisle, and they give a remarkably vivid sketch of the past of that unlucky border capital. Incidentally, the author eulogizes many a hotel and inn, and a reader could very well construct a tour round these from his record. Only of one rustic hostelry does he speak with faint praise, and there, as he amusingly tells, Charles Edward, a century and half earlier, had also noted that the landlady was "a sad imposing wife." When Mr. Bradley mentioned this coincidence to another grumbler at the charges, a passing cyclist, the latter, he says, "unlike myself, derived no consolation whatever" from it, only remarking, and with justice, "that he was a member of the C.T.C., while the Prince was not." It is in its human touches that Mr. Bradley's book chiefly pleases, and its historical anecdotes of the few ancient families of rank round the Lake district are as crisply and pointedly told as its stories of the old "statesmen"—not the Wordsworthian, but the genuine articles. The author is meritoriously resolute not to belong to the injudicious band who, if they talk of Westmorland, "use the bard of Rydal on the principle of a trump card at whist, and 'when in doubt' quote Wordsworth." None the less he has an agreeable knack, whenever he does introduce one of the "Lake" circle, of giving some quaint incident or trait concerning him which to nine readers out of ten will be new or at least forgotten. He has one or two interesting reminiscences of Southey, and one of the best is a pictorial one which we reproduce. Equally brightly he discourses of that shameless absentee, Bishop Watson, who lived complacently for thirty years beside Lake Windermere on the revenues of his see of Llandaff.

Mr. Bradley made a special pilgrimage to Caldbeck, the home of the veteran fox-hunter, John Peel, who yielded to mortality in 1854, but whose renown is embalmed in a song. At Caldbeck, Mr. Bradley had the advantage of "a crack" with John Peel's venerable nephew, and he also recalls the chequered history of Woodcock Greaves, the hero's intimate and the poet of "D'ye ken John Peel?" The song itself was casually composed one winter's night while the two sportsmen were sitting by the fire; it was thereupon set to "an old rant called 'Bonnie Annie,'" and then, to quote its maker's words, "I sang it to poor Peel, who smiled, and a tear or two ran down his manly cheek. 'By Jove, Peel,' I said in jest, 'you'll be sung of when we're both run to earth.'"

JOHN PEEL'S HOME.

From "Highways and Byways in the Lake District."

SKETCH OF SOUTHEY FROM LIFE. By A. T. Paget, Je
In the possession of Charles E. Paget, Esq.

From "Highways and Byways in the Lake District."
(By permission of Messrs. Macmillan.)

SIR EDWIN ARNOLD'S NEW BO

THE VOYAGE OF ITHOBAL. By Sir EDWIN ARNOLD
C.S.I. (John Murray. 5s. n.)

In the classical atlases, Africa passes out of civil little below the equator. Yet Herodotus tells Phoenicians in the days of the Pharaoh Neso who, s by way of the Red Sea, succeeded in carrying out orders to sail round the unknown southern coastl return to Egypt by way of the Pillars of Hercu travels are here imagined by Sir Edwin Arnold as re heroine of his romance, to the blazing Egypt of a fargone day, when

> Sais, City of Neith,
> Flickered and danced in the glare;
> Danced in the blazing gold of the noon;
> Temples and gateways and trees,
> Like unto Temple-girls did these
> Dance for the glory of Neith.
> Golden and green and white and brown
> So did the houses and groves and town,
> Walls, roofs, window-bars, up and down
> Dance for the glory of Neith
> Shadows glanced on the glass of the lake,
> Palm-fans danced in the fluttering air,
> All for the light's sweet sake;
> For the Goddess, mighty and glad and fair
> Who makes for her people the golden day
> And the dear delight of the sun-warmed air,
> Twenty-five centuries back—
> Ah, can you listen to what I say?—
> Egypt under the sunshine lay,
> Basking in gold and black.
> Neko was Pharaoh and King > Ruler of Nile and its lands,
> Lord of River and fields
> Holding the world in his hands.

It is a glittering open-air picture, and thus attuned to the times we join the crowded audience in Pharaoh's hall and listen to Ithobal as, with his brown crews around him, he tells the tale of the ships. Nor is it difficult to follow him with interest. He proves himself the capable narrator of a round unvarnished tale, and Sir Edwin Arnold has been at pains to endow him with sufficient individuality to make him live. He is, throughout, the stout resolute captain of ships with a well stored memory and a discriminating tongue. His philosophy is simple—"What the high Gods will have falls at its hour"—but together with the fatalism goes a joyous pride in his destiny and in the craft and wit that has helped him to mould it. And so the tale runs briskly from the day when he is lured by the vision of a silver dove into the slave-market at Sais, there to meet his fate in the person of the dark captive princess from the far south, till the galleys lie safe in harbour again after the toils and triumphs of five and thirty moons' sea-faring. There is no magic in it all, no subtlety; but picture succeeds picture, natural description interlinks with adventure, and ever swells the catalogue of the wonders seen by the way. Let us take, however, this quiet passage descriptive of a fair day's sailing:—

> But we sailed wide,
> Holding the friendly breeze, and all that night
> And all next day—day of the eleventh moon—
> Merrily sped the Dove, and Ram, and Whale;
> My lusty carmen drowsing in the sun;
> The drum and flute at peace or striking up
> For frolic dance. In the warm air was taste
> Of life, and joy, and hope grown breathable.
> Then did I know, dread King!—my painted sails
> So filled, my lady's hair blown for a sign > Straight onward, and the faces of my men
> Set to the look of such as fear no more—> Then knew I that we should not fail. The barks concise, it is not wanting in picturesque touches, an carries the reader with it, and yet in reading the one cannot help feeling that Ithobal somehow or ot to keep a hand-camera by him and snap-shotted other scene, jotting down colour notes for future re want a sea-mist or some other transforming-magic t cliff, the saffron-tinted pinnacle, above all the d capped hill into a composition that is not merely On the other hand the genre work is excellent of i for instance the pretty multi-coloured lines on t or almost any of the passages descriptive of animal

In fine, every one who takes up this poem wil interest to the end, but many will lay it aside wit sion that they have been reading a transcript.
much the same effect, to hazard a suggestion, a passage in Mr. Mackail's excellent version of the manifestly drawn from poetic sources; it is literat somehow it is not quite poetry.

OTHER NEW BOOKS

The Antarctic.

To THE SOUTH POLAR REGIONS (Hurst and Blacke is an account of the explorations of the Newne to Victoria Land (1898-1900), by Mr. Louis Ber the scientific staff, who occupies the same post o
the national expedition, which set sail for the same Discovery a few weeks ago. As a German Exped started for another side of the Antarctic Ocean in the scientific work, the attention of the publ be much directed to this part of the world in th
The adventures of the Southern Cross party been related by its commander, Mr. Borchgrevin
"First on the Antarctic Continent"; but it is a t bear retelling, and Mr. Bernacchi tells it well.
enthusiasm for the magnificent effects of light a the clear Polar atmosphere; and, though he cons that they are indescribable, he manages to give them by his own graphic descriptions with the excellent photographs. The book is divided into t a narrative of the expedition, and a résumé of results. The distinction, however, is rather one of subject. The latter section a kind of append alarmingly technical for the unlearned reader; m while nearly silent upon the winter life of the exp one-roomed hut, contains much about the habit seals, besides some very interesting theorizing o problems of the mysterious South. Mr. Bernacch premature to speak of "the Antarctic Continent that "everything tends to prove the existence of of large islands." But he admits that the summer temperatures experienced by his party se strate the existence of "an extensive land area."
a very novel theory about the extraordinary " which stretches for some 500 miles east of Moun Terror. He thinks that this is not, as has supposed, the northern edge of a vast Polar ice-ca gigantic "tongue" of glacier-ice running into th main mountain range, such as is seen elsewhere in on a far smaller scale. There must, therefore, on t

Expeditions already on their way. We should add that, in illustration of his views, Mr. Bernacchi has prefixed to the volume an admirable chart of the whole South Polar region, besides smaller maps of the discoveries made by the Southern Cross.

Amy Robsart.

In WHO KILLED AMY ROBSART? (Elliot Stock, 3s. 6d.) Mr. Philip Sidney has raised an interesting question, and we are most probably in possession now of all the evidence that is in existence to enable us to answer it. Dr. James Gairdner, the foremost authority on the history of the time, has said all that can be said. Mr. Sidney's own conclusion is "That Amy was murdered, but by a person or persons unknown." His book, however, is very far from being a complete treatment of the subject. Its aim, its author tells us, is twofold—to relate all that is known about Amy Dudley and to be a kind of historical hand-book to "Kenilworth." It is late in the day to expose the errors of Scott. They were well known to Scott himself, who never pretended that "Kenilworth" was an accurate history. It is somewhat otiose thus to kill the slain; nor was it necessary to print the whole "Ballad of Cumnor Hall" with the enigmatic statement that it "is not too well known or oft-quoted not to be included here," considering that Scott himself printed it entire in his notes. But when we come to the facts of the case, we regret to find, in the work of so serious an historical student as Mr. Sidney, a good deal which calls for criticism. In an investigation of this sort, if any historical judgment is to be formed we must have exact chapter and verse for every statement, and our author does not think it necessary to give them. He rejects "Leicester's Commonwealth," but he does not quote, or meet, its statements in detail. He refers frequently to "Simancas MSS." Has he inspected them himself, or is he merely referring to the English Calendars of State Papers based upon the transcripts? If the latter is the case he should mention the volume and page to which he refers. In the same way Mr. Sidney should distinctly state whether he prints the correspondence between Dudley and Blount from the MSS. at Cambridge, or has merely reprinted them from a predecessor in his field of investigation. In regard to the treatment of Queen Elizabeth we have two complaints to make. The first is that, when Mr. Sidney has already quoted the evidence that Amy Robsart was ill for some time before her death, he should put a sinister interpretation on the Queen's statement that she "was dead, or nearly so." But a stronger protest must be entered against the note entitled "Children of Queen Elizabeth." Here especially definite authority should be given for every statement. Instead of this we are told of an inscription "on vellum," "in a manuscript still existing, preserved at Shrewsbury," and of a "tract, signed by Cardinal Allen, printed abroad," and of the Englishman living in Madrid who was said to be the son of Elizabeth and Leicester. All this is surely of very little value: on such a matter we want either detailed investigation or silence. Mr. Sidney does not appear to have heard of Mr. F. P. Badham's elaborate argument that the Earl of Essex was really the son of Elizabeth. On the main question, too, Mr. Sidney should at least have noticed the elaborate statement of Anthony Wood ("Life and Times," Ed. Clark, I., 260-263), based on tradition as well as gossip. It would have been well if before writing Mr. Sidney had made himself acquainted with Dr. Gairdner's study of the subject. In short, the book before us is not of great assistance in the controversy.

FICTION.

Kim.

KIM (Macmillan, 6s.). There seem to be two opposit attending the career of the successful novelist in Engl one danger is that he may magnify his office, delude hi the belief that the dreaming of dreams is the same th solving of problems, strike an attitude as though he be globe like a Colossus, patronising the people who do the of the world, and pouring out novels of several thousand signed apparently to fulfil at one and the same time the of the Baedeker, the Penny Encyclopædia, and the Sho chism. The other danger is that he may become so w in the cares and troubles of this world that his work as will become casual and perfunctory. We have lately s striking example of the former peril. The devel

HURREE CHUNDER MOOKERJEE.
(From "Kim," by permission of Messrs. Macmillan.)

Mr. Kipling seems destined to illustrate the latter. indeed, go all the way with the American critics "Kim" was still an incompletest serial, fell upon it like Commanders-in-Chief. He writes like a man who is tired; he is not absorbed in his subject as of old.

The pity is the greater because he has here a good subject of which, so far as we know, no other novelist has ever touched the fringe. His theme is the Secret Service of the Indian Government; and the proceedings of that service are among the few romantic mysteries of real life which no prying newspaper man has yet succeeded in laying bare to the eyes of the curious. One knows, or may know, in a general way, that it has its secret native agents whose identity is hidden behind mysterious letters and numbers like E23, who wander in strange disguises through the length and breadth of the land, and away over the frontiers as far as the plateaus of Tibet, finding paths, anticipating intrigues, playing the spy on native princes and border peoples. But one may know no more. The Indian Government keeps his secrets well. So, when Mr. Kipling tells us of an Irish lad, the orphan of a sergeant and a lady's-maid, brought up by a half-caste woman in a bazaar, who volunteers to act as chela to a wandering lama, who strays by accident into his father's old regiment, and is sent to school to be trained for an appointment in the Secret Service, he has chosen a mise-en-scène fraught with very thrilling possibilities. And of course the story as told by Mr. Kipling is very different from what it would have been if told by Mr. Henty or any other of the writers for boys who might have been expected to handle it. There is Oriental atmosphere and the attempt to penetrate the intricacies of the Oriental mind. The book is obviously the work of a man who has seen further into the Oriental mind than the average Anglo-Indian. The lama is, indeed, an unconvincing figure—a mere windbag full of empty phrases about the Wheel of Life—but the Babu and the Pathan are real. Yet the story as a whole leaves us with the feeling that the author did not take a great deal of trouble with it. It is less a connected whole than a string of incidents. Many of the incidents seem irrelevant and the end seems to come not because the story is over but because the author has covered the requisite number of pages and is tired. Very likely he is tired: very likely the world has been too much with him during the last few years. Very likely he wants rest and solitude in order to be again inspired, and to write, as he used to, like a man intoxicated with his story.

The curious and interesting—often beautiful—illustrations photographed from reliefs executed by Mr. Lockwood Kipling are really such as to add to the value of the book. We are reproducing one of them.

Mr. Richard Bagot.

Mr. Richard Bagot must be congratulated on his determination to pursue the art of fiction into new outlets. His two books on the life of Rome and of Romanists—"A Roman Mystery" and "The Casting of Nets"—showed certain gifts rare enough among the multitude of novelists, and he has done well in his new book, THE JUST AND THE UNJUST (Lane, 6s.), a book of great merits and some defects, to choose a new theme. We have followed his writing with interest from the first—if for no other reason, because he belongs to the small and select band of authors who tell their stories in pure, limpid, and grammatical English. He is never rhapsodical nor does he say clever things. His style is good because it is natural and balanced and restrained. There is in fact only one word for it, it is "well bred"; and this is an epithet which equally applies to Mr. Bagot's construction. One pivot of the story is that friend turns out to be the half-sister of his not impossible, but too striking for the nove it to be discovered by another curious coinci a chance meeting. Moreover, there seems, a to be a direct contradiction at the beginning the references Mr. Bagot makes to the Lord Heversham and his prematrimonial frien In which the unscrupulous female relative mali Lord Heversham is defeated is hardl Lord Heversham does not seem quite str dealings with her, and the method adopted by defeating the blackmailer is an unpleasant o have been put into operation. But besides to which we have alluded there is much t beautiful in the story and in its characters; with keen delight by those who are mature en with the world of modern Society.

New Canterbury Tales.

Mr. Maurice Hewlett continues to write romances with a good deal of colour and of cleverness. As we indicated in our not respects masterly, book, "Richard Yea and Nay," he writes them also with some and, we fear, an increasing preciosity of style and an over-elaboration of workmanship. "The Forest Lovers" was a pure and absolute delight. The "Little Novels of Italy" was very admirable. His NEW CANTERBURY TALES (Constable, 6s.) strikes us as roulé and slightly wearisome. They are half-a-dozen stories that have appeared already in the magazines, strung together on the thin thread of a pilgrimage to Canterbury, and rechristened, in addition to their old names, "The Scrivener's Tale," "The Prioress's Tale," and so forth, in the manner of their famous prototype.

The first narrative concerns that Countess of Salisbury to whom we owe the Order of the Garter, and we must give praise to Mr. Hewlett's succinct and ingenious treatment of so threadbare an anecdote. A less gifted writer would have made it the salient point of the tale. All Mr. Hewlett says is "Even aly, the subjects of them are always lovely ladies d if these fair dames and "maids" are not each gnated as being "long limbed," which was the ry heroine in Mr. Hewlett's former book, they are ly all painted as having long noses, a matter in our author's predilection for longness leads him eakishly, for length of nose is not an attribute of of his heroes, a boy grown "mannish," and casting mannish looks on maids and such-like cates, is oriously as "a lady-faced youth with a long nose, a very small mouth, and hot green eyes." He endows with long noses which are "thinnish," and hangs "narrow necks" and "sharp peaked chins." escape banality at the expense of falling captive to In point of fact, Mr. Hewlett's mannerisms are grown, so that while the new book has many beauties it he beauty of spontaneity or unconsciousness. But man can imagine himself back into the fourteenth o one can be successfully, spontaneously, or unconfourteen centuryish." For it is not by the use of ses as "she seemed sib" or "the pair made frank y" that we shall create the illusion that time has slipped back "six long sad hundred years."

There is a certain coarseness of idea now and again protruding its head amidst the flowers of Mr. Hewlett's style which cannot find excuse as being incidental to fourteenth century work, since, as here practised, it is modern in kind; and the maiden Paravall carried in the arms of her lover, and "turning her head about, but ever towards him, nozzling in his smock" has not the beauty which its author appears to claim for it. There is rather too much "nozzling" in the story altogether. We could wish, too, that Mr. Hewlett's picture of a "maid," as he would say, were a trifle more wholesome than the following:—"a moon-faced, sidling, cuddling, snoozling, snuggling, coaxing, adoring, mothering, greensick slip of delicacy." This other thumb-nail sketch of a girl, whose "hair was the colour of dormice and her feet lighter than a hare's," is far happier, though even so it seems strange that a writer with Mr. Hewlett's delicate sense for the value of sound could have written it.

Correspondence.

CRABBE'S ALDEBURGH.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Being well acquainted with the old Suffolk town of Aldeburgh, I have read with considerable interest the article under the above heading which appeared in your issue of September 28. The writer has naturally referred to the Moot Hall, of which an illustration is given, but has said nothing of its contents, which would afford to an archæologist on a rainy day occupation of a most attractive kind. I allude to the collection of MSS. relating to the borough which are there preserved, some of which have been transcribed and printed in the late Mr. N. F. Hele's "Jottings about Aldeburgh" (1870). Mr. Hele, though an excellent naturalist and a skilful taxidermist (witness his beautiful collection of birds preserved in the Ipswich Museum), was unfortunately not skilled in the deciphering of ancient documents, and made many unfortunate blunders (including the two rows not a single house remains, showing the effe incursion of the sea during a period of three hundred y low tide, occasionally, remains of the ancient Dunda disclosed, the extent of which can only be rightly appre reference to the plan to which I venture to draw attent

Burlington House, Sept. 28. J. E. HAR

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Although my pen is but a poor one, may I v be so bold as to ask Mr. Gribble, What did he expect Aldeburgh?

It is only because my name has been drawn across l in your review, in the character of a red herring, whil same time not having any wish to have such greatnes upon me, that I am trying to put my question forward.

While anxious that the 150th anniversary should altogether unnoticed in the literary world, the task Mr has set me is an impossible one—namely, finding out landmarks, footprints, &c., of Crabbe's short sojour borough. How can I do this? The poet left in 1782; witnesses are alive, but we have an old dilapidated which he embarked for London and prosperity, three ol and a rejuvenated White Lion Hotel. The present borough could never be put into the framework of "Borough" except in the most superficial details. It think that Mr. Gribble's path in his way to and from t Lion was overshadowed by a megatherium in the shap Moot Hall (also transmogrified since the poet's time) again ask a question Does St. Paul's Cathedral appe as a snail in its progress up Ludgate?

As regards the poet and patronage, a recent Civil L prove that patronage is as rampant as ever. The con liberality of Edmund Burke towards Crabbe will alw marked contrast to that of Walpole towards Chatterton, proves that the poet was right to seek the help of a patr present-day writer would not cringe to be admitted company of Dr. Johnson, E. Burke, and Sir J. Reynol existing?

One of Crabbe's greatest admirers should appear i of literary names connected with Aldeburgh. I refer t FitzGerald, who lived in a little cottage here and was a visitor too. And in my humble capacity I regret that Macmillan in their "Miscellanies" of Edward FitzGe not publish the whole of the "Readings in Crabbe." Ap for taking up so much space.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

CHARLES G

Aldeburgh Times, October 2, 1901.

"JACK HARKAWAY" AND THE AUTH SOCIETY.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The recent death of Bracebridge Hemyng, th of "Jack Harkaway's Schooldays," serves to empha again the lamentable relation that in many cases existe past between the commercial value of an author's work sum which he received from the publisher for the co As your contributor "G" says, the popularity of th Harkaway" series was phenomenal. I remember how boy, I used to look forward to the successive parts of t that Hemyng "sold his copyrights for ridiculously small sums," whilst his publisher naturally made a handsome fortune. Can there be any more graphic illustration of the crying need there was for the establishment of the Authors' Society?

Happily, the existence of the Society now makes such unfair publishing arrangements practically impossible. But are all writers sufficiently grateful for what the Society has done for them? I trow not; for if they were, there would not be a single writer (however obscure he may be) who would not willingly send up his annual subscription to the Society.

Yours faithfully,

GEORGE EASTGATE.

Yarra, Holland-road, Sutton Coldfield, Warwickshire, October 1.

"MASTER AND SLAVE."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—You say in your notice of my little story "Master and Slave" that it has a "flavour of the Socialistic pamphlet," and as such a statement is likely to prejudice me in the eyes of your readers, I should be obliged if you will allow me to say in your columns that I think it does me an injustice. I am not a Socialist, and have no sympathy with Socialistic theories. I have the greatest sympathy with those who suffer under social evils and disabilities—am ready to help them with my pen whenever I can, and I find that, in the present mood of society, to dub everything of the kind as "Socialistic" or favouring Socialists, tends to shut up the well-springs of pity.

I am yours faithfully,

A. T. STORY.

National Liberal Club, Whitehall-place, S.W.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

The De La More Press (High Holborn), after contenting itself for several years with private printing, enters the open market this season with its own publications. It was started by Mr. Moring of Moring's Quarterly—a comparatively little-known, but admirably printed, periodical devoted to the study of art, archæology, and heraldry—and he called his press after the original form of his family name. "My idea," Mr. Moring explained to our representative, "is to supply a want which I think is felt for books that are rather outside the ordinary run. There are many subjects which possess little interest for the general public, because nothing has been published to make it seem worth while to read about them. One of our aims is to open up fresh ground, and to make it attractive by artistic books written in an interesting way." The chief book in hand at present is a subscription volume on "Monastic Seals of the Thirteenth Century," with plates, and with introduction and notes by Mr. Gale Pedrick. Other illustrated volumes in the press are "The Heraldry of Dante," by the late Rev. H. W. Pereira; "Siena, its Art and Architecture," by Gilbert Hastings; "Greek Terra-Cotta Figurines," by Alexander Moring; and a sumptuous edition of FitzGerald's first translation of the Rubáiyát with illustrations in colour. Mr. Moring has also opened an agency in London for the publications of Messrs. Mansfield and Co., who are working on similar lines in New York, and who will look after the publication of the De La More Press in America.

The first volume of Mr. Heinemann's new series, "A Century of French Romance," will be "The Chartreuse of Parma," (Stendhal) with an introduction by Mr. Maurice just appeared in the "Dictionary of National book by Mr. Frank Bullen entitled, "Deep A Collection of Stories of the Sea," illustra Twidle; and Dr. Fitchett's "Tale of the Next month they will issue the following Hannibal," by Stanley Weyman; "Th Marchioness," by Mrs. Hodgson Burnett Halpin: A Romance of the New Navy," by Later they will publish Mr. Seton Merriman's Velvet Glove."

Mr. John Long shows his faith in fiction but novels in his autumn list, of which he including "The Real Christian," by Lucas Cl of Eden," by the author of "The Master Si West," by Keighley Snowden; "An Ill Lovett Cameron; "The Lovely Mrs. Pembe Warden; "The Golden Spur," by J. S. Flet ter of England," by May Crommelin; "Hon by Frederic Carrel; "The Green Turbans Cobban; "The Mission of Margaret," by "No Vindication," by Mrs. Coulson Kernah Must Weep," by Sarah Tytler.

Mr. Cecil Headlam, whose monograph on Bronze Founder of Nuremberg, is announce new series of Great Craftsmen, has also writt to appear early this month. It will be pu Hurst and Blackett and, (in the United S Putnams. The title of the English edition is Mr. Molyneux."

Mr. Watts-Dunton's "Aylwin," having the sixpenny as well as the six-shilling public at three and sixpence by Messrs. Hurst an will shortly publish Mrs. Alec Tweedie's new I Saw It," with illustrations from photograp herself.

The fifteenth volume of "Book Prices published by Mr. Elliot Stock at once. The books sold has reached the highest amoun fifteen years.

Messrs. Bell are publishing "The Prin book," by Mr. Alfred Whitman, of the profusely illustrated with reproductions of fin

Mr. Rowland Ward will shortly publ volume on travel and sport in Abyssinia Powell-Cotton.

In their "Stories of Missions Series" Anderson, and Ferrier will issue immediately, "The Sign of the Cross in Madagascar," development of Christianity from the lan missionaries on the island to the present time Kilpin Fletcher.

Judge O'Connor Morris' new work, Questions," will be published by Mr. Grant Ri Messrs. F. V. White and Co. have just edition of Mrs. Stannard's well-known nov Conjure with."

American publishers are beginning to records beyond the department of fiction. announce that "The Habitant, and other Poems," by William H. Drummond, has re first thousand. Another volume by Mr. Dru Courtean and other Poems" will be publish the Atlantic during the autumn.

Dr. Hurry, of Reading, is engaged on Abbey, from its foundation to the dissolutio have many illustrations and plans, facsimiles latter will be found one of the song, "Sumer i written down in Reading Abbey.

The Twentieth Century Citizen's Atlas,

ment of the plot of his novel, "Her Ladyship's Secret," which appeared in our review, where Lady Bramber is spoken of as "formerly Mrs. King, a widow robbed of her child by her brother who has adopted it." It was Richard Earle not her brother who adopted Mrs. King's daughter.

The Ladies' Gazette is a 2d. weekly which starts this week. Its first number seems promising; it has a good feature in a Musical Supplement, and we may commend its idea of a "Children's Literary Society."

Books to look out for at once.

"Words by an Eye-Witness: The Struggle in Natal." By "Linesman." Blackwood. 6s.

"With Paget's Horse to the Front." By Cosmo Hose-Innes (Trooper) Macqueen. 3s. 6d. Illustrated.

"Mexico as I Saw It." By Mrs. Alec Tweedie. Hurst and Blackett. 21s. net. Photographs and sketches.

"Erewhon Revisited Twenty Years After." By S. Butler. Grant Richards. [A revised edition of the original "Erewhon" will be issued on the same day—9th inst.]

"Alfred Tennyson." By Andrew Lang. Blackwood. 2s. 6d. ["Modern English Writers" Series.]

"The Works of Lord Byron: Letters." Vol. VI. Murray. 6s. [This volume completes the new edition of the Letters, and contains an Index.]

"The Violet Fairy Book." Edited by Andrew Lang. Longmans. 6s.

"The Benefactress." By the author of "Elizabeth and her German Garden." Macmillan. 6s.

"Some Women I Have Known." By Maarten Maartens. Heinemann. 6s.

"Deep Sea Plunderings." By Frank T. Bullen. Smith, Elder. 6s. [A collection of sea stories.]

"Light Freights." By W. W. Jacobs. Methuen. 3s. 6d. [Another book of sea stories.]

"Wheels of Iron." By L. T. Meade. Nesbit. 6s.

"The Marriage of Mr. Molyneux." By Cecil Headlam. Hurst and Blackett. 6s.

"The Sinner and the Problem." By Eric Parker. Macmillan. 6s.

"The Lover's Progress, Told by Himself." Chatto and Windus. 6s. [An anonymous love story, introducing many Continental celebrities.]

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS,

With notes where required to guide the reader as to their contents.

[Notes on a book under this heading do not preclude a subsequent review.]

ART.

ANDREA MANTEGNA. By P. Kristeller. English Edition by S. Arthur Strong. 12½×9, 511 pp. Longmans. 70s. n.

[A sumptuous work, copiously illustrated. The English edition appears before the German.]

BIOGRAPHY.

UNSTORIED IN HISTORY. Portraits of some famous Women of the 16th, 17th, and 18th Centuries. By Gabrielle Festing. 8×5½, 307 pp. Nisbet. 6s.

[Gathered from State Papers, by the author of "J. H. Frere and his Friends."]

MENDELSSOHN. (The Master Musicians.) By S. S. Stratton. 7½×5½, 307 pp. Dent. 3s. 6d. n.

[Gives rather more space to musical as distinct from biographical matter than other volumes of the series.]

HEROES OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY—Gladstone, Havelock, Bismarck, Lincoln. By G. Barnett Smith. 8¾×5½, 363 pp. Pearson. 5s.

[Popular biographies compiled from accepted sources of information, with illustrations.]

FÉNELON. His Friends and His Enemies. 1665-1715. By E. K. Sanders. 9½×5¾, 426 pp. Longmans. 10s. 6d.

LORD MILNER. By W. B. Luke. 7½×5, 168 pp. Partridge. 1s. 6d. n. [A short readable life.]

THE PRIVATE MEMOIRS OF MADAME ROLAND. Ed. by E. G. Johnson. 7¾×5½, 381 pp. Grant Richards. 6s.

[Revised reprint of the translation published in London 1795, with HELD TO RANSOM. A Story of Spanish Brigands. By F. B. Fo 8×5½, 408 pp. Nelson. 5s.

FOR THE FAITH. A Story of the Young Pioneers of Reform Oxford. By E. Everett Green. 8×5½, 364 pp. Nelson. 3

MADAMSCOURT. By H. May Poynter. 7½×5, 224 pp. Nelso

[Brings in Princess Clementina Sobieski's escape from I in 1719, to be married to Prince James Francis Stuart, and th of the Stuart standard at Braemar by the Earl of Mar.]

A LAD OF DEVON. By Mrs. H. Clarke. 7×4¾, 128 pp. Nelso

[Adventure at sea and elsewhere in the days of Nelson.]

THE QUEEN'S SHILLING. By Geraldine Glasgow. 7×4¾, Nelson. 1s.

[Struggles and misfortunes of a gentleman ranker.]

PROFESSOR ARCHIE. By Leila Percival. 7×4¾, 104 pp. Nel

[A fisher lad who ends as a Cambridge Professor.]

MOOSWA AND OTHERS OF THE BOUNDARIES. By W. A. 8×5½, 311 pp. Pearson. 6s.

[Tales based on incidents told the author by "trappers" i West Canada about the furred animals of the northern forests.

JIM'S SWEETHEART. By E. L. Haverfield. 7½×5, 256 pp. Nelso

[A little boy's life in a Scotch village.]

CLASSICAL.

THE "RUDENS" OF PLAUTUS. Ed. by E. A. Sonnenschein. 176 pp. Clarendon Press. 4s. 6d.

DRAMA.

THE WAYFARERS. An Original Play. By R. Orme. 8¾× Bickers. 5s. n.

EDUCATIONAL.

FIRST YEAR'S ALGEBRA. By C. A. French and G. Osborn. 172 pp. Churchill. 1s. 6d.

THE STORY OF THE ISLE OF MAN. By A. W. Moore. 7½×5 Unwin. 1s.

A FRENCH PRIMER. Accidence and Syntax. 6¾×4¾, 132 pp. C Press. 2s.

TUTORIAL HISTORY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. 2nd E A. J. Wyatt. 7×5, 223 pp. Clive. 2s. 6d.

GREEK ACCIDENCE. By T. C. Weatherhead. 7½×5, 176 pp. wood. 1s. 6d.

FICTION.

THE RIGHT OF WAY. By Gilbert Parker. 7¾×5½, 366 pp. mann. 6s.

[In French Canada. The hero is a barrister who mars his and marriage by drink, and redeems himself in a second life new name and in a new place.]

MISS PAUNCEFORT'S PERIL. By Mrs. C. Martin. 7¾×5½, J. Long. 6s.

[Modern society. Miss Paunceforte's matrimonial entangl in which religion plays a considerable part.]

THE LORDS OF LIFE. By Bessie Dill. 7¾×5½, 354 pp. J. L

[The story of a girl who has to earn her living. In S India, and London.]

ROMANCE OF A HAREM. Trans. from the French by C Forestier-Walker. 7¾×5½, 271 pp. Greening. 5s.

[The experiences of a French Governess in the Sultan's har

THE WORK OF HIS HANDS. By Cris Healy. 7¾×5½, Hutchinson. 6s.

[The loves of an ambitious and self-absorbed artist mechan starts a new life of duty at the end.]

THE FOLLIES OF CAPTAIN DALY. By F. Norreys Connell. 256 pp. Grant Richards. 6s.

[The escapades of an Irish soldier in the Napoleonic war told "after" Charles Lever.]

IDYLLS OF ROSEHILL. By R. Guthrie. (Popular Stories. 7¾×5½, 153 pp. Stockwell. 2s. 6d.

MOUSME. By Clive Holland. 7¾×5½, 337 pp. Pearson. 6s.

[The author brings "My Japanese Wife" to England; he duction to country and London society.]

THE SECRET ORCHARD. By Egerton Castle. 7¾×5½, Macmillan. 6s.

[This corresponds in plot to the play by the author, prod Mr. and Mrs. Kendal. The scene is a French château, and a pi given of modern French society.]

THE PURPLE CLOUD. By M. P. Shiel. 7½×5½, 464 pp. (Th

SYLVIA'S AMBITION. By ADELINE SERGEANT. 7¾×5¼. 200 pp. Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.

[A slightish tale of a young actress and her mother who finally find well-to-do relations.]

THE BOURGEOIS. By H. DE VERE STACPOOLE. 7¾×5¼. 261 pp. Unwin. 6s.

[The lighter side of life in Paris, the chief characters being Charles Frisson, the author of a play called The Bourgeois, and Peter Alabaster, a susceptible young American.]

THE BLACK MASK. By E. W. HORNUNG. 7¾×5¼. 298 pp. Grant Richards. 6s.

[A continuation of "The Amateur Cracksman," the exploits of a professional criminal.]

FOR LOVE OR CROWN. By A. W. MARCHMONT. 7¾×5¼. 408 pp. Hutchinson. 6s.

[The alternative is between a state marriage with a foreign potentate and a marriage for love.]

THE MOST FAMOUS LADIA. By NELLIE K. BLISSETT. 7¼×5, 331 pp. Blackwood. 6s.

[Provence in the time of Troubadours.]

BARBARA WEST. By K. SNOWDEN. 7¾×5¼, 363 pp. J. Long. 6s.

[The story of a young journalist, and his love for a girl who will only be his "sister."]

A GIRL BY THE NAME OF BROWN. (Popular Stories, No. II.). By E. THORNE. 7¾×5¼, 219 pp. Stockwell. 2s. 6d.

[Partly in Italy. Turns on the relations between two sisters.]

OSMUNDA MY QUEEN. (Popular Stories, No. III.) By A. F. B. REDLOCK. 7¾×5¼, 269 pp. Stockwell. 3s. 6d.

[Partly in Cornwall, partly in Russia.]

HISTORY.

THE SPANISH PEOPLE. Their Origin, Growth, and Influence. By MARTIN A. S. HUME. (The Great Peoples Series.) 8×5½, 535 pp. Heinemann. 6s.

CAVALIER AND PURITAN IN THE DAYS OF THE STUARTS. By LADY NEWDIGATE-NEWDEGATE. 8¼×5½, 367 pp. Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d.

[Written round the correspondence, news, letters, &c., preserved at Arbury, of Sir Richard Newdigate, whose life reached from the Great Rebellion to the Revolution.]

LITERARY.

THE RAMBLER. Vol. I. Ed. by H. VIVIAN. 12×7½. Ballantyne Press.

POETS OF THE YOUNGER GENERATION. By W. ARCHER. 9×6, 565 pp. Lane. 21s.

[Critical essays on a large number of "minor poets," with excellent woodcut portraits of each of them by Mr. R. Bryden.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

IN MEMORIAM. Verses for Every Day in the Year. Selected by LUCY RIDLEY. 6½×5, 193 pp. Chatto and Windus.

HANDS AND HOW TO READ THEM. By E. RENE. 7½×5, 125 pp. Pearson. 1s.

THE OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY. Vol. V.—Kaiser-Kyx. Ed. by Dr. J. A. H. MURRAY. 16½×11. Clarendon Press. 5s.

HOW TO STUDY ENGLISH LITERATURE. ("How To" Series.) By T. S. KNOWLSON. 7¾×5¼. 156 pp. Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.

[A short practical book on methods of study and criticism, with extracts.]

COMMERCIAL KNOWLEDGE. By A. WARREN. 8×5½, 260 pp. Murray. 2s. 6d.

[An attempt to teach the young in a readable way the intricacies of commercial routine.]

THE NORDRACH TREATMENT FOR CONSUMPTIVES IN THIS COUNTRY. By J. A. GIBSON. 7×4½. 103 pp. Sampson Low. 3s. 6d. n.

[A description of Dr. Walther's open-air treatment for consumption at Nordrach, by which the author has himself been cured. He maintains that the cure may be effected on the same lines in England.]

ELEMENTARY TELEPHOTOGRAPHY. By E. MARRIAGE, F.R.P.S. 8¼×5½. 118 pp. Iliffe. 3s. 6d. n.

FIRST STAGE BUILDING CONSTRUCTION. (Organized Science Series.) By B. CUNNINGHAM. 7×5, 240 pp. Clive. 2s.

NATURAL HISTORY.

THE MIGHTY DEEP AND WHAT WE KNOW OF IT. By AGNES GIBERNE. 7¾×5¼, 280 pp. Pearson.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITION

A POPULAR HANDBOOK TO THE NATIONAL G Ed. Two vols. By E. T. COOK. 7½×4¾, 740+637 pp.

[The first vol. takes the Foreign Schools, the s The volumes are very handy, printed on thin paper binding. Those who are really studying the Gall content to take with them one of the volumes, convenient than the rather bulky single complete wo

AUNT ANNE. By MRS. W. K. CLIFFORD, 8¼×5¾, 116 p

THE VICAR OF WAKEFIELD. By OLIVER GOLDSMI Classics.) 6¼×4, 213 pp. Grant Richards. 1s. n.

[A well-printed handy reprint, without illustrati

POETICAL WORKS OF ROBERT BRIDGES. Vol. I Smith, Elder. 6s.

BEN-HUR. By GENERAL LEW WALLACE. 8×5½, 479

[A reprint of this book so popular in America by C. E. Brock.]

HISTORY OF THE CONQUEST OF MEXICO. H Three vols. Ed. by J. F. KIRK. 7½×5, 477+463+52

[Including Kirk's notes, and an introduction sp this ed. by Mr. George Parker Winship.]

THE MAXIMS OF LA ROCHEFOUCAULD. Trans. by 97 pp. Finch. 1s. 6d. n.

THE EXPLORATION OF AUSTRALIA. Two vols. CALVERT. 10×7¾, 285+386. Dean.

[Twenty rare Maps are added to this edition.]

THE MAN FROM BLANKLEY'S, and other Sketche ANSTEY. 7½×5, 266 pp. Longmans. 3s. 6d.

POEMS OF DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI. 6¼×4½. Elvey.

[Completes the Siddal edition of Rossetti's wor piece, illustrating The Bride's Prelude and a shor Rossetti.]

THE WORKS OF WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE. 20 vols

THE FORTUNES OF NIGEL, PEVERIL OF THE PEA SCOTT. (New Century Library.) 6×4, 580+756 p

GOETHE: HERMANN UND DOROTHEA. Ed. by C. 152 pp. Clarendon Press. 3s.

VANITY FAIR. By W. M. THACKERAY. 7½×5¼. 746 p

[A pleasantly-printed octavo reprint with Thack and facsimiles of the original wrapper and title-pag

THE LIFE AND WORKS OF CHARLES KINGSLEY and Memoirs. Vol. I. Ed. by his Wife. 9¼×6, 2

[This is to be an Edition de Luxe in 19 vols., four vols. being devoted to the Letters and Memoir is now published, the frontispiece giving Mr. Low trait of Kingsley. The Life is reprinted from the edition. The volume is extremely handsome, well paper, bound in sateen cloth with embossed gilt l designed by Mr. A. Turbayne.]

THEOLOGY.

TEN DIALOGUES BETWEEN A CHURCHMAN AN By G. P. THOMAS. 7½×5, 111 pp. Stockwell. 1

THE CONFIRMATION AND COMMUNION OF IN H. HOLLOWAY. 7¾×5, 228 pp. Skeffington. 5s.

[Preface by Lord Halifax.]

LIKEWISE THE YOUNG WOMEN. By the VENERAB 7×4½, 228 pp. Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.

[Uniform with "Unto You Young Men."]

LIBERAL RELIGIOUS THOUGHT AT THE BEG TWENTIETH CENTURY. Ed. by W. C. Bov Green. 2s. 6d. n.

[Addresses at the International Council of Fr Liberal thinkers and workers, held in London, May ROADS TO ROME. Ed. by the Author of "Twenty Orders." 8×5½, 301 pp. Longmans. 7s. 6d. n.

[There are 65 contributors, who explain ho Roman Church, among them Lord Brampton, M Miss Adeline Sergeant.]

THE IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL. By J. A. Br Hodder and Stoughton. 2s.

[Reprinted from the Expositor. The argum

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 208. SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1901.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

NOTES OF THE DAY 331, 332, 333

"LITERATURE" PORTRAITS.—XXIII.—Mr. Henry George Wells. An Appreciation, by E. H. Lacon Watson 333, 334

POETRY AS A PROFESSION.—A "Personal View," by Margaret Armour 335

NATIONALITY IN ENGLISH ARCHITECTURE 337

CURRENT LITERATURE—

François de Fénelon 340

Fénelon: His Friends and Enemies 340

The Empire

The Growth of the Empire—Australian Federation 340

A Vanished Arcadia 341

Main Currents of Nineteenth-Century Literature 342

Libyan Notes 343

Works of William Shakespeare—Art under Arms—War Notes—Pictures of the War—Through Rhodesia with the Sharpshooters—To-day with Nature—Fables and Folk-Tales from an Eastern Forest—Reminiscences under Wellington—The Thirteen Colonies—Old Dutch Towns—The Poets of Ireland—How to Study English Literature—A Motley Crew—The Story of Newfoundland 344, 345

Educational Books 346, 347, 348

The Right of Way—The Potter and the Clay—The Dolly Dialogues—Love Idylls—Cinderella—The Red Chancellor—The Whirligig—Poor Elisabeth—Mountains of Necessity—Prince Babar and His Wives—The Emperor's Design—Penance—Honanza—The Seven Houses 349, 350, 351

LIBRARY NOTES 351

AMONG THE REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES.—I. 352

CORRESPONDENCE—Who Killed Amy Robsart?—Dickens Examinations—"Two Girls and a Dream" 353

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for... 353, 354

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS 354, 355, 356

NOTES OF THE DAY.

The subject of the Literature Portrait next week will be MR. R. S. HICHENS.

* * * *

Books to read just published:—

"Erewhon" (new edition) and "Erewhon Revisited." By Samuel Butler. (Grant Richards.)

"The Mystery of Mary Stuart." By Andrew Lang. (Methuen.)

"A Winter Pilgrimage in Palestine, Italy, and Cyprus." By H. Rider Haggard. (Longmans.)

"The Potter and the Clay." By Maud H. Peterson. (Hodder and Stoughton.)

"The Benefactress." By the author of "Elizabeth and her German Garden." (Macmillan.)

* * * *

The late Ameer of Afghanistan belongs to literature by his Autobiography, published by Mr. Murray, a very remarkable the Ameer, has written on him in the magazines and g of his character in her novel "A Vizier's Daughter." Review recently published some very interesting given by the Ameer to his son on the latter's visit t

* * *

Messrs. Cassell are to be warmly congratulated series called "The Nation's Pictures," of which the now issued. They are marvels of colour reproduc such pictures as these can be bought for a few pence the hideous "chromo" and the crude print as adorn walls of the lower middle class must surely be p
The series should really do something to educate t æsthetics. The parts are to be issued fortnightl part includes Mr. Abbey's "O Mistress Mine," East's "Autumn," Mr. Maurice Greiffenhagen's and Mr. Orchardson's "Napoleon on Board the B Their size averages about 10½in. by 7in., and there to the history and meaning of each picture. An sevenpence.

* * *

One of the oldest members of the Edinburg trade has passed away in the person of Mr. Robert the firm of Oliphant, Anderson, and Ferrier. Mr. A spent all his life in the Scottish capital, of which he having been born there seventy-two years ago. He firm of William Oliphant and Co. as a junior appren and gradually rose to be senior partner of the firm man of sound literary tastes, and was specially wel history of his native city. At one time he was cha Edinburgh Booksellers' Society, and he had sat fo as a member of the Edinburgh Town Council.

* * *

In the book called "The American Invaders, tactics, and progress," by Fred A. Mckenzie, the ch interests us most is the chapter which compares Am English methods of publishing. The writer is clear trade, "the time has come for a change, and the ch made on American lines." Perhaps. But those who memories will find that for most of the new depa described as characteristically American, there English precedents. We read for instance, that country is placarded about new books." We can re time when the whole of our own country was plac
"Poor Miss Finch," and when touts in the Strand you leaflets drawing your attention to "The M Hansom Cab." And was not one of the more sensati of Robert Louis Stevenson once advertised by sand
The practice is, indeed, not unfamiliar at the prese
The only method of advertisement practised in A

> who gave the author definite instructions as to the period, the plot, and the characters, and had the manuscript considerably doctored to suit the taste of the public before he issued it. The book was simply rammed down the throats of the American public.

Excellent. But the thing has been done before in England. The publishers of novelettes and "bitty" papers showed the way. We know of one office in which a staff of young ladies is regularly employed in writing out serial stories from plots which some one in authority supplies. We have been acquainted with authors who have been retained to write stories of mystery and adventure under editorial supervision, with clauses in their agreements to the effect that, when any story ceased to please, it should be hurried to a close, and another story should be begun instead of it. The main difference between England and America seems to be that, in America, if we may believe Mr. Mckenzie, more reputable authors and publishers lend themselves to this kind of bookmaking. The pity of it all lies in the statement that

> This book of the hour sale has its great disadvantages. The novel of the second-class writer, however considerable the merit, has little or no chance.

The man who enthusiastically exhorts his countrymen to copy the methods which have produced such results may be a good friend to the booksellers, but he is a bad friend to literature.

* * * *

The present French Ministry is reported to have expressed dissatisfaction at the slow progress made by the famous Academy Dictionary. A commission of the Budget, in discussing the sum allotted to the Immortals, has expressed the pious wish that they would display a little more energy in the matter. The Academy has in hand two dictionaries. One, the "Dictionnaire de l'Usage," came out originally as long ago as 1694. When the sixth edition of it had been completed, in 1835, an historical and etymological dictionary of the language was proposed. The Academy was imprudent enough to undertake this gigantic work, but the extreme care with which they have proceeded has made this second dictionary something of a byword. It has been calculated that at the present rate they may arrive at the letter "z" in about ten centuries. Some time ago it was decided that all the efforts of the Academy should be concentrated on the production of an eighth edition of the popular dictionary. This amounted practically to a complete suppression of the larger undertaking, and this is where the trouble comes in, for the ten thousand francs allotted to the historical dictionary have for some years ceased to be devoted to that object, and it has struck certain Ministers that a sum no longer used for its original destination might as well cease to be granted.

* * * *

The Author has a very outspoken article from Mr. Heinemann on the subject of literary agents, lately discussed in our own columns. He is opposed to the agent from the point of view of the publisher because the plan prevents free intercourse between publisher and author; because he has not always found agents honest; because their employment is an implied imputation on the publisher; because he does not wish publishers to be played off against each other; and "because no author would be so quixotic as to employ a literary agent if he did not hope to get so much more out of the publisher as the agent's commission represents." He is equally opposed to the literary agent from the point of view of the author and of literature. The agent, he thinks, is never successful with young and un-

CLOUD-CHANGES: A SONNET.

(Written when watching the sun go down on Lake

> How wonderful the infinite deeps of sky
> That storehouse where th'Omnipotent dot
> His dread Insignia, where He layeth by > His lightning-rod, where piled in mighty > Lie the dread bolts and arrows He lets fly
> Where, too, He caverns the great fans th
> The Heavens bare before His searching e
> And where He nightly pens the clouds lil
> Or loosens them in flight like mighty drak > Streaming in line across the waste of blue
> Till piece by piece the long procession h
> And now, for outstretched necks and wing
> Lo! stately ships glide in upon the view
> Then founder in a sea of fiery lakes!

A

We are sorry to hear that Mr. Joseph Henry seriously ill at his residence at Birmingham.

Sir Theodore Martin, who is now in his eig has been ill at Llangollen, but his condition shows

On October 21 the Leeds Mercury will appea paper at a halfpenny. The paper was started in 1

The new Junior Sheriff of the City is Mr.
Marshall, of the well-known publishing firm. H held the office of Under Sheriff for two years.

The Angel Hotel, in North London, the yard o in Hogarth's "Stage Coach," is about to be p rebuilt. It has been established as an inn for centuries.

On Wednesday Dr. Monro, Provost of Oriel, Vice-Chancellor in Convocation at Oxford, as t
the President of Corpus.

Mrs. Bishop (née Bird), well-known as an intr intends to become a missionary.

Madame Sarah Grand has gone to America haha.

Mr. Gilbert Parker, M.P., has presented versity, Kingston, Ontario, with a set of portrai Governors.

Sir Robert Ball has gone to America to deli lecture at Boston, and he will also represent th
Cambridge at the bicentenary of the University o

Among the seventy new members who have joi Society this year are the Duke of the Abruzzi Count Plunkett, Lord Windsor, Mr. Choate, the Armagh, Sir Mountstuart Grant-Duff, Mr. Paget
Asquith, and Professor Saintsbury.

Mr. F. C. Burnand has successfully undergon for an obstruction in the roof of the mouth.

After many years' connexion with the Lo

L'Honneur, a play produced in Paris on October 4 at the Théâtre Antoine, is a translation of Sudermann's Ehre, and was warmly welcomed by the French critics for its admirable construction.

The Emoluments of Poets.

Our Personal View this week, written by "Margaret Armour," a poetess of no small accomplishment herself, weighs poetry in the balance from the practical point of view of the young man or young woman in search of a profession. The conclusion drawn is, in effect, that there is money in poetry for men of genius who are also men of business. The two qualities are not mutually exclusive, as the publishers of the works of Lord Byron and Lord Tennyson respectively discovered; and our contributor's suggestion that poets should draw attention to their poetry by obtruding their eccentricities of manner, life, and personal appearance was probably not put forward without preliminary observation of their habits and characteristics. At the same time we doubt whether the facts, so far as they can be collected, bear out her view that the poet, if he takes her advice, has better prospects nowadays than in the time of our forefathers. Milton, no doubt, did very badly, and made less out of "Paradise Lost" than a modern poet may make out of a lyric which can be set to music. But the case of "Paradise Lost" is hardly typical. There are plenty of other cases to be set against it. Pope made £5,320 by his translation of Homer; Macpherson made £1,200 out of Ossian; Crabbe, after his poetry had been selling for years, was able to get £3,000 for the copyrights; Southey left £12,000 earned, at any rate, partly by his poetry; Thomas Moore made £400 a year merely by writing poetical squibs; Thomas Campbell got £1,000 for one of several editions of "The Pleasures of Hope"; Byron and Scott prospered enormously; and many similar examples of the pecuniary success of poets could be cited. It would be difficult to compile a corresponding list from the names of contemporary or recent poets. Since Lord Tennyson died, we doubt if any poet has steadily made a large income out of poetry. A poem here and there, not as rule of the highest quality, has sold extensively, and presumably brought large profits to the poet. "The Epic of Hades," "The Light of Asia," and some of Mr. G. R. Sims' collections of ballads are instances in point. Humorous poets who have been able to keep up a steady flow of ingenious rhyme for the comic papers must also have done well; and there has been a demand for patriotic verses like those of Mr. Kipling, Mr. Newbolt, and Mr. Begbie. But serious and dignified poetry has met with little encouragement, with the few remarkable exceptions which we have mentioned. The influence of Matthew Arnold was out of all proportion to his sales; and we could without difficulty enumerate many poets whose work is admirable, but whose circulation rarely if ever reaches four figures. On the whole, therefore, it seems clear that poets are by no means so well off as they were a hundred years ago. The competition of the dead poets makes things increasingly difficult for the living poets. One's reading capacity is limited, and the reprints are cheap and good, and a poem does not get out of date as quickly as a novel. There is, too, so much more in the newspapers now that the average man has less leisure for poetry than of old. What with a war in one continent and a yacht race in another he is too busy with the literature of the actualities to have much time to give to literature of any

Literature Portraits.—XXI

MR. HERBERT GEORGE WEL

It was in that very charming book "Love and M ham," if I remember right, that Mr. H. G. Wells took (no doubt smiling to himself the while) to insert a pas mendation of the excellent "Tutorial Series" of text science. This was one of those sly jests that some of refrain from committing to print, more for the satisfacti own sense of humour than from any expectation of am outside world. For, should the fancy strike you to ex catalogue of the British Museum Library, you might fi to the credit of our author, alone or in collaboration, an " Physiography," a "Text-Book of Biology," and a "T of Zoology"—the two last-named works belonging to mentioned.

This fact is explanatory of much. Mr. Wells is a turned writer of fiction, and he has made of his scient ledge a very useful handmaid in the labour of novel-wri has worked it, as the phrase runs, for all it is worth, singular dexterity and success. Other novelists—the Grant Allen is an example—may have had an equal bent in the same direction, but they have generally from mingling their biological text-books with thei When, with M. Jules Verne, they have enlisted the w science to stimulate their imagination, it has commonly in a certain air of unreality, a certain sense of div humanity and human life. Ingenious and plausible inventions of that veteran French writer, we find our rest in his books lies in the machinery rather th character. It is the Nautilus and its marvellous ca that attract our attention rather than Captain N Columbiad and its padded projectile rather than intrepid voyagers. In reading "Five Weeks in a Balloo first time, I recollect that the ultimate wreck and alm of that cleverly-contrived apparatus seemed almost to price to pay for the escape of the travellers. In fact, Jules Verne displays a great variety of remarkable ch drawn with some care and with more than ordinary co he has very rarely succeeded in making any of them ali are personifications of certain abstract qualities, artfully with just sufficient touch of caricature to raise a smi he wish to draw a Frenchman—he takes the spirit of sponsible frivolity; or an Englishman—he incarnates t matic temperament. In his savants, his learned profess is almost always to be found the same comic blend mindedness and nervous excitability. It is no slight say of Mr. Wells that the wealth of his inventive in even in its furthest flights, has seldom obscured the hu his men and women. These are always very real and ver even when they are creatures of the prehistoric past (w not some "Stories of the Stone Age" from his pen s ago in one of the magazines ?) or, as in "The Time M and "When the Sleeper Wakes," of the distant future.

The power of infusing life into his characters is article in the equipment of a novelist, without which al the best, can produce but an arid and barren brilliancy is easy enough to possess this power and yet to fail o and a scientific training rarer still. And with all this, apart from the mere mechanical part of the business, the moving platforms, the aeroplies and aeroplanes, the various organizations, the Labour Bureau, the Public School Trust, and the rest, he has a wonderful eye for detail and for the logical effect of his many imagined improvements. The little conversations held by Graham with some of his subjects after he has come into his kingdom are no less surprising in their grasp of a complex organization than delightful in their thinly-veiled satire. Take, for example, that with the Surveyor-General of the Public School Trust :—

> "We have conquered Cram," he said, "completely conquered Cram—there is not an examination left in the world. Aren't you glad ?"
>
> "How do you get the work done ?" asked Graham.
>
> "We make it attractive—as attractive as possible. And if it does not attract then—we let it go. We cover an immense field."

The new system makes a point of "catering for girls by the thousand" :—

> "At this moment," he said with a Napoleonic touch, "nearly five hundred phonographs are lecturing in different parts of London on the influence exercised by Plato and Swift on the love affairs of Shelley, Hazlitt, and Burns. And afterwards they write essays on the lectures, and the names in order of merit are put in conspicuous places. You see how your little germ has grown ? The illiterate middle-class of your days has quite passed away."

There is thought at the back of all that Mr. Wells writes, and there is more thought in this book than in any other of his. Yet—it may be for that very reason—"When the Sleeper Wakes" is not by any means his best work. The conception is fine in many respects, but it is on too vast a scale. It cannot be rendered credible ; it is a huge phantasmagoria. Yet there are many shining passages in it, and the human interest (if not quite so lively as usual) is far from being altogether lost. The author is partially overpowered by the thirty-three millions who people his London of two hundred years hence. This is why, I imagine, he has failed to give us that abundance of little vivid touches that give such an air of actuality to a book like "The War of the Worlds." There may also be a little too much insistence on the lessons to be learned from the Labour Bureau and its works, a little too much preaching by direct discourse instead of indirect satire. The public has never loved the novel that discloses its purpose too obviously. This labour problem is never very far from Mr. Wells ; he handled it in the old days of "The Time Machine," when Capital and Labour had become the Eloi and the Morlocks, the dwellers above and underground ; he reverted to it in the days when Mr. Lewisham, that most lovable of prigs, began to wear the red tie of Socialism ; he comes back to it once more, with more directness and energy than ever, in "When the Sleeper Wakes." Here, in fact, the central motive of the book lies in the revolt of the masses against the new tyranny of trust, and organization, and syndicate, and it is so far justified in that it leads to Graham's crowning act of heroism.

When a writer possesses some special gift denied to most others, it may seem absurd to express a wish that he should use it more sparingly. Yet in this case I must record a personal hope that Mr. Wells will not confine himself too strictly for the invisibility ever be discovered, we see now th the results must be that of our author. An who could have treated the theme of "The W lightly, so gracefully, and with so delicate a bl pathos. This little fantasy, in some respects author has yet done, is a very brilliant and y modern civilization. It reminds one, stra Kingsley's "Water Babies" in some of its q secret of its excellence seems to be that it half-way house between the real and the exception of the one strange visitor all the cha belings of to-day. There is no occasion for dangerous gift of prophecy.

For there is some danger of Mr. Wells speak, a professional prophet, and it is agains some of us would wish to warn him. On the gent reader prefers "Love and Mr. Lewisham the Worlds" ; while the publisher, and the their faith to Wells the prophet rather than mate delineator of the ambitious lower middl nately the two latter gentlemen have more to than the mere intelligent reader, who is at o of expressing his opinions ; and so we find his new batch of travellers to report on our First Men in the Moon") while he takes mantle in real earnest in a series of "Anti buted to a monthly review. We may admire which he describes Martians and Selenites, beings have not the same interest for us as t Cavorite, again, is an ingenious and plausible more of Cavor himself—the scientist, the in Mr. Wells can strike an original note in fictio the pains to bring Martians down (in shells Jules Verne) to the gorse-clad heaths of Su sending the Sleeper (in a trance borrowed Bellamy) to visit the London of two centuries real and very uncommon power ; and it wou allowed himself to be drawn insensibly wi humanity. I believe I have read all his novel part of his short stories, but the pictures to w the most pleasure are those of Lewisham in "Schema" that was to map the way for a c and of the same young man again in his supre renunciation. For Mr. Wells has discovered th of all truths to the novelist—that there is som
most despicable of us—in that engaging rasca Hoopdriver, the very unheroic hero of "The W and in Dr. Crump, who was flattered when t that his beliefs were like—a steel trap. He women better than most novelists ; and the t drawing is not so common that we care to see obscured by that other talent of intelligent an

E. H. LA

Mr. Wells made his start in letters, we t the Students' Magazine at the Royal College o quently he contributed to the educational pa not very encouraging work from a pecuniary p first success was a metaphysical article i Review in 1890 ; then he took to writing "T Globe ; and presently Mr. Henley lent him in consequence of changes in the syllabus of the London University examinations. Another text-book, confessedly prepared for examination purposes, and published about the same time, was the "Honours Physiography" which Mr. Wells wrote in conjunction with Mr. R. A. Gregory, Oxford University Extension Lecturer, for the honours examination of the Science and Art Department. In 1895 he gave up newspaper work to devote himself to novel-writing, and in that year brought out no fewer than four volumes with different publishers. The chronological list is as follows:—

1895.—"Select Conversations with an Uncle" (No. 3 of Mr. John Lane's "Mayfair Set").
"The Time Machine" (Heinemann).
"The Wonderful Visit" (Dent), 4th edn.
"The Stolen Bacillus, and other Incidents"—mainly stories from the Pall Mall Budget, Pall Mall Magazine, and St. James's Gazette (Methuen).
1896.—"The Island of Dr. Moreau" (Heinemann).
"The Wheels of Chance" (Dent).
1897.—"The Invisible Man" (Pearson).
"The Plattner Story, and Others" (Methuen).
1898.—"The War of the Worlds" (Heinemann).
"Certain Personal Matters"—Essays (Lawrence and Bullen).
1899.—"When the Sleeper Wakes" (Harper).
"Tales of Space and Time" (Harper).
1900.—"Love and Mr. Lewisham" (Harper).

Mr. Wells was also part author with Messrs. Jerome K. Jerome, Barry Pain, Pett Ridge, and others of the book on "The Humours of Cycling,' published by James Bowden in 1897. With one exception his books are all in print, and issued by their original publishers. The exception is the volume of essays published by Messrs. Lawrence and Bullen—"Certain Personal Matters"—but this is being taken over by Mr. Fisher Unwin and will shortly appear in a new edition. Two new books by Mr. Wells are expected before the present season closes—"The First Men in the Moon," which has been running in the Strand, and will be published in volume form by Messrs. Newnes, and the series of essays to be concluded in next month's Fortnightly, and republished by Messrs. Chapman and Hall under the title of "Anticipations of the Reaction of Mechanical and Scientific Progress upon Human Life and Thought." Mr. Wells' earlier contributions to the reviews include papers on "Morals and Civilization" (Fortnightly, February, 1897); "The Novels of George Gissing" (Contemporary, August, 1897); "The Cyclist Soldier" (Fortnightly, December, 1900); and "Stephen Crane" (North American Review, 1900).

The Elizabethan Society—not to be confused with the Elizabethan Stage Society—is prospering, and has issued a capital programme of lectures for the winter:—

"Shakespeare's Justice Shallow not a Satire on Sir Thomas Lucy." By Mrs. C. C. Stopes.
"Concerning Alfred the Great." By Alfred Austin.
"An Elizabethan Conception of Beauty." By Frederick Rogers.
"Thomas Shadwell." By William G. Hutchison.
"Shakespeare and Contemporary German Criticism." By Miss Elizabeth Lee.
"Shakespeare's Prose." By Sidney Lee.
"Inigo Jones and his Masques." By Ernest Rhys.
"The Maid of Honour: an unpublished Romance (of the seventeenth century) by Sir Henry North." By A. H. Bullen.

The dates are all Wednesdays, and on the intervening Wednesdays the society meets to read the plays of Thomas Middleton. The place of meeting is Toynbee Hall, and the time 8 o'clock.

POETRY AS A PROFESSION.

A "Personal View."

To the sensitive ear of the poet the machinery of to creak dismally, and his only solace lies in trans harshness into song. He is a captive in our work-a-d for ever pining back to some age of gold, and, as function to be a melodious egoist, his fellow-men b sorrows. He breathes from every bookshelf his musical sigh.

But though part of his suffering is temperamental result of craving for more joy than human conditions part of it must also be ascribed to the financial proble calling. Zeus made him free of Heaven, Schiller to atone for having forgotten him at the partition of Eart the celestial entertainment does not, unfortunately, i mortal bill of fare, he is forced to hang round the tabl below, and to barter his songs for bread.

The necessity to earn a living is, of course, the b professions, and in being subject to it, the poet only s common lot; what makes matters specially hard for hi reluctance of the average man to give bread in exc mere beauty. A very few stalls in the market-place ho poetic wares the world wants. If it craved for poe does for beer, say, poetry would flourish like brewing will be long before the convivial glass is eschewe divine drunkenness of song, and, until then, poets mus a lean people. In fact, to quote the hackneyed in "poetry doesn't sell"—terse and awful summing u case! In olden times music and gesture were thrown crease its attractions, and when these were discarded the shape of private, or assured, means, or of i patronage, became indispensable for success.

Even when the invention of printing had made appeal possible, it was the drama, with its composite public interest, that most often paid the poet's bills. T in other garb only succeeded indirectly when she c her votary to some lucrative post or to a pension. who, through sheer sale of editions, runs to "yachts of houses" is a comparatively modern innovation, and, the inherent and enduring unpopularity of true art, is n to become a very frequent one.

If we examine the conditions of the poet's calling t find the majority of the nation apathetic, as it has alwa while a small, persistent minority seems to have charg with the task of keeping poetry alive. In the minority inner and an outer circle, the former consisting of th whom poetry really matters, and who would sacrifice its cause; the latter, of the class who, with a liberal ed have imbibed the idea that poetic taste is a branch of the same time in sympathy with the many, so much the luckier for him; but as the increasing complexity of civilization differentiates temperaments more and more, broad appeals must become more difficult to make, and souls that are star-like and apart will gain nothing by swerving from their orbit. Besides, until he call, he cannot know what heart will answer. Who could have predicted a public for Rossetti after Wordsworth, or for Kipling after Rossetti?

But when "each for the joy of the working" has fashioned his wares with his best cunning, he must step down into the trade arena and be a tradesman with the rest. He must, first of all, try to get hold of a publisher. Though he speak with the tongues of angels and have not that, he might as well be sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. Occasionally he may secure one at once, but publishers, as a rule, are shy of chaperoning the children of Apollo. They have, too often, found them wallflowers. And since the début of the novel, that belle of so many seasons, poetry has been pushed further than ever into the background. Cheap education has created an enormous uncultured reading public whom it pays much better to cater for than for the cultured few. One novel that hits the popular taste may yield a harvest rich enough to recoup for many failures, and the publisher, as a man of business, cannot be blamed if, speculating more and more in the form of literature which has, for him, the greatest possibilities, he become spoilt for small returns. Of course, plenty will be found willing to risk the poet's money and to publish his verses on commission, but a publisher with nothing at stake has an easy mind, and an easy mind is not the lever that lifts a book into notice.

But supposing one of the necessary courage and altruism to be found, he will be of very little use unless he thoroughly realizes the magnitude of his task. The poems are doomed if left to push their way by their own unaided merit. They can no more do so than mustard or starch. "Great is advertisement for little men," and who is so big that he can forego it? As much energy is required for floating a poet as for floating a gold mine. A boom should be strenuously engineered, and, as a starting point, there is nothing better or more legitimate than a favourable verdict from critics in authority. Unfortunately, however, such critics cannot weigh the deserts of all comers. Their time barely suffices for those who have already "arrived," and the others frequently fall into hands too timid or too obscure either to make or mar them.

Besides the all-round critics there are nowadays some specialized poet-makers, whose good word may be of great service, but here, too, there are drawbacks. They are apt to weaken the case for their client by over-statement, and when they have introduced a certain number of geese to the public as swans the public retaliates by treating their genuine swans as geese. Their power to help a new poet diminishes in proportion to the array of new poets they discover.

Still, let us imagine our poet lucky to the point of having been well reviewed. The threads of destiny are once more in

why should he shock us? He is iteration incar thing one can reasonably urge against him is th to the man in the street rather than to the ma who is the more likely purchaser. The latter, too often take his poetry upon trust, will hardl dence on the sandwich-man.

But, though so much depends on the ex publisher, those of the poet also count for mu and serviceable elbows he may wirepull
If his lungs lend themselves to it, he may "ra madden round the land," or he may step in side issue as an Adonis or a popular novelis deeds will help him; also any striking, howe characteristic. Or he may float into notice on th popular movement, as a patriot, a symbolist, a energetic temperament he ought to find some way poetry a going concern, and should the concern is probable, when he himself does, that does not all, but only the beneficiaries under his will.

Public attention once gained, the poet has a earning a living, but what of those who ply obscurity? Whether Inglorious Shakespeares their fate is the same. For minor musicians, there are minor posts. At the worst, if they st to the creative side of their business, they have the hat, or the pavement; while, if they al effort, they may support themselves by teaching, are deemed communicable. But who that indulges charity will toss the poet a penny for his som unless Touchstone, and he was a fool, ever regret belonging to him had not been made poetical by would pay a professor, at so much the hour, omission?

To some extent magazines and journals patro bard, but their dole of space is niggardly, whils are so careless about the quality of what they a wonders sometimes if they do not employ poetry n
the appearance of the page than anything else use of pictures in many eyes is to break up the b a wall. When the poet is paid, which is not alwa are small and swiftly vanish, yet not, alas! mor his work:

> Where go the poet's lines?
> Answer, ye evening tapers!
> Ye auburn locks, ye golden curls,
> Speak from your folded papers!

And after the magazines, what is left? Me ments are not common, and one fears that rhyme cards and crackers do not buy many Christmas g

No, poetry is a poor profession, save for the have at the same time rare gifts and rare luck.
then either forbear from making poetical those earn their own living, or endow them not compelling magic of Orpheus, but also with elbo

It is the lean purse that goes under—the purse that cannot risk uncertain issues, and that must be filled somehow, often under conditions that leave its owner little time or strength for the truer calling.

The generation that makes things hard for its poets must lay no flattering unction to its soul. Far from winnowing the chaff from the wheat, it increases the proportion that is worthless, while lessening the total yield.

MARGARET ARMOUR.

NATIONALITY IN ENGLISH ARCHITECTURE.*

The epoch which saw the decay of those great fabrics, Church and Empire, which ruled the Middle Ages both as ideas and as realities, the influence of the Renaissance which came to England simultaneously with the Reformation—for the year 1536, in which the Act of Supremacy was passed, may be fixed as the date when England was beginning to feel the effects of the Renaissance—is a period of singular interest to the architect. Enthusiasm for antique modes was slow to destroy our national architecture; the cry of Cyriac of Ancona in the fifteenth century, "I go to awake the dead," came late to the insular ears of Englishmen; Seneca was not unquestioningly chosen as the model of Tragedy, and Plautus and Terence were not the only groundwork of Comedy. We had not as yet touched the height—or the depths—of the Renaissance, and we had not reached that phase in the lives of our builders when Latin precedent was so overpowering as to produce the absolute subservience of our beautiful natural style of architecture to the specious pretence of the Italo-Vitruvian school. England has always been slow in the fine arts.

The First Pointed, the golden period of English architecture, received mortal hurt in the reign of Henry VIII., and presently the Gothic style lay a-dying. The Italian sculptor Torregiano, with his work on the tomb of Henry VII., led the way for the Cinquecentists; but Gothic, indigenous to Germany and actively assimilated by us, died slowly and lingered on until the end of the sixteenth century, traces of its influence, especially in the rural districts, being hardly lost for a century later. Good, sound, solid, and simple forms, well constructed by men who respected themselves and their work, were not to be easily superseded amongst a sturdy race by the resuscitated dogmas of Vitruvius. We were practically the last of European peoples to be overwhelmed by the new ideals, and when the change really came it came very slowly and through the French and German architectural "reformers."

It is less easy for us to follow the direct cause of the slow and insidious introduction of the artistic innovations of the South into our midst than it is to trace the same change in France. Louis XII. is said to have brought Fra Giocondo of Verona back with him to France and to have founded a school of architects. From these deliberate beginnings a form of building was ultimately evolved which entirely suited the French temperament. The Pseudo-Roman elements of style appealed

To understand the impending change with some intelligence we must reflect that Renaissance is a t has comparatively recently come into use to indic known but indefinite space of time and a certain pl development of the European races. If we insist literal meaning of the word, the Renaissance was a re- the metaphor may signify the entrance of an art up stage of energy, implying a freer exercise of facultie belonged to the mediæval period, or it may imply application of a fresh knowledge of antique work phases of thought.

The architecture of the Renaissance in England w same free product as the architecture of the Venetian the poetry of Ariosto, the sculpture of Michelang painting of Titian and Correggio. The poetry, the the painting of the Cinquecento was national; R architecture in England was not a freer exercise o but a grafting of foreign varieties upon a healthy suited to the land of its adoption. It flourished for two but finally most effectually killed the parent stock and, the glimmerings of a fresh Renaissance shown in quite rec we stand confessed to-day as a nation without a natio tecture. If this is, as it quite conceivably is, the r

COWDRAY HOUSE, SUSSEX. PART OF COURT.
Small Gothic Window (on the right), Tudor Bay Window next to it, two Elizabethan B

Renaissance movement, it were better that the move never been born.

It is with much greater pleasure, therefore, tha the pages of Mr. Gotch's book than we struggle wit magnificent folios edited by Mr. Belcher and Mr. M Mr. Gotch's book deals with much the same peri covered by his large and well-known "Architectu Renaissance in England," with the addition of work o half of the sixteenth century; but, whereas the prev exhibited a series of examples, to a large scale, of El and Jacobean buildings, the present volume takes the handbook. Its scheme is to take up the story of Eng tecture where existing text-books, such as Rickman the careful drawings of exterior and interior details, and there is a most acceptable chapter upon sixteenth century houses planning, illustrated by the collection of drawings in the Soane Museum, known as John Thorpe's. Whether or no this remarkable series of drawings was actually by the hand of John Thorpe or his son, or both, is a highly controversial subject, but the author takes the view, which we must confess coincides with the opinion we have arrived at after some study of the originals, that they give at least the first-hand idea of a contemporary designer of what Elizabethan and Jacobean houses were or ought to be.

Mr. Gotch's previous work hardly dealt at all with the historical development of architecture—which is, possibly, the more fascinating side. The present book is primarily historical, and deals with the characteristics which distinguish the architectural work of the period which lies between what the author considers as the end of Gothic and the thorough acceptance of Italian forms. The term Renaissance is used by Mr. Gotch to distinguish the style which characterizes the work of this period, and he adheres to nomenclature which divides architectural forms somewhat as follows:—Gothic, 1100-1500; Renaissance, 1500-1625, or thereabouts; Italian, 1625 and onwards. Of recent years people have got into the way of including under "Renaissance" all English work which has classic character, but Mr. Gotch looks upon Inigo Jones as the dividing line, and prefers to class his work as Italian; and as the term "Renaissance" and "Late Renaissance" has been applied to it, the author decided—not altogether happily, we think—to call work previous to this the "Early Renaissance."

CLEGG HALL, LANCASHIRE.
Rational Settlement.

By "Renaissance" work in England is commonly understood that work which exhibits Italian influence in a pronounced degree, and since it refers to style and not to period, the use of the term "Early Renaissance" is, to our mind, open to some objection. After a good deal of work had already been touched with the Italian spirit there was a good deal more which had no trace of it, but was quite Gothic; and the examples of the two styles exist side by side. The inclusion of Tudor work, of the buildings of Henry VII.'s period and some of Henry VIII.'s, under the nomenclature of "Renaissance" is a doubtful years of the Renaissance. The difference, eve confusion of terminology, is important. It a from the dislike of writers on Gothic archit work of the period with which the present book period which did not appeal to them and has adequately dealt with. They apply the term "ba "Bastard Gothic" or "Bastard Italian"—but w very far out of the wood when a writer so obvious a national and beautiful form of transitional wor early examples into the net of "Renaissance, however obvious in its teaching, however plainly be set down, can eradicate from the mind of the others"—more especially "the others" for who text is avowedly written, the fact that " architecture means, for ninety-nine men of architecture conceived in imitation of the work Italian and occasionally Flemish designers of the Mr. Gotch in his survey of buildings es country during the Tudor period seems to go Cold Ashton Manor-house, Somerset, whic for illustration in the prospectus, Stokesay Castl and the Wolsey portion of Hampton Court P Renaissance architecture in the sense that Northamptonshire, Blickling-hall, "Swakeleys," Uxbridge, are. It is inc sink such national and descriptive ti beneath the flood of the high-sounding fo

We are fully aware that Mr. Gotch h nomenclature in excellent company, but less, we think, misguided. He may historical student, but he is not doing the ability of our home-grown builder years of the sixteenth century. Holbei the brothers Adam, Hawksmoor, Sir Chr Sir John Vanbrugh, Sir Robert Taylor, a Chambers were men who worked, and wo tion, in a foreign style, and more o succeeded in flattering the proud ignora classicized patrons. But they were not the artistic breath of the soil, and the did, fine as much of it undoubtedly was part of our national expression of natio building.

It is for this reason that we dislike title Early Renaissance for work which styled Tudor. Cowdray-house, for exa illustrated in Mr. Gotch's book, is ma character, although the groining of th porch has Renaissance ornament about it. The hall-h such as Speke are also largely Gothic in spirit, w Renaissance ornament, and many of the buildings covered by Mr. Gotch are composed of work of d and consequently of different styles, but are maind the Gothic ancestry of these buildings, not the spirit blood, that distinguish them. The buildings of James I. are only Renaissance buildings in the s Rushton and Lilford-hall are. By the time of Inigo of Gothic ancestry had died out, and under Wren less had the insight and genius to resist his Royal to impose flamboyant French Renaissance upon were even less discernible, and in the eight English architecture had very few characteristics it from that of any other European country. Ind we may still find justification for what we do not altogether approve.

To come to a parallel in art, Cimabue, one of the most interesting figures of the Renaissance, was not a Renaissance artist in style, although he was in period. He started with work which owed nothing directly to antiquity. Inasmuch, therefore, as the whole period covered by Mr. Gotch's book is a transitional one from Gothic to Classic, it would have been better, in our opinion, to have chosen as a title "The Transition from Gothic to Classic." Not that Mr. Gotch has attempted in his well-written, well-reasoned, and exhaustive survey to champion one style more than another. He has approached the subject most successfully from the historical point of view, and presented an admirable collection of well-reproduced illustrations, which very graphically tell their own tale. If "students and others" do not happen to like the work illustrated, they are, he seems to say, welcome to their opinion, for he presents facts from which they can judge. And our quarrel with him turns mainly upon a question of terminology, and we feel that he takes "Renaissance" some thirty years too far back.

There is no doubt whatever in our minds that Messrs. Belcher and Macartney are safe enough in their title, for this handsome volume has been produced to illustrate a wide and varied selection of the civic and domestic buildings erected in England subsequent to the reign of Elizabeth. The title "Later Renaissance" is given to work of the time of the Stuarts, Queen Anne, and the early Georges. Some of them had, it is true, retained a little of the English tradition, but the work represented is characterized by forms for which the architects were mainly indebted to Italy, and not chiefly to Gothic. The work of that period was more than touched with the Italian spirit, it was denaturalized often cleverly, and occasionally almost appropriately. The subjects illustrated on a truly magnificent scale include Greenwich Hospital, Somerset House, Hampton Court Palace, Bolton-house, Castle Howard, Ham-house, Groombridge-place, Houghton-hall, Wilton-house, Melton Constable, Coleshill, Bowood, Seaton Delaval, and many others, and not only are the plates a very fine series, but we believe that the measured drawings of exteriors, elevations, and a very worthy complement to Mr. Gotch's "The A[illegible] the Renaissance" and to Mr. C. H. Reed's [illegible] "London Churches of the XVIIth and XVIIIth C[illegible]

We offer no apology for the inclusion of "Th[illegible]

RUSHTON HALL, NORTHAMPTONSHIRE [illegible]
Renaissance in Style and [illegible]

Work of Robert and James Adam" under this he[illegible] brothers Adam doubtless came late, at a peri[illegible] appreciation of the pure beauties of Greek arch[illegible] ornament had been rendered possible by the [illegible] James Stuart and Nicholas Revett. They came [illegible] of the movement, and our street architecture owes [illegible] elegance of taste and lightness of touch. We are [illegible] the remains of their work in the unremunerative Ad[illegible] dignity of Portland-place, and the decorative grace [illegible] and Luton-house. The present reproduction [illegible] illustrates decoration and furniture from their [illegible] engravings of "Works in Architecture" published [illegible] 1812. In the present issue Mr. Batsford has incl[illegible] five of the twenty-six plates which found a place in [illegible] issued reproductions of "Works in Architectur[illegible] brothers Adam, and by adding five more plates he has [illegible] included all that can be considered of a decorative [illegible] the famous originals. The noble work of the Scott [illegible] has had so powerful an influence upon English de[illegible] owe much to Mr. Batsford for his enterprise in re[illegible] work which is both scarce and expensive, for it is [illegible] interest of all concerned that the designs shoul[illegible] through the medium of the original drawings and [illegible]

CURRENT LITERATURE.

FÉNELON.

FRANÇOIS DE FÉNELON. By VISCOUNT ST. CYRES. (Methuen. 10s. 6d.)

FÉNELON: HIS FRIENDS AND ENEMIES. By E. K. SANDERS. (Longmans. 10s. 6d. n.)

Fénelon, in spite of Télémaque, is hardly a name for the biographer to conjure with in England; and the simultaneous appearance of two considerable accounts of his life and work is rather to be regretted. Students will perhaps like to study both. Mr. Sanders' book is in many ways a meritorious work with which the general reader might be willing to rest content. It does not cover any ground which is not covered by Lord Cyres, save in unimportant details. One might, perhaps, say that the former is to the latter as Thirlwall's history is to Grote's.

Lord St. Cyres belongs to the new school of Oxford historians whose main aim is to be accurate and exhaustive, who write for one another rather than for the world, and who throw out innumerable footnotes as they proceed, much as an invading general drops "details" at all important points along his line of communication. To some extent, perhaps, the pleasure of reading his pages is impaired by his painful anxiety to leave no joint in his armour which the weapon of the critic may penetrate. To some extent, too, the character sketch suffers not so much from the desire to be judicious as from the polite assumption that the writer is only assembling and co-ordinating facts with which his readers are already well acquainted—an assumption which, of course, is only likely to be warranted in the case of a small minority of readers at the outside. But though his method is to keep in close touch with his authorities, his style is by no means without individuality and distinction. His natural vivacity is, indeed, such that, though he follows the methods which tend to make the modern Oxford historians difficult to read, he is quite readable. He is no less live than learned. He can lash out with a vigour that is not in the least academic, and which comes as a joy to any reader who is beginning to weary of the expositions of mysticism—a thing eminently difficult to expound—or of the unavoidable technicalities of theological dispute. The long controversy with Bossuet, for instance, is related with a care and completeness which may well reduce many readers to the condition attributed by Macaulay to those who are "in at the death of the blatant beast." But they will breathe again when they read that:

> To many the whole matter will seem a mere futility, a dispute over things that pass man's understanding, conducted on one side by a pragmatical bully, and, on the other, by a hysterical hypocrite. And not a few must have risen from its study to find new zest in a saying of the great contemporary sceptic, Bayle, that God is too essentially good and reasonable to be the author of a thing so charged with odious sophistries as a positive religion.

It will be seen that Viscount St. Cyres does not approach Fénelon in the spirit of a hero-worshipper. His attitude is particularly candid when he deals with Fénelon's attitude towards the Huguenots. Here there was a legend to be dispelled. Fénelon is currently thought of as an apostle of toleration, and Mr. Sanders encourages this view of him, which can, it is true, be supported by certain quotations from his letters. The truth rather than nerve itself to sever the festering limb blow. The Church must use towards her stiff-necke remedial harshness, a terrible kindness, and here must be seconded by the civil power; sword Prince must stand at the gate of the sanctuary t from her external enemies, so that she may fresel approve, correct, and to enforce her decrees on a and contemners of her authority within the realm Fénelon's relations with the Mystics naturally pages in both books. Lord St. Cyres treatment of t on the whole more discriminating and complete Mysticism is explicable he explains it, and the his pages really live: Bossuet, the "snob in purpl de Maintenon to whom "Louis came for ref tempestuous beauty of his mistress"; Madame Gu Fénelon's friend "according to the laws of that affection of which the female bosom is the seat and of religion the objects"; and many others. The b acceptable contribution at once to historical and literature.

THE EMPIRE.

Mr. A. W. Jose's GROWTH OF THE EMPIRE (M not an entirely new book, though it has been so enlarged that the present work is something more edition. The chapters on the origin of our Empi American colonies, Canada, India, and Australia little alteration. A chapter on Imperial developm that is necessary in their case. Africa, however, i of which great changes have lately occurred impending, demands different treatment; and th so much to say on this subject that he must difficulty in keeping this part of the book withi limits. Certainly, it is no easy matter to describ but compendiously all that has happened of late yea the Sudan, the district of the great lakes, West most of all, South Africa. None of these events passed into the region of settled history; the proces ment has only just begun. Still, the author has furnish a succinct account of all the chief recent more than this can hardly be expected. He has evi pains to secure accuracy, but no writer on the day—May, 1901, is the latest date mentioned—can at correctness except as regards the very driest facts.

For this reason, these chapters, necessary as t less satisfactory than the earlier history of t "Empire" is a loose expression at the best f States bound together only in part by common i kindred blood. On the one hand, India is not a nor are such places as Malta and Wei-hai-wei colo other hand, while we assert Imperial rights over these we should hardly try to coerce such real colonies as Australia. Mr. Jose is an Imperialist who recogniz nature of the ties that hold together so many distant so many different conditions. His views are practical he indulges in no grandiose theories, but finally sum tion as follows:—"Stripped of all vainglorious ness a the Empire means just this, that we are a stage beyon the world in national evolution. The 'pack' fr history of so peculiar an Empire, to which no other, either ancient or modern, bears much resemblance, can only be written on a large scale. We do not know that it has been better summarized than by Mr. Jose, who sees things, at any rate when they are distant enough, in their true perspective. He has an eye, too, for the picturesque, and writes attractively of the early traders and mariners to whom we owe the first beginnings of our colonies. The seventeenth century settlements on the coast of North America have by this time a large literature of their own, but one is less familiar with the special circumstances which delayed the discovery of Australia. Mr. Jose has a good description of the voyages of Portuguese, Spanish, and Dutch explorers, and of the way in which they cruised and blundered among the islands, but failed to find the Australian continent. In 1526 the Portuguese reached New Guinea, and worked their way down the eastern coast of Australia as far as Cape Howe. Then, finding themselves on the Spanish side of the Pope's line, they quietly falsified their maps, and kept off other explorers for the next 150 years. Meanwhile, Spaniards came across the Pacific, finding islands in plenty, but not the great Terra Australis. Torres actually entered what are now called Torres Straits, and sailed away again; and while he took them for open sea, a Dutch ship carefully avoided them under the impression that they were dry land. Later, in 1642, Abel Tasman found Tasmania, and circumnavigated, but did not discover, Australia. In 1644, he sailed right across the western opening of Torres Straits, thinking that its reefs were the sure sign of continuous land behind them. Then came Dampier, in 1688, the first Englishman to set foot in Australia. Both then, and after a second exploration, he formed a poor opinion of the country, and left it for the more fruitful islands to the northwards. Finally, came Captain Cook's expedition, and the annexation of the whole great island, or continent, in 1770.

Sir John Cockburn has not done himself justice by publishing in book form his essays and speeches on AUSTRALIAN FEDERATION (Horace Marshall, 2s. 6d. n.). The essays, that is, do not do him (or their subject) justice; written for various magazines and all within a few months, they repeat themselves in phrase and matter and so rather confuse than instruct the reader. A single carefully-planned essay, describing shortly the progress and outcome of the movement which the author did so much to guide, would have replaced them to great advantage. The speeches, however, are really interesting. Sir John was a staunch advocate of State-rights; it was doubtful to him whether responsible government was compatible with federation. "Once they embarked upon federation," he said, "all traditions as to Parliamentary sovereignty would go by the board." Wherefore (the argumentative process is curious) he fought boldly, and in the end successfully, for a Senate elected by manhood suffrage and a Constitution whose ratification and alteration should depend on the direct vote of the electorates.

THE JESUITS IN PARAGUAY.

Mr. R. B. Cunninghame Graham's VANISHED ARCADIA (Heinemann, 9s.) is a remarkably interesting account of the rise and fall of the Jesuit missions in Paraguay. This Christian Republic, as it has been called, began early in the seventeenth century, and ended with the expulsion of the Jesuits in 1767. At that time, the Jesuits had complete dominion over a country as apertures where once were hung the bells. In the th a few half-wild cattle still were to be found. The vas where once the Jesuits branded two and three thous

a year, and from whence thousands of mules went fo and Bolivia, were all neglected. Horses were scarce crops few and indifferent, and the plantations made by of the tree (Ilex Paraguayensis) from which is made maté were all destroyed.

This will serve to show the extent of the ruin effe enemies of the Jesuits. It is a chapter of history deserves to be written, and, except for one peru author has done the work extremely well. We regre his pen is not under complete control, and that he indulges in religious and political obiter dicta whi being generally irrelevant, give one an unfavourable of his historical judgment. With this one reservatio nothing but praise for his book.

Jesuits landed in South America not ten year foundation of their order. By the year 1614 there Jesuits in Guayra and Paraguay, with letters p Philip III. authorizing them to convert the Indian parts. We cannot even give a summary of the events 150 years, but can only say that the troubles of t came least of all from the Indians themselves. The to be that from first to last the Jesuit treatment of did not commend itself to the secular authorities.
expected to lend themselves to the enslavement of t
they stood, in fact, between them and the Spanish e instead of supplying native slaves, created a free and native community. This, apparently, was the head their offending, and the main reason for their ex the early days of the missions they had also other e especially the Paulistas, a sort of half-bred slave-hun by land and water, whose hostility compelled the general exodus. This event, soon after 1650, i described by the author. The Jesuit Moses was Pa de Montoya, who, with infinite difficulty and equal nearly 12,000 Indians 500 miles down the Para territory in which they hoped to be unmolested by t slave-hunters. There for a time they had peace and new enemy arose in the person of the Franciscan Paraguay, Don Bernardino de Cardenas. He died i having failed to do the Jesuit Fathers as much harm intended. Then came a long and most unsatisfactory less serious trouble, which ended, after continual fri expulsion of the Jesuits in 1767. They had enemi both religious and political, but no charges were bro them, nor were the reasons for their expulsion ever They were supposed, erroneously, to be rich, and we be strenuous opponents of slavery. These were reaso

There is nothing Arcadian in the disturbed his missions, but the every-day life of these communiti presents a picture of Arcadian simplicity and happi
two priests who presided over each mission sta means whatever of coercing the Indians, it must b that the latter were quite content with their rulers.
townships were built in the form of large quadrangle
a church, storehouses, and ranges of dwellings thousand Indians. A species of communism prevail work was the consideration paid for food and Jesuits holding the Pauline view that if a man woul neither should he eat.

before eating, they all united and sang hymns, and then, after their meal and siesta, returned to work till sundown, when the procession again reformed, and the labourers, singing, returned to their abodes. . . . On rainy days they worked at other industries in the same half-Arcadian, half-communistic manner, only they sang their hymns in church instead of in the fields. . . In addition to weaving, they had tanneries, carpenters' shops, tailors, hat-makers, coopers, cordage-makers, boat-builders, cartwrights, joiners, and almost every industry useful and necessary to life. They also made arms and powder, musical instruments, and had silversmiths, musicians, painters, turners, and printers to work their printing-presses; for many books were printed at the missions, and they produced manuscripts as finely executed as those made by the monks in European monasteries.

Such, whether Arcadian or not, was the civilization introduced, through moral suasion only, by the Jesuits among the Indians of Paraguay, and snuffed out for reasons of State after it had endured for more than a century. The author, of course, holds no brief for the Jesuits. It is rather the communistic aspect of their enterprise that attracts him. But he shows that the Jesuits knew how to make the most of the unpromising raw material with which they worked, and that they would have had a still greater success if they had been allowed a free hand. In any case, it was no small achievement to teach agriculture and the arts of life to many thousands of idle Indians and to hold their affections for several generations.

THE SELF-CONSCIOUS SCHOOL.

MAIN CURRENTS OF NINETEENTH CENTURY LITERATURE. Vol. I. THE EMIGRANT LITERATURE. By GEORGE BRANDES. (Heinemann. 6s. n.)

This book is the first volume of a series designed to "trace the outlines of a psychology of the first half of the nineteenth century by means of the study of certain main groups and movements in European literature." It deals with the writers who derived most of their inspiration from Rousseau, and who, mostly from a safe place on the yonder side of the French frontier, shrieked or moaned, according to their temperaments, their disappointment with the results of the French Revolution. Some of them had never admitted that any revolution was required; some were shocked by its excesses. All of them were, in a general way, disgusted with the Napoleonic despotism because it introduced too much of the uniformity of the drill ground into human life and offered no encouragement to sentimental eccentricities. The great names among them are those of Châteaubriand, Nodier, Senancour, Benjamin Constant, and Madame de Staël. They were all extensively, if not actually, unhappy; and we seem to see them all sitting in a row, contemplating their own souls like so many chemical specimens, infinitely saddened by the spectacle. One of them, at all events, was constantly and thoroughly in earnest. Senancour, the sentimental atheist, was as sorrowful as the Slav pessimists of whom it has been said that they are the only pessimists who, as a matter of principle, do not enjoy their dinners. The others were too profoundly conscious of being interesting to be really miserable, and took something of the showman's interest in exhibiting the pageant of their bleeding and bedraggled hearts. But, whether they were happy or miserable, whether they were natural or posed, they where it was printed in 1887, and the perusal of it b to light that are at variance with some of Professo statements. It is not true, for instance, that Consta acquaintance of Madame de Staël in Paris. He carriage and introduced himself to her on the road t

DR. GEORGE BRANDES.

Dr. George Brandes, the great Danish critic and controversia author of the book here reviewed, is perhaps best known in this count his work on Shakespeare. His works are well known on the Contine own country he has been the inspirer of a real literary renaissance. H down the predominance of German thought in Denmark by rev countrymen the beauty of French writers, and he has inspired the with a real enthusiasm for literature. His professional career in Denm impeded by his revolutionary tendencies, and for some time he lived in Berlin. He has now returned to Copenhagen. Dr. Brandes was and is of Jewish extraction.

to Lausanne. Nor is it correct to say that "Mada evidently expected that he would marry her." He an offer of marriage, which she refused. It was only begun to take advantage of the liberty thus acco that she tried her hardest to chain him once more to wheels. Ultimately she gave up trying, and then her. "I have lost Madame de Staël," he writes, " never recover from the blow." Yet he did recover to love, not only his wife, whom he describes as angel," but also Madame Talma, Madame Réc others.

But, if Professor Brandes is apt to be careless i

But it was a happy thought to contrast Châteaubriand with Voltaire, who, "with all his restlessness and all his faults, sustained his life's battle freshly, unwearisedly, and invincibly to the last because he never for a moment waverest in his faith in his ideals"; and this summing up is good, and perhaps final:—

> A genius of René's type may employ religious phraseology, but he never truly merges himself in a higher being; his melancholy in its inmost essence is only the egoist's unsatisfied craving for enjoyment. As a genius René knows that the Deity is with and within him, and he can scarcely distinguish between himself and the Deity. He feels that his thought and his words are inspired, and where is the boundary between that which is of him and that which is not of him? He demands everything—the homage of the public, the love of women, all the laurels and roses of life—and it never occurs to him that he is in duty bound to make any return. He accepts love without loving again. Is not his a privileged nature? Is not he a prophet hastening through life like a fugitive, a fleeting fire, which illuminates, consumes, and vanishes?

The other writer who is adequately treated is Madame de Staël. All her important books are carefully analysed. Her helplessness in the presence of German philosophy is, perhaps, insufficiently emphasized. By trying to render its truths, which she never tried to understand, in the conventional language of sentimentalism, she stamped herself as shallow, as she also did by inviting Fichte to epitomize his philosophy in a statement lasting only a quarter of an hour, and interrupting him at the end of two minutes to say that she understood the Fichtean Ego was a device for helping lame philosophers over stiles. But Professor Brandes is right in regarding her as, on the whole, the sanest, as well as the best advertised, of the emigrants. This is his estimate:—

> The tendency to return to the past and the tendency to press onwards to the future, which produce discordancy in the actions and writings of the other members of the group, in her case combine to produce an endeavour which is neither reactionary nor revolutionary, but reformatory. Like the others, she draws her first inspiration from Rousseau, like the others, she deplores the excesses of the Revolution, but, better than any of the others, she loves personal and political freedom. She wages war with absolutism in the State and hypocrisy in society, with national arrogance and religious prejudice. She teaches her countrymen to appreciate the characteristics and literature of the neighbouring nations; she breaks down with her own hand the wall of self-sufficiency with which victorious France had surrounded itself.

It is a just verdict based on a careful study of the evidence. If criticism were often so discriminating and so well expressed as that of Professor Brandes, there would be a larger public for it than there is.

THE BERBERS.

Libyan Notes. By D. Randall-MacIver, M.A., Laycock Student of Egyptology at Worcester College, Oxford; and Anthony Wilkin, B.A. (Macmillan. 26s. n.)

The ancient Libyans or modern Berbers—for they are apparently the same people—form one of the puzzles of the ethnologist and their language is a philological crux. There is no doubt that the Libyans were connected with that early "Aryan" civilization which the Greeks found in a high state

tion to Algiers with a view to ascertaining whether that can be scientifically established regarding t supports the Petrie hypothesis. Accompanied by a friend he went to Algeria in the spring of 1900, and some and profusely illustrated volume contains th their joint observations. In a brief visit no extensiv tion of various tribes was possible, and the explorers confined their researches to the Kabyles of the J neighbourhood, and the Shâwiya of the Aures re sidering the shortness of the time, they accumul deal of material; but it must be remembered tha also able to avail themselves of the comprehensiv Hanoteau and Letourneux, Tissot, and others wh longer experience and better opportunities for The account of the modern industries, and espec pottery—always a suggestive aid to the archaeolo great care and minuteness, and the numerous draw and in colour, of Berber pots appear to justify t contention that there may have been a connexion b potters of prehistoric Egypt and the Libyan ance Kabyles. A conservatism of decorative types ex about 7,000 years is, perhaps, difficult of acceptance, authors hold that such conservatism is "natural t live in a low state of culture," and therefore "hav their old habits and methods of life, their old arts an without wishing to improve by foreign innovatio long experience has shown to be sufficient for t needs." We do not, however, quite understand ho the Shâwiya, in whom this quality is specially noted, have adopted or preserved in their pottery a primit of decoration resembling "very early European an Italian models," whilst their neighbours the Kaby show a rather intimate connexion with ancient Egypt Moreover, in dealing with very simple primitive de is not always necessary to assume outside influence patterns might easily be evolved independently.

The main interest of the work for ethnologists co anthropometric results obtained by the authors' caref ment of the heads of 107 Shâwiya and Kabyle men. show the absolute length and breadth of each head, the resulting cephalic index, the nasi-alveolar h bizygomatic breadth with resulting indices—be measures and statistics of hair, eyes, stature, &c. Th also photographed in full and in profile, and a numbe of heads are photographed—an admirable addition t method. The results are not favourable to the theo bodies disinterred by Petrie at Negada and elsewhe to Libyans. The mean cephalic index of the Ber (Preugrueber found it 764 on 181 Kabyles, and oth 767 from 180 Biskra Berbers), whilst the highest ceph measured on the skulls of the "New Race" in Egypt and between these two, as Messrs. Randall-MacIver observe, "there is a gulf which cannot be bridged the most liberal allowance," they add, "for the between the living specimen and the skull, the mod evidently falls not into the long-headed but inte dolichocephalic class, approaching closely to t cephalic." It is necessary, however, to point out tha index 773 for the 107 Berbers is obtained from an extr wide variation. Some of these Berbers had an index 700, and some above 860. That is to say, there are dolic and true brachycephalic Berbers, though the ma prejudice us against a volume, which, in spite of its essentially tentative and immature character, and a tendency to overestimate its own importance, contains a great deal of valuable data and suggests many interesting speculations. The investigation of the rude stone monuments of North Africa by a competent committee of excavators would be a real boon to archæologists; for what is here shown, in photographs and descriptions, points to many curious results.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

A New Shakespeare.

Messrs. Archibald Constable's new WORKS OF WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE, in 20 volumes (2s. 6d. net per volume), is a rearranged reprint, we fancy, of their Whitehall Shakespeare. The special new feature is the illustrations, one to each play. These are coloured, and are the work of many hands, the list including Mr. Jacomb Hood, Mr. Byam Shaw, Mr. Patten Wilson, Miss Eleanor Brickdale, and other well-known artists. They maintain, on the whole, a high level of excellence. Mr. Patten Wilson is not quite at home with colour effects, and Mr. Byam Shaw reveals that blackness and heaviness into which he sometimes falls as an illustrator. Miss Brickdale, to our thinking, carries off the palm for design and colour. But all the pictures add greatly to the interest of the edition, though we can but think it a pity that there is no reference to or list of the pictures at the beginning of the volumes, and, indeed, no means of knowing, save by the signature—often only initials—who the artist is. The flowery title-pages designed by Mr. Lewis Day remind us a little too much of a "Christmas book." The volumes are handsomely bound.

The War.

ARTS UNDER ARMS, by Maurice FitzGibbon (Longmans, 5s. n.), contains rather too many classical quotations of the sort that are to be found in the grammars; but the book is brightly written and there is good stuff in it. The author was in the Irish Hunt Contingent of the Imperial Yeomanry, and was captured at Lindley with Colonel Spragge. His account of this particular incident of the war is the first to be published, and should therefore be no less valuable to the student than interesting to the reader. He properly relates it at length and in detail. His description of the scene of the surrender is very graphic:—

> Our foes did not consider us disgraced. Hundreds of Boers leaped to their feet all round us, hurled their slouch hats into the air; many of them too, I remember well, were binding up their wounds. A few came up to us, and to our wonderment seized us by the hand saying, "Well done! you fought well, right well!" "By George," one of us replied, "you're sportsmen anyhow."

Knowing something about surgery, Mr. FitzGibbon was during his imprisonment required to act as surgeon to his battalion. At President Steyn's request he bound up the finger of the Government printer, who had hurt himself while striking off copies of a proclamation; and he had the delightful audacity to send in a bill for his services:—

> This I put into an envelope addressed to the President himself, placed it in the printer's uninjured hand, and requested him to be the bearer of it to the Landdrost's house. Little did I expect to see the man again; but in half an hour ample warning against it. The diary shows that t fortune was fooled no less completely than the Boe time when Lord Roberts was preparing his coup Villebois-Mareuil was noting in his little book, "Th are making themselves incorrigible laughing s without, a doubt, are played out." When Lord nearly ready, the Colonel was observing that "the only follow the railway which revictuals them, for th sufficient bullock wagons, and their infantry is not in to make ordinary marches in a country where fatiguing." Incidentally the book furnishes an item of evidence in favour of the much denounced conspiracy theory: "As President Steyn well said a it is all or nothing—a question of taking back the co of South Africa and finishing with Albion's ar duplicity." We are left wondering whether M. de Vo passage in his mind when he wrote, in his hyster that "the African Vendée presented to all who w devoted the attraction of a noble cause to be se translator has done his work creditably.

PICTURES OF THE WAR (Constable, 7s. 6d.), b Stuart, who represented the Morning Post, is very g and quite one of the better books on the Transvaal
There was a time when Mr. Stuart used to write for Observer with all the affectations which Mr. W. expected from his young men. He has knocked abo since then, and now his manner is easy and conver traces of the old influence being discoverable preface, which is avowedly written to insult pro-Stuart was one of the besieged in Ladysmith, an marched with Colonel Mahon to the relief of Mafek ever he saw he describes brightly or vivaciously, perhaps a little too fond of saying that this, that,
operation "put the fear of God" into the Boers, the fear of God but the fear of men with which it w to inspire the Boers; and it is not quite clear th been inspired with it yet. There are no pictures not even a portrait of the author in khaki, but th very good maps, including the Boer intelligence m smith, drawn from Lombard's Kop by Mr. Jorissen,

There is no fighting in THROUGH RHODESI SHARPSHOOTERS, by Rennie Stevenson (Macqueen, merely relates the march from Beira to the Trans and, though there is no attempt at military criticism, impression that the whole adventure was a lament Curiously enough there is not even any mention of the commanding officers concerned, though one won glad of an impartial account of the proceedings of S Carrington who, almost alone among prominent le so far to have escaped criticism. Camp life is the writ and he retails its humours with much gusto, in an manner, and without any literary pretensions.
fact, more slang in this war book than in any that w

A Good Nature Book.

Mr. E. Kay Robinson's TO-DAY WITH NA Richards, 6s.) must not be confused with so many similar kind which labour at the instructive and the Like them it takes us through the months in order arrangement and matter it is one of the best o have seen. It is full of really fresh observation, esp
the habits of birds; there is no meddling in the ma

returned with a large amount of material for the ethnology, folk-lore, and natural history of the district. Whilst this is being put into shape Mr. Skeat presents us with the first-fruits in these little tales. As usual, the motives are often familiar, but the form is new. The Malays, like the negroes, tell of a creature which is little of body but great of wit, but instead of Brer Rabbit he is the mouse-deer. The Malays, like other people, feel bound to account for natural facts—to expla'n why birds are not all of one sort, why cobs of ma'ze are perforated, why one shrub grows tall and another low, or for the origin of some common proverb. They have their deluge, the'r were-tigers, perhaps a trace of the totem. Ep'sodes of the tales are met with elsewhere; sometimes close parallels for the whole. Thus the "Pelican's Punishment" is a variant of a well-known Jataka story; "Father Lhmstlek," the "Tiger and the Shadow," and others are amongst the tales collected in Ind'a by Mr. W. Crooke, and published under the title of "The Talking Thrush." There is material here for the student.

When we consider the handling of these stories we cannot feel quite satisfied. Mr. Skeat has not embellished them in any way, and he has kept the Malay names, so that he appears to have the student in his view; yet the pretty get-up of the book and its pictures suggest that it is meant for children. The purposes of both may be served if the stories be frankly re-written, without native names, and notes be added giving the outline of the story as told, with authority and parallels. But Mr. Skeat has, we fear, fallen between two stools. Many of the tales, as "The Elephant's Bet," would amuse children well; on the other hand, some are dull and some are mere sketches of a story. The student, again, will expect a little more; but we freely grant that he ought to be pleased with what he gets, including a good index, and delightful illustrations by Mr. F. H. Townsend thrown in.

The Peninsular Campaign.

Reminiscences of Waterloo and the campaign in the Peninsula are numerous enough, and it cannot be said that any new light is thrown upon the military operations by Captain Hay's REMINISCENCES UNDER WELLINGTON (Simpkin, Marshall, 6s.), now edited by his daughter, Mrs. S. C. Wood. Nor have these fragmentary anecdotes and comments any literary value. They were written hastily in the spare moments of a busy life when the author was Commissioner of Police, during the years 1840-55, and in all probability they were never intended to appear in print. But they make interesting, if rather disconnected, reading, and bring before us more clearly than many more ambitious works the daily life of an officer on active service at the beginning of the last century. Captain William Hay—he received the C.B. for his services as Chief Commissioner of Police during the Great Exhibition of 1851—entered the old 52nd Light Infantry, now the 1st Oxfordshire Light Infantry, at the early age of sixteen, and found himself at the seat of war just two days after the battle of Busaco. With this regiment he saw plenty of fighting—about a dozen "affairs" and engagements—and with the 12th Light Dragoons, to which he was afterwards transferred, some twenty more, including the battles of Vittoria and Waterloo. The impression left upon us after reading these desultory reminiscences is that of a young, gallant, high-spirited officer, with considerable aptitude for his profession and an even greater aptitude for the contriving of practical jokes, many of which are detailed at some length.

The Thirteen Colonies.

[illegible]

part reproduced from old books and prints. The [illegible] studied her subject extensively, and her narrative is tr[illegible] enough, but her style of writing is somewhat heavy. [illegible] no lack of interesting matter—indeed there is too mu[illegible] to be presented adequately in so small a space—and t[illegible] history of the various settlements is sometimes cr[illegible] consequence. Possibly the "general reader," for whom [illegible] is ostensibly designed, will find rather too solid a feast o[illegible] tion for his taste. But the work was worth doing [illegible] author may be congratulated on having accomplis[illegible] thoroughly.

OLD DUTCH TOWNS AND VILLAGES OF THE ZUIDER ZE[illegible] 21s.) must be classed with pictures-books. The lett[illegible] Mynheer W. J. Tuyn is quite brief and quite obvious [illegible] up to the illustrations by the Heeren W. O. J. Ni[illegible] and J. G. Veldheer. Of these artists the latter is by far [illegible] effective draughtsman. He seeks and obtains broad [illegible] effects. His collaborator labours so hard at his de[illegible] you can scarcely see his houses for his bricks. T[illegible] introduction by a writer, who only signs with the initia[illegible] which is decidedly well-written; and the volume we[illegible] acceptable gift book if bestowed upon the right recipi[illegible]

Mr. D. J. O'Donoghue, the author of the life [illegible] Clarence Mangan, William Carleton, &c., has been [illegible] time engaged upon a new edition of THE POEMS OF I[illegible] Biographical and Bibliographical Dictionary of Irish [illegible] English verse. Part I. has just been issued by [illegible] O'Donoghue and Co., Dublin. The whole work has been p[illegible] re-written. Part I. contains over 600 notices, 111 mo[illegible] the same part of the old edition. Much doubtful mat[illegible] seventeenth and eighteenth century writers has bee[illegible] up, a feature of the work being the unveiling of the a[illegible] authors of squibs and pasquinades in the eighteenth [illegible] part of the nineteenth century. The book will be v[illegible] bibliographers and historians.

HOW TO STUDY ENGLISH LITERATURE, by T. Sharpe[illegible] son (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d.), contains much advice to [illegible] exception can be taken, though we doubt whether th[illegible] who need it will be capable of deriving much advantag[illegible] The most useful chapter is that which deals with th[illegible] from the point of view of the candidate for examinati[illegible] author shows the student how to "play to the gallery [illegible] very pleasing cynicism.

Short stories and newspaper articles—some grave, [illegible] —are found side by side in A MOTLEY CREW, by M[illegible] Steevens (Grant Richards, 6s.). Perhaps the serio[illegible] on Charities are really the best things in the bo[illegible] Steevens has a practical knowledge of the detail of phil[illegible] enterprise, and what she has to say on such subject[illegible] attending to. In the stories we find considerable art[illegible] too often hampered by ignorance of the life in which [illegible] brought to bear. They are, however, so well told th[illegible] justified in encouraging Mrs. Steevens to continue, no[illegible] in warning her to recognize her limitations. The open[illegible] "A Sketch in Five Phases," is well worth reading. [illegible] imagined, though it might have been better told and is [illegible] story for the space allotted to it. If Mrs. Steevens we[illegible] it out instead of indicating it, and present tableaux [illegible] relating events, she might write a very impressive, tho[illegible] very cheerful, novel. In saying that her work strikes [illegible] of the clever amateur, we should wish the accent to

EDUCATIONAL BOOKS.

English History.

Mr. Arthur Hassall's CLASS BOOK OF ENGLISH HISTORY (Rivington, 3s. 6d.) is the work of an experienced teacher and capable historian and is well suited for teachers or "crammers," which is its avowed purpose. It is full of facts, brought up to date, and carried to the end of Queen Victoria's reign. The chapter divisions are according to reigns, and each is provided with an appendix of "Important dates," "subjects for class," blackboard illustrations," and "notes and illustrations." In the hands of the pupil, save for purely cram purposes, it would, in our opinion, be of very little use, as the style is as bald and dry as possible, the arrangement mechanical, and the matter confined to a chronicle of facts, ignoring almost entirely social and intellectual movements. There is, in fact, nothing to stimulate the historical sense. This, however, must be the oral work of the teacher, and for him the book will have great value as a text-book on which to found his teaching.

ENGLISH HISTORY FROM ORIGINAL SOURCES, 1307-1332, by N. L. Frazer (Black's Historical Series, 2s. 6d.), is an excellent idea well carried out. Accounts are reprinted, or translated, from contemporary documents, of the chief events of this troublous time. It is a most interesting book for the general reader; dip where he will, he will find something to catch his attention, a vivid picture from Froissart, a stirring political poem, a bit of Chaucer or Burns, an illuminating extract from Marlowe. We can find no fault with the inclusion of Burns and Marlowe in such a book; although they are not strictly "original sources" for history, they are such for the understanding of history. The young student may here taste for the first time of Adam Murimuth, the Chronicle of Lanercost, Thomas Walsingham, and others whose names he has never heard; he may learn something of the methods of dealing critically with the sources, and how to extract the essence from Rymer's "Fœdera" and the Statutes of the Realm. We can hardly conceive of a more useful companion to school history, and only wish there were more of it. Tables of dates and chief events and a bibliography are added for reference and further work.

PROBLEMS AND EXERCISES IN ENGLISH HISTORY, Book B, 1399-1603, a revision term course, containing sixty typical questions, with full answers, hints, and references, by J. S. Lindsey (Cambridge: Heffer, 2s.), is part of a comprehensive work, planned for teachers and students. The questions may be had separately for class use, and the answers can be given after the papers have been done. The hints and bibliography are excellent; the questions cover a great deal of ground, and the answers are good models. We opened this book, we confess, not without some prejudice; but we believe it to be sound, and likely to prove a real help. It is not a cram work.

A FIRST HISTORY OF ENGLAND (Part I. to 1066 A.D.), by Miss C. L. Thomson (Marshall, 1s. 6d. n.), is the result of experience. Miss Thomson is wont to teach history to children of ages from nine to twelve by means of stories orally delivered, and this book is meant to be used in revision, not to be given as a text-book in the first instance, nor (as Miss Thomson dryly says) to be "learnt by heart." The book contains ten chapters of about fifteen pages each, illustrated with pictures, and is one term's work. This is the most rational attempt to improve the teaching of history we have met with. It is an admirable little book.

Miss Thomson has also edited CARMINA BRITANNIÆ (Marshall, 3s. n.), a selection of poems and ballads (illustrations

Ancient Britain, wars and pirate raids, the Crusaders, and other such topics, ending with Rebellion. It is a capital reader, which ought colour to the dry history lessons in a Board school, interesting to more fortunate children than those standards.

English Literature.

THE AGE OF CHAUCER, by F. J. Snell (Bell, 3s. a series of Handbooks of English literature. It co deal of matter, and is clearly put without affectati somewhat abrupt in transitions. The best part se chapter on Miracle Plays. It is a useful companio better suited perhaps for students than for th wishes to understand that he may enjoy. Prof. Ha tion is rather laboured.

To their editions of the "English Classics" M have added MACAULAY'S LIVES OF JOHNSON AN taken from the "Encyclopædia Britannica," edited Downie, and BROWNING'S STRAFFORD (2s.), edited b Wilson. Others besides school-children will no use for the notes in the latter volume. In the for are not so necessary for any but strictly education but they are quite satisfactorily done. The e understands the limitations of these essays, so high Macaulay. They have every good quality save th and inspiration; but of these qualities they have

Mr. E. E. Speight has already proved his literary matters, and we are safe in his hands w and edits for schools POEMS OF SHELLEY (Black, not possible to explain to schoolboys the blot on but if a Life is given it is not just to omit pointing moral weakness which marred his character. H explained, but we are glad to say there are Some useful test questions are added.

JULIUS CÆSAR, in Black's School Shakesp edited by L. W. Lyde, M.A., is from the scho quite admirable. The analysis of the plot is a mod and conciseness, the notes are quite short and and the whole is well printed. This is one of t books we have seen.

HENRY V., edited by Fanny Johnson for School Shakespeare" (1s.), is a play which, with it rhetoric and fiery patriotism, will always be a schools. This edition is not distinguished also It has the usual aids (including a genealogica glossary), and its notes have the merit of belu they are very numerous. The book is best su young children or elementary schools.

